THE JARR FAMILY GOES TO THE MOVING PICTURE SHOW.

By Roy L. McCardell, in New York "Evening World."

"Can't we go to see the moving picture shows, paw?" asked the little Jarr boy.

"No, you can't!" said Mr. Jarr emphatically.

"I wanna go! I wanna go!" cried the little girl.

"I do wish your mother would come home!" cried Mr. Jarr testily. "I can't have a minute's peace to read my newspaper."

"Mamma said if we were good you'd take us to see the moving pictures," whined the little boy.

"Boo hoo! Me wanna go!" bawled the little girl, crying with dry eyes.

All this trouble in the Jarr household was due to the fact that the "Peril to the Playhouse," a nickelette moving picture show, had invaded the Jarr neighborhood.

For months past a building, the lower floor of which had been occupied by a funeral director and embalmer until the proprietor had died and buried himself, had been boarded up in front, and "after extensive alterations," which consisted of tearing out partitions and putting up much gimcrack stucco work and applying white paint copiously had, the boardings removed, burst on the view of the delighted juvenile population of the neighborhood as a fairyland-fronted "Bijou Dream"—which is a euphonism for smelly darkness and flickering pictures on a screen inside.

Just now from the street below the exultant voice of little Ikey Slavinsky had floated up: "De picksher show is open!" and the Jarr children, hanging out the window to catch the joyous words, had immediately descended upon their father for the price of admission.

"I don't believe in those moving picture shows," said Mr. Jarr severely. "In the first place most of them are fire traps; in the second place they are injurious to the eyes; in the third place the pictures they show are simply exemplified dime novels. You two can't go, and that settles it!"

But that didn't settle it. Master Willie Jarr and little Emma Jarr sniffled and sobbed in acute disappointment until Mr. Jarr had administered a sounding slap to each, whereat they stopped sobbing and sniffling and bawled lustily.

They were full at these Home Exercises for the Voice when the door opened and Mrs. Jarr came in from her shopping.

When her hand was upon the door the children commenced to bawl:

"Papa says we can't go to see the moving pictures, mamma! Can't we go? You said we could go!"

"Oh, dear!" said Mrs. Jarr, when she had silenced the children by shaking them breathless, "it seems a pity that I can't go out of the house for a breath of fresh air but what your father must punish you! How would he like to have to put up with you all day, I wonder?"

"I'm sure I hardly touched them," said Mr. Jarr. "They heard some child go through the street shouting that that new moving picture show around the corner was open and they immediately demanded to be taken to see it."

"You said we could go, maw; you know you did," piped up the boy.

"Oo said if I was a dood dirl I should go!" whimpered the little girl.

"It's no place for them. I don't believe in it!" said Mr. Jarr.

"Can't we go, maw?" whined the boy.

"You SAID we could!" bawled the girl.

"Oh, dear! I believe I did promise them!" said Mrs. Jarr, looking around helplessly. "And anything to keep them quiet! Won't you take them, papa?"

Papa stirred uneasily.

"Well, if I must, I must," said he. "Suppose you come along?"

"Me?" asked Mrs. Jarr. "I hate moving pictures."

"So do I," said Mr. Jarr, "but come along and let us see what the new place is like."

The new place was plaster mermaids and gold paint and white outside. Inside it was Stygian darkness. The scene from real life being depicted on the screen was called "Mr. Henpeck." Every time Mr. Henpeck was thrown out of a window by his mother-in-law after marriage, or kicked out of the house by his prospective father-in-law before he carried off his bride, a mechanic playing the piano stamped his foot upon a pedal that clashed a drum, asd all present laughed.

"What a foolish thing!" said Mrs. Jarr, as they came out into the light with the satisfied children. "Did you notice that the man wore the same overcoat in the picture labelled 'Five Years After Marriage' that he did when he courted the girl?"

"Ah!" said Mr. Jarr. "That is realism for you!"

WHAT DRAWS THE CROWDS?

Bellaire, Ohio, March 20, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I read with interest Mr. W. L. Jones' letter from Coatsville, Pa., under the heading "Live Wire." Mr. Jones failed to state what it was that was filling his house, and left the issue in doubt. Let me tell you our circumstances, as we have been convinced that it is the pictures that the people want. Our new Olympic has seats for 680, and we would like to have a thousand. We run four new reels of pictures every day, advertising that we use the entire output of the Licensed companied and that every reel they make will be seen at the Olympic sooner or later. We cut out the illustrated song, as it detracted from the picture; we cut out all premiums, as the people did not care enough to come and see them, and we believe we get our crowds by having a feature picture and advertising it. Urban's "Acrobatic Fly" packed our house to the doors; Gaumont's "Vale of the Aude" which I consider one of the best scenic pictures ever put on a curtain, made another big house; any Biograph, advertised, will draw. A Kalem Indian film, a Selig Western, an Essanay comedy, one of Edison's Richard Harding Davis or some special writer film, always means a noticeable increase in our business. We have put close to seven thousand people through our house, using nothing but new pictures. Ours was formerly a vaudeville house, but it fell flat. The census population of Bellaire is 9,987, and there are two other good houses here besides ours, and if other cities do not support the pictures it is because they are not put on right.

INDEPENDENT MANUFACTURERS, DO YOU NEED A GUARDIAN?

April 7, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Allow me to make a brief statement through your valuable columns. Last year the Independents were in dire need of American film. At that time an American picture sold, no matter what the subject was. Whether it was light-struck, under-exposed or poorly printed, it sold. Since that time, however, new and promising Independent manufacturers, such as Thanhouser, Powers, Actophone, and Nestor, have come into the business and have spent real money in building factories. This means legitimate competition and the ultimate elimination of concerns which have nothing at stake.

Every Independent exchange in the country will agree with me that to-day is the brightest day that has dawned since the business was divided. What, then, is the object of this new proposed combination? Manufacturers do not need it; exchanges do not want it. Who does? Only those manufacturers who fear honest competition and who desire to hold all the stock of a company that will control the manufacturers as to their output, and exchanges as to their purchase.

Why should we admit that we are incompetent to manage our own businesses? A centralized shipping office for all manufacturers would be beneficial on certain lines, but I would advise all Independent manufacturers and importers not to sign any agreement before the Alliance meeting of May 6, no matter how rosy it looks, else some day the shingle hanging in front of your door will be taken down and a new one will replace it.

I am, yours for an open market and honest competition,

A. G. WHYTE,
1 Madison avenue, New York.

LAEMMLE'S MINNEAPOLIS EXCHANGE MOVES.

Minneapolis, Minn., March 31, 1910.

Manager Moving Picture World:

My Dear Sir—I wish to take this means of informing you that the Laemmle Film Service, of Minneapolis, are moving their offices from "100 Lumber Exchange" into the fourth floor of the Sykes Block. We are making this move solely on account of not having ample office space to conduct our business, which I am glad to tell you is rapidly increasing.

If you would care to use this item for a piece of news, I can assure you same will be appreciated.

Thanking you sincerely for past favors, and with best wishes, I remain, Sincerely yours,

JAS. V. BRYSON,
Manager the Laemmle Film Service.

A CLEVER ADVERTISING SCHEME.

Oklahoma is so imbued with the spirit of progress and advancement along every outlet for human activity, one is not surprised to unearth in the capital of that Southwest State an ingenious advertising scheme for moving picture theatres. Manager B. H. Powell, of the Olympic Amusement Company, which controls a syndicate of houses in Oklahoma City, has not only taken advantage of the current saving and light-improving qualities of the G-E Mercury Arc Rectifier, but has utilized its advertising possibilities as well.

The illustration is an exterior view of the Gem Theater, one of the Olympic houses, showing a Rectifier outside, on the balcony, where the brilliant bluish light can be seen by passersby for a long distance. The apparatus proved so successful in attracting attention, all the theaters in Oklahoma City are now using the G-E Rectifiers in this manner.

HUDSON COUNTY, N. J., LIST OF HOUSES.

We give below a complete and correct list of every show house devoted to moving pictures in Hudson County, N. J. It varies greatly with the list of a year ago. While nearly all of these houses were in existence a year ago, more than half of them have changed management. The past year has produced only three brand new establishments as compared with three of the old places that discontinued business and were dismantled.

The Amusement Managers' Association of Hudson County has given a good account of itself in the past. The loyalty of these men to each other and their unselfish work for the benefit of the whole State of New Jersey stamps them as a set of men who are a credit to their business. To them the exhibitors of New Jersey owe thanks for their heroic work in once repealing the obnoxious "Child Law" and once blocking its passage, but we have never heard a word of praise for them from the outside, in fact they have met with indifference, and for that reason they are not so keen this year to pick chestnuts out of the fire for their brethren down the State.

It is understood that the Atlantic City forces will this year marshal their strength and influence at Trenton, where the salaried busybodies have introduced for the third time their pet measure, that bill known as the "Child Law," which must be indeed well thumbmarked by the rough handling it has had during the last three years. Their determination to pass it is a sublime and beautiful thing, in fact if the salary part of it should suddenly stop and they still continued the work, it might almost be called martyrdom.

The Hudson County managers have not lost heart or interest, but consider that they have done their share of the active work and are now willing to remain passive and give other districts a chance to see what they can do. They still give the case their moral support, and if appealed to will help it along financially. They are in favor of any move that may be made, but it's not their move. Meetings are still held by the Hudson County managers every Friday, 4 P. M., at the Summit Hippodrome, 250 Summit avenue, West Hoboken, for the discussion of local matters, but exhibitors from other districts are invited to write or happen in at any time, where they will be received with welcome.

A Romance of the Western Hills

Civilization as it Appealed to the Indian Maiden.

Indian subjects are always attractive inasmuch as they give an opportunity for outdoor photography, and this Biograph subject, while being a story of exceptional interest, comprises a series of most wonderfully beautiful views in the mountains of Southern California. The moral presented shows the bitter hopelessness of the redman. An Indian maiden is adopted by tourists, and is being educated by them when she meets the young nephew of her benefactor. She is led to believe that the young man loves her, only to find herself forgotten for one of his own race. Her appeal to her benefactor meets with repulsion. In fact, it is assumed that she is presuming. She now finds civilization a gift not yet perfect, and so goes back to her own people.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

A ROMANCE OF THE WESTERN HILLS.—Civilization as it appealed to the Indian maiden. A party of tourists visit an Indian village and are charmed by the pretty little Indian girl, who offers for their consideration ornaments and beads. A book of civilization falls into her hands and naturally the girl is fascinated by the apparent mysticism of it, but her lover, a young brave, tells her "White man's book no good." This, however, does not dissuade her, as her slight association with the white people has made their sphere appear to her enthralling, hence when she has the chance of living in their world she is elated. She is adopted by a kindly disposed couple who treat her almost as their daughter, educating her and showering on her every attention. She is happy, but the tyranny of fate conspires, and she is made to realize the bitterness of her condition. The young nephew of her benefactors arrives from college, and is attracted by the little Indian girl, and pays her quite some attention. This the little girl assumes is love for her, and is happy in that assumption, for she confides in him; hence what a blow it is to her when later she finds the young man with his fiancee, a young lady of his own race. She pours out her heart's sorrow to her benefactors, who, of course, are amazed that she should have expected it otherwise. Now she finds civilization a gift not yet perfect. Back to her own people she goes, and her former lover upon learning her plight, vows vengeance. The young brave makes his way to the house of the white people and upon finding the nephew alone in the garden, grapples with him, and would have finished him had not the Indian maiden, who followed him, begged him to spare the white boy. While they are thus engaged, the boy's fiancee approaches, and learning from the Indian how the fellow had pretended love for the red girl and won her heart, she realizes what a wretch he is and breaks her troth with him, bidding him never speak to her again.

THE KID.—He unwittingly plays Cupid. From the title of this film one would naturally assume that it depicted the impish pranks of a mischievous youngster, and, in a measure, so it does, but his innocent mischief has a delectable result. To Walter Holden since the death of his wife, falls the responsibility of raising his only child, a boy about twelve years old. Holden being of domestic tastes, feels the loneliness of the home without his wife, despite the presence of his interesting boy. The youngster, ebullient in spirits, was, while a source of anxiety, a great balm to his crushed heart, and father and son were almost constant companions. Like all boys of his age, he is a bit wild and frankish, and we find him amusing himself playing cowboy and soldier, with an old-fashioned flint-lock pistol and cowboy makeup. His father enters into the fun for a time as earnestly as the Kid. Finally the Kid goes out into the field to play the game. A short distance from the house is a very tall windmill tower and to the top of this, by means of a ladder, climbs pretty Doris Marshall to enjoy the beautiful view therefrom. The Kid happens along, and seeing the pretty girl on the tower, an idea strikes him. "Aha! The fair maid will be a prisoner on the tower." This he effects by removing the ladder, and so she remains until the father seeking the whereabouts of the boy, discovers his deed, and rescues Doris from her lofty position. This is their first meeting and they are visibly attracted by each other; even the Kid takes a fancy to Doris, and wants her to come along with pop and him. An energetic Cupid, to say the least. Well, the girl is again irresistibly drawn to the tower. By a trick of fate, the father also climbs the tower, not knowing Doris is already there. Here is fine sport for the Kid. By removing the ladder he makes prisoners of them both. Here he tantalizingly keep them until the novelty of the act wanes. They are, however, together long enough to intensify the feeling induced by their first meeting. Upon reaching ground, the father makes a faint attempt to spank the Kid, but Doris begs him not to. This raises her still higher in the esteem of the Kid, and he renews his pleas for her to come with them. Well, the boy's trick results in a new mamma for him.

A CASE OF IDENTITY.—This film shows another case handled by the wonderful detective Hogarth, and carries us to an entirely different locale and set of situations.

The mystery begins when Hogarth receives a call from a foreigner who, being unable to speak English, starts to write his business and drops to the floor dead before finishing. There is no clue upon the man, save the tailor's mark on his overcoat, but for a mind like Hogarth's that is enough. Finding the tailor, he learns the name of the mysterious stranger. He is mystified when the next day's paper announces that the man whom he saw lying dead on the floor is to sail with his daughter for Europe at noon. Being a man of decision as well as intuition, Hogarth makes a quick dash for the boat, and finds himself a fellow-passenger of the man, who is apparently the double of his mysterious caller, and the girl, who is supposed to be his daughter. He soon finds that there is a love story, for one of the deck hands on the liner exchanges notes and signals with the girl, and Hogarth soon learns that the man is her fiance in disguise.

He contrives to enter the stateroom of the girl's supposed father and there finds evidence that the man is in the employ of an unscrupulous Prince who intends to force the girl into marriage, and also that the man's power over the girl comes from a forged note purporting to be from her father, of whose death she is ignorant. How Hogarth convinces the girl of the terrible danger she is in and of his power to save her, and how he confronts the pretended Marquis and after a desperate struggle succeeds in taking him into custody, makes a thrilling and effective climax to an intensely fascinating story. The scenes taken on board the ocean liner are exquisite in atmosphere and photography and lend a splendid reality to an almost perfect film.

THE MINER AND CAMILLE.—A theatrical repertoire company is playing through Colorado, their principal bill being "Camille." During a performance of this well-known drama a humorous incident, the subject of this film, occurs. A big-hearted Colorado mountaineer and his friend are in the audience, induced there by the proprietor of the theater, who knew them in the mining camp. Neither of the men has ever witnessed a dramatic performance, and as the play progresses both become absorbed in it. The older man is so carried away that at the vital moment when Armand upbraids Camille and refuses to listen to her pleadings, he jumps upon the stage and throws the leading juvenile man of the company bodily through the scenery "up stage center." The explanation that the whole thing is a play brings the miner and his friend, who has attempted to assuage the violent protest of the audience by drawing his "Colt's 44," to a realization of their ridiculous attitude. Peace is declared, but the miners get stage fright and refuse to return to the box. After the play they are seen toasting the "Queen of Tragedy" and, incidentally, the leading man of the company, who good-humoredly accepts the apology of the miner, though his face is covered with several pieces of court plaster.

READY IN A MINUTE.—There is a pretty girl before the firelight in a pretty gown. There is a young man in opera hat and coat, the happy possessor of two theater tickets, but the girl's pretty gown is not pretty enough and she must change it. She will be "ready in a minute"—and then the fun begins.

The clock goes round and round, and the hours soin away until even the calendar begins to show the lapse of time and its leaves show the passing days as they turn over. Then it must be months after, for this surely is a beard which has grown on the young's man face and it certainly is true that his forehead has grown very high. Still the time flies, and we see the poor young man now old and gray. A long white beard decorates his still immaculate shirt front, but there are holes in his elbows and knees, and he has grown very feeble. The plaster falls from the walls, huge cobwebs stretch across the doorways, and even the furniture has fallen to pieces.

And then She appears and all the illusion vanishes and—it really has not been so long! It is not even too late for the theater, if one doesn't mind missing the first two or three acts.

GALLEGHER.—The first scenes show how the story begins with the murder and robbery of an old millionaire and the escape of his secretary. The detective who is put on the case comes into the newspaper office to see his reporter friend and there Gallegher hears of the case, when he becomes possessed of the wild desire, which probably fills every boy's heart, of playing detective. He is so enthralled with the profession and the personality of the sleuth that in spite of all remonstrances from his employer, the editor, he follows the man when he leaves the office. The next scenes show Gallegher watching the passers-by on the street corner and in the railway station, searching vainly for a man who looks like the photograph of the much sought secretary, who has only three fingers on his right hand.

The boy's vigilance is unexpectedly rewarded when he finds that the criminal has purchased a ticket for a small suburban station near which, as the initiated know, a prize fight is to take place that night. The criminal has disguised himself by removing his beard and moustache, but unfortunately for him this makes him look all the more like his youthful picture in the detective's possession. Gallegher, not knowing that his absence from the office resulted in his discharge, seeks his friend, the reporter, and taking the detective with him they go to the prize fight.

The fistic encounter takes place in an old barn and they are easily able to locate the criminal, but just as the fight is in full progress, the detective about to arrest his man and the newspaper reporter and Gallegher to get their great "scoop," the police appear and everybody is under arrest. The reporter's plea to be allowed to send his story to the paper is unavailing. The sergeant is inflexible, but Gallegher, slipping his hand into the reporter's pocket, takes the notebook and, crying pitifully, succeeds by his very size and youth in getting by the sergeant and away. He borrows a cab and though fired after by the other officers lashes the horse into a run, and the next scenes show him speeding away toward the newspaper office where compositors and pressmen are holding the presses for the promised story. His boy's wild ride is stopped twice by officers, whom by street gamin shrewdness succeeds in throwing off the track, and just when all hope has been abandoned and the paper is going to press without it he rushes in with the story and falls in a little heap on the floor. Needless to say that after this he does not lose his job.

DROWSY DICK, OFFICER NO. 73.—"Drowsy Dick," a young officer on the police force, is afflicted with a sleepiness that nothing seems able to overcome. He incurs the enmity of the sergeant by yawning instead of laughing at the sergeant's story and is assigned to a tough district as a reward for his demerit. His soporific tendency is here laughingly displayed.

Cries from a basement where a free fight very evidently is in progress fail to excite him, and he stretches lazily as he descends. An instant later we see him surrounded by probably the most villainous crew of desperadoes and thugs ever collected in one room. They creep upon him, raise their weapons to strike the fatal blow—but why tell how he escapes, or what his reward?

A YORKSHIRE SCHOOL.—We see the Nickleby family discussing their financial condition and Nicholas deciding to answer Squeers' advertisement for an assistant. Then we see Mr. Squeers gathering together some of his prospective charges, his meeting with Nicholas, their departure from the "Saracen's Head," a London hostelry, their arrival at the school, the incidents in the school room showing Squeers' brutality and introducing Smike in his pathetic character. Nicholas expresses to Smike his deep sympathy for him, and while he is doing so Squeers enters and takes Smike by the collar, striking him a blow with his cane and threatening Nicholas.

That night Smike steals away from the school, only to be brought back by the wily Squeers. The next day as Nicholas is teaching his class Squeers enters, dragging Smike after him, and, after telling all of the shivering youngsters that he is going to give them a practical illustration of the dangers of running away, proceeds to belabor Smike. Nicholas can stand it no longer—he springs upon Squeers, snatches the rod from his hand and administers to him a beating which brings the bully to his knees. Nicholas then takes Smike and leaves the school.

His prospects for the future look very dark, but on his arrival at home his mother shows him a letter which she has received from her brother in India, to the effect that he is rich and is about to return to England, where he will provide for the comfort of Mrs. Nickleby and her family. All look at Smike in his wretchedness and agree that he shall share the joy which has come into their household. This is the happy ending of the story which cannot fail to win applause of the observer.

SHE WANTED A BOW-WOW.—As the title suggests, Polly wants a "bow-wow," anything in the line of a four-legged canine. She takes the matter up with Bob, who argues that a "bow-wow" is a nuisance in the house and flatly objects to bringing a dog into the family.

Polly cries and tells Uncle Joe about wanting a "bow-wow" and how her horrid Bob will not permit her having one. Uncle Joe is all sympathy and tells her she shall have one, and promises to go right out and make the purchase. She is highly elated and begins making preparations for the reception of her little "bow-wow."

Bob and Polly have in their employ a maid and a butler, who, a year before, had secretly married. Some time before James and Marie had come to live with Bob and Polly, they had been blessed with a little girl baby, which was being kept by a friend of Marie's. On the day that Polly had taken her complaint to Uncle Joe, the servants had received a short note from Mrs. Wilson stating that the baby was ill and for them to call and get it.

It is then that the trouble begins. Uncle Joe brings home the pup, and fearful of Bob's wrath they resolve to hide the dog and write a note to Bob, stating that it belongs to them (Uncle Joe and Polly), for him to forgive them and to take good care of it. The pup is hidden behind a screen in the room, and Polly and Uncle Joe slip out to await developments.

In the interval which follows, James and Marie enter with the baby. Fearful of losing their positions if Mr. Bob learns of their marriage and of the baby, they are in a quandary as to what to do with it. They hear someone coming and seeking to stave off inquiries until the last moment, they slip the little one behind the screen at the other side of the room. Bob finds the letter and, of course, looks behind the wrong screen. Horror is expressed in his face when he sees the baby, for he presumes that this is the "it" referred to in Polly's note.

Resolved to annihilate his treacherous wife and unfaithful wife, Bob searches the house for the two, but the crime is averted when the two frightened servants confess to the ownership of the baby, while Polly and Uncle Joe bring out the pup.

THE BAD MAN AND THE PREACHER.—"Snake" Williams, typical bad man, and a little group of cowboys are found loitering lazily about the Snakeville, Ariz., barroom when the noonday stage coach out of Phoenix rumbles around the bend and deposits one lone passenger. Interest is immediately aroused and as the stage coach pulls out Snake, the constant bully, sidles up to the newly arrived stranger to inquire the latter's business. Explaining at the same time that although the town has no mayor or reception committee, he will be pleased to do the honors. Following this statement Snake invites the stranger into the "Silver Dollar" for any refreshments the gentleman might desire, with the recommendation that "old Henry" is about the best the "Silver Dollar" affords.

"I am a minister of the Gospel," answers the Rev. James Smyth, "I do not indulge in liquor of any kind."

This blunt affront comes with a shock which almost sweeps the bully off his feet, while the other boys gather about to view the poor and indiscreet pastor's quick extermination. But before Snake has an opportunity to vent his wrath, Rev. Smyth turns on his heel and disappears around the corner.

Two days later we find the Rev. Smyth in front of the little frame church posting a notice to the effect that "Services will be held here to-day at 2 P. M.," extending an invitation to all to attend.

Snake Williams, who fears that the affront from the preacher might question his title, calls his little crowd of bad men together and announces solemnly that no services will be held in Mustang this day. With his rowdies at his heels he rides off to the little frame church and proceeds to riddle the preacher's notice with bullets from his Colts.

The services are in progress and shortly after the shots are fired the preacher comes out, demanding to know the reason for this desecration of the Sabbath. Snake starts a row and forces the preacher into a fistic battle. The two fight strenuously, Snake sometimes on top sometimes the preacher. But in the end a straight-from-the-shoulder wallop sends Snake rolling in the dust and the awed cowboys, seeing their chief defeated, rally to the preacher's standard and finally enter the church, leaving Snake and Rev. Smyth to further discuss matters.

"Preacher," says Snake, condescendingly, "you're a wonder an' if you'll forgive a pore sinner——"

Rev. Smyth stretches out his hand. Snake grasps it gratefully and upon the pastor's invitation enters the church.

THE MISTAKEN BANDIT.—Jim Thaw runs an isolated general store in California. He occupies also the position as agent for the Great Eastern Express Company, which in the West is a dangerous job. One day the stage drives up and deposits a money box with Thaw with instructions from the general manager of the Great Eastern that it is to be held with him over night, adding that he must keep a careful watch as it is reported that Buck Brady, an outlaw, has been seen skulking in the vicinity of Thaw's store.

When the box arrives Thaw's wife is very ill and Jim had just been preparing to ride for the country doctor. He realizes that duty commands him to guard the money, while the love for his wife who is dangerously ill, urges him to forsake his duty and ride for the doctor. The trust is partially met when his daughter volunteers to water the place and defend it should Buck Brady and his band endeavor to force an entrance.

Jim has been gone but an hour or so when a Lazy cowboy rides up and dismounts at the Thaw store. He has come for provisions and his wonder and curiosity are aroused when his knockings at the door are unanswered. Inside, the girl, who believes the innocent cowboy to be Buck Brady and his band, is making preparations to protect the treasure. However when she does open the door the cowboy finds himself looking into the barrel of a pistol and the glint of steel courage in the girl's eye informs him that beyond a doubt he will suffer death if he makes the least suspicious move. The girl commands him to enter a small room off the store and after disarming him closes the door and locks it securely.

Another dreary hour passes and there is another knock at the door. The frightened girl starts nervously, then cautiously steals to a window and looks out. Three men, armed and whispering together are loitering at the door.

The girl slips a heavy bar into the door, locks at her pistols and makes ready to defend her treasure. Suddenly there is a battering at the door and the heavy panels burst from the door and a pistol is thrust through. The bar is lifted and the bolt shot back and the three desperadoes slip into the room. Against the three the girl sees she can do nothing, when suddenly the door to the side is thrown open, two shots are fired and the foremost bandit drops in a heap on the floor. The others are panic stricken and seek to retreat, but this is cut off by the stalwart form of Thaw, followed by the doctor and, with leveled pistols. The wounded bandit and the two captured ones are rescued by the sheriff, who comes on the scene, and explanations follow.

The cowboy tells his surprise at being held up by Jim's daughter and how he guessed at the truth when the real bandits appeared. The girl thankfully stretches out her hands to the cowboy and we may imagine that a love affair is well rooted.

LUBIN MFG. CO.

JONES' WATCH. Jones is fussily nervous and absent-minded as well. Preparing for a journey, he neglects to slip his watch in his pocket in his hurry to make a train. Rushing toward the station, he collides with several persons, among whom is a pettishly aristocratic young man who clings hungrily to Jones' neck. Jones detaches him and continues his mad race, only to find that he missed the train. He also finds that he has lost his watch, and suspicion immediately attaches to the young nobleman. Taking a revolver from his pocket, he starts upon a search for the supposed thief and not being a detective, he catches him. Springing out from a place of concealment, he nabs up the surprised "sonse" and takes away his watch. Scowls the face of the robbery penetrates the befuddled brain, and the victim starts after Jones, picking up a policeman and several others on the way. Meantime Jones has reached home and proudly relates the attempted theft and recovery of the watch to his horrified wife. She explains that she found the watch just after his departure and tried to get it to him by the servant. Jones is startled to find that he is the thief himself, and to add to his discomfiture the policeman and the victim appear on the scene. Jones manages to get the watch back into the young man's pocket and then loudly denies his guilt and insists that the young man be searched. When the watch is found the crowd decides that the accusation was a grave error and apologies to the now triumphant Jones are profuse and humble.

HEMLOCK HOAX, THE DETECTIVE.—Hemlock Hoax thinks he can "put it all over" Sherlock Holmes, and his sleuthing is somewhat of a joke in the little tropical town where he lives. Two boys plan some fun at his expense and bring him the news of a terrible murder. Holmes is led to the scene of the crime and with measuring tape and magnifying glass proceeds to search for clues and material for deductions in the most approved detective fashion. He discovers a shred of cloth on a projecting branch and declares the murderer to be as good as found. Like the human hound that he is, he starts hot upon the scent and lads a tramp wearing the garment from which the cloth was torn. The surprised tramp develops a burst of speed that is astonishing and Hoax makes a good second. Others aid the pursuit and they are led a merry cross-country chase that ends in the capture of the tramp by Hoax and a policeman they have picked up. The trembling tramp is led back to the scene of his atrocious crime and confronted with the body of his victim. Then, for the first time, Hoax discovers that the body is merely a dummy stuffed with leaves, and the small boys are properly punished, though not until the crowd has enjoyed a good laugh at the expense of the crestfallen Hoax.

THE FISHERMAN'S LUCK.—Professor Coblenz was an enthusiastic fisherman. Fishing is particularly the pastime of the deep thinkers, and the professor was such a deep thinker that he was apt to be a trifle absent-minded. He shouldered his pole and started for the sea wall where the fish ought to be biting, and he was so deeply engrossed in trying to figure out why Swiss cheese has holes and sarsaparilla none at all, that he failed to blow his horn and slow down at the crossing, with the result that the pole knocks over the basket of clean laundry that the washlady is toting to a customer. So gets what satisfaction she can from mussing the professor up a bit and he goes upon his erratic way only to knock down a couple of young ladies with the far-reaching fishpole. A cyclist is the next to suffer, and a farmer soaises him with a pail of milk when the professor digs the farmer's haircut in the ribs with the butt of the pole. Arrived at the sea wall, the professor baits his hook. Of course he does not expect a bite; that's not what he does fishing for, and in the natural order of things he would fish all afternoon without doing more than furnish some hungry fish with an abundant free lunch, but just behind the professor a young couple are spooning, and fate sends a large fish to impale itself on the hook. Wild with excitement, the professor gives a mighty tug and lands the finny trophy squarely between the faces of the two lovers, whose lips are puckered for a kiss. They charge on the professor just as the other victims come up. It's all right, though. The professor can swim, and it's a good thing he can, for he is thrown over the sea wall.

WESTERN JUSTICE.—Two prospectors are partners, sharing their life and their luck until the inevitable girl crosses their path. She cannot marry both, and when she makes her choice the other accepts the situation bravely. He congratulates his pal, but he knows that the old-time partnership no longer is possible and there is a division of the gold dust and nuggets. This division is observed through the window by a Mexican half-breed, who follows the disappointed man along the trail until he is able to force him over the cliff. The action is observed by an Indian girl who has earlier been insulted by the Mexican, the insult being resented by the prospector. Now the woman hurries to her home and tells her husband of the murder. He takes the trail of the murderer, while the woman mounts a horse and rides to the camp to warn the white men. There is a hurried call to saddles and the dusty cowboys ride madly toward the base of the cliff where lies the body of the murdered man. Meanwhile the Indian has stalked the Mexican, and the latter seeks to throw him off. There is a struggle in which the Mexican is badly hurt and he creeps to a deserted cabin to hide. Ascending to an upper story, he draws up the ladder which serves in place of a stairway, and when the men enter in search of him he is not to be seen. They are about to leave, convinced that he has made good his escape, when one of the men rests his hand upon the post which supports the ceiling beam. maker of masks, is in his shop making love to his assistant, when Louison, his wife, comes in and surprises him. She dismisses the assistant and during the angry discussion which follows, Pascal gives her a sudden push. She falls heavily to the ground and strikes her head violently. She has to be put to bed, the doctor is summoned and also a neighbor to nurse her. Pascal returns to his work, but he is obsessed by the thought of his dying wife, for dying she is, and every mask he carves takes on her features; he is even driven to compare and perfect each one by the original. Carnival day comes, Louison dies the same day and whilst Pascal is away at her bedside a number of merry makers enter the shop, find the box where he has hidden the masks and take them away. Towards nightfall Pascal is again in the shop. He approaches the window to glance out, when the livid face of Louison appears and stares in upon him. Terrified, clutching wildly at his breast, he staggers back. Another face appears and yet another. He turns to fly, but the door opens and seven shrouded figures enter in single file. Each has the face of Louison, livid and drawn, with a thin streak of blood on the lips. They form a circle around Pascal, who turning like a haunted beast, falls dead to the ground; then seeing for the first time that something is wrong the figures lift their masks, and perceive that a tragedy has ended their merry-making.

JOHNNY'S PICTURES OF THE POLAR REGIONS.—A better title for this film might be a burlesque on Messrs. Cook and Peary's trip to the North Pole. The film is a decided novelty and consists of a series of drawings, in which the sketched figures move. How it is done is a mystery to all but those initiated in the arts of Pathe Freres trick cinematography, and it is hilariously funny. The caricatures of the two gentlemen are laughable in the extreme and they seem to have made their journey in motor boats which travel through the ice-floes at a reasonable speed, coming through the Metropolitan Subway, passing all sorts of trained seals and walrus and various igloos, one of which is labeled post cards, another telegraph office, the third New York Herald, and finally reaching the pole the two explorers find it housed in a spacious igloo with an Esquimau taking tickets at the door, for which he charges one franc fifty centimes.

THE PILLAGERS.—An Arab encampment is attacked by a band of pillagers, who put to flight many of the party, and carry off the principal members, namely a young woman, her husband and child, together with the asses laden with bales. An old man, the grandfather, is left lying on the ground tightly bound with cords, and a little black dog also escapes destruction. Attracted by the old man's cries, a troop of soldiers comes to his aid; the dog, set free from its leash, tracks down the robbers and whilst they sleep releases the Arab woman from her bonds. It is then the work of a few seconds for her to snatch up her child, sever the cords which bind her husband, and for them all to steal away with the asses, the dog leading the way. Upon perceiving the disappearance of their captives, the pillagers give chase, but the fugitives succeed in reaching their camp, now guarded by the soldiers, who open a sharp fire upon the robbers, taking some prisoners and putting the others to rout.

THE BULLY.—Elsa, the little daughter of the man in charge of the bathing houses at a fashionable watering place, is sent to play, by her father, on the sands. The little girl takes her doll, her bucket and spade and trots away happily to build a castle, but her pleasure is interrupted by a boy visitor who tries to snatch her doll away. As the little maiden holds fast to her plaything, the boy pettishly throws a spadeful of sand in her face. Her cry of pain brings her father to the spot, and he loudly expresses his indignation to the parent of the boy, who strongly champions his own child, in spite of the fact that little Elsa's eyes are seriously hurt. She is carried home by her father and a doctor is called in. A few days later the boy and his sister are caught by the tide whilst scrambling over the rocks. Their danger is not perceived by their father until almost too late, and then he frantically runs to implore the bathing man to go to their assistance. His appeal is met by a curt refusal, but little Elsa, who has forgotten and forgiven before even the bandage has been removed from her eyes, insists that her father shall make an effort to save the imprudent children. Happily the danger is circumvented, and the two fathers agree to forget and forgive like their children, who celebrate the occasion, they and their many other little friends, by bringing presents of dolls to Elsa, whose generous little heart first brought about the reconciliation.

SIMONE.—The gist of the story of the Tuscany maid, Simone, which de Musset so charmingly wove into verse, may be given in a few words, since the tale is one of the simplest. Simone is beloved by Pascal, a young craftsman of the town, and hand in hand, the two lovers, accompanied by another couple, Strambe and Lagine, wander through the green meadows listening to the birds and whispering the story of their love. Such recitals need no audience, and so the two couples separate, Strambe and Lagine to seek more noisy amusement, and Simone and Pascal to sit upon the grass. In the course of their talk, Pascal plucks one of the beautiful blossoms of a bush growing near, and places it in his mouth, still gaily laughing and talking. In a few minutes his face grows livid, his eyes glassy and he falls back dead. The affrighted cries of Simone attract their erstwhile companions and the townspeople to the spot, but their faces grow grave as she recounts her tale; she sees suspicion lurking in their eyes, and presently the little crowd drifts away one by one, leaving only the doctor and a few others to examine the flowers of the bush. Then Simone, already overcome by grief, stealthily approaches the bush, seizes one of the poisonous blossoms, puts it between her pallid lips and in a few minutes the fatal flower has done its work and death has vindicated her.

THE GREENHORNS.—Mr. and Mrs. Goslow engage a maid and manservant, both of whom have been strongly recommended as being extremely hardworking. The Goslows, delighted to secure two such treasures, adjourn after their lunch for a peaceful siesta on the veranda, leaving the newcomers to their work. Sad however, is the havoc caused by the energetic and overzealous servants during the forty winks enjoyed by their master and mistress. The family oil paintings are vigorously scrubbed with soap and water, and a handsome clock also receives a bath. The maid polishes the pots and pans until holes appear, and the man breaks through the floor whilst scrubbing it with unnecessary force. Washing the linen results in its total unfitness for further use, and cleaning the floor of the kitchen means nothing less than inundating it with water to these raw country servants, who evidently do not believe in doing things by halves. When Mrs. Goslow comes to pass her housewifely eye over the labors of her new acquisitions, her horror gives vent to loud cries which bring her husband to her side. He, on his part, is unpleasantly surprised by falling through the hole in the flooring. Upon regaining more stable ground he opens the kitchen door, receives a bucket of water full in the face, and speechless with anger, bundles both servants out, neck and crop.

THE WREATH.—Paul's father is sick and out of work. For many weary days he has searched for employment, and finally gives up and takes to his bed. The same day Paul comes home from school with a note from his teacher that his son had played truant again. To the poor father's overwrought nerves, his son's mischievous shortcomings are a great burden, and the thought of his boy's lack of attention to his studies but adds fuel to the fever which is rapidly breaking down his once strong constitution. A few days later when Paul runs in from his pleasures, he finds that his father has finally succumbed, and throwing himself beside the bed, he sobs out his sorrow for his lack of filial attention, alas, too late. The sad little funeral party of just the mother and son go to the cemetery with the body of the man they loved so well, but the lack of work had decreased their little store of money to such an extent that they could not afford to buy even one poor wreath for the lonely grave. Heartbroken, they return to the desolate home. Paul now repentant, spends all his evenings in study, much to his mother's amazement. Night after night he burns the midnight oil in his endeavor to regain his lost ground with his fellow students, and every day he enters his father's room and offers up a prayer for his dead father's blessing on his efforts. Finally composition day arrives and Paul's essay has won first prize. He receives a big package of books and a laurel wreath is placed upon his brow. Overjoyed he rushes home to his mother and earnestly pleads her to accompany him to the lonely mound in the cemetery, and there as an offering to his beloved father, he places his hard-earned wreath upon the wooden cross which marks the spot beneath which lie the ramins of all that they hold most dear.

DELHI.—This time it is Delhi that is revealed to us, and as an additional interest at a moment when a grand Mohammedan festival is in progress. The streets are thronged with people, many of the natives wearing fantastic costumes, whilst at intervals a wild dance will take place to the sound of strange instruments. Other pictures present another aspect of the cult of the Mohammedans. We are present at a religious service at the Great Mosque and watch the ceremony of the purifying bath, which is immediately followed by a magnificent view of the outside of the building, before which prostrate themselves in long rows hundreds of white robed Mohammedans, forming a truly impressive and imposing sight. In terminating, we may say that all the pictures of this film have evidently been taken with the view to securing unusually striking effects.

THE STORM.—This picture is in reality a series of magnificent scenes of the sea lashed into fury by a storm on the rock bound coast of Normandy. The departure of the fishing smacks, the lonely wives left on the shore, the anxious watchers during the storm, and the finding of a body washed up by the cruel waves, add interest to the film. The scenes showing the water dashing over the rocks, sending its spray many feet into the air ... sky clouds, are of marvelous beauty and make the film ... of the most attractive ever put out.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE GIRL IN THE BARRACKS.—A young Russian soldier has a sweetheart, a young peasant girl, whose father, a cruel, overbearing character, will allow his family no privileges, and very strenuously objects to his daughter receiving any attention from the young soldier.

He catches her and the young soldier walking together and making love. He drives his daughter home and locks her in her room, taking her shoes away from her so she cannot leave the house. She has another pair of shoes under the bed, and after her father leaves the room she escapes from the house and goes to the barracks to tell her lover all about her father's objections to his courtship and the treatment to which she has just been subjected.

The young Russian and his messmate are busy cleaning up the General's office when they hear the young girl coming. They think it is the General and immediately become very much interested in their work. When the girl enters they are very much surprised and appreciate the joke. The girl tells her beau her story, and while in the midst of it they look out the window and see the General approaching. They hide the girl in the closet. The General enters, looks over his mail and becomes absorbed in correspondence.

While thus engaged, an anarchist, previously selected in secret council, stealthily enters the room through the window and is just about to stab the General when the young peasant girl from her hiding place sees him, sneaks from the closet, seizes a revolver and checks the assassin in his purpose.

The Russian General is astonished when he sees that his protector is a young girl. He asks her how she happened upon the scene. She explains. The General calls his soldiers, who arrest his would-be murderer; then he calls the young soldier, pretends he is provoked at his breach of discipline in allowing his sweetheart to enter the barracks, but he is too well pleased with its result to his own advantage to hide his feelings.

He commends the girl for her bravery and encourages the young fellow in his good fortune in making so estimable a choice. The girl leaves the barracks with her lover, and together they go to her father and plead their case and ask his consent to their marriage. The father refuses and severely denounces the lovers. The General has not forgotten his preserver, and on a mission of acknowledgment and appreciation he enters upon the scene and tells the girl's father how she saved his life, and highly commends the young fellow as a faithful soldier and a trustworthy man whom he has decided to promote to a sergeancy.

The parents of the girl are pleased with the General's visit, and the father is taken back and ashamed of his harshness. He consents to his daughter's marriage, and the young folks are at last happily betrothed.

G. MELIES.

THE SEAL OF THE CHURCH.—A senorita, with whom two young matadors, Jose and Pepe, are in love, tries to keep both on the string. She leads each to believe that he is the chosen one, creating a strong jealousy between them.

Pepe calls to see the girl and she receives him with a show of great affection and preferment. While they are courting, a caballero, friendly to the other lover, Jose, tells him of the girl's duplicity.

In a rage he goes to his inamorata and, demanding an explanation, accuses her of harboring his rival in the house. She cajoles him, and playfully stealing his dagger from him without his knowing it, endeavors to hold his attention by caresses as Pepe tries to make his escape.

Unfortunately he is seen and pursued by the enraged Jose, who, coming up with him as he seeks the protection of a priest busy pruning trees in the grounds of the monastery, engages in a terrible struggle in which the priest is powerless to interfere. The rival breaks away, and the lover, discovering the loss of his dagger, seizes the pruning knife of the priest and again goes off in pursuit, the priest following as quickly as he can. Unfortunately he is too late, the rival is dead, and Jose, now sobered and full of despair at what he has done, begs the priest to give him absolution.

The crime is discovered and the priest arrested, as his knife was found near the body of the murdered man. Being bound by his office as priest not to reveal the secrets of the confession, he cannot excuse himself nor give the name of the real murderer.

The guilty man goes to the home of the senorita and gleatingly tells her of his revenge. Knowing that the priest has been accused, the girl hurries out of the house and, hastening to inform the authorities, she reaches the Magistrado's office just as the priest is brought in by the soldiers.

She informs them of the murderer's whereabouts, and the soldiers at the command of the Magistrado release the priest and start in pursuit of the guilty man. The soldiers enter the girl's home, and the hunted matador, jumping from the window, mounts his horse and flees, pursued by the soldiers, who find him hidden in a wild and unfrequented retreat, where he shows fight and is shot dead by the troops.

When the senorita realizes the results of her intrigues and duplicity, she is conscience stricken. She goes to the old village priest and confesses her misdeeds. He receives her with fatherly tenderness, admonishes and advises her to make amends by seeking the seclusion of the convent. Acting upon this suggestion, she is received by the nuns as a novice of the convent and prepares herself to take the vow of the Church and devote the rest of her life to good deeds.

THE FIRST-BORN. "Love me, love my dog," seems to be the motto of the young wife and of her mother. Newlywed is disgusted when he sees the affection dissipated on the dog. They smother it with kisses, give it the best seat at the table, and make the servants dance attendance on it.

The last straw is added when Newlywed's wife and mother-in-law object to serving his breakfast before the dog is seated. They pay no attention to him as head of the house, and patience ceasing to be a virtue, he seizes the canine and throws it out of the room, to the horror of Mrs. Newlywed and her mother.

They berate him soundly and restore the pet of the household to their bosoms. Newlywed is frantic. He grabs his hat and packing his valise departs for more congenial and natural surroundings. Taking to the woods, he locates himself on a far-off ranch with a family of Texas pioneers whose domestic relations are brightened and enlivened by real children, with whom Mr. Newlywed becomes a general favorite, and amongst them he enjoys a season of rest right next to nature and natural home life.

After he has been in his retreat a few weeks he receives a letter announcing the birth of their first-born. Delighted, he dances about with unbridled joy. Rushing into the house, he gets his belongings, jumps on his horse and makes a break for the railroad station, where he is met by a "bunch" of his "cowboy" chums, who give him a parting salute as he boards the train to come to clasp his son and heir in a fatherly embrace.

When he reaches his home city he calls a taxicab and stops at the stores, buying toys and trinkets regardless of "cost, rhyme or reason." He is possessed with ecstatic spasms of great happiness. Encountering all sorts of obstacles and harshness, he reaches his home laden with presents, and bursts in upon his family, who silence his boisterous demonstrations of parental pride, pointing to the nurse who is bending solicitously over the sleeping infant.

Newlywed tiptoes over to have a look at his first-born. The nurse lifts the cover, and behold! the "doggoned" pet has blessed the household with a puppy, a son. "Gee whizz!!!" (Worse and worse of it.) Newlywed drops helplessly to the floor.

"IMP."

THE MAELSTROM.—A marriage against her will, to a man she does not love—a fate abhorrent to any free-born girl. True, he is wealthy, but what is money when one's heart is unhappy? On her wedding day, in fact, the man whom she does love is beseeching her to turn, but she dare not, and is married to the financier.

He is a peculiar man—a puzzle to her. She sees that he loves her, but he does not seem the least perturbed at the fact that his love is not returned. He is always smiling. Oh, if he would only talk to her of her coldness—plead with her as a lover should—open his silent heart to her—do or say something that may perchance affect her—but he does not. He is one of those men who study, cold and calculating. Has he a heart at all? The answer comes to her suddenly one day, when he appears with a travelling bag, saying that he must go out of town—business calls him. Before he leaves the room, however, a message comes from the stock exchange: there is a panic! The market is going against him! He dashes out, dropping his coat and handbag. She picks it up, opens it, and finds—only a revolver! Like a flash the truth strikes her—she has misunderstood him all the time —he really loves, and her indifference has almost had a terrible effect!

We now follow him to the exchange floor. There is a scene of awful pandemonium. On all sides frantic men are begging him to sell, sell, sell, or it means ruin. With the same enigmatic smile, he is standing stoically 'mid the scene of ruin and disaster; he is cornered, but is bravely trying to bluff the market and save himself from being wiped out.

Up in the spectator's balcony a scene of wonderful import is being enacted. His wife knows of what was impending. Her love for him is now a raging flame. Did he not, on the very eve of disaster, calmly present her with a beautiful necklace of jewels? Now it is her sacrifice. She sends a messenger out with a box containing all of her costly jewels, and soon he brings to her in the balcony a certified check. The amount is sufficient. She sends it to her battling lion on the floor, and in a moment the avalanche of ruin is shattered into harmlessness.

The victor, his work done, carries that inexplicable smile home—to the little wife whose love, craved by a lion, meant naught to her because she had never known lions!

IN WAR TIME.—A young husband has gone to drink, and, as usually follows, it wreaks havoc with his sense of honor. When the Civil War breaks out a courier is spending the night at his home, his mission being to transfer valuable papers he carries to another courier who is to meet him at the house the next day and take them through the Union lines. This second courier was a suitor of the drunkard's wife in her sweetheart days, and her husband now plans to spoil matters for him. He therefore robs the sleeping messenger, substituting an empty envelope for the one bearing the papers; these he sells to the Northern commander, and buys more drink.

Through a series of stirring incidents, the young wife learns of her husband's baseness. In endeavoring to save the situation she is captured and paroled in the custody of an officer. But the courier, who still loves her, succeeds in an astoundingly daring rescue, and brings her home. Yes, she admits she loves him, but even though her mate in life is such a despicable creature, she must be true to her vows.

Soon a report is brought to her that her husband was killed; it is providential, and we now see her making preeparations to marry her sweetheart of former days, the courier.

On the wedding day, however, a negro girl brings word that the supposedly dead man is in a certain low dive, heavily under the influence of liquor. A friend of the groom intercepts her before anyone but he has heard it, and he goes to the dive. He finds the man there, in the throes of delirium tremens. He is carried to an upper room, and the bridegroom's friend sits at the door, calmly waiting for him to die. Habitues of the resort call a doctor, but the man at the door draws a pistol and holds them off, while the man inside raves and tears at the confining walls until he succumbs. Then the doctor is let in, but he is too late to be of any service.

The friend goes silently back to the house, and the wedding takes place.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A NEW BURGLAR ALARM.—A portly man of business is seen in his office, paying close attention to a bottle of whiskey, which he hastily hides in the safe as his wife enters. The latter, a formidable lady, takes him home, and forces him to spend a quiet evening with her in the drawing room. Meanwhile, at the office, two burglars, who have entered through the window, are busy at the safe with a crowbar. They find the bottle of whiskey and some cigars, and indulge so liberally that they are soon sleeping peacefully on the floor. There they lie until the morning, when hubby appears and seeing the state of things, hastily rings up his wife, who appears shortly afterwards with two policemen. The men secure, hubby points out the bottle to his wife with pride as a new burglar alarm.

HUSTLING MR. BROWN.—This unusually clever and amusing trick subject introduces Mr. Brown, the great hustler, who in a series of scenes shows his remarkable magical powers by which he, in his mysterious way, gets things to move at lightning speed, often to the discomfiture of his victims.

THE POWERS COMPANY.

THE RE-MAKING OF A MAN.—Harry Allen is a victim of the liquor habit. After a jolly spree with the sports, he enters his father's home very drunk. His father, a banker, of high social standing, orders his son to leave the house and never enter it again until he is a real man.

Two years pass, and the son is going a downward path rapidly. We see him, as a bum, thrown out of a saloon. Harry enters a cafe and begs a drink of two men, Richard Grant and his friend, who are seated at tables. The waiter attempts to eject Harry, but Grant interferes. Something about Harry awakens Grant's sympathy and he says to his friend: "This fellow is not bad, and I am going to make a man out of him." Grant takes Harry to his apartment, treats him to a bath, a shave, good food and good clothes, and then gives him a position in his office. Lillian Clay, a society girl, who is engaged to be married to Grant, calls at his office, meets Harry and becomes infatuated with him. A short time after, at a ball at Lillian's home, she tells Harry that she loves him. Harry, faithful in his devotion to the man who saved him from a drunkard's grave, determines to go away; and he writes a letter to Grant, telling him that he is compelled to leave town and cannot explain. A letter is handed to Harry. It is from his father's lawyer and tells him that his letter to his father had come too late, as his father had died some weeks before, leaving his entire fortune to Harry.

Two years pass. Grant is in trouble. Large losses in business have brought him to the verge of ruin. If he does not take up a note for $32,000 before three o'clock he is a ruined man. Despair drives him almost insane. He writes a note to his wife, Lillian, and then seizing a revolver, is about to end his life. A rap is heard on the door, and Harry Allen enters. He compels Grant to tell him the cause of his trouble. Allen pulls out a pocket checkbook and says, "I am a millionaire now. All I have is at your disposal." He takes out a check and hands it to Grant to fill in the amount, and then Harry, accompanied by the office boy, dashes out to the bank to take up that note and save his friend. When Allen returns to tell Grant that the matter is settled and that he can hold up his head proudly as a merchant, he finds Grant's wife, Lillian, there. The wife sees the two men hug each other and dance for joy, but she never knew just why.

HIS MOTHER'S LETTER.—Tom Greene, a New England boy, is out of work. His former chum, Al Thompson, sends him a letter from Nevada, in which he offers Tom a chance to make big money to help him work his gold-mining claim. Tom bids good-bye to his old mother and goes to Nevada. He meets his chum, and he also meets Nellie Lane, a most accomplished flirt, whose father keeps a hotel in the town nearest Al's mine.

After two months of hard work, Al sends Tom to town with a bag of golddust, with which Tom is to buy needed machinery and supplies.

Tom stops at Lane's Hotel, and after some comedy scenes with Nellie and her various admirers, he lets himself be persuaded by a traveling salesman, Baker, to get into a stiff poker game. Tom loses his head and cashes the gold nuggets, and loses every dollar of the money that Al and he had worked so hard for.

Later in the night, Tom, half-crazed by his loss, determines to enter Baker's room and get back his money. He forces the lock of the door. Baker is awakened by the noise. Seizing his revolver, he points it at the door. Tom Greene, not realizing that death awaits him at the other side of that door, is about to open it, when he hears footsteps. He goes back into his own room. A rap is heard, and Al enters. He hands to Tom a letter from Tom's mother marked "very urgent." Tom learns from the letter that his old mother is very sick and fears she may die without seeing him. In a beautifully pathetic scene Al forgives Tom and helps him to get back to his mother.

NESTOR FILMS.

AT DOUBLE CROSS RANCH.—As he read his uncle's letter, Archibald Willard merely shrugged his shoulders and heaved a sigh of bored resignation. Truly it was the master stroke of what he termed "Uncle Joe's tedious eccentricities," this offer of $50,000 if he would wed the daughter of his uncle's comrade, Col. Redmond. This meant a tedious trip to the Colonel's ranch, and even then Miss Moinai might prove entirely impossible; still, as his fond mother argued, it was distinctly worth a trial. Then, too, mingling with hundreds of swaggering cowboys and riding bucking broncbos would be rare sport. Accordingly, armed to the teeth with guns and knives, he set forth, accompanied by the haughty Mrs. Willard. Major Joe Buford's kind offer, however, was not received at the ranch with such complacent resignation. Moinai indignantly declared that she had already bestowed her heart upon her father's junior partner, Lewis Shelby, at which the sly old Colonel pretended to be greatly surprised; but, in truth, seeing which way the wind blew, it was this fact which caused him to make the young cowboy his partner. Lewis' suggestion, therefore, that they give the Willards a reception they would long remember, met with hearty approval from all sides. He and Moinai would meet the mother and son at the station, and escort the stagecoach home on horseback in truly Western fashion. At a given signal, a band of Indians, in warpaint and feathers, would surround the coach. They were to be led by Sour Bill, for whom the cowboys borrowed Kid Eagle's headdress, and with the aid of some brown house paint, which they assured the enraged Bill would surely wear off inside of a couple of months, he might well have been the proud possessor of the title they bestowed upon him, "Chief Pain-in-the-Face." The hold-up was to be followed by a thrilling rescue by the cowboys stationed in the distance, and the day's sport wound up by giving young Archibald an opportunity to ride the bucking broncho he had written he intended doing. The entire program worked like a charm. At the first sight of the savage Indians, Mrs. Willard fainted, while Archibald got to his knees and implored the redskins with such earnestness to spare his life, that it was only with the greatest difficulty they kept from laughing in his face. The cowboys then made their heroic rescue, and the Indians, selecting a soft spot, fell in a heap at the first sound of the rescuer's guns. Mrs. Willard still remained unconscious, so Moinai, giving her horse in charge of one of the "dead" Indians, clambered into the coach to revive the poor lady. The girl thought the sport had gone far enough, but not so Lewis; for the instant they reached the ranch, while father and daughter were taking care of Mrs. Willard, he led Archibald to the barn, and putting him aboard "Peanuts" started him down the road at a sharp clip, amid the shouts of the pursuing cowboys. "Peanuts" was the gentlest of the bronchos, so, at the most, the young man would only get a severe shaking up. This shaking up, however, together with a slight sprain and several bruises, which he received in falling, so cooled the tenderfoot's ardor for anything Western, that he remained up half the night in his fear that they might miss the first Eastern-bound train.

ECLAIR.

LOVE THE CONQUEROR.—At the border of a wood a company of gypsies are seen playing dice. The sister of the chief pleads with him to give up the despicable game, and as he is exceedingly fond of his sister, laughingly promises. Later we see the same company performing in the street, having reached the town. In the evening the chief, forgetting his promise to his sister, again plays dice and drinks heavily. At last, having lost all he possessed, he accepts the challenge of a young nobleman to play one last game, his sister to be the stake! The nobleman wins, and despite the efforts of the rest of the company, the chief allows his sister to be carried off. Soon, however, the chief comes to himself, and with his followers starts in hot pursuit of the ignoble nobleman. The young gypsy woman fights valiantly against her captor, and so retards their progress that they are overtaken by the chief just as they are about to cross a stream in an open boat. The nobleman, seeing escape is impossible, shoots the chief, who falls overboard. Made desperate by her awful predicament and her love for her brother, the young woman flings herself overboard and aids in the rescue of the chief. Although badly wounded, he recovers, and is forgiven by her for the wrong he has done her.

BISON—

RED WING'S CONSTANCY.—The squaw man leaves his wife at their shack, after an affectionate farewell. During his absence a half breed comes to the squaw and endeavors to persuade her to leave her cowboy husband. She repels him and finally they quarrel. When her husband returns she tells him of the half breed, and after giving her their provisions, the cowboy starts to find him. The half breed is overtaken on the road, and a knife being his only weapon, the cowboy throws aside his gun to have a fair combat. The half breed is the successful combatant. After waiting some time for her husband, the squaw becomes anxious and goes in search of him. She comes upon his body and hastens to get the Sheriff on the half breed's trail. A number of cowboys accompany him, but after many chases return home, telling the squaw of their failure. She then determines to capture the half breed herself and follows his tracks to a woodland. When he spies her he would harm her, but by pretending to be friendly he follows at her bidding. When she leads him to a grave, he shows suspicion and then fear. He tries to get away, but Red Wing is set upon her retribution. She compels him to fight her with a knife, and after a short duel she is the victor. She returns to the sheriff to tell of her triumph and guides him and the cowboys to the grave where lies the half breed. She spurns the reward offered for his death, feeling repaid by being her husband's avenger.

RIVALRY IN THE OIL FIELDS.—It is a difficult proposition to choose between two men, and so Mary found it. There was Jack Belden and Ned

King, and though the former was audacious enough, Mary decides upon Ned, who shows Belden that his presence is undesired in the garden. As Belden leaves he meets his old sweetheart, Annie, whom he spurns, leaving her alone. Ned goes to seek his fortune in an oil well and after much labor is overjoyed to have "struck oil." He is congratulated by his associates. Belden, with an unscrupulous lawyer, Scraggs, concocts a scheme to Ned's disfavor. Annie, however, overhears their plotting and bides her time. After Ned leaves the real estate office in possession of his lease, Belden gets another paper from Scraggs and seems well satisfied. Because of his good fortune, Ned gives Mary an engagement ring and they are elated over their prosperity. When Ned returns to work at his well, the sheriff shows him a paper which shocks him and Mary as well. Belden stands by and triumphantly laughs at their plight. Ned is distracted and all Mary's sympathy avails little. At this time Annie tells Mary of the duplicity and promises her help. At an interview between Belden and Scraggs, Annie succeeds in being an unseen third and becoming possessor of the valuable document. Taking it to Mary and Ned, she is delighted at their joy and is finally satisfied by seeing Belden arrested and Ned again installed at the well.

ITALA—

THE THREE BROTHERS.—Cretinetti and his two brothers are naturally lazy and the servant experiences great difficulty in waking them. Instead of getting up as all good children do, they simply ignore the morning call and turn from one side to the other and continue their slumber until such time as their mother brings water for their morning toilet. Here's where the fun begins, of which the eldest brother is generally the victim. Excitement in general prevails until the father of the boys takes a hand and marches them off to school. Not enthused over the idea of going to school, the three little vagabonds go along the way and do all the damage they possibly can. One afternoon they manage to steal the medal of good behavior and take it home. Their parents, proud of them, give them many gifts for the attention at school.

AMBROSIO—

THE LEGEND OF THE CROSS.—A Lord once sought a beautiful but humble girl, who, to earn her living, led a few sheep to pasture. Stellina paid no attention to the Lord's attentions and he determined to win out, so one day he borrowed a monk's coat and went to Stellina's door. She, unsuspectingly, opened it and greeted the monk. When she saw the deception she ran to the edge of a bluff and decided that it would be best to end her troubles. The cross, erected in her memory, is ever strewn with flowers.

FRICOT IN COLLEGE.—Parents, who decided their boy needed strict discipline, sent Fricot to college. Here, however, he has large scope for his tricks and leads the different board members a terrible life. Nothing but the very severest thrashing avails, and that only for a short time. He raises the pupils to mutiny and in desperation the principal puts him in a trunk and sends him back to his parents, freight prepaid, telling them he could do nothing with their boy.

LUX FILMS.

THE ARTIST'S CHILD.—Jacques, the son of a wealthy merchant, is a painter of promise; his father, however, looks upon his aspirations with disfavor. Praise by some friends of one of the young man's paintings leads to a quarrel between him and his father, and he goes away to make his own way in the world. Years pass, but success does not come to the artist, his wife dies, his child is starving, and one day falls exhausted in the street. A lady takes the child home and finds the father to be her son, whom she has been trying to trace ever since his hasty departure from home. A reconciliation is soon brought about, and the father welcomes his son and grandchild home.

A YOUNG AVIATOR'S DREAM.—A young boy, having spent the day at an exhibition of flying machines, comes home very enthusiastic over airships. He sits down at his desk thinking of what he has seen and finally falls asleep. While slumbering, we see him make a flying machine out of all the pieces of furniture about him, and sail high in the skies, over housetops and church steeples, seemingly everything going smoothly. Next we see him crossing above the houses and later fall to the street. Simultaneously, his head slipping from his desk, he awakes and sees in reality it is but a dream.

THANHOUSER.

HER BATTLE FOR EXISTENCE.—Susan Dale has been brought up in luxury. She has two suitors, Will Emory and Jim Briggs. She chooses Will, and at the opening of the picture informs Jim of her choice. But a change comes to the fortunes of Susan's father; an unlucky speculation claims his wealth and his life.

When Will discovers that his fiancee is penniless his love cools; he breaks the engagement and goes to Europe to avoid the girl. Susan, friendless, starts out to earn her own living. She applies for a job in a lawyer's office, but leaves when the man insults her. She secures a place in a department store, but is discharged because, fatigued after an arduous day at the counter, she took a seat while on duty. She applies for work at a factory, but is rejected, owing to lack of experience. Finally, in desperation, she takes a place as maid in the home of Mrs. Gray. There Burg, the offensive lawyer, meets her, and in a spirit of revenge, denounces her as a thief. The mistress discharges her and Susan decides to end her life.

Fortunately for Susan, Burg meets Jim Briggs, the rejected suitor, on the street and laughingly tells him how he brought about Susan's discharge. Jim knocks the wretch down and rushes to Mrs. Gray's residence. He arrives in time to dissuade Susan from her purpose, and all ends happily to the peal of wedding chimes.

NOTICE.—This is purely an EXTRA REEL, and has no effect whatever upon our regular releases. We secured these pictures by special arrangement with Mr. W. D. Boyce, Chicago sportsman and advocate of outdoor life, who is interested in showing the American public the real Africa. Mr. Boyce took about 10,000 feet of negative throughout the various regions traversed by the ROOSEVELT party, and almost at the same time that COL. ROOSEVELT was making his famous journey. We have selected the best thousand feet from this lot, and will release it on the date mentioned above. The photography is marvelously good, and the scenes intensely interesting and genuinely educational.

Why Vaudeville is Featured in Moving Picture Theatres.

A REMARKABLE SITUATION.

It is unnecessary to say that the policy of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD is essentially and entirely the promotion of the best interests of the moving picture. We want to see it a predominant and unhampered factor in the entertainment field; we want to see it stand or fall on or by its own merits; we want to see it occupy a distinct and well-defined place in the scheme of things. We do not want to see it attached to, or hung onto, any other kind of entertainment. We do not want to see it forming an act or a number in a vaudevile entertainment; we want to see it occupying its own separate position in its own separate sphere. It is surely good enough, meritorious enough, and important enough to deserve all these.

In pursuance of this policy the reader will notice that we demur, we have demurred, and we shall demur to the mixture of vaudeville with the moving picture exhibition. Song slides, music, illustrated lectures are legitimate appendages of the moving picture. That is to say, they have some photographic interest and therefore are closely related to the other branch of photography which they nicely supplement. But vaudeville has not any discoverable relationship whatsoever with the moving picture or with the stationary photograph. It is an interloper; it is an invader from its own field. More often than not it is a vulgar interloper, a degrading one, a debasing one, and rarely by any chance an uplifting one. The very last time we went into a moving picture theater we saw a trick vaudeville act which seriously discounted our pleasure, and we believe the pleasure of the other people in the house, in a very beautiful moving picture that was our business to see.

Now, why has vaudeville recently so strongly invaded the moving picture houses of New York City and presumably other cities? It has puzzled us; it has puzzled others. We have asked managers of these theaters why this thing has been done. We have been told with a shrug of the shoulders that the moving picture, per se, is not strong enough to fill their houses. We wondered at this, and, frankly, we were doubtful of it. Time after time we have observed that public interest in the moving picture not only remains unabated but is on the increase. And we have wondered a great deal why it is that with this increase of public interest in the moving picture it has been found necessary to supplement the entertainment in moving picture houses with vaudeville. At last we think we have hit upon a plausible explanation of this disagreeable state of things. Disagreeable, in our opinion, because the inferior vaudeville (and most vaudeville is inferior) is swamping the picture. A state of things which frankly we do not like and which we think is undeserved. Well, here is the explanation, furnished us by the manager of one of the largest business enterprises in the United States which has been running pictures for the last two or three years and recently has found it necessary to adopt vaudeville in his houses. It is simply this: that this great enterprise cannot get enough good pictures. When we say enough good pictures we mean pictures made by the associated manufacturers. They get a sufficient quantity of pictures, but they do not get them of sufficiently high standard of quality all through. In other words, in order to fill their houses and dispense with vaudeville they want feature films all the time. Not one feature film a day, sandwiched between comedy acts and the like, but the highest quality dramatic and photographic pictures which can be supplied.

It is curious to reflect that with the present activity amongst the manufacturers, with daily changes, not enough good pictures can be obtained to keep the business at its proper level. What construction do we put on this? Simply that the public's appetite for the very highest class of motion picture photography is insatiable. The public does not want vaudeville in moving picture houses. It wants the best possible moving pictures. The public itself say so, the moving picture exhibitor says so. Now it is up to the manufacturers to supply the demand which unquestionably exists.

At last we have a clearly stated authoritative opinion as to why vaudeville is presented in moving picture houses. The moral, to our thinking, is obvious. Also. it should be very agreeable reading to the manufacturers of these films. It simply means this: that the public is willing to take all the good high-class pictures that can be made. Logically, therefore, we expect to see the manufacturers double their plants and in future put out enoughh headliners and feature films. Not merely one or two a week, but every day of the week, in order that the picture may come into its own, and vaudeville be relegated to its proper place, which is the vaudeville field.

"Elektra" on the Screen

There is no disputing the astonishing enterprise of the Vitagraph Company of America. The quid nuncs, "those in the know," give a wise shake of their heads whenever the Vitagraph Company is mentioned in these times. And you commonly hear it said that the Vitagraph Company is making enormous strides commercially and technically. It is with moving picture manufacturers as with individuals. Each appears to have its turn of that kind of quiet reputation which is the best tribute to its success. Now everybody is talking Vitagraph, where at one time everybody was talking—anybody. We have said that the company is exceedingly enterprising. The picture we are reviewing is a powerful reminder of this fact.

Students of the opera season which has just now closed, well know that one of the feature productions, if not the most remarkable of all the season's productions, was the opera by Dr. Richard Straus, the Austrian composer, on the subject of "Elektra." Elektra, it may be said, was a young woman of classical times who avenged the murder of her parents; went mad in the process and generally behaved in a most uncomfortable, if not tragic, manner. For this weird subject Dr. Richard Straus has set some "music" which has been described to us, and referred to by critics, as nothing more nor less than discord, dissonance and uncanny sounds. Be that as it may, the lady who enacted the operatic part of "Elektra" got through a tremendously heavy athletic amount of work and made a reputation for herself. Whether the music will last is just as much open to question as was Wagner's music when it was first rendered in New York City over twenty years ago.

With that characteristic enterprise of theirs, the Vitagraph Company have turned this story into a film which was released last week. Rather a tragic, not to say sombre, theme for a film. We certainly had some curiosity as to what the company's producers would make of the subject, and, writing some days after seeing the picture, we want just to record our impression of it; while, at the same time, we place on record the fact that the Vitagraph film "Elektra" was cordially received and applauded by the moving picture public gathered in Keith & Proctor's Bijou Dream, on Twenty-third street, last Saturday evening. Indeed, we were surprised at the warmth of the reception accorded to this picture, because, as we have pointed out over and over again, moving picture audiences, especially of the better kind, seldom indulge in any considerable demonstration of applause.

First of all as to the photography of this picture: It pleased us very much in respect to its excellent technique; then, a purely personal opinion of our own, the blacks were not black; that is to say, they were not cold black, but rather had some perceptible warmth in the shadows. As to the construction of the piece, this was clear even to those unfamiliar with the story. The tragedy was extremely well acted, with superb dignity and conviction. Indeed, we were agreeably surprised at what we would call the classical atmosphere that seemed to pervade the picture. Now we come to the impersonation of "Elektra." This is the feature of the film of which we think the most, days after having seen the picture. The lady who impersonated "Elektra" "let herself go" for all she was worth. She was the mad, revengeful, passionate, remorseless woman to the life. Indeed, we have never seen a more effective, a more sombre, a more startling piece of acting on the moving picture screen than the Vitagraph "Elektra." Undoubtedly the picture was a very great success, and we think the company should be commended for their enterprise, alertness and up-to-dateness. It is really remarkable to reflect how rapidly we are advancing in moving picture making. Who would have dreamed two or three years ago that the most extremely exciting opera of recent years would find its silent analogue in the same season? But it is so. The spirit of progress is rife in the moving picture field as in other branches of the work.

One little incident in connection with this film classic, "Elektra," made us smile when we heart it. It was this: that the music played by the pianist at Keith & Proctor's could not by any stretch of imagination be said to be quite suitable for the subject. It certainly was not tragic, it certainly was not classic and it certainly was not sombre. First of all the pianist played "Sephanie" Gavotte, a favorite of our own; then Franz Von Suppe's "Poet and Peasant," also a favorite of ours, and finally a selection from Auber's "Crown Diamonds," also a favorite of our own. It is unfortunate, or fortunate as the case may be, that we who write this have a tolerably good memory, and something more than a nodding acquaintance with popular music, and, as we have said, we smiled at the incongruity of a classic picture on a screen being accompanied to music written 2,000 years after the incident depicted was supposed to have taken place, and, moreover, unsuitable for the subject. We are dealing elsewhere this week, as last week, with the subject of music and the picture, and we think this fact is deserving of special mention here. We have no doubt that in time such a progressive firm as Keith & Proctor will do the right thing by the picture in all cases and assure the fact that such an anachronism will not occur again. There must have been many amongst the audience like ourselves who realized that to play modern dance music to a classic film was an incongruity. It is a mistake to suppose that people who attend the moving picture theaters are uneducated. We frequently encounter at these houses men of the very highest type of mentality and we are confident that the unsuitability of the music to this picture was noticed by others as well as ourselves.

But our special object in writing this article was to applaud the enterprise of the Vitagraph Company for the singularly fine bit of work that they put around the tragic film of "Elektra." We shall be curious to know how this film fares in the way of popularity amongst the moving picture theaters. We would be gratified to any of our exhibiting readers if they would let us know what effect it has upon their audiences. Indeed, we are always glad to hear from them on the subject of the reception accorded to the various films that are shown at their theaters.

The Construction and Conduct of the Theater

"Man is an evolutionary being," a wise sage and eloquent friend, Wm. H. Swanson, remarked the other day during an interview in which he discussed with us the efforts being made by the Independent faction to elevate their position. But "that is another story" the evolution of which we are still watching with unabated interest.

It is an axiom of life, however, that as man progresses, mentally and socially, his ambitions and his handiwork reach a higher plane. Evolution has transformed the rude abodes of the aboriginal Americans into artistic palaces of brick, stone and marble; so, in the march of progress it is reasonable to infer that the stucco and gingerbread decorations of the pristine moving picture domicile will make way for something more substantial. After repeated requests, which convince us that all persons interested in cinematography look to the MOVING PICTURE WORLD as their official guide and as the only recognized organ entirely devoted to moving picture interests at large, we have decided to devote some space to the construction proper of the moving picture theater.

The pictures of to-day are good. They are produced with much care and the improvements in projecting apparatus have kept pace with the improvements in the pictures. In the beginning, with poor pictures, any old store room was considered good enough to show them in; but with the advance of intellectual and technical quality in the pictures the cheap places are disappearing, to make room for more expensive and adequate houses. This is as it should be, for, "a good picture must have a good frame."

This transformation has even extended to the chairs. Exhibitors realize that the comfort of the patron has much to do with his attendance and comfortable opera chairs are now in use in almost every moving picture theater. Appearance is also being considered, although many fine lobbies are still disfigured by flaring posters. Not that we object to the poster. They are a necessity, provided that they are well made and neatly hung or framed; but sensational posters, tacked or pasted on the walls of the lobby, or on the ticket office, give a vulgar appearance to any place and deter the better classes from entering.

Lobbies decorated in white or cream plaster have been, and still are, in great favor, though this kind of decoration soon loses its attractiveness unless the painter is called in. Some cities, like Baltimore, for instance, have this ornamentation painted in dark colors to represent hardwood or metals, while, in other instances, the plaster front is replaced by marble, hardwood or rustic work.

There seems to be a lack of originality on the part of the exhibitors, and I doubt if a bright and glaring facade is the best thing for a patron to see just before he passes into the gloomy interior. "The Rustic Man," of Michigan, advertised in last week's MOVING PICTURE WORLD some suggestions for a novel front. We show a photograph of a rustic theater front that quite attracts from its very familiarity to the conventional idea of [illegible] style and the lobby decorated with [illegible] work by wires and our observations will be based upon a close study of existing conditions. We do not pose as authorities or as architects. We merely say that being, as we are, constantly in touch with theaters throughout the whole United States, we feel that we are in a position to give some advice and point to certain improvements.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has done its share in placing cinematography on a more solid basis. We have encouraged the progressive exhibitor, the desirable exchange and the intelligent manufacturer. Now, at a very important epoch of the business we deem it necessary to review the progress that has been made and will begin with

THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE THEATER.

From the very start, a certain type of construction has been adopted and has been followed by nearly everyone. A long dark hall with no light, no ventilation and no gallery. A waste of space for a lobby, open to the winds, decorated with a profusion of plaster reliefs, white and gold paint.

The absence of a gallery forces the builder to make the most of the floor space to accommodate enough seats. In the majority of the narrow houses we find not over 12 chairs in a row and, to seat 300 persons, we must have 25 rows, or a hall not less than 100 feet long. If a gallery was provided to seat 75 or 100 persons, we would gain a space in the hall of about 25 feet. The open lobby could be reduced and the space gained from the lobby and the hall could provide a very comfortable and spacious waiting room. The gallery could be so arranged as to have the operating booth on the edge and, by this arrangement, have a shorter throw and better pictures.

A waiting room offers many advantages that have been overlooked. For instance: In too many of the theaters, the spectators are treated to currents of cold air falling on their shoulders and making them so uncomfortable as to discourage them of ever returning. A waiting room or ante room, if you wish to call it so, would break this cold wave.

A waiting room has another advantage which should be seriously considered by the exhibitor. With the present system of continuous performance and of allowing any one to enter or leave the auditorium while a picture is on the screen, we discourage many devotees of motion pictures, who, deeply interested in a scene, have either to move to allow some one to pass in front of them or to have some newcomer masking the view while looking for a seat, or a lady removing her hat as slowly as possible, and this at the most pathetic moment. More than one spectator has expressed his disgust when reading a sub-title to have some one pass in front of him and shut off the view; and the moment he cannot read the sub-title on the screen he loses the thread of the picture and becomes dissatisfied with the show.

A waiting or ante room would be a genuine remedy to this drawback, as the ushers would allow no one to either enter or leave the auditorium while a picture is on the screen.

Many exhibitors have lost money by the lack of a proper waiting room. When the auditorium is crowded some rustic lamps would be a novelty—and a novelty will always draw the crowd. There is also a manufactured article known as "Artstone" that would be cleaner and more durable than the plaster decorations.

We have been repeatedly asked what is the best flooring for a moving picture theater? what is the best wall decoration? what is the best color scheme? the best method of lighting, etc., etc.? We will take up these the ushers keep the crowd waiting in the cold lobby and prospective visitors, when passing the door, seeing a number of persons already waiting in the open lobby, pass away to visit another less crowded place. Now, with a proper ante room, the passing visitors could not see the persons waiting on the inside, and would not know if the theater is crowded or not.

For these reasons and many others too long to enumerate in this article, we believe that a waiting room, situated between the open lobby and the auditorium, would increase the cash receipts.

Such an ante room does not need to be very high of ceiling and could be built under the gallery, so every inch of the floor space would be used to the best advantage. Such a waiting room could be made remunerative by installing a few vending machines for the benefit of the patrons wishing to chew gum, candy or peanuts during the show and bring easy money to Mr. Exhibitor.

In this waiting room posters and notices of the coming shows could be neatly framed and displayed on the walls; they would certainly tempt many of the visitors to return the next day or next week.

The ante room would decrease the length of the auditorium proper and give us a shorter and better throw for the pictures. The booth could be sunk below the level of the gallery and thus give a direct throw and avoid the bad angle found in some many theaters.

As it is not our intention to give a course on architecture, we merely make suggestions and will let more competent men work out the details. Many persons tell us that the pictures shown in small towns look so much better than what they see in big cities. In small towns the ground is not so valuable, while in large cities the price of the land is at high-water mark, and to save the expense of a too wide frontage, the houses are built the full depth of the lot, and narrow. In small towns the auditoriums are not so deep and not so narrow and under these conditions they can obtain a shorter and better throw.

"PICTURE PLAYS" AND THEIR PRODUCTION

A Visit to the Powers Factory, at Wakefield

Pat Powers has long been the man of mystery of the Independent moving picture field. Not merely so, but one of the most talked about. We heard of "Pat" a long time before we met him—he will, we hope, forgive us for using his baptismal patronymical appellation;—first of all installed in an office in the World Building, New York City; secondly in the building formerly used as training quarters by the New York mounted police, at 241st street and Richardson avenue (Wakefield), N. Y.

P. A. POWERS, President of the Powers Company.

For months we had not the pleasure of meeting Mr. Powers, personally, but reports of his progress reached us, and frankly we commiserated him in our hearts, because we know that, like many other men who enter the moving picture field, he was buying his experience in the making of pictures very expensively. He was the victim; like many other manufacturers whom we know, of mendacity and incompetency, which unfortunately is still present in this industry, and which we are determined to root out of it. It is one thing for a business man to make up his mind to produce moving pictures; it is another for him to succeed in that desire, especially if he trusts too implicitly to the protestations of help, whose ability he has to take on trust.

When we judged that Mr. Powers, at Wakefield, had fairly settled down to the production of good photographs, we made up our minds to pay him a surprise visit. We gave him six months, there or thereabouts—a very fair time, even with the best available talent, in which to fit up a plant and turn out photographs that would be tolerated in a high-class moving picture theater. We paid this surprise visit last week, and Mr. Powers was our guide down to Wakefield in that little car which he knows so well how to drive.

Arriving at the studio, we were soon amongst old and familiar friends. There was Mr. L. G. B. Erb presiding over the technical end of matters and Mr. Joseph A. Golden in his element as stage director and producer. One glance at the stage convinced us that expert minds had been at work in fitting up an eighty or hundred thousand candle-power Cooper Hewitt light installation; that the stage had every facility for the production of high-class indoor plays; that there was no lack of properties; that the scenic artist was a master at his game; that there was a large separate building for the development of the negatives and positives; that the various other branches of the factory were all complete and up-to-date; that, in short, the Powers factory is, as it stands at this moment, very well equipped for the production of high-class moving pictures. Indeed, the building is almost ideal for the purpose of the work, with plenty of floor space and every facility for making what Mr. Powers calls his "picture plays."

Rumor having alleged that the Bianchi camera in use at the Powers works is not satisfactory, we asked Mr. Erb to explain his idea of the working of the instrument to us while we carefully examined a book of specimen prints made both inside and outside by means of this camera. Mr. Erb stated to us that he found it was a perfectly satisfactory instrument, and that he was enabled to make pictures with it in the open air at so small an aperture as F. 11. Then came an actual trial of the Bianchi camera, with the writer of this article as the subject, or, rather, one of the subjects. Mr. Erb filled the camera and took up his position, whilst this same present (innocent) writer was deputed by Stage Director Golden to enact the part of a society villain on account of his six feet and half an inch of height and alleged Mephistophelian aspect, though everybody knows he is the reverse of villainous. This was the story: We were supposed to be dallying with another man's spouse. Being discovered in the act by Pat Powers, he drew the attention of the outraged husband to the fact, whereupon there was a struggle between ourselves and the other man—a struggle to the death, in which we were remorselessly clubbed to death with an unloaded pistol. However, all ended well, for we, in company with the lady and the other three men in the part, subsequently bowed our acknowledgment to Mr. Erb as he concluded turning the handle of the Bianchi camera. Thus ended the little Powers picture play in which the characters were impersonated by amateur actors tolerably well known in the moving picture field.

The negative, when developed, showed that the camera gives a well-defined, well-exposed picture of very good quality. Mr. Powers and Mr. Erb claim that they obtain an even better picture with this camera than with other cameras. This interesting test over, we gratified our curiosity by a careful study, in company with several other visitors, of the Powers picture play release of April 12, "His Mother's Letter." First of all we followed the story without concentrating or focusing all our attention upon it. With Director Golden responsible, we expected to find a clearly told story with strong dramatic points. We were more than satisfied with the story of "His Mother's Letter," nay, we were very agreeably surprised and delighted. It tells the story of a boy going to Nevada, meeting with many adventures there and subsequently returning to his old mother and leaving the gold behind. This is one of the most powerful stories ever released by an Independent film manufacturer. One scene in the picture we shall not readily forget: It is where the young miner, having lost all his money at poker, decides to rob the man who beat him at cards. They occupy adjoining rooms. The victorious gamester goes to bed, carefully placing a pistol on the chair to guard himself in case of attack. Then we see the would-be thief stealing from his room with a huge, murderous-looking dagger in his hand. He starts to pry open the door of the bedroom wherein sleeps the man whom he would rob. Then we see the latter awakened by the sound and stretch out his hand for his pistol. The would-be robber is just about to enter the room of his victim when his chum arrives with a letter from his old mother, who thus unconsciously saves her boy from becoming a criminal, or being shot dead as one. This situation should make the fortune of this film, and, incidentally, the reputation of the Powers Company as makers of highly dramatic moving photographs.

Now, what about the photographic quality of these "picture plays," as Mr. Powers prefers to call them? It is all that can be desired. The Powers Company have a very great command over the tinting, toning and developing of their positives, which are clean, strong, vigorous pictures, whether they be in monochrome or in color. The particular picture that we examined may be regarded as the Powers Company's first series of high-class releases. The quality of this picture could hardly be improved upon, either photographically or dramatically. Therefore, we cordially recommend the Powers picture plays to the notice of our exhibiting and renting readers.

In Mr. Powers we have great pleasure in welcoming a worthy recruit to the Independent moving picture side. His engaging personality, which has already made him immensely popular in the moving picture field, should be, and no doubt is, a valuable asset to the company. Moreover, he has a record for business success in the phonographic field, another valuable asset. In Mr. Erb and Mr. Golden we have two men who have won valuable experience in the technical and dramatic end of moving picture making. So that, all through, the Powers Company, in our opinion, is as well equipped as it possibly could be for the work it has laid itself out to do, and that is, the making and selling of high-class moving picture plays.

A Suggestion.

Exhibitors and managers of moving picture theaters will have an opportunity of suiting the music to the picture in the case of the Edison release of May 3d next, so we take this opportunity of drawing their attention to the fact. This release takes for its subject that of the Cigarette Maker of Seville ("Carmen"), the character of which is to be presented by Mme. Pilar-Morin. Now, every pianist, every musician of the smallest pretension, knows the music of "Carmen," which perhaps was the best known and most popular opera produced last century. Even the little boy in the streets whistles the Toreador's song and other favorite parts of the opera, which is also a ballet d'action. What we, therefore, suggest to the exhibitor and the musicians employed by him, is to assure that when the film of "Carmen" is shown on May 3d, or whenever or wherever it is shown, Bizet's music should be played with it. This is the second of the Edison grand opera stories. The first of them was "Faust," and we were disappointed that when we saw this picture Gounod music did not accompany it. Anyhow, there is the opportunity ready made for those of our readers who are interested in the adaptation of suitable music to the picture to do what we have so often asked them to do. We have no doubt that if and wherever it is done the pleasure of the public will be heightened.

Moving Pictures and Music.

By Paul Evert Denton.

With the innovation of the moving picture show in the amusement field, demand for musicians has increased rapidly, until now hundreds of piano players and performers on other instruments are making good wages in the large cities and towns. Some shows can afford an orchestra.

It is a peculiar fact that the average spectator doesn't take much note of the music or realize its importance when he goes into a show. Yet he would miss it.

What is the moving picture show without music? Did you ever drop into one when, perhaps, the piano player had gone to supper, and there was no sound with the exception of that peculiar to the projecting machine? You know you were conscious of the fact that there seemed to be something lacking. You weren't at your fullest enjoyment. Somehow a moving picture show isn't half so entertaining unless there is a pianist to put you in the proper mood for the picture, so that you can best appreciate it.

How much more you enjoy seeing a big ocean liner leaving New York Harbor with its crowd of humanity, to the tune of some light waltz song. It seems entirely in keeping with the picture.

And how sad is that deathbed scene, or where some poor little child is thrown into the street by a cruel, drunken father, and as the snow begins to fall faster and faster, she swoons in the cold mass of feathery flakes—and how much more intensified is that emotion in you when you see the picture as the strains of the "Flower Song" (that composition indispensable to tragedy), or, perchance, "Hearts and Flowers," is wafted in your ears.

Moving pictures and music are inseparable. This the public cannot deny. And yet how little attention and praise the musician at the piano receives.

The musician or piano player in a moving picture show must be versatile. He should have accurate knowledge of the tunes of a catalogue of songs that have caught the popular fancy. Coupled with this knowledge he must have the power of application.

For instance: How fitting to play "Please Go 'Way and Let Me Sleep," when a tramp lays himself down in some quiet nook for a snooze, or perhaps play "Because I Love You," in a scene of domestic tranquillity punctuated by the hurling of cups and saucers, or, again, "Teasing," when the rest of an old grandfather is broken by the pranks of a Buster Brown who tickles the paternal nose. Hundreds of like examples could be noted, which are all up to the quick wit of the player and the conditions of the picture. The audience always enjoys this.

How peculiar would be the impression on a spectator to hear some lively quickstep played as a little girl's sick mother passes away and leaves her to the mercy of the "cold, cruel world."

The pianist must be able to quickly change his music to put the interested spectator in the mood the picture demands. He must acquire the ability of being able to play to the correct time in which the figures in the picture dance, if there is a Terpischorean film. This is no easy matter, as the figures sometimes change the time quite frequently in a picture. The pianist must watch close, because the effect would be rather marred if a two-step were played while a Colonial minuet was being executed.

Much has been written on the various devices for sound and imitation, constructed to lend realism to the pictures. But music is even a more important adjunct in the display of moving pictures than these.

Music, while it may escape the attention of the spectator, has the strange and subtle influence of creating moods, and that is why it is so important in the presentation of the moving picture.

The Villain of the Piece.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

In former article I have told my readers something about my experiences in the way of producing and rehearsing silent and talking plays; I also had something to say about the dramatic movement in the picture, and the enormous part played by the lady's hat in the moving picture house. Like all authors, I like to hear nice things said about my work, and as these little personal experiences are evidently to the taste of my readers, I propose to continue the series from time to time. There is a lot to be said about the lighter and more human side of the moving picture. I do not think that there is any subject of conversation on which men and women more easily get together than the moving picture. Politics, religion, science, art, all give way, I notice, to the moving picture when it is mentioned. I found myself, the other evening, a guest at a great and exclusive New York club, the members of which are men of eminence and renown, who discussed learned subjects in a learned way. Yet so soon as it was known that I was identified with the moving picture, so soon as the subject itself was mentioned, hardly anything else was talked about thereafter but moving pictures.

But this is not about the "villain of the piece." Who is this "villain of the piece?" Ladies and gentlemen, brethren and sistern, it is I, who write this, moi-meme, myself, my very own and undoubted self. I never had the ambition common to many, both men and women, of "going on the stage." Many boys have, as we all know. They either want to go on the stage, go to sea or drive a locomotive. I never had any of these things. I always wanted to be what I am—a knight of the pen. But I have had a sneaking, half formed desire to go on the stage very occasionally, and in one capacity only—that of the villain of the piece. I have no use for the hero, the old man, the adventurous soldier. I do not very much care for actresses, unless they are nice women, but I do love a right down, straightforwared, unmitigated villain on the stage. You know the kind of villain I mean. Lago; Richard the Second; Mephistopheles. Good old Mephisto! There's a villain for you; the very devil himself. I shall never forget the villainously villainous way in which Irving as Mephistopheles, in "Faust," turned, towards the close of the play, to Martha, the maladroit old woman of the piece, and said in that unspeakably sardonic voice of his: "I don't know what will become of you. I won't have you." Fancy the devil rejecting anybody! How very villainous, and how I would like, were I an actor, to play such a part. Such an opportunity of letting yourself go! I would not like talking platitudes, religion, sentiment, and the very usual things of the usual drama.

Well, I realized my secret ambition last week. I wanted to play the part of a villain, and to play the part of a villain in a moving picture play. I have no doubt that those of you who know me personally will say that I was not half a bad villain. Six feet and half an inch, 205 pounds and one of those saturnine expressions of countenance which may mean that the possessor of those attributes is either a detective or bank robber. A very obvious villain, eh?

The little drama of which I speak was rapidly arranged by Stage Director Golden, of the Powers Company. We were having tests made of a film, when with truly remarkably and rapid inspiration Golden wrote, cast and arranged the little drama on the stage, while Erb turned the handle of the camera, as you will see him doing in a picture elsewhere in this week's issue. So, if you please, I was cast for the not uncongenial part of a man making love to a lady, who happened to be another man's wife. I sat down by the lady's side and proceeded to business. We were getting on very nicely in our billings and cooings and Erb was recording it all down when the stentorian voice of Mr. Powers himself was heard!

"Pat" was the dam good natured friend who discovered the villain of the piece (me) making love to another man's wife! His voice was heard apprising the outraged husband of my little game. A heavy hand was laid on my shoulder. I turned, only to see before me a glaring face, and the cold muzzle of a murderously deadly six-shooter. "Villain," shouted a voice. "Aha. Aha," shouted I. I rose. We closed; we struggled; we swayed in the deadly combat! In a few seconds I was on the ground getting it pretty badly in the neck. "Spare him. Oh, spare him for his mother's sake," shouted somebody. I think it was Golden; I am not sure. So I was spared! To rise a resuscitated villain and stand with my friends, Powers, Golden and the lady and gentleman before the camera to show that, after all, it was only a play. Golden said I made a mighty fine villain. Were it not that my ambition had been satisfied I might feel inclined to treat with him or some other stage producer for a real job as a villain in a real picture.

Well, it feels pretty good to play the villain when it is love making, or robbing a safe, or having a good time; but the other end of matters is not so pleasant. Even though it only be playing you are apt to get some hard knocks when you are discovered doing that which you ought not to be doing. I have heard that actors are so often carried away with their parts that they inflict serious injury on one another. Cases have been known where in the heat of much passion people have been killed on the stage. Still, it is nice, to my way of thinking, to be the villain of the piece. The whole machinery of the play hangs upon your villainy and its greater or less efficacy or efficiency. If there were no villains there would hardly be any stage plays, for uniform goodness on the stage is just about as cloying as it is in real life. In life, villainy which, of course, I do not seriously defend, supplies the shadows of the picture as it does in the play.

On the whole I do not think that I will play any more villains on the stage. I mean the kind of villain that is found out by Powers and Golden. Give me the kind of villain where it is all love making, champagne, rolls of notes and a good time, and you are not found out and brought into uncomfortable propinquity with an unpleasant looking pistol.

G. Basil Barham, 347 Kingston road, Wimbledon, S. W., London, England, would like to have American manufacturers of electric specialties for show purposes to send him their catalogues and descriptions of their goods.

The "Roosevelt in Africa" pictures seem to have become a fad, for nearly every manufacturer of slides is supplying them to dealers. The latest entree into this field is Mr. McIntosh, who has made up several sets of these slides to sell at a very reasonable sum, and he anticipates a heavy sale, as the slides are clear and are based on authentic pictures.

The Nicholas Power Company have just installed through the Actograph Company a No. 6 cameragraph and adjustable inductor complete at the Lyric Theater, Oyster Bay, L. I. This combination produces such excellent results in economy of operation, reliable service and perfect pictures upon the screen that it is proving very popular with the exhibitors.

GOOD OPERATORS.

By F. H. Richardson.

One writer in a letter recently said: "There is one point of advice Mr. Richardson, you might give some of the operators, which you will, of course, do in time, though it may not be good policy to do it now, and that is for them to get a good operator and pay his price, instead of trying to make one through your column."

Now certainly, from the rest of the letter, the writer did not intend the expression in any offensive way. But I would like to ask him where is the manager to get these good men? In these United States there are about ten thousand places where moving picture films are shown. In fact, there are about that many moving picture places. Now I firmly believe it to be a fact that there are not in all this country one thousand really first class, high grade operators. By this I mean men who are thoroughly posted in all that pertains to their profession and are also ready and willing to apply that knowledge at all times! In other words there is, I believe, but one high class man to every ten jobs! Of course operators will object to this statement, but that does not alter the fact! There is probably a larger percentage than this who possess the requisite knowledge and are capable of doing really first class work, but many of them are too infernally lazy to do their work right, so what use is their knowledge? None at all! They might as well not possess it! The Operators' Column does not design to "make operators." It couldn't if it wanted to. The column is conducted for the reason that there is a need for it and The Moving Picture World is, to my mind, truly progressive in filling such a need. The trouble with the average operator is that he is altogether too easily satisfied. If his picture satisfies the "boss" that is enough. He, himself, is never dissatisfied with his own performance, hence he never progresses beyond a certain point. You seldom find him doing much real studying, though one can study projection for years and still find plenty to learn. His tool kit too often consists of a screwdriver, pair of pliers and film shear, all of which he carries in his pocket—he is therefore always ready for work. Line! His library consists of—nothing. Ask him what celluloid is made of and he would wonder if you were crazy, asking him so irrelevant a question. Ask him how many pounds pull the intermittent sprocket exerts on the film in starting it and he would have a fit. Ask him even so simple a question as to how he would measure a reel of film in his operating room, and four out of five of him couldn't tell to save his neck. Probably he would suggest a yardstick. Even ask him how many times the intermittent acts to each turn of the machine crank and I'll bet a surprising number of him couldn't tell you. But ask him if he is a first class operator and he'll swell up like a toy balloon and at once tell you he has "been running six years." That seems the standard answer—six years! As a matter of fact, the time a man has been in the business has not half so much to do with his ability, as has the amount of time he has put in really studying his profession. That is what counts. I know men who really have been running machines a number of years who are not worth a d—n as far as ability goes. I know others who have only been running a comparatively short time who are excellent operators and some of them first class men. Now please understand I'm not roasting the good men. I'm not even roasting the poor ones, but I'm simply telling them a few plain, wholesome truths. There is a great scarcity of really good men and this condition is likely to continue until managers wake up and demand better service, at the same time recognizing superior ability in the pay envelope. At present, operators' wages are too low to attract many high class men. It takes brains to run a moving picture machine—brains and real knowledge, if the best results are to be attained. Also it takes exceedingly close application on the part of the operator every second the machine is running. You cannot expect to buy this kind of service for a song, Mr. Manager. In this old world superiority in anything must be paid for in dollars and cents! Men of real brains, knowledge and ability don't have to, and won't, work for $15 a week. On the other hand, as conditions now are, managers can only secure a small number of high class men, as before stated, and that condition can only be changed by demanding ability and recognizing it in the pay check. Thus, gradually, better men may be secured, and thus only.

The Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company, Omaha, Neb., branch has moved to 1212 Farnam street, where they have taken an entire floor. This sounds like prosperity—and it is due to the demands of the exhibitor who clamors for the "Trevor Lion Screen."

Everybody appears to be singing "Kelly." "Has anybody here seen Kelly?" No matter where you go you hear the same tune, if not the same words—"Has anybody here seen Kelly?" But has anybody heard anything new in connection with the moving picture business? Aye! there's the rub, as Hamlet would say. I have been over the Broadway and the Whiteway for a week past and I have failed to discover anything new. Of course, I have heard that Hammerstein is still on the Independent list and all the Wm. Morris' houses are the same, and that is about all. There is an excellent opportunity here for a man to express (or register mail, for that matter) his candid opinion, but I dare not do so. Why? Because that editor who wields the blue pencil is on the lookout for me. If I say anything against the Patents Company I get a knock; and if I say anything for the Patents Company I get a knock; so I have decided to knock nobody but myself, so here goes.

Some people are not able to discriminate between a knock and a boost, nor are they capable of appreciating a compliment. I feel that I am in one or the other of these classes. A friend of mine told me the other day that I would make a good expert witness in a patent suit bearing upon moving pictures. I protested and begged that my name be kept in the dark. He reassured me with the assertion that I would not be kept long upon the stand because the men who knew the motion picture business from A to Z are always the greatest help to a jury. Now, what do you think he meant by that?

I made a few remarks in my last letter regarding operators. I wish to add a few more. Look out for the bogey man! He is not a myth, nor is he a specter, but he gets into your booth at one time or another. One of the most valuable assets of the operator is his card. When he loses that he loses his license. I know many worthy boys who depend upon their card for a livelihood. I know of others who think the card is good for anything from a joy ride to a trip to Europe. Be careful of your cards, boys. I may be treading upon the all-claimed territory of another writer, but I still give the warning cry. Look out for your cards! If you do not, the municipal department will. They have men out on the job. Don't lend your cards to someone else. If you must eat, see that the man who takes your place has his card. It is better for you to throw up your job than to have the department take your card from you. Take a case for instance: An operator with a card goes to supper and leaves his machine in charge of a friend whom he knows is perfectly capable, but the friend has no card. While the man with the card is enjoying his beef and —— an inspector drops in. The substitute is asked to show his card. Of course he has none, and an apology is made to the effect that the man with the card is out, getting something to eat. The inspector leaves a notice for the regular operator to report to the public department at a certain time. The operator complies and his card is taken away from him. In some cases the operator ignores the notice, and then the department shuts down the show. I have heard of no less than three cases of this type during the past week. The moral is that every operator keeps his eye on his card. This is not a question of unionism, but one of self-protection independent of all organization. The municipal department looks to you for your card and you must not only be on the job, but you must also have the card. When I refer to the card I mean the card issued by the municipal department.

By the way, I know of a young man who is an active union worker and holds a union card, but he failed to pass examination before the municipal department. I do not say the party I refer to was incompetent, but what I wish to convey is that when an operator gets his card he should not treat it as a license for life. All men who hold a job should always keep themselves posted on all things bearing upon it and be ready for examination. To get a license for the privilege of turning the handle of a machine is to get a license for nothing. The handle is one thing and the machine another. There was a time when an operator of a moving picture machine was looked upon as a craftsman, and he was. He was given an outfit and told to play a house. At times it happened that the house to be played had no electric wiring, and I am sure that some who may read these notes will recall the time when they were obliged to climb electric light poles and train a line into the hall they were expected to play in that night. But they were operators—not handle turners. They could go out on the road, set up, give a show, pull down, pack up, and give a show in the next town the next afternoon. In other words, they were men who entered and studied the business, and the most of them are among the foremost of our stage electricians to-day.

I heard a street rumor the other day that the Patents Company was on the job and that within a few days something would leak out that would make some people sit up and take notice. Take a tip from me. The Patents Company (which is practically the licensed manufacturers) is not doing anything radical. I am now speaking from a business standpoint, and not as the mouthpiece of any concern or combination. I feel as certain as certainty can be that, at best, all the floating rumors are the fruits of premature conception.

In conclusion let me say that the municipal department of Greater New York is fortifying itself on the non-inflammable film question. Every show of pictures of any importance is being watched and a report is made as to the quality of the film used. This has been drawn down to such a nicety that the city department has data showing that the Keith & Proctor houses have been supplied with non-inflammable film more frequently than others, and yet in the tally of one month these houses showed non-inflammable film exclusively but one day.

The latest I hear is that the electrical department is about to insist that the regular theaters using moving pictures must install booths. With flame shields, automatic shutters, non-inflammable film, etc., etc., as presented to-day in comparison with the crude, open work of the past, the remonstrances of the theater managers seem justifiable. Yet, where can you draw the line?

Pennsylvania Aisle Law.—A decision has been handed down by Judge Kunkel upholding the State factory inspector in his efforts to enforce the law requiring three 4-foot aisles in all moving picture theaters. The exhibitors nodded else this absurd law would never have been passed. Their thanks are due to the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company for the fight that they have made and, although the first decision has been adverse, we are informed that they are appealing the case to the Supreme Court.

Coffeyville, Kan.—The Jefferson and another large theater have closed after a successful season. The Princess, Royal and Star are running moving pictures and vaudeville to S. R. O. nightly. We will have three airdomes for this Summer, which are now under construction. The Star Theater management are opening an airdome. Mr. Pachen will also open an airdome about the 20th of this month. Pollock & Catul will open their airdome immediately. Altogether the business is in a very prosperous condition in this part of the country, although most of the pictures have renewed their youth by reason of their age before they reach us.—C. F. Hutchinson.

The Casino Theater, on Madison street, Chicago, Ill., has a unique musical auxiliary in a set of electric bells situated at different points throughout the house, in which numerous selections are rendered. The bells are of the chime pattern and have a special muffler for soft passages, which brings out the distance effect when in accompaniment to films which require such assistance from these melody machines. Many theaters throughout the city are adopting these methods of attracting patrons, and not alone for this advantage but in order to be able to exhibit their film subjects with a better and more realistic effect.

"A Romance of the Western Hills" (Biograph).—Any film which depicts subjects in which Indians are shown is interesting, partly because the photography must be done outdoors and partly because there is a great interest in Indian subjects. It can be said, too, without fear of correction, that much good is accomplished by these films which show how the Indian has been abused and mistreated. In this picture the white man who trifles with the Indian girl should have been severely punished. Indeed, it was the girl who suffered through his perfidy. Obviously the white man could not love an Indian girl sufficiently to marry her, but he should not trifle with her. Even though the girl in this instance goes back to her own people, one feels that the man should be punished for deceiving her. The acting and staging are both good, and the photography is clear and accurate in tonal qualities.

"Jones' Watch" (Lubin).—A lively comedy, showing graphically what happened to a man when he forgot his watch. Calamity followed calamity, but all in humorous fashion. He narrowly escaped arrest, but by means of a clever ruse succeeded in restoring the watch taken under a misapprehension. It is a funny picture and never fails to raise a vociferous laugh.

"Hemlock Hoax, the Detective" (Lubin).—A travesty upon so-called detective work that develops into some good cross-country sprinting. The acting is clever, developing many amusing features as it proceeds. To see a detective hunting clews with a magnifying glass is funny indeed.

"The Fisherman's Luck" (Lubin).—All sorts of luck comes to fishermen, but not all fishermen are so unfortunate as this one. He catches everything but fish, and creates so much disturbance with his apparatus that he is thrown over a wall into the sea by his victims.

"Her Sister's Sin" (Pathe).—A love story worked out over the so-called sin of a sister and made to turn upon the loyalty of the living to the dead sister. She loves her lover, is abused and stoned and maltreated, but finally the sun breaks through and the clouds roll away. The acting is so sympathetic that one lives over the pictured scenes. The photography is clear, adding strength and beauty to the entire picture.

"One-Legged Acrobats" (Pathe).—A pair of acrobats at work with only two legs between them. They perform diverting and highly amusing stunts. Acting and photography are alike interesting.

"King Cotton" (Edison).—A picture giving a complete history of cotton from the seed to the finished product, one of those excellent industrial pictures which are such a pleasure to look at and which are so excellent in the way of instruction as well as entertainment. It is photographed with all the skill which the Edison operators show when doing work of that character, and is another valuable addition to the growing test of educational subjects.

"Vintage in Lanquedoc" (Gaumont).—A picture of wine making at Lanquedoc, a companion to the one shown last week. The artistic qualities of the work are quite as good, and the film is an addition to the long list of educational pictures put out of late.

"The Volcano of Chinyero" (Gaumont).—An excellent film illustrating in a graphic way a volcano in action. The photographer has done his work well and has succeeded in conveying the actual impression of a mountain. Operators make mistakes in this respect more frequently than they should, and there is too often reason to criticise a photographer's representation of a mountain; but in this instance the work has been well done and a sufficient proportion of the picturesque features have been retained to make it interesting.

"The Ranger's Bride" (Essanay).—A delicious bit of humor, with the acting so natural that it actually seems as though Bill was really frightened when he sees the spinster which the boys have rigged up for him and undertake to foist upon him through the offices of a bogus clergyman. When Bill runs they all run after him and the ceremony is performed regardless of his protestations. After they have all left, however, he discovers the deception and realizes that perhaps his friends have saved him from a cruel fate. At any rate he is cured of the loving habit and determines that single blessedness is quite the proper thing after all.

"A Family Quarrel" (Essanay).—A fast and furious comedy which is acted with all the dash and go which characterize such pictures in the Essanay studio. All ends well and the audience is kept laughing while the short film runs.

"The Kiss Was Mightier than the Sword" (Gaumont).—A rather strange method of forcing the leaders to settle a dispute which led to war, but perhaps it would be effective. The principal interest will be in the reproduction of Athenian scenery, with buildings, costumes and other features clearly represented. That the wives refuse to allow their husbands to kiss them until they promise not to prosecute the war further is interesting, but the photography of the scenery, including a view of the Ægean Sea, is so good that it cannot fail to attract. A good subject, well worked out and photographed with great skill.

"O'er Hill and Dale" (Gaumont).—A picture giving beautiful views of such scenery as can be found almost everywhere in a wooded hill country. There are glimpses of many beautiful sections of the country, showing fields and woods and streams and buildings such as can be seen in any ordinary landscape, making an exceedingly attractive picture. Yet it is composed of such scenes as are common about one everywhere. It is, perhaps, an unusual representation of usual subjects.

"A Hasty Operation" (Pathe).—A knockabout comedy of the rough house order. The amusing feature, the serious usage which a man receives at the hands of the corpulent nurse, is laughable, and after all his experiences, including the loss of a leg which the doctors cut off with sheer joy, he whips the corpulent female soundly and then she is avenged by his getting another drubbing at the hands of the mob who saw his action, but did not see hers. The danger line between comedy and rough house is here so close that one hesitates to undertake any criticism between them.

"Honest Peggy" (Pathe).—A girl finds a pocketbook and through that is given a good home, though an orphan and an outcast. It is a pretty story, well told, and the delight of the orphan when she realizes her good fortune arouses one's emotion very strongly.

"The Conqueror" (Vitagraph).—A dramatic recital of what a young man does who goes to the city and fails to accomplish his purpose. He is first a wreck and then aroused to a sense of his own shame, he resolves to begin again and this time he conquers that worst of all enemies, himself. It is a good picture, filled with suggestions for the young man beginning life and offering in a somewhat veiled way numerous suggestions for improvement in one's acts and life. It is a good story and should exert a beneficial influence, besides affording entertainment to those who appreciate fine acting and photography.

"Sandy, the Substitute" (Edison).—A realistic dramatization of Roy Norton's excellent story of the Wyoming mountains, dramatized by the author. It is the story of a man who substituted for the sheriff in the search for and capture of an outlaw, depicting with strong realism the pathetic parting scene between the outlaw and his wife, when Sandy forces her to shackle them together. Then comes the long, weary march back to the camp with the prisoner, over mountains and through an unbroken waste of snow. The $5,000 blood money is indignantly spurned by Sandy, who accepts it and sends it to the outlaw's wife. The dramatic quality of this picture is very strong and this has been strengthened by the best of acting and all is shown clearly in photography which cannot be questioned. It is one of the most interesting and strongly dramatic films the Edison company has turned out in a long time.

"The Gypsy Girl's Love" (Kalem).—A dramatic picture which ends happily, though for a time it looks as though the gypsies were going to be lynched for a crime of which they were innocent. The weak feature is that the mob would listen to a colored boy. A frenzied mob would not be likely to do that anywhere, much less, perhaps, in the section where the scene of this story is laid. There is a heart story running through it and the discovery of the perfidy of a lover is what leads to the difficulty. The acting is sympathetic and realistic, particularly in the mob scenes. The photography illustrates the steady improvement of this firm in that department and altogether it is a very satisfactory film.

"The Hunchback Fiddler" (Pathe).—A comedy from the Pathe studio which presents some novel features and keeps the audience in good humor while it lasts. The film in action and photography is up to the Pathe standard and usual style.

"Paula Peters and Her Trained Animals" (Pathe).—A scenic film which will please the children and will scarcely displease the older people. A marvelously well trained horse, a troupe of dogs and one or two monkeys perform remarkable stunts at their trainer's command. The horse is snow white, which makes him very conspicuous in the picture.

The work of all the animals is wonderful and excites great interest in any audience.

"The Tongue of Scandal" (Vitagraph).—While this is a very strongly dramatic picture, one scarcely sees any particular good arising from its production. Scandal mongers are too numerous in any community and events represented in this picture might well bring about scandal. It is scarcely conceivable that a man would force the concealment of marriage under such circumstances as are here set forth far too graphically for comfort. Without criticising the acting or the technical quality of the picture, we heard many object to the story, and point out besides that it seems far too improbable to be accepted as convincing. A motion picture should either instruct or amuse and this does neither. It seems all the more regrettable since this firm uniformly produces such excellent work in every sense. It would seem as though the producer or the director who had charge of the production nodded when this was put upon the stage.

"The Girl in the Barracks" (Vitagraph).—A love story, which is made novel by laying the scene in a Russian barracks. There is a harsh and forbidding father, a persistent lover and a peasant girl, who saves the life of the general in a dramatic manner. And at the end happiness for all who are connected with the affair. Often the shifting of the background makes a picture seem entirely new, when, as a matter of fact, the story is substantially as others which have gone before. The Vitagraph people have worked this out in an interesting way, supplying details true to life and making a film technically perfect.

"Their Sea Voyage" (Essanay).—A funny film, worked out with all the close attention to the requirements of the situations which characterizes the Essanay work. The picture is more than ordinarily funny, and every audience is certain to laugh. Even a New York day audience laughed at this, and that should be proof enough of its funny qualities. It takes something out of the common to excite the risibles of such a stolid set of people as drift into a New York motion picture house in the morning, and this film did it.

"The Old Fiddler" (Kalem).—Here is a picture out of the ordinary in both acting and photography. Produced by the firm's Southern stock company, it was so good that it was substituted for a reel previously advertised by the house. The story is a good one, embodying numerous dramatic situations which are carefully worked out and made the most of. The acting is sympathetic, revealing qualities which appeal to the audience which gathers in most motion picture houses. The photographer allowed no opportunity for doing good work to escape him and the result is a film which is going to be popular wherever it is shown.

"The Miniature" (Pathe).—A romantic picture telling an interesting love story, centering around a miniature of a handsome young woman. Powdered hair and patches, and costuming in keeping, help in making up a pretty picture, one that will please by its daintiness and, yes, one can say it truthfully, its freshness. The lady involved looks as though she had stepped out of a Watteau painting, and all the accessories are in harmony with the central character. A duel begins, but it ends when the lady appears. The ending is happy and the picture is as pretty and attractive as one might wish.

"Ice Scooters on Lake Ronkonkoma" (Pathe).—A view of a motor scooter, an ice boat invented during the past year and capable of making 120 miles an hour under favorable conditions. Two fast boats of this character, of radically different types of construction, are shown in an exciting race. The picture is interesting because of its novelty and its beauty is enhanced by careful photography.

"A Ramble Through the Island of Sumatra" (Urban).—A delightful picture illustrating picturesque points in Sumatra, affording a view of its scenery, its people and its industries. The photographer selected his viewpoints with unusual intelligence and the picture affords an accurate impression of the island.

INDEPENDENTS.

"The New Burglar Alarm" (Great Northern).—A short comedy which tells an interesting story and offers a suggestion of what to do under certain conditions. It is unnecessary to describe the picture. See it and judge for yourself whether it is good or not.

"The Hustling Mr. Brown" (Great Northern).—A lively comedy which represents the hustling Mr. Brown in action. Here the audiences will discover a laugh concealed in every line and the scenes only add to the laughable character of the story as it proceeds.

"The Valuable Hat" (Itala).—A representation of what befell a gentleman who placed his money in his hat and then some boys played a joke on him, making him think he has lost it. Every hat in sight suffers, but finally he discovers his own hat on his back with his money intact.

"At the Farm" (Itala).—A strong drama, with a farm scene as a background and against which the drama is worked out. It is an interesting and well told story, with actors in sympathy with and understanding their subject, and deserves a long run because of its excellence.

"Red Wing's Loyalty" (Bison).—An Indian romance in which an Indian girl is represented as succoring the man who helped her in her hour of need. The picture will, perhaps, be chiefly interesting for the views of prairie life, including a camp at night and numerous Indian and other scenes which are made as accurate as possible. This firm's work in this direction is too well known to require comment. The acting and staging are satisfactory and the technical qualities of the picture are sufficiently accurate to supply clear interpretation.

"The Actress" (Powers).—A strong love story with comedy situations which add to its interest. The story centers around a well known actress and a Western mining engineer. One of its unique scenes represents a behind-the-scenes view of a well known New York theater before the curtain rises. There is some good acting, including bits of pure comedy, which brighten up the film and increase its attractiveness. It is a clean, American play, well acted, well staged and well photographed.

"Daddy's Double" (Thanhouser).—A story of love in a boarding school, a foiled elopement and a resourceful young man, who makes up like the girl's father, fools the coachman so he is driven to the school in the family coach, marries the girl and is forgiven afterward by the father, when he discovers how resourceful and brilliant his new son-in-law is. Acting and photography are alike well done. The film is likely to be popular wherever it is shown.

"Strength of Duty" (Eclair).—A dramatic film, well described in its title. The acting is sympathetic, and the photographer has performed his work carefully. The picture is pleasing and holds the interest throughout.

"Rivalry in the Oil Fields" (Bison).—A love story centering around an oil well. Perhaps one of its principal points of interest is the fact that it illustrates to some extent scenes in the oil regions, necessarily unfamiliar to very many who will, because of this, see the picture with some degree of instruction. The story of fraud and deception helps to bind a number of isolated events into a connected story.

"His Mother's Letter" (Powers).—Laid in a Nevada mining camp, the scene of this film possesses considerable interest. The story is familiar enough. A man gambles with another's gold and loses it, but just as the culprit determines to do something desperate a letter from his mother, begging him to go home, changes it all. A few lively comedy scenes add to the picture. Acting and photography are sympathetic and clear.

"At Double Cross Ranch" (Nestor).—A film filled with action and the overflowing spirits of the exuberant cowboy. The games played upon an innocent tenderfoot make one wonder if it is possible the fools are not all dead yet. There are all sorts of wild stunts, including a hold-up by fake Indians, a whirlwind rescue by cowboys, and the riding of a bucking broncho, all intended for the beginning of the education of an Eastern gentleman who was persona non grata. It all works to a charm and the tenderfoot sits up all night to be sure not to miss the first eastbound train.

"Legend of the Cross" (Ambrosio).—Into a week of pictures which were otherwise free from the gloom of death and sorrow this one is injected, which represents a girl hurling herself from a cliff because of a monk's deception. True, the cross erected in her memory is always strewn with flowers, but why are such films necessary? They serve no purpose, and they spoil the rest of the program in the minds of a considerable number of people. Give the public something instructive, or something pleasing.

"Fricot in College" (Ambrosio).—Excepting as a vehicle for the representation of college pranks the usefulness of this film is questioned. There are some amusing points, but most of the sport is too much of the rough house type. Sport is to be commended, and even pranks can be tolerated, unless they descend to the boor's methods; and that is what happens here in places.

"The Rosary" (Imp).—A love story of interest, centering in a painter's studio where two students are studying art. There is the heart interest of love and jealousy graphically depicted and all the features of life pertaining thereunto. The representation of painting is clever and the idea of using a rosary as an inspiration is original. The acting is sympathetic and one feels convinced that the conception of the author of the scenario has been fairly interpreted.

"Washed Ashore" (Lux).—A story of an abused child who ran away and with a companion conveyed a man floating on the sea, who proves to be the girl's father. While the scenes are worked out with care, the story itself is scarcely of sufficient strength to more than hold the interest. It is not disagreeing, nor is the gloom of death invoked, but the abuse of a child is not an entirely delectable subject for contemplation.

"The Attack Upon the Train" (Lux).—A picture representing a scrimmage in which shots are exchanged, an arrest follows, then comes the holding up of a train and lastly a cowboy celebration rough enough to satisfy the most exacting lover of excitement. The film has plenty of action, which probably will do much toward making it popular.

SELIG VERSATILITY.

Just to show that his retinue of talented artists can shine in other settings than backwoods scenes, war dramas and spectacular plays, Selig has favored us with an advanced peep at "The Angelus," a simple story of daily life. The story is inspired by Millet's historical painting of the same name and in a series of beautiful scenes the Selig players stir the emotions and bring out the beautiful sentiment of "Peace on earth, good will to men," that Millet, in his masterpiece, suggested by the expression on the faces of the listeners to the tolling of "The Angelus" bell. This picture will be released on April 28, and, as we have said, it shows Selig in a new role to which it is to be hoped he will return again.

ESSANAY ACQUIRES TALENTED LEADING LADY.

It was recently announced that the Essanay Company was organizing a very strong and capable stock company, but until now all names have been withheld. It is interesting to learn that Miss Martha Spier, a talented young German actress, who last season acquired considerable renown at the New German Theater in New York, has contracted with the Essanay Company for the Summer months to play leading parts in the excellent Essanay productions.

Although Miss Spier has been in America but a short time, she has scored brilliant successes in leading roles, playing to select German audiences at the New German Theater in New York. Here she attracted the attention of certain New York theater managers and received much flattering comment for her splendid interpretation of Hannele (in which Mrs. Fiske will shortly appear), and it was even whispered that when she appears in English-speaking plays she may even give the famous Russian, Nazimova, a good race. Miss Spier's work in stock at the New German Theater was highly complimented by the German newspaper dramatic critics. She has won many staunch friends and admirers during her brief season in New York and declares she was offered another season with the German Theater Company, which she refused, preferring to give the silent drama a thorough try-out.

In Germany, Miss Spier is acknowledged a very clever comedienne, and for several years essayed leading roles at the Hoftheater, Meiningen, one of the foremost of the German theaters, interpreting the best drama. The Meiningen institution, it will be remembered, is a court theater in the Hoftheaters at Berlin. With her own company Miss Spier has made extensive tours in Germany, Holland and Belgium, playing all the leading theaters in the principal cities and won much praise from the German newspaper critics. They have all endorsed her distinction of being unsurpassed in comedy roles. Miss Spier is also highly versed in a musical collection [illegible] and she distinguished herself in comedy at a contest at Meiningen, awarded by the nobility of the city, which supports the artistic institution.

Miss Spier had intended to come for the Essanay Company only until after the first of the year, but the many manifestations of her English, the only barrier at present between her and the English-speaking plays. However, since she has seen the work in motion pictures she seems one way to stay longer. She finds the work fascinating and revels in her parts and duties.

Miss Spier was at first not much impressed at rehearsals in silent motion picture work until she had viewed the making of pictures, the practical work, in the Essanay studio.

"It is wonderful," she said, "how much more there is to it than one has thought before seeing the actual work. Of course, I have realized the art of pantomime is tremendously hard to acquire, but there is something more to it than mere pantomime. I cannot fully express my eagerness to study this delightful new art and am sure I shall enjoy it."

Miss Spier is slightly below the normal in height, but does not appear to be so. She has a personality [illegible]

[illegible] beautiful and expressive eyes. Her personality is charming. Her individuality and character are in her every gesture. She has been an earnest student of drama and comedy, with more than average results. She is altogether a charming actress.

The Essanay Company is to be congratulated on the acquisition of this talented young lady and the film world will undoubtedly await with interest her first appearance under the Indian Head.

The Essanay educational film, "Aviation Meet at Los Angeles," is directly responsible for having reunited two long-separated brothers. Separated by the Johnstown flood, a decade ago, each thinking the other dead, John Robinson, of Reading, Pa., discovered in this Essanay film that his brother still lived. Following up the clew, he found his brother in Los Angeles, Cal.

KALEM DOINGS.

Wednesday, April 27, the Kalem Company will release a very ambitious picture entitled "The Sacred Turquoise of the Zuni." This is an Indian picture that is out of the ordinary and one that no doubt will become a classic among other Indian productions. While the story is purely an imaginary one, it is based upon true incidents described by Mr. Frank Cushman, the well-known author, who lived for many years among the Moki and Zuni Indians, being eventually adopted by them. His works are the most complete study of their customs and history known to science. The story of "The Sacred Turquoise of the Zuni" was worked up by Mr. Frank J. Marion from details furnished by Cushman's books and the Kalem scenic artists and property men made special studies of the Indian exhibits at the American Museum of Natural History, where the finest Indian display in the country is to be found. The picture will no doubt cause considerable comment, owing to its unique conception and execution. Mr. Sidney Olcott, producer in charge of Kalem's Southern Stock Company, was brought North especially to produce "The Sacred Turquoise of the Zuni." Exhibitors and exchange men will remember his previous Indian productions, such as "Hannah Dusten," "The Priest of the Wilderness," and others," all Indian pictures of great merit.

VITAGRAPH GIRL FETED.

A very novel treat was afforded the attendances at Saratoga Park, Brooklyn, moving picture parlor last Saturday evening. A reception was tendered Miss Florence Turner, known as "The Vitagraph Girl," by Manager Robertson and a special exhibition of Vitagraph pictures was given. The theater was crowded to its fullest capacity. When the title page of "The Vitagraph Girl" song was thrown on the screen, the applause was deafening, but just as soon as Eddy Warden began to sing her charms as the song slides displayed them, the audience was admiringly and patiently waiting for the chorus in which they all joined with a right good will and they demanded an encore so they could sing it again. Miss Turner was introduced by a Vitagraph representative. After the applause subsided, she responded in a very naive and fetching little speech. The approval was instantaneous. Her admirers were not satisfied until she acknowledged their appreciation by accepting a magnificent bouquet of flowers.

LUBIN NOTES.

There are little laughs in picture making that do not get into the film. One came to a section of the Lubin players last week when a comedy picture was being taken with the exceedingly plump comedienne of the Lubin Company as the star. One trick scene required her to run up and down hill several times. Twice she ran to the top of the hill and down again, but the third time she stopped halfway. "I can't get up," she cried to the director. "Then come down," was the sane suggestion. "I can't go either way," came the despairing cry; "I'm all out of breath." "Then hold," advised the director of strenuosity, and the picture making stopped while the plump comedienne recovered her long lost breath.

"Rastus in Zululand," to form one of the early Lubin releases, is one of the few pictures to be made under two flags. A part of the film was made in Philadelphia, where the start of the picture is supposed to occur, while the scenes in Zululand were done under the British flag in the West Indies. It is a comedy subject and about as good as they make them for real laughs.

THANHOUSER NOTES.

Tiny Marie Eline, who made a hit as the juvenile Sherlock Holmes in "A 29-cent Robbery," is slated for early use in the production of a classic by the Thanhouser Company. The classic is of the "St. Elmo" order, rare and rich in heart interest, and of a certain age, but of a strength that has held popular favor decade after decade. Tiny Marie's part will not be a leading one, for the play calls for no tots in important roles, but readers can be assured that the part, such as it is, will be shown at its best by the tiny star of "A 29-cent Robbery."

"A 29-cent Robbery" was the leading picture on the first reel with two subjects put out by Thanhouser Company, which event bears date of April 15, 1910. The reel was an experiment: the Thanhouser people were anxious to know if the much talked of "split reel" was in demand. They are now convinced it is, if not overdone, and the releases of this company will be marked by a variety of "split reel" issues. The next will appear Friday, April 29, and be of a strong comedy flavor, as the titles will indicate. They are "She Wanted to Marry a Hero" and "The Cigars His Wife Bought Him." They are welcome "laugh" additions to any program, and the Thanhouser people expect to hear favorably from them.

"She Wanted to Marry a Hero," the opening subject, is a lesson and a warning to young women who delve too deeply into Laura Jean Libby. It's nice enough to read "love stories" occasionally, but don't devour them until they influence and bewilder you. The heroine in the picture wishes she hadn't. The Libby yarns made her throw over her commonplace sweetheart and seek a heroic one, like those Miss Libby writes about. Her search proved to her that no hero is perfect and book heroes are fakes, so she concludes that her original sweetheart, in spite of being unheroic and unromantic, is good enough for her. Anna Rosemond portrays the hero-seeking girl.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Regarding Lens Action.—Toledo, Ohio, asks the following: "How many times does the light cross itself after leaving the arc until it reaches the screen? Where does the picture right itself? At what point does the light cross itself?"

The light rays cross themselves once between the arc and screen, namely at a point halfway between the two lenses which go to make up the projection lens. At that point the rays all meet in a point theoretically no larger than the point of a needle and it is at that point also that the picture "rights itself," that is to say, becomes right side up. If you will write the Bausch & Lomb people I make no doubt they will mail you catalogues containing cuts showing the action of the light rays in lenses, so that you may study same at your leisure.

Toledo also says: "I wish to thank Mr. Byron Carrier for his reply to Mr. H. F. Hoffman's article concerning operators and degenerates. There are just as many gentlemen among the operators as there are in other fields of motion picture endeavor. In fact where the operator has to work ten to twelve hours in an iron lined cracker box, besides getting the film, which takes from one to three hours addition at the average exchange, he has little time to be much of a degenerate or do anything else but work and sleep."

About Carbons and Shutters.—Kansas (name of town suppressed by request) asks the following: "(1) What is the use of the perforated shutter on the Edison machine? (2) Should the two carbons be in a perfectly straight line or should the lower be slightly to one side (alternating current)? (3) What causes the carbons to sputter and give a violet light? Is it on account of poor carbons? (4) My carbons seem to always burn off at one side. Should they not burn evenly?

(1) I do not quite catch your meaning. If you ask why the wing of the shutter is perforated, it is for the reason that they decrease the flicker, or make it less noticeable by perforating the wing so that some light will pass through it, thus producing a sort of gray instead of black curtain as this wing passes in front of the light. If you mean why is the wing present at all, it is by reason of the fact that the more rapid the flicker the less flicker you see. Without this wing you would find that, while your picture would be much more brilliant, there would be such a noticeable flicker that the picture would be ruined. Take all the spokes out of a wagon wheel but one and revolve the wheel rapidly and you see that spoke all the time. Put all the spokes in and at the same speed you see no spokes at all. That is the principle. (2) The lower carbon tip should be slightly in advance of the upper one, just enough to force the upper crater to face the lens as squarely as possible. (3) I think that the trouble you are having is caused by using carbons with bad cores. If the core of a carbon is bad, or if it has none (the hole is empty, I mean), it will not give good light. Possibly you are using poor quality of carbon. (4) Evidently your carbons are not exactly in line sideways—as you look through the condenser opening, I mean. If your carbons are not exactly in line sideways the crater will burn to one side, thus destroying much of your illumination.

Bad Lens or Film Buckles.—Wilmington, Ohio, writes: "My film is out of focus in center. Sides are clear. Have put in new aperture plate and tension springs. What is wrong?"

The trouble may be in your projection lens. See if there is any oil on its inner end. Get another lens and try it. It may be your tension springs set too far in or out, not bearing squarely on the aperture plate tracks, thus causing the film to buckle or belly in or out as it passes the aperture.

Lens Too Small.—Belfast, Me., says: "Am projecting a 12 x 14 stereo picture at 75 feet. The corners do not come out clear but have a red shade. Have a 14½-inch back focus lens. Am using 4½-inch condensers. Are condensing lenses made of different focal length?"

I think you are using what is known as a "quarter size" stereo lens. You should have a "half size" instead. With that long a focus quarter size lens you will most likely not be able to get the shadows entirely out of the corners. You are also using condensers of remarkably short focal length. Very few of them are used in this country. You do not say what size your motion picture is, but it is safe to say that you should have at least two 6½ condensing lenses. Yes, condensing lenses are made of different focal lengths, as follows: 4½, 6½, 7½, 8½ and 10½. There are other lengths also, but those are about the only ones used in projection in this country, I believe. Very few 4's and 10½ are used and 6½ and 7½ are the most commonly in use.

Answers to the "Hard One."—A couple of weeks ago I passed a "Hard One" up to our readers and here are two replies: Woodcliff-on-Hudson, W. W. Madison, writes: "I was called in to examine a machine in the South which showed a trouble similar to the one described and you may offer this solution to our Iowa brother. I found the shutter was just screwed barely taut to the beveled gear shaft. I found that while it felt tight it really slipped back and forth on the shaft. I have also found that some telescope lens tubes will slide in and out, thus producing a blur on the screen. I have also known the lens to be loose in its holder and teeter from the vibration of the machine. How would some of our friends like to hear some of the hair-raising episodes a crank twirler has bumped into in thirteen and a half years' road experience—and still alive?"

It does not seem to me that any of the above offers adequate explanation of Iowa's trouble. Slipping of the lens tube throws the whole picture out of focus until it is remedied. Slipping of the shutter would produce travel ghost and teetering of the lens would produce vibration on the screen. Iowa's trouble was a blurring of any figure when it moved, it being again clear the instant it was stationary. No doubt the editor of The World would appreciate the experiences you mention if properly detailed. That, you realize, would hardly come in my department.

Rock Springs, Wyo., Mr. Thos. Berta, writes: "I think Iowa must be in error in his statement of the case, when he says the figures blur only when in motion. I had a similar trouble and if he will watch closely he will, I think, find his picture becomes blurred and clear and blurred and clear in succession. The film really seems to bulge in and out in front of the aperture. But there must be some cause! Most likely it is getting service from a distance and leaving the film in a hot room or where the sun shines on it, thus causing it to dry and shrink abnormally. The best remedy I have found is to place the film in a tight box with damp cloths under it for a time, of course not allowing the film to touch the wet cloths."

The above explanation is unique anyhow and not so unreasonable at that. But should Iowa try moistening his films he must be very careful not to overdo it, since should the film get too wet the emulsion will stick to the back of the film. Many thanks to Brothers Madison and Berta for their letters.

WILKESBARRE PROBLEM SOLVED.

By F. H. Richardson.

A week or two ago I submitted a problem, inviting our readers to try their hand, or brain, at evolving a solution. Mr. O. C. Miller, Atchison, Kan.; Mr. A. W. Crowe, Watertown, S. D., and Mr. Chas. Young, Chicago, have sent in correct solutions, one of which is appended in full. As I stated the problem, the crank speed at which the phenomenon became apparent was practically 80 per minute. Mr. Miller very properly points out that I probably made an error in measuring the speed. I did not! But it does not follow that because you are told that current is "60 cycle" it is exactly that. It may be a little more or a little less, usually more. The dynamo may be running a trifle over speed or under speed and this will account for the apparent discrepancy.

The Solution.

"Allow me to present the following solution of the 'Wilkesbarre Problem,' on page 561, of The Moving Picture World, of April 9, which, in my estimation, is purely mathematical and mechanical:

"If a three-blade shutter intercepts the line of light three times for each intermittent movement of the film, and there are 16 movements per revolution of the crank, and 75 (not 80) revolutions per minute, we will have $3 \times 16 \times 75 = 3{,}600$ times per minute that the line of light is cut off.

"With 60 cycle a. c. we have 60 reverses of current per second, or $60 \times 60 = 3{,}600$ periods per minute during which there is no current pressure between the carbon points and, consequently, no light production.

"Hence, if an exact speed of 75 revolutions per minute could be maintained, and the position of the shutter be such that the line of light was unobstructed at the instant the current was reversing, the screen would be practically dark, even though a first class arc be burning in the lamphouse. On the other hand, if the machine should be advanced or retarded 1-96 of a revolution, and an exact speed of 75 revolutions per minute could be maintained, a normal flow of light would result.

"With a machine driven at 75 revolutions per minute by the same line shaft that propelled the a. c. generator which furnished the above current, either of the [illegible] conditions could be maintained.

"The apparent dying down and flashing up of the light mentioned by Mr. Richardson, was due to the tendency of the operator to maintain an absolute speed of 75 revolutions per minute. The Wilkesbarre Problem could not exist where d. c. is in use.

"Yours truly,

"O. C. MILLER.

OPERATOR GETS INTO TROUBLE FOR TAMPERING WITH FIRE SHIELD.

The perverted attitude of the ubiquitous newspaper correspondent towards the motion picture is again evidenced in a copy of the Cleveland "Plaindealer" to hand, which in one column records a near panic in a church by a small headline, "Singer's Hat Burns," and in the next column, in big type, makes capital out of a trivial incident in Keith's Hippodrome by scare headings: "Fire Panic Averted by Usher—Picture Film Explodes—Moving Picture Operator Burned While Fighting Flames." Then follows the usual garbled newspaper account which contradicts itself.

Our Cleveland representative, who happened to be in the house, has furnished us with an accurate account and we would not mention the incident at all if it were not to correct the wrong impression created and point to the source of the trouble as a warning to other operators.

The Hippodrome is probably the largest theater of its kind in the United States, with the exception of its patronymic in New York, and at the time of the accident to the film there were over 2,500 in the audience. The entire equipment of the Hippodrome is of the best, so also is the operating booth used in connection with the projecting of motion pictures. It is the finest booth that we have ever had occasion to see, and is built entirely of steel, the floor of the same being covered with rubber mats. It is a very spacious booth, and will easily accommodate four persons, and is rigged for two machines, and they are always set up when pictures are projected. The doors of the booth are drop doors, this in case of fire, and the ventilation system used in the booth is most perfect. In case of a fire, all that would be necessary for an operator to do would be to drop the steel slides in front of the holes, this where the pictures are projected, leave the operating room and drop the entrance door, which would then confine the fire in the booth and solely to the booth, and the audience would see neither flames nor smoke, and really would have no chance to know that a fire existed in the operating room. This plainly shows you that Mr. H. A. Daniels, manager of Keith's Hippodrome, took all possible precaution when he installed the booth.

Let us now offer a few words in rebuttal of the newspaper article referred to. In the first place, there was absolutely no explosion, and why should there be? The film burned to the magazines, and the fire was confined to the magazines. We again state there was no explosion. It is just such wildcat articles written by an ignorant reporter that tend to blacken the reputation of the house at which the fire took place, but it also hurts the motion picture business in general. Again, there was absolutely no panic, for some of the people really did not know what took place, so quick was the action of the operator and the attendants near the booth. We venture to say that less than one hundred people in the audience knew what really had happened. This is a conservative figure. In fact the article itself contradicts the headlines which state there was a "fire panic." In the article the reporter states "others throughout the house were scarcely aware that anything unusual was happening." The man that shouted "fire" did not finish the word, for he was not given the chance to yell, as the attendant, Mr. Riley, the usher, took quick action with him. We naturally would expect, and any one else would, that a woman would set up a commotion, but would not expect that from a "man." It could not have been a man that yelled "fire," although he may have looked like a man.

Mr. Cox, who was the operator, is supposed to know his business, and it was only due to his carelessness that the accident occurred.

The film destroyed was a Gaumont issue entitled "The Golden Lily" and "Ascending the Jura Mountains," a most beautiful film. The Hippodrome is served by the Lake Shore Film and Supply Company, who take special pains to see that their films are in prime condition. The machine on which the film was being projected was a Pathe Professional model, latest type, and in the best working order. The fire was not due to any imperfections of the machine, it was not due to weak sprockets, poor patches or any other imper-tions in the film, but, as already stated, it was due to negligence of the worst kind on the part of the operator. It seems that he considered the automatic fire shutter as unnecessary, although all leading manufacturers of motion picture machines to-day use an automatic fire shutter. We presume the operator thought he knew more about machines than experts do, and he therefore took a rubber band and fastened up the automatic fire shutter with same. He fastened the fire shutter to the upper tension roll. We do not know whether he stopped cranking his machine, or if he cranked it so slow that it caught fire, but he, as well as his assistant, and also others who know, admitted that the rubber band held up the automatic fire shutter.

We are stating the facts just as they occurred, and contrary reports which you might read are erroneous. The "Plaindealer" reporter endeavors to make a hero out of Mr. Cox, the operator, but he was not even scorched, so efficient were the fire preventive facilities in the Hippodrome booth.

THREE OKLAHOMA SHOWS SELL FOR $35,000.

Negotiations were closed last week whereby E. H. Hulsey, amusement promoter, of Galveston, Tex., secured control of the Powell moving picture houses in Oklahoma, and gained for himself the title of Oklahoma City's Picture King. The deal amounted to $35,000 cash, and was swung by J. E. Thompson, of the Putnam Company.

Hulsey came to Oklahoma City only recently and closed the deal after three days' dickering with B. H. Powell for his three houses, the Gem, 117 North Broadway; Orpheum, 220 West Main, and Olympic, 112 West Main street.

"I have also secured option on another location on Main strett, where I will open on July 1 one of the finest moving picture houses in the entire Southwest," said Mr. Hulsey, to a World correspondent. "This new house will be run in conjunction with the others and the Texas houses owned by myself. No pictures will be shown in my houses but those censored and inspected by the National Board of Censors of New York City. This board is composed of the leading educators of the metropolitan schools."

Mr. Hulsey is known as the "Amusement King" of Galveston and is the pioneer moving picture operator in that city. He owns and operates four houses in Galveston and Houston and is also heavily interested in a Texas film exchange. O. McLane, of Houston, will arrive in Oklahoma within a few days to become general manager of the local houses.

Hulsey states that he is thoroughly enthused over the Oklahoma City spirit and intends to spend most of his time in that city.

NEW THEATERS FOR WEST PHILADELPHIA.

Ground has been broken at Fifty-second and Ludlow streets by the Greater Philadelphia Realty Company for a new edifice —the Nixon Theater, which will have a seating capacity of 3,000.

Mr. John D. Allen, the architect, has designed this structure somewhat on the lines of the new Forrest Theater, which is noted for its safety and comfort. The building will be absolutely fireproof, being constructed exclusively of steel and concrete. Unusual precautions have been taken in the matter of exits and fire escapes. The owners have insisted upon even more than what was required by the Building Department and the Department of Public Safety. Mr. John D. Allen is noted throughout the country as an expert in the science of acoustics, and his theories will be carefully carried out in the building of the Nixon. The stage of the Nixon, like that of the Forrest, will be designed to accommodate the most massive productions. The contract to build this theater has been awarded to Mr. A. Raymond Raff, one of the city's best known builders, and it is estimated that the cost of construction will exceed $250,000. This theater will be personally directed by Mr. F. C. Nixon Nirdlinger, who has been general manager for Nixon & Zimmerman for a number of years, and Mr. Thomas H. Love, business manager of the Nixon & Zimmerman Theater Company. These gentlemen have promoted the enterprise and will superintend its construction. The theater is expected to be completed by the first of next November. The building will include a [illegible] ball room, 72 x 90 feet, which has been specially designed for the requirements by Mrs. Mary E. Lovett, who has met with notable success in conducting select dancing classes in that vicinity. There will be in connection with the ball room a [illegible] floor devoted to ladies' parlors and resting rooms, waiting rooms and gentlemen's smoking room. The Fifty-second street front will include two very handsome stores with an arcade effect, opening both on Fifty-second street and on the theater foyer.

MULLER'S BRONX CASINO PUTS IN MOVING PICTURES.

Mr. G. W. Muller, proprietor of Muller's Bronx Casino, 2072 Third avenue, New York City, has placed an order with [illegible] Hallberg for the following moving picture equipment: 1 Mutograph No. 1, 1910 model, moving picture machine with [illegible] stereopticon attached; 1 Motiograph No. 1, 1910 model, moving picture machine, combined with double dissolving stereopticon attachment. These lamps will operate on a specially constructed "Hallberg" Economizer, made for 208-volt 60-cycle 2-phase alternating current to deliver direct current of 20 amperes to each of the two dissolving lamps or 30 to 40 amperes to each of the moving picture lamps. There will also be installed a special double lamp "Hallberg" A. C. Economizer to deliver alternating current to the moving picture and dissolving lamps when desirable. This Economizer equipment is the most efficient and modern in existence and the saving of 75 per cent. on the electric current bill as well as giving the most brilliant illumination which could possibly be produced. There will also be installed two "Hallberg" 4,000 candle power flaming arc lamps and complete [illegible] tric ventilating equipment. Mr. Muller has made up his mind to produce the best moving pictures possible and has spared no expense in accomplishing there results.

With characteristic enterprise the Independent Moving Pictures Company of America have secured an African jungle picture which they release April 16. This is a full reel culled from some 10,000 feet of negative made in the African wilds by W. D. Boyce, of the Chicago "Ledger." On another page will be found a brief description of the film, which, we are told, is the real goods. Independent exhibitors will no doubt "yell with joy," to quote the presiding genius of the Imp, over this chance for them to come in on the Roosevelt popularity wave.

Mr. E. H. Montagu, formerly sales manager of Pathe Freres' Chicago office, has moved to New York and assumed charge of the advertising of red rooster films. He is located in the St. James Building.

BILL STEINER GOES INDEPENDENT.

Just as we go to press we are handed a dispatch from William Steiner, president of the Imperial Film Exchange, asking us to state that he will manufacture films and will begin to release in four weeks. With this was a copy of a letter that he had sent to the Patents Company:

New York, April 15, 1910.

Motion Picture Patents Company,
80 Fifth avenue.

Gentlemen—The Imperial Film Exchange hereby notifies you that it has this day withdrawn as a licensee of your company, in respect to all offices at Troy, Washington, D. C., and New York City.

This company hereby surrenders each and all licenses which it has heretofore received from your company.

Respectfully yours,
WM. STEINER, Pres. Imperial Film Exchange.

This piece of news is so unexpected that we cannot make any comment further than to say that we wish Mr. Steiner all due success in his manufacturing venture. The Independents gain a good recruit—a leader, in fact—and Bill's many friends on the other side will miss his genial personality.

The Excela Soundograph

The only complete and up-to-date effect-producing machine ever invented is now complete and ready for the exhibitors. Everybody pronounces it a wonder. Almost any sound or effect imaginable is easily and realistically produced by simply turning a crank, pulling a handle or pushing a button. The effects are all mounted in a handsome cabinet structure, 25 x 40 inches square and 42 inches high, with means exterior for the operation of each effect separately, or they can be operated in combinations. The Soundograph can be located either in the orchestra, pit or back of the screen as the exhibitor prefers. No expert operator is required, any one person is all that is needed to operate the Soundograph and produce perfect sound effects. A boy or some other employee of the theatre learns quickly to work the effects, thus relieving the exhibitor of the services of an expensive operator. It will put life and realism in your pictures and delight your audiences. It holds their interest and attention to the end of the reel and assures you of big box office receipts every day.

"Oh, my heart is weary waiting, waiting for the May" and "the flowers that come in the Spring, tra la." I am anxious to disport myself in the merry Springtime, tra la. For in the Spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of various things. "I'm to be Queen of the May, Mother." Such a lot of things are going to happen in May to all of us. I presume that I shall have my share of the happenings, and shall see what is to be seen in the moving picture field. There will be much doing in May, it is said.

First of all, there will be the annual meeting of the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance, at Chicago. Then we shall not only see what we shall see, but we shall know what we shall know. We shall know the outcome of the recent palaver at the Imperial Hotel, and the fate, temporary or otherwise, of the constitutional changes or attempted changes on the Independent side of the moving picture business. So, "my heart is weary waiting, waiting for the May."

"Wait until May the first," people are saying in the business. I have wondered what they have been waiting for. I think I have found out. Assuming an absolutely impenetrable disguise I have made a number of inquiries as to the intentions of an organization which looms large in the moving picture field; which throws a black and sinister shadow across the entire moving picture business of the United States, if not of the world. I mean the General Film Company, with that amazing capitalization of $2,500,000. I am enabled, after all my inquiries, to give my readers some interesting information about this Colossus of the business, that has quietly taken shape under our very noses, and which if it emerges in the open, possibly next May, must have a truly terrifying aspect to us all.

Talk about trusts, monopolies, combines! Why, they are no more than pigmies compared with the potentialities and possibilities of the General Film Company. It would take your breath away if I were to tell you the amount of money that is behind this concern. It would double you up, not to say asphyxiate you, if I were to put down in cold print the scheme which is in the minds of the incorporators of the General Film Company. It would make the Motion Picture Patents Company look like thirty cents. Beyond that the language of comparison can hardly go.

Reader, what do you say to a company like the General Film Company, which might concentrate, in its own organization, the entire moving picture business of the entire world! At a very rough calculaton there are probably a hundred high class film manufacturers in the world, allowing twenty for the United States, twenty for Great Britain and the remaining sixty for the other countries. Just imagine the General Film Company controlling all these! Of course it is hardly necessary to say that, first of all, a working agreement with Lumiere, Eastman and the other raw stock makers must be made. This clearly would give the General Film Company a control of things at the very beginning. They would be in on the ground floor.

Then we have the theaters. Twelve thousand in the United States, 5,000 in Great Britain, probably 40,000 or 50,000 in the other parts of the world. Manifestly, therefore, with the film agreement in its pockets, the General Film Company would find no difficulty in assuming control of all the theaters in the world. Isn't it gigantic? Doesn't it take your breath away? Mr. Rockefeller must appear quite a tiny person besides the masterful Colossus who could conceive the idea of the General Film Company and is slowly and deliberately maturing his plan. Ain't it orful, Mabel?

Of course, in this condition of affairs the dividing line between trust and Independent would disappear. The whole business would be swept into one net. The General Film Company would out-Murdock Murdock. The Sales Company would be swallowed up in the same mouth. As for the Alliance, it would disappear in the voracious maw of this mammoth amongst trusts and combines. Fancy, worldwide control of the moving picture centered in one man who would be the master of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice!

Then comes the renter or film exchange man in the business. Would he be required? If so, how much of him and how many of him? Or would, as seems feasible, one vast distributing agency be erected in New York City, with branches in the other cities of the world? Just in the same manner as the Standard Oil Company works. Consider the enormous control to be exercised by the General Film Company and then you will realize the mighty power it would possess. Film renters would be dispensed with as easily as we are casting off our overcoats. They would be put right out of the business; there would be no film for them to handle and nobody to sell them to. Isn't this enough to make the poor renter unable to sleep at nights?

When the Patents Company was formed it was perceived that a big power had entered the film business, but by comparison with the General Film Company it must now appear a very small thing, indeed. This is the age of great things. Worldwide combinations are the order of the day. Consider how Mr. Morgan, with a truly imperial instinct, organized concerns like the Steel Trust and was instrumental in bringing the International Marine Company into existence. The General Film Company would probably be as big as either of these and have command of the entire moving picture business of the world. A two billion-dollar corporation is well within the bounds of feasibility. I do not know what will become of me. Still, my friend, who has given me this information, has hinted that Lux Graphicus will be taken care of. Probably I shall be given a million or two stock in the concern in order to keep my vitriolic pen quiet. So, as I have said, "my heart is weary waiting, waiting for the May," when, according to some authorities, all this is likely to happen. To quote George Bernard Shaw, "You Never Can Tell." All I have to say is, keep your eye on the General Film Company, as the newspaper, "Variety," seems to be obtaining some valuable information which manufacturers, exhibitors and renters would do well to ponder over. But I flatter myself that I have gone one better than "Variety" and have got nearer the heart of things.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The question often arises with the exhibitors who favor a change of subject each day as to whether a continuance of a good subject for more than one day would be to their advantage. Mr. Sam Levin, manager of the Orpeum Theater, has put this matter to a test and has proven to his own satisfaction that a continued run of a good film brings pleasing results. The Orpheum recently showed the "Fly Pest" film of Urban and after a most satisfactory introduction on the first day it was decided to hold this subject over, with the result that Mr. Levin was swamped with telephone inquiries and managed to pack his house. It is evident that when a patron is well pleased with any subject it is only natural that they should spread the publicity among their friends and "The Great American Tongue" is considered the best medium of publicity in the world. Mr. Levin is well pleased at the result of his experiment and expresses his approval in a manner that is convincing.

Mr. Frank H. Prude, operator at the Orpheum Theater, has recently perfected a novel device by means of which he is able to project the lines of the choruses of each song separately as they are sung. This not only enables the audience to read the lyrics with greater rapidity, but by using this simple mechanical device he is able to throw the scenes depicted with each line by the use of the dissolving projector.

Mr. A. Powell, who controls the Ideal Theater, of Kokomo, Ind., recently purchased the Airdome Theater, in that city, and, after making extensive alterations and effecting many improvements, it is expected that he will open the house for the Summer. Mr. Powell attributes his success as an exhibitor to the fact that he always accompanies his films with appropriate music and sound effects which add very greatly to the interest displayed by the audience in his animated pictures. All of the employees about his house have their certain duties to attend to and each in himself is an auxiliary, lending his personal aid to the production. His operator must know when to run a reel more rapidly and when to slacken up for a pathetic incident in the pictures. The piano player must also be alive to the times when the music must be regulated to suit the occasion and with all these aids Mr. Powell bids fair to continue his former success and convince his patrons that it is his policy to offer them every possible inducement and give them an entertainment that will bring forth praise from every hand.

I am greatly gratified to see that The Moving Picture World is not only read, but that its advice is taken into serious consideration.

Several theaters, objects of some previous letters, have taken notice and, fully realizing the good work done by the Orpheum, are fast modifying their music and adopting some sound effects. In other words, the manager, the first one interested in the receipts of the place, is not allowing his pianist and other musicians to amuse themselves with any noisy old rag-time tunes to the detriment of the pictures. No, Mr. Manager stepped in and gave some orders.

At the Pastime, the other day, they had a Vitagraph picture of a Mexican type, and the musicians gave us a good Spanish selection, very appropriate to the production, and excellent sound effects were rendered. There is still room for improvement, as it is not very correct to give the gallop of horses running on soft ground; but as long as the managers show the real spirit of reform we must be a little lenient and encourage them the best we can.

The managers should have the same faith in the future of moving pictures as we find on the part of the manufacturers, and not jump to the conclusion that pictures are merely a side show or a curtain raiser. Cinematography is still in its infancy and will last for many generations to come. Capital is invested every day in the erection of new theaters and in the promotion of new branches of the industry.

An example is the great prosperity of Bell & Howell, of 90 Illinois street. These enterprising young men have so many orders booked ahead for their different machines that they are compelled to increase their plant by moving to another floor of the same building, where they will have double the present space with better facilities.

The Old Reliable Film Renovating Company has also been forced out of their old quarters to seek increased facilities at 22 Randolph street.

The exchanges report excellent business. The American Film Service occupies the bank floor of the building 77 South Clark street, and looks like a bank, with its large, spacious anteroom and its fine hardwood and glass partitions. Six windows with brass ornamented gratings complete the ap-peatance. The windows are marked: "Cashier," "Information," "Booking," "Song Slides," "Films Out," "Films In." Everything looks cheerful and prosperous.

The Standard Film Exchange occupies the whole second floor of the two buildings, 159-161 Washington street, and is a model exchange. A spacious anteroom, furnished with open chairs, is provided for the operators waiting and returning the reels. One side of the front part of the building is occupied by a very tasty private office for Mr. Hopp, in the rear of which is still another smaller private office, a real cozy corner. The remaining part of the front is devoted to the general offices and a large exhibition room for machines, etc. In the rear is found a very large room for the examination and rewinding of the films, with two large vaults in which are kept the reels, each reel in a galvanized iron box. Along in the rear is provided a well equipped and well lighted repair shop and a store room for posters, etc. In the center of the floor, back of the partition and windows are the booking office, the song slide department, the film service, etc. With all these increased facilities, the Standard Film Ex-

The Unique Film and Construction Company, with The Geo. M. Hoke Supply Company, have just moved to fine quarters at 81 South Clark street, and is another well equipped film exchange.

The United States Film Exchange has also secured fine quarters at 81 South Clark street.

One thing struck me rather forcibly is the number of typewriting machines used in the exchanges, the large force of pretty, vivacious stenographers and the mountains of boxes of envelopes, circulars, etc. Yes, a modern exchange looks more like a mail order agency than a film house. No one would think that a rental office would require such a clerical force. Is it a sign of good times?

Typewriting machines, well dressed stenographers, can, to a certain degree, impart an air of prosperity to persons not familiar with the business. To men knowing that exhibitors in general have very little time or do not care to read circulars, but expect good service, as upon the service depend the cash receipts, all this outlay of an expensive clerical force is the sign of something wrong. Where is the flaw?

A QUESTION AND AN ANSWER.

By An Exhibitor.

In a recent issue of The Moving Picture World the query was propounded: "What do exhibitors generally, in view of their own experiences, think of the future of the moving picture?" In one instance at least the question has been answered in a spirit of enthusiastic hopefulness, and as it was answered in deeds and not in words alone, it seems well to take a closer view of the splendid playhouse, devoted to moving pictures, music and song and lectures, erected but three weeks before The Moving Picture World asked its most interesting question. It is an entirely new building, situated in the busy and populous city of Springfield, Mass., and is called the Bijou. There is not anywhere in these United States a playhouse, whether devoted to moving pictures or to the highest class of theatrical attractions, with which this house in Springfield cannot sustain a favorable comparison. It was built at a total cost of $35,000.

The builders and promoters are not what are known as "showmen," but belong to the best and most solid citizenship of Massachusetts, men of weath and inclined to be conservative.

It may be well now to take a glance at the theater itself. It has a seating capacity of just 1,000 and every one of the 1,000 seats is a marvel of comfort. The writer is physically a large man and as a rule undergoes a mild species of martyrdom in the seats of playhouses, but he felt entirely at ease while seated here. The cushion was soft, the look of the thing elegant and refined.

The first impression is one of light and cosiness; that is, after the inviting lobby, with its retiring rooms opening on either side, has been passed. To the left on entering is the room for men and on the right that for women, heavily carpeted and supplied with a lounge and comfortable chairs. These two rooms, to be sure, are but minor features of the house, but are furnished with the same lavishness which characterizes the equipment of the house. Perhaps the most notable feature of the interior, where the walls are finished in salmon pink, outlined by the white woodwork, is the admirable arrangement of the clusters of electric bulbs on the front of the boxes and at frequent intervals about the semi-circles formed by the balcony. The ceiling has been finished in green, white and gold. The house is lighted up during the running of the pictures—a great gain with the best people. There is a corps of operators, a corps of singers, a lecturer, a lady from Boston, an orchestra, attendants [illegible] two ticket sellers in two different booths. The operating booth is constructed of iron and [illegible] machines, two of which are constantly in use. It is provided with running hot and cold water and every possible comfort to the operators.

Now how has the public responded to the effort to give the people the best and give it in the best style? In this answer to this question comes the test. The public cannot get enough of the entertainment offered. Night after night the house is crowded after a similar fashion, as the cut will show, no "standing room," the people are standing on the sidewalk out into the street for quite a distance. That is quite of the fact that the location is by no means the best and in spite of the fact that a larger house, containing [illegible] situated in the very heart of the city, is likewise running moving pictures, interspersed, I am bound to mention, with "vaudeville."

What is the secret of it all? I have seen precisely the same thing in Philadelphia, where one house, giving [illegible] of first runs and illustrated songs and nothing more, is eminently successful and is conducted on the same high class methods. One thing seems sure. With what the [illegible] film makers now offer in pictures of fine quality, there ought to be and there is a similar striving for an "up lift" among exhibitors. The taint of cheap and nasty has gone from the pictures, the vulgar and freakish side of the industry has wellnigh disappeared, and because the moving picture deserves a better home, people are building them. I have no doubt whatever that the present moving picture will attract the best quality of public, if properly presented and [illegible] in a fitting home. Around the Bijou you see no crowds of dirty urchins hanging about, but there are plenty of automobiles. The surroundings invite the confidence of the best public, and order in such surroundings maintains itself. In the face of such facts, the still existing belief that the moving picture is intended mainly for half grown boys and the unwashed rabble generally is bound to disappear, even in the press and the pulpit, and we are approaching nearer to the "ideal picture house," of which so much has been said and written.

The management is in the hands of Edward L. Knight. The head operator, the youngest in the State, is Henry B. Schoch.

Maywood, Ill., April 5, 1910.

Editors, Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—In several recent numbers of The Moving Picture World articles have appeared in which the piano playing at the Pastime and other moving picture theaters of Chicago has been subjected to severe criticism, with regard to the music that is played as accompaniment for moving pictures. As the critics say, the music generally is inappropriate.

In justice to one theater, where the playing was appropriate, however, I wish to mention the music formerly produced at a small theater on Adams street. For some months past there has been a good pianist there, but who has recently left. In my opinion, his interpretation of the music appropriate to the pictures was excellent, in many ways characteristic, and closely following every change in the films. The former manager of this theater evidently realized the value of proper musical accompaniment for his pictures.

But recently the management of this theater was changed, and a new pianist and operator installed. I do not have to speak of the music that is played there now—"J. M. B." has covered that subject thoroughly in The Moving Picture World for February 12.

I believe that if the managers of the downtown picture houses of Chicago were thoroughly impressed with the importance of proper musical accompaniment for the films, they would insist upon more careful work on the part of the pianists along this line. I am interested in moving pictures, and have visited nearly all of the larger picture houses throughout the city of Chicago, and, I am sorry to say, have found the same general disregard for proper accompaniment for the films.

I wish to ask as a constant patron of the Chicago moving picture theaters, if the managers do not believe it worth their while to look into this matter?

JOHN W. RAYMOND.

SELECTING A SHOW.

Washington, D. C., April 12, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World,

Gentlemen: I wish to say a word about the propriety of showing certain films in the "family" or outlying theaters. The matter was brought to my attention the other night in a most striking manner, while I was attending the evening performance at one of the numerous family picture houses in the vicinity of Fourteenth and U streets.

The film on the screen was the recent Biograph production, "The Love of Lady Irma." I was seated toward the front of the theater, the section most popular with the young folks; and was watching, not so much the film itself (I had seen it several times before), but the effect which it produced on the children seated all around me. Their interest in the plot was intense, and when the scene was reached where the two thugs, hired by Lady Irma, draw their knives across her husband's face, several of the boys, whose ages I should guess at being from twelve to fifteen years, stood up and with clenched fists discussed "what they would have done if they had been there." Some of the girls present shuddered when this scene was reached, and hid their faces, while many took no interest in the rest of the film. When I passed out after seeing the rest of the show, I found a group of young boys standing in front of the theater still talking in excited tones about the film they had just seen.

Now, surely this is no suitable film to be shown in a theater where fifty per cent. of the evening's audience is composed of children ranging in age from five to fifteen years. The effect on them is anything but desirable and I think that the management should make it an object to secure films that would interest their youthful audience, and yet not work them up to such an undesirable state of excitement.

Please do not misunderstand my object in writing this article. I am not in any way criticising the Biograph Company's work or their plot in "The Love of Lady Irma," because I believe that the film is a fine one, and the plot exceptionally strong and interesting. The point I wish to bring out is simply this: Keep films of this class for use in the downtown districts, where the audiences are generally composed of grown-ups, who are capable of understanding and appreciating such stories as this without expressing any particular emotion.

I would suggest, for theaters which are patronized regularly by the coming generation, a program composed of films on the following order:

1. Good Scenic or Record Flms, as
   a. Urban Eclipse—Over the Appenines of Italy.
   b. Pathe Freres—Rhine Falls at Schaffhausen.
   c. Gaumont—Poetry of the Waters.
   d. Eclair—Trip to Berne.
2. Good Educational or Industrial films, as
   a. Edison—King Cotton.
   b. Pathe Freres—Tobacco Culture.
   c. Urban Eclipse—Fly Pest, and Acrobatic Fly.
   d. Selig—Industries of Southern California.
3. Clean Comedies; as
   a. Biograph—What's Your Hurry?
   b. Imp—Stung.
   c. Selig—Wizard of Oz series.
4. Biblical Subiects, as
   a. Vitagraph—Life of Moses series.
   b. Pathe—Passion Play.
   c. Gaumont—Fall of Babylon.
5. Subjects taken from Literature, as
   a. Edison—The Prince and the Pauper.
   b. Biograph—Leather Stocking.
   c. Pathe Freres—Return of Ulysses.

A program composed of two or three reels of any of the above or a host of other similar films would not only prove of extreme interest to a youthful audience, but would also in itself be largely educational, a very desirable factor.

Respectfully yours, R. J. W.

[We hope that this letter will have the good effect of causing some of the managers of family theaters to use a little discrimination in the selection of proper films, and that it will emphasize what we have been trying to preach through the columns of the Moving Picture World.—Eds. M. P. W.]

QUANTITY VERSUS QUALITY.

Washington, D. C., April 5, 1910.

Editors, Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—I have had the pleasure for nearly a year to receive your valuable paper and I must say it is the first piece of mail that I look for every Monday morning. I find that your paper not only contains valuable information for a man in the moving picture business, but also on photography and other subjects.

I have in a way watched the improvement of the moving pictures from the time C. Francis Jenkins first discovered the principle (?) by which a moving picture could be thrown on a screen. To me it is a source of regret that we, having first discovered the moving picture, should let a foreign country, namely, France, outclass us in the production of moving pictures, not only in product but also in artistic quality. The moving picture has advanced so far that the mere making of hundreds of feet of film is no longer the only end in view. Some makers even now must think that is all if we are to judge by some of the stuff they are turning out. A picture should be made from the best point of view to produce the most artistic results. Then the film should have the proper exposure so as to get the proper values of light and shade and not have mere black and whites which is so often the case. Notice the values in a Pathe film and you will easily see where the majority of our films are deficient in this valuable quality. There is no reason why we should not get results here unless the American habit of making things in a rush is the fault. By this I mean not taking time to study the subject at hand and photographing it from the best point of view; taking into consideration light effects and producing the most artistic picture that the subject at hand would

I would like to ask an exhibitor why it is that the film producers give us so much dramatic stuff. In looking over a recent list of licensed film releases I find that our best maker of films has, from February 10 to March 31, given us sixteen subjects and of this number there is but one comedy. The cry of the patron is, give us something to laugh at. Life is serious enough without always being reminded of the sad things. I admit that if all pictures were comedies there would be a howl, too, but if you have a goodly number of clean comedies we exhibitors would not then make the life of the exchange man miserable by clamoring for something to amuse our patrons. Film makers please take notice and help us out, also don't be afraid to let us have good scenic pictures (artistically taken) and industrial subjects and you will find that the great thinking public will be pleased, and the moving picture art will have a good show for a long existence. Try and eliminate all stabbing, shooting or other violence as much as possible, and when necessary to introduce it, do it in such a way that the severest critic could have nothing to say. This can be done in a moving picture play as well as plays on the legitimate stage. I feel that if the film makers will look to these things and be ever watchful to produce clean plays and get the best that can be gotten out of a subject, both photographically and artistically, then they will appeal to the thinking public, which is in a great majority, and the worries of the film exchange and the exhibitor will be greatly reduced. Very respectfully,

WILLIAM P. HERBST

GIVING THE AUTHOR HIS DUE.

Chicago, Ill., March 8, 1910

Editors, Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Authors should be given credit on the screen regardless of whether they are noted or unknown ,or whether the public is interested in knowing who they are, or not.

Because an author is noted in the magazine field it doesn't necessarily follow that he will be a successful writer of scenarios for motion picture use. A well known film company of this city, in one of their circulars have this to say on this point: "We receive a majority of our manuscripts, perhaps, from magazine writers, some of whom have won reputation in this department of literature. The reason so few of the manuscripts are found practicable is because of the long experience of the authors in writing pretty lines and phrases to the neglect of interesting situations and plots."

I have seen many films by noted American authors but have yet to see one that is in any way superior to stories furnished by unknown writers; and as a matter of fact, the best films have been those where no credit was given on the screen; so where does the justice come in?

I think many people are interested in knowing who write all the good stories and I, for one, have often wondered who the authors were.

The magazines are filled with stores each month by unknown writers and credit is given; a theater program gives credit to the authors, composer, scene painter, dressmaker, wigmaker and others of a production; and I don't think it can be said that the public is any more interested in knowing who all these people are than they are in knowing who the writers of scenarios are.

The credit on a screen will not help a well known writer very much, but it would help an unknown one and give him a little encouragement to go ahead and do more and better work and thus make his work more sought after by film makers. Yours truly,

CHARLES R. WILHELM,

EDUCATIONAL FILMS APPRECIATED IN THE WEST.

Portland, Ore., April 8, 1910

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—In your issue of April 2, 1910, Volume VI, No. 14, you publish an editorial entitled "The Educated Classes and the Moving Picture," in which you declare that "It cannot be pretended that as yet the moving picture in any of its phases has attracted the sympathetic notice and patronage of the educated classes." I have no doubt that you speak advisedly concerning conditions as they exist in the East, but in the States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, such a statement would not be justified because for months past we have been engaged in an educational campaign which has brought to many of our houses the patronage of the very best people in the community, and we are constantly emphasizing this phase of motion picturedom. I am enclosing articles from the Portland "Oregonian," the leading paper of the Pacific Coast, and also from the Oregon "Journal" and the "Evening Telegram" of this city, which is some slight indication of what we are doing in this direction.

We would like to suggest that you use your influence as a journal with the manufacturers in endeavoring to have them cooperate so that the weekly productions will be diversified to such an extent as will enable us to blend our programs as they should be in order to make up an attractive program, building it up to a climax. For many years I was the general manager of the Pantages Circuit, and I gained my knowledge of blending programs through a rich and varied vaudeville experience, and since my connection with the picture business I have endeavored to put into play the same theory of organized and blended entertainment. I am frequently diverted in this plan, however, on account of a lack of diversity, and a woeful dirth of decent, intelligent comedy. Trusting you will not consider my suggestions in this matter presumptious, I remain,

Very respectfully yours,

A LESSON IN SELF-SACRIFICE FOR OUR CHILDREN'S SAKE

Never in the history of motion pictures has there been depicted as powerful a lesson as in this Biograph production. It is bound to do a world of good for humanity by portraying in a most convincing manner a subject that has for some time past been brought to public notice by column after column in the newspapers, to wit. Tuberculosis, or "White Plague," as it is sometimes called. Edgar Thurston is afflicted with the dread disease and his physician persuades him to break off an engagement to marry a young girl, but she, impulsive-hearted, refuses to do so, reasoning that the doctor may be in error. The doctor, however, resorts to a plan whereby the character of Edgar is apparently blackened and thus induces in the girl moral repulsion. It is a subject that is bound to attract widespread attention from the fact that it is a powerful argument on the principles of the medical profession, the Health Board of every community and the worthy Tuberculosis Committee. Aside from this it tells a decidedly interesting story, with photographic quality and scenic beauty never before excelled.

THOU SHALT NOT. Edgar Thurston imagines he is suffering from what is usually termed a broken heart, and resorts to some of the most outrageous antics supposed to portray such disorder, but without effect. Edgar is engaged to Miss Laura Edwards, who loves him so devotedly as he does her. Their future seems so promising until Edgar, growing weary, succumbs to a physical examination which results in the discovery that he has consumption in an advanced stage. The doctor upon learning of his actions exclaims: "Marry him, want to possibly transmit your weakness to others that shall be? Has intelligence almost thanks Edgar's mind, but upon the doctor's expert information he writes: 'Dear Laura: My physician tells me I have consumption in an advanced stage and that we must not marry. He is right. Though I love you good-by, Edgar.' However, the persistent rejected girl refuses to heed her sweetheart's decision, considering it a quibble. We may it pertains for things to count in others but never count to us. We do ourselves because this one to Edgar writing, but Physician always gives us worthing scatter we need it or not. Laura even goes so far as to threaten to end herself, to drink off the edge of a cliff if Edgar persists in becoming what she deems the silly advice of the doctor. He convinces her that mental strain is in vain and finally decides to take his advice. Then Edgar is disposed to treat the doctor's statements with polite indifference, until he is shown a recent newspaper of what might follow its marriage. In the person of a little child filled with the dread disease. He is now willing to do anything to avoid a deed that to him now seems criminal, hence the doctor plots. He fears to almost destroy Laura's faith in Edgar, and to do this he engages an actress to play the part of the "other woman," dispatching the valet to give the girl an inkling of his master's double life. The plan succeeds, and though it almost broke their hearts, it surely prevented an aftermath of woe. Here is a subject that is bound to attract widespread attention from the fact that it is a powerful argument to the principles of the medical profession, the Health Board of every community and the worthy Tuberculosis Committee.

THE TENDERFOOT'S TRIUMPH.—"It's in the surprise" that great plays are made and battles won, and our tenderfoot friend, appreciating this, pulls a victory that is amazing. The Western camp folks had suffered the loss of a number of horses at the hands of a gang of horse thieves led by Black Pete, who up to date eluded the United States Marshal and his deputies. Their deeds becoming more brazen, a notice is posted offering a reward of $500 for the apprehension of Pete, and while this reward is rather tempting, formal efforts have proven so fruitless that the boys of the camp are slow to move. The marshal has a pretty daughter, on whom every boy has set his heart. They vie good naturedly with each other in engaging her attentions, but she treats them all with the same consideration, liking them all, but no one in particular. It remains for one of them to do something extraordinary. Ah! an idea. "Say, boys, I like you all immensely, but I will give my hand for keeps to the captor of Pete." With a cheer the boys rush to get into saddle, all eager for the expedition. At this moment, a handsome young tenderfoot arrives at the inn, and upon learning the cause of the excitement, wishes, after meeting the girl, that he was eligible for the contest. The more he thinks of the matter the more he longs to play the hero. The cowboys are already on their way and have taken all the available horses, and the only beast of burden at hand is a donkey. However, on this he starts, alone and unattended. The girl, though feeling kindly towards him, considers his efforts a joke. Meanwhile, the cowboys have been surprised by the horse thieves, who disarm them, take their horses and order them back to camp. Well, never was there such a gang of seasoned cowboys as they when they faced the humiliation on their return trip. They try to convince the young tenderfoot that his endeavor will prove futile, but he is determined to take the chance. He resolves that his movements must be subtle and cunning, and so he selects. Taking out his shaving brush, he saunters along the ridge above the thieves' lair and seemingly rambles over into their very arms. For a moment his dreams of life are slim, but they accept his explanation that he was reading and not looking where he was going. His humor and speech disarms them off their guard, and watching his chance, he grabs up two revolvers and cries "Hands up!" Well, "it's in the surprise." There are four in the gang, so he makes one bind up the three while he keeps the guns leveled at them. Job a string of ties he brings Pete and his gang into camp, where he claims and gets the $500 reward together with the special hide-out. The heart of the girl which she most cheerfully gives.

THE COWBOY'S SWEETHEART. The opening scene discloses the front of the village postoffice

in a small Western town. A lady whose dress is something more elaborate than the average of Mustang usually affords comes from the postoffice reading a letter. A cow pony is hastily brought and with unusual dashing leaves on and when she walks leisurely away, to follow perhaps after her. In a strip of woods she overtakes the rider attempts to hide his affections, but she is too. She repels him, but he seizes her in his arms and presses a kiss to her lips just as Jesse Lewis, another cowboy, comes on the scene. The lady explains that she has been insulted by the greaser and the latter is bound to lay the trespasser out for life. After the "greaser" rides away, Jesse lifts her up and volunteers to escort the lady to her home.

Here is the beginning of the complications that follow. Jesse Lewis is engaged to a Western girl, but the Western girl has left the country with the man whom he has addressed as Miss, but changed his feelings. Meetings between Jesse and the lady ensue at the "Bar Q" ranch, located near Flagstaff, while Jesse evidently discovers that he has lost all use for Jessie the Western girl.

While a letter must be sent to the other one evening and asks her to "clear the thing." The greaser, who is almost hopeless, grows [illegible] and Jesse hits him.

The rich guest at the "Bar Q" has exposed her true character of "being" the wealth Western girl to be not. She was pretended to make love to Jesse and has even promised to be his wife.

The "greaser" who was fired in mind he found he received from Jessie Wells critically the fine lay average and the conformity really noticed. Leading the lady of the "Bar Q" stealing the words one day, he follows her and witnesses her slip a letter from her hand. Words are passed of start to stop the controversy and gets in the letter. It reads:

My Darling Wife:

Hope you are enjoying yourself on that ball with Western sport, and I am intensely awaiting your return home.

Your affectionate husband,

HARRY

The "greaser," with the letter, steals off toward the woods, mounts his horse and rides off toward Jennie's home. When he arrives he shows her the letter and tells her he can offer proof that Jesse has been completely captured by the Eastern lady and that they are planning an elopement. He intimates, too, that Jesse is aware of the lady being married to an Eastern man, as the letter points out.

The two ride to the wooded trysting place, toward which the "lady of the Bar Q" was walking when the greaser obtained the letter. When they slip quietly through the woods they come upon the lovers.

The greaser endeavors to win Jennie, but she declares that she loves Jesse despite his shortcomings and will endeavor to win him back.

The next morning she mounts her horse and rides over to the "Bar Q." The lady receives her coldly at first, but when she has heard the little girl's story, she becomes thoughtful and finally resolves to help her in winning back the deserter.

The next morning when Jesse calls on his new sweetheart he surprises her, as he thinks, in a drunken condition, and pulling a cigarette. Jesse is disgusted and finally rushes out of the room, while the lady sinks back in her chair, relieved and happy in the thought that the trouble she has caused has been corrected.

Jesse is sick at heart when he thinks of his having forsaken his little Jennie for this vile woman. He desires to make amends and rides slowly to Jennie's home. It is his intention to offer an abject apologies and beg her forgiveness, then to leave the country for good, but when he mentions this last feature in his plan of redemption she turns to him with a little cry and stretches out her hands to him. Jesse understands, then, with a glad cry, takes her in his arms, vowing never more to forsake her.

VINTAGE IN LANQUEDOC. Languedoc is a [illegible] of France which lays between the Garonne River and the Rhone with the Pyrenees and the Mediterranean on the south. In Spring and early Summer no part of France possesses more delightful climate than Languedoc and the province is of interest to the world in general because of the fact that it is considered a great pleasure resort for consumptives.

Here may still be heard the soft accents of the Langue d'oc, a language which has not even yet stooped its last word in the realm of the world.

The ruins of the old Roman town the Pont du Gard, the two mediæval fortresses, the old tower and [illegible] the picturesque scenery of the Eastern Pyrenees with the castles and chateaux make the scenery one of the most interesting in the whole of France.

In this film we are introducing to the public as well as a short trip through this interesting province, the vineyards belonging to one of the wealthiest and most known of French gentlemen. The every process of producing wine is shown in detail and many of the [illegible] scenes in the scenes go so well throughout that we are thrown into the scenes assisting as [illegible] are blessed of remarkably pleasing personalities and the the best of companions until that day they both become enamored of Calonice, a fairer maid than any of the many whom they knew.

Calonice shows a preference to Lorenzino, while Gillio, against his desire, feels a deep jealousy of his younger brother. The dark thoughts presented thus to his mind so tormented him that he becomes melancholy and broods over his loss of the fair haired girl.

Gillio one night, when the sense of loss weighed most heavily upon him, betook himself to the region of her home that he might, if the fates were kind, catch sight of her, then to his impassioned gaze was presented the picture of his more favored brother serenading Calonice.

Crazed by jealousy, after a moment's quarrel, he stabs the dear companion of his pleasant boyhood and presuming he has killed his brother he returns to their home, confesses to the mother, and becomes a fugitive from justice.

We are permitted to watch him in his wanderings and to see his dreams as he mentally recalls the happy days of youth.

When he finally returns to Florence, after years of wandering, the reunion of the brothers during divine service is a remarkably strong finale. He enters the cathedral while Lorenzino is singing the Alleluia alone, soon another familiar voice blends with his and as the two brothers clasp hands, the grand melody rings sweeter to the listening ears than they have ever heard it sound.

THE LOOK-OUT; Or, Saved From the Sea.—An unreasonable old man of wealth, his beautiful daughter, her sweetheart, a poor music master.

His suit rejected by the father, the young musician, despondent, attempts to hurl himself from the rocks into the sea.

He is saved by a hillsman, member of a band of freebooters, who persuade the discouraged youth to cast his lot with them.

He is appointed sentry for the company, and in this capacity is enabled to assist in saving his sweetheart and her father from the bandits.

The old man, impressed by this action, accepts the youth as a son.

A RAMBLE THROUGH THE ISLE OF SUMATRA. Native market scenes. Performing monkeys and their dusky audience. Realistic mock fight by natives armed with dirks. Ruins of a Hindu temple. Sublime scenery—cascades, boulders, cliffs, jungle. Temple ruins. Carving most ornate, every detail standing out with remarkable clearness.

Sumatra is in a large measure a dependency of Holland, though a matter of thirteen times the size of that country. The island is well supplied with mineral wealth and one expedition alone collected more than 100 kinds of timber. The principal cultivated plants are sugar cane, coffee, sago, rice, cocoanut palms, yams, sweet potatoes and tropical fruits. The film carries the interest of a drama.

THE SACRED TURQUOIS OF THE ZUNI.—Scene I.—Finding the Stone. A young Zuni Chief enters a turquois mine and prepares to work. He gathers up various good sized fragments of rocks and proceeds to smash them by crushing them with another big rock. When he has worked a sufficient length of time he discovers a magnificent turquois, a stone so big and beautiful that it seems to emit rays of light. Just then an Apache Chief comes into view. As the Apache notes the find he stealthily creeps down and tries to attack the Zuni from the back. But the Zuni is too quick and turns just as the Apache's knife is about to fall. They have a fierce fight in which the Apache is scalped and left for dead. The Zuni exits and when he has gone the Apache revives and crawls away.

Scene II. The Apache Camp. A group of Apache Indians in various occupations scattered about playing a game. As the game is proceeding famously a runner comes in to announce the return of the Indian who was scalped in the first scene. He crawls in apparently half dead, is behind from his horse and falls exhausted to the ground. A squaw fetches a bowl of broth and when the Indian drinks this he revives somewhat and tells his story in graphic pantomime. At its conclusion he gasps and falls back as if dead. The other Indians thereupon hold a powwow. The Chief makes a speech and they don their war bonnets, get their horses and start out to avenge their brother and capture the wonderful jewel.

Scene III. The Turquois Consecrated to the Gods. We see the interior of a Zuni Temple with a big idol on a stone platform in the center. The entrance is up high on the side. Two Zuni priests are doing a snake dance before the altar. The young Zuni of Scene I., then enters and after a brief pow-wow in which he describes the finding of the turquois and the fight, he gives it to the priests who place it on the breast of the idol where it emits rays of mysterious light. As it does so, all three prostrate themselves and then exit.

Scene IV. The Theft of the Sacred Turquois. A clear night in Arizona. The light from the moon comes only through the high door and falls on the statue of the Zuni god. The temple is empty and quiet. Then slowly an Apache's head appears peering in the door, then disappears. Then it comes again and slowly the Apache enters and is followed by another. The two exhibit by signs half in fear and pride, but finally one of them mustering up courage enough to inspect it closely. He discovers the turquoise and while his companion is watching the door, he pries it out with his knife, conceals it in his pouch, and the two sneak out as they entered. They fail to notice that they have left their knife behind.

Scene V. The Theft Discovered.

Scene VI.—The Pursuit.

Scene VII. The Apaches Captured.

Scene VIII. The Turquois Recovered. The wounded Zuni with difficulty drags himself into the temple, restores the turquois to its place on the breast of the idol and then drops dead at its feet.

THE LOVE ROMANCE OF THE GIRL SPY.—This is the fourth and last of the Kalem Company's celebrated series of productions relating the fascinating adventures of Nan the Girl Spy. In this is shown how Fate played a trick on Nan, how she found the man to whom she entrusted herself and her future happiness, in the army of the enemy she hated so bitterly.

Scene I. The End of the Battle. Nan Meets the Wounded Union Officer.

Scene II. One Month Later—Love's First Awakening.

Scene II.—Captain Wilkins Bids Nan Farewell.

Scene IV. The Girl Spy is Captured.

Scene V.—The Escape.

Scene VI.—Nan Tells Gen. Lee of Her Failure.

Scene VII.—After the War Captain Wilkins Claims His Rebel Sweetheart.

THE CALL OF THE HEART. A rich old grouch of a fellow is so much embittered against the world at large and so self satisfied in his accumulated and increasing wealth that he will have nothing to do with and absolutely refuses to listen to the appeals of the helpless and needy.

A poor widowed mother is taken ill and being near death she instructs her little daughter to trust God and seek a shelter and home where He may direct her and pins a note to the little one's dress, telling of her mother's death.

The child leaves and the mother dies. By some strange disposition of fate the child is led to the home of the hard-fisted old "grouch," who is comfortably established in his fine home and rich surroundings, thinking of no one but himself. The little girl arrives at his home and is taken in by the housekeeper, who fearfully and timidly takes her to the old man.

He has just awakened from a dream in which his conscience has been aroused. He realizes his hard hearted meanness and has been brought to an appreciation of the greater riches and blessings of charity and a practice of the golden rule.

When he sees the little orphan he can scarcely realize that she is not a part of his dream. The good housekeeper shows him the note the little girl has brought with her, and the old fellow cannot resist the winning ways and sweetness of the little one. He takes her to his heart and home, and gradually his heart completely melts under the gentle influence of the child. He seems to have been born again and to have become as a child himself.

THE MERRY WIDOW TAKES ANOTHER PARTNER. "The Merry Widow" is a winner. A short time ago she had cast aside her weeds and wedded an Italian count who has recently departed this mundane sphere to join his predecessors. Free and unfettered by matrimonial ties, she again longs for somebody and another partner to share her joys and sorrows.

Puff and Grunt, the two fat and disappointed suitors for the widow's hand, lost of her heart less and determine to try it again and ever more their friendship is disturbed by the rivalry with which they plunge to secure her as his very own. The feeling becomes so intense that they challenge each other to a fist fight in order to establish a claim to the prize. They both seek the assistance of a professor of physical culture in order to better themselves in the manly art of self-defense.

They are fit, in their own estimation, to battle for a kingdom or the championship of the world. They meet in the ring, each with his second "down to the nuts," and proceed to demonstrate their science and determine the rightful claimant to the fair widow's hand and fortune. While they are in the midst of the "bout" a messenger boy enters and announces the marriage of the widow at the little church around the corner.

Off go their boxing gloves, pell mell over goes the fat for their hats and coats and to the door. Regarding the sport they indulge in an unceremonious race for the widow's home, then to the church, where they arrive just in time to meet the widow and her newly acquired spouse, in the shape of a diminutive and corpulent dwarf, coming out the church door with the bridal procession, and never so much as a glance at the vanquished rivals.

Puff and Grunt link arms and dejectedly make their way to a "thirst parlor," where they impose sufficient resolution to seal their friendship and make an avowal of "Never again."

"IMP."

IN AFRICA.—The entire civilized world (yes, and a big part of the uncivilized) is agog with the doings of the great American faunal expert, Theodore Roosevelt. Pages upon pages in the press of the world have shrieked forth not only his departure, but have vied with each other in publishing every detail of his activities in Darkest Africa. It has remained for W. D. Boyce, however, to train the infallible eye of a moving picture camera, and bring back to us a complete record of the wonders of life and travel in the land of darkness and wild beasts. Of course, we first see the arrival of the expedition at Mombasa, together with the Governor of East Africa. And a mighty caravan it is, indeed, that the adventuresome American takes with him into the jungle. Not only are there four bullock wagons, but also no less than four hundred native porters, afoot, each carrying his burden, weighing sixty pounds. Among other scenes are shown the fording of the G'Uaso Nyiro. Roosevelt made this spot one of his chief encampments, on account of its natural advantages, and it was from here that a great portion of the tidings of his progress reached the outside world.

But travelling in Africa was not all hunting, for many diversions both amusing and instructive were afforded the visitor. We are shown the Chief of the Masai tribe, a black of tremendous proportions, making a fire in the primitive way, by friction. We also see natives making rope with Nature's own tools, their hands. First they cut some fibrous bark from young trees, and this they deftly pick and roll into amazingly adequate rope, using the bare thigh as a rolling-stone.

Something that will amuse us of the trolley, subway and Twentieth Century Limited, is a "leg-power" road in Africa. It is a line of cars that look like the cars on a Coney Island toboggan slide, which fleet-footed black boys push along the track. Great travelling—it is not!

Archeologists have told us that the orang-outang and gorilla, with their awful physical might, are good samples of primitive man, and the living species that proves it is the African savage. We are now able to see some specimens in wrestling matches, their favorite pastime. Each one of them is a giant, of most terrible muscular development. It is sad to contemplate what would happen to Jeffries or Sandow in the grip of one of these Samsons of the jungle. Their bouts are splendid exhibitions, their great chunks of muscle making their ebony skins bulge alarmingly as they strain and tug at their rivals' ponderous weight. Their speed and agility is natural and surprising.

We are also given a treat in the way of a balloon ascension. Mr. Boyce took a big air-craft out with him for the delectation of the savage, and we see him taking with him a friend who is dear to the hearts of the American newspaper-reading public—John T. McCutcheon, the noted cartoonist, now on the Chicago "Tribune." The American flag is attached to the basket, and it is an inspiring sight to see the dear old colors soaring above the heads of a horde of black, half-nude savages, who gaze on the balloon reverently as if it were a supernatural mystery.

One could go on for a week telling of the wonders that made our Teddy's trip a delight to him, but the anticipation might rob a view of the picture of some of the thrills. Suffice to say, Africa outdid itself in honoring and amusing Mr. Roosevelt. And just how the dauntless hunter attended to the serious business of his trip makes a wonderful chapter in our picture story. 'Way off in the distance, we see a herd of beautiful, wild zebra. The graceful, striped beasts are innocent of the proximity of the keen-eyed hunter, and are grazing peacefully; suddenly there is a puff of smoke—and in less than one-tenth or a smaller particle of a second than was ever computed, that entire herd goes shooting out of sight like greased lightning. It's a wonderful sight to witness, and you can just imagine what it means to follow the tracks of that bunch fast enough or cleverly enough to get something in the bag.

Still, Teddy Roosevelt is reputed to be just as good a hunter as he was a President, so you can bet he handles African beasts as well as he did the Washington variety!

THE NEW SHAWL.—Out in the Canadian northwest a pretty girl is bound to have a goodly supply of admirers. Marie is one, and she likes Jacques very much; even now she is writing a note telling him to meet her at their favorite trysting-place. Jacques gets it, but in walking through the woods a bear trap suddenly snaps closed, and his foot is caught. In pain, he hallooes for help, and who should come along but Victor, his rival for the hand of Marie. Does Victor release him? Oh, no! Instead, he seizes Marie's note which Jacques has been fondly reading, and off he goes to meet her.

Marie borrowed a pretty shawl from her friend Annette, who got it from her husband. When she arrives at the appointed place and sees Victor instead of Jacques she flees, dropping the shawl. Innocent Annette's husband has gone to the aid of Jacques in the bear-trap, and accompanying him to the scene, has been just in time to see the fleeing figure, and the shawl on the ground. Of course, he jumps at the quickest solution (the wrong one) and his wife cannot convince him that it was not she who met Victor; neither can Victor himself tide the awful storm of the maddened husband, until finally, when Jacques' fellow-trappers come to the cabin to make Victor explain the mean advantage of Jacques in the bear-trap.

Nothing makes a man feel more sheepish than to find that he had been following the wrong track—especially when he's a big, northwestern trapper.

THE POWER OF A SMILE.—How often have we contemplated on the very small events in life that have sometimes changed completely the course of our ways. Here we have a man, wicked, criminal, rough; he sits on a park bench and beside him is a young woman, reading. The story moves her to smile. It is a magnetic smile; he must smile, too. The situation changes, she frown; his face changes with hers through every expression as she reads, sweetly unconscious of his presence. Presently she finishes and departs. She has forgotten her purse. The crook picks it up, finds a key in it. All he needs is her address—he follows her, and plans the job.

Later, when he enters the house, she returns and surprises him. But he's a quick thinker. Thus far he has only pocketed a photograph of her smiling face, so he gallantly returns her purse to her as an excuse for his visit. She takes a kindly interest in him, and soon proposes that he take a position at her husband's office.

He gets a good job, and his pal, a recently liberated ex-convict, notes his reform cynically. And prospects are rosy, until the reforming man suddenly learns that his pal of other days is blackmailing his employer. He sees him ushered into the private office several times, and after one of these visits he steps into the office. He is just in time! His employer has come to the end of his tether, and seeks refuge from unavoidable blackmail in suicide. The ex-crook just prevents it, and after telling his employer very plainly what he thinks of a man who is mixed up in crooked deals and tries suicide having such a pretty, innocent wife at home, he walks out.

Going back to his den, he meets the ex-convict, and over a bottle of whiskey not only draws from him the reasons for the blackmail, but by a clever trick of feigning drunkenness gets possession of the papers that are the key to the situation.

We now see him on the old bench in the park; he puts a burning match to the documents; then he draws the picture of his smiling benefactress from one pocket, and a newspaper from another. With the cheery face smiling on him, he runs his finger down a column; the heading reads "Help Wanter—Male."

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE HIDDEN TREASURE.—Three treasure hunters obtain possession of a document describing the location of a treasure which is hidden away in an almost inaccessible part of the mountain country. While they are discussing their plans at a small inn, the famous Dr. Nicola comes in and learns of their intentions. He notices that only one of the three men is suited for the business which the three are about to undertake. He decides, with the help of this man, to seek the treasure himself. He leaves, and soon after sends one of his Chinese servants to the inn, requesting him to come and see him at once. On his arrival he is persuaded to seek the treasure with Dr. Nicola, the latter explaining that he is more experienced than the other two men in such matters. The treasure hunter finally agrees to all that Dr. Nicola suggests. However, the other two find out that they have been betrayed, and make up their minds to have revenge. Secretly they board the steamer on which Dr. Nicola and their betrayer are passengers and put an infernal machine in the hold. Dr. Nicola, always ready for an emergency, appears suddenly from behind them and forces them to throw the machine overboard. Later on, when Dr. Nicola has taken lodgings in a small country inn, the two treasure hunters send a scoundrel into his room with the intention of disabling him. Again the doctor awaits his assailant, and successfuly hypnotizes him as soon as he enters the room. Finally, after all these troubles, Dr. Nicola and his man find the treasure, arriving on the spot just before the other two, who are very much put out at the result of their efforts, and as a last resort they try to get hold of the treasure in Dr. Nicola's home. But the doctor again gets the upper hand, and to put a stop to their game altogether, he hands them over to the police.

THE POWERS COMPANY.

A NEWSPAPER ERROR.—Will Dean leaves his sweetheart, Helen, to whom he is engaged to be married, and goes to Mexico to make a fortune in the silver mine there.

At the Hotel Diaz he meets the hotelkeeper's daughter, Arnita, who falls in love with Will and wooes him in the impulsive Mexican fashion.

Will saves the life of "Bob" from a bad Mexican who is about to stab "Bob." The two Americans become fast friends and partners in a mine, in which they strike rich silver ore. Having made a neat fortune, Will and "Bob" "choose up" to see who goes back to the States, and Bob wins. He goes away, taking with him a letter to Will's girl, Helen, asking her to come out and marry him in Mexico, and to bring her sister, Grace. Bob falls in love with Grace and marries her. A stupid newspaper reporter confounds the names of the two sisters, and Will reads in a copy of the paper that his sweetheart Helen is married to his chum. A letter from the girl to Will explaining the mistake is destroyed by the Mexican girl, Arnita. Crazed with rage Will marries Arnita. The Mexican girl is a terror, particularly when she is drunk, and she makes poor Will wish he were dead.

A powerful dramatic situation comes when Bob and the two girls arrive. Will's fury against Bob subsides into woe when he learns that the sister, Grace, is Bob's wife, and that his girl has been true to him. The Mexican girl comes in maudlin drunk, and Will has to confess that she is his wife.

Helen is about to go back home. Will kisses her, and then he goes out to end his wretched life. Bob snatches the pistol from his hand and makes him promise to be a brave man and endure his trial. Meanwhile Arnita has skipped away, leaving a note saying, "You can have your American girl. I've goth three other husbands anyhow."

Will doesn't know what to say or do now. But Helen's kid brother does. He puts Helen's arms about Will and makes them kiss and be re-engaged.

BISON—

A HUSBAND'S MISTAKE.—A happy family picture—Mr. and Mrs. Jones and their little daughter—at the table. A friend joins them, and remembering some important papers that he desired to show Stiles, Jones goes to his office. When alone, Mrs. Jones and her guest play cards, the wager being a kiss—the terms are laughingly accepted by Mrs. Jones. The youngster has become tired and is sent to bed, but just as Mr. Stiles is taking his forfeit she stands in the doorway and sees him. She is again sent to bed and they settle down to another game, when they are attracted by a noise in the next room and discover a burglar, at which Mrs. Jones faints. The father returns, asks the child where her mother is, and hearing of the scene the child witnessed, shows anger and refuses to listen to Stiles. Both Mrs. Jones and he are compelled to leave the house, and they separate, each to go their own way. The little daughter misses her mothr, and when she is taken ill her chances for recovery are slim. The father advertises for a nurse and Mrs. Jones applies. The doctor receives her, and learning who she is admits her at once. He then tells Mr. Jones that the youngster will probably get better. He joyfully enters her room, and in his great gratitude kneels at her bedside. He feels a hand stealing across the bed, clasping his, and looking up sees his wife. There is a reconciliation and the doctor says his charge will recover.

ADVENTURES OF A COWPUNCHER.—Pedro, the foreman of the Colonel's ranch, very willingly complies with Daisy's request that he get her horse. As she is about to ride off Pedro offers her a rose, which she accepts graciously. She goes some distance on her way when her saddle becomes disordered. At this moment Slim, a cowboy, happens along and helps her. For his kindness he is rewarded with the rose Pedro had bestowed upon Daisy. Slim starts on his way when he observes a placard announcing help wanted at the Colonel's ranch. He applies and is taken before the foreman. Pedro recognizes his rose, remarks about it, and is finally angered when Slim refuses to return it. Daisy enters and as Slim passes the offending flower back, Pedro snatches it and dashes it in Slim's face. A quarrel ensues and only Daisy's intervention keeps the cowboys from joining Pedro. Slim is ordered from the ranch and Daisy appeals to her father for the discharge of Pedro; with him go all the cowboys. Daisy leaves a note telling her father she has gone in search of Slim. Pedro takes the note and follows after. Daisy is captured by Pedro and taken to a shack, where he taunts her. An Indian girl is an unseen spectator and endeavors to find help. This she does, in Slim, who gives her his horse to ride to the ranch, while he makes his way to the shack. Slim rescues Daisy, but after a hard ride, during which Slim is wounded, they are made prisoners. The Indian girl has meantime reached the ranch and a party have started to help Daisy. They arrive just in time. Slim's reward for his bravery is Daisy's hand given him by her father.

AMBROSIO

THE HEART OF A VAGABOND.—A tramp wanderng from house to house in search of food and shelter is greeted with scorn and turned away as if he were a shabby dog. Charity to him seems no longer to exist on earth. He finally plucks up courage enough to enter a rich miller's house which looked so homelike, and just at the proper time, as he thought, as the family were at dinner enjoying their evening meal. Here he receives the usual gruff treatment and is obliged to continue his long and weary journey. Shivering and trying to overcome his drowsy feelings, he succeeds in reaching a mountain. Everything seems quiet, when suddenly a desperate cry breaks the stillness of his surroundings. The tramp hastily runs in the direction of the sound and there finds a young boy moaning as if he were in severe pain. With great effort he lowers himself down an ice-covered steep and at the bottom of it finds a boy half covered with snow. He tries to assist him and on close inspection recognizes in the boy the rich miller's son, who had so cruelly turned him away from his door. A sudden thought of revenge makes him hesitate. The tramp is overcome by his human feel-tugs and cannot do an injustice, so he extricates the poor boy from his painful position and carries him to his parents, this being his generous revenge.

DAYS OF '49.—As Bob Canby struggled onward over the alkali desert with parched throat and stiffening limbs, he almost wished he had not left his partner, Jack Willoby, hors de combat, after a stunning blow on the head, and skipped out with their combined gold.

But he had no map of the mines, which turned out to be one of the wealthiest in the country, to retrace his steps would be useless.

Six months passed and Mrs. Willoby, receiving no word from her husband, took their little daughter, Nona, and started in search of him. The trip, however, proved too much for her strength, and ere the prairie schooner had finished its journey she died.

The child she placed in charge of Sheriff Johnson, and his good wife, having no children of her own, gladly welcomed the motherless little one.

Willoby, unlike his young partner, had made a map of the mine, but when he revived his reason had flown, so for ten years he wandered aimlessly around, always closely guarding the sketch of his claim.

It was in his usual aimless fashion, after a long tramp, that he fell exhausted on Sheriff Johnson's ranch, and Nona, riding up, had him carried into the house.

Upon reviving, Nona's marked resemblance to her mother awakened his sleeping memory, and upon showing her a pouch she had worked for him and covering up his long beard and scraggly hair, the girl was able to recognize him as her father.

Bob Canby, who had settled near the Johnsons, had that day proposed to Nona and had been refused. He was telling the Sheriff of his ill fortune, when Willoby caught sight of him and instantly recognized his former partner.

Not so Canby; he needed the additional proof of the map of their mine, which Nona had let fall as she examined the pouch. However, she returned in time to prevent Canby from pocketing it, and with the Sheriff, locked it in the chest of drawers.

Unseen, Canby had watched them from the door, and as soon as all but Willoby had left the house, he called in Hank Barton to assist him in obtaining the map.

Barton had just lifted it from the drawer when Nona entered. Canby managed to evade her, but his accomplice she caught sight of as he ran into the closet. Quickly bolting the closet door, she called to her father, and placing a rifle in his hands, bade him shoot should his partner attempt to escape; and then mounting her horse, galloped after the Sheriff.

Luckily she lost no time in finding her guardian and his men, for, in the meanwhile, Canby had stealthily re-entered, overpowered her father, and, releasing Barton, had put the old man in his place and started to flee when Nona and the men rode up to quickly release Willoby, relieve the conspirators of their stolen property, handcuff them and lead them away.

GRANDPA'S DARLING.—Brown, an old trusty servant in the house of Mr. Simpson, is retiring on his life's savings and recommends to his employers a young man to take his place. But Thomas returns evil for good. On learning that Brown is entrusted by his old employer to send off money by post he stealthily follows him back to his home and takes the checks from the letters. But he is caught in the act by the little grandson of Brown, who happens to come in at the moment. The cowardly rogue terrifies the poor child with a revolver. Some time after Mr. Simpson is advised that the checks are missing. Suspicions are on poor Brown. He is confronted by his employer and is filled with horror and dismay when he is accused of the theft. He is arrested just as the little boy returns to his grandpa's house. He is about to explain when again Thomas is there brandishing the revolver and goes away leaving the poor child stupefied. He is found by his older sister, to whom he relates all. Hand in hand they rush to Mr. Simpson's house just as their poor old grandpa has arrived with the police. The tale is told the real culprit is unmasked and Mr and Mrs. Simpson are happy to find that their old devoted servant is all they thought him to be. We leave him with his darling saver in his arms.

THE SIX-LEGGED SHEEP. The entire fortune of the old showman, Petrus, consists in his pet six-legged sheep, but the phenomenon fails to command much enthusiasm, and, therefore, Petrus and his family continue in dire poverty. It happens that a passerby noticing the beauty of Lucie, the daughter of old Petrus, falls in love with her, and in order to escape the misery of her poverty-stricken home she consents to an elopement. When the old father discovers that his daughter has left him to marry Rudolph, he is broken hearted, and falls ill with want and sorrow. As they have no resources, Petrus' old wife is obliged at length to dispose of the beloved pet of the family, the six-legged sheep, in order to supply nourishment to the sick man and bring him back to health. When he recovers he continually inquires for the pet which has so long been the only means of earning bread for him and his, and at last the wife is obliged to tell him that she was forced to sacrifice the dear sheep to save his life. The scene is a most touching one and the distress of the old couple is beyond expression. Meanwhile, Lucie and Rudolph, happily married, are on their way to visit and bring cheer to the old couple, and on their way they meet the slaughter-house girl, in whom Lucie recognizes the girl and playmate of her childhood. The cart is stopped and the sheep bought back, and the young people immediately perceiving what has happened, hasten to restore the lost treasure of old Petrus and his wife. So the old couple have the double joy of seeing their dear daughter well and happy, and also welcome with tears the return of the sheep.

DOWN IN MEXICO. In sunny Mexico dwells a beautiful girl named Papita. Her father, a grasping old rascal, wrings from her every penny she can earn as a flower girl. Tony, her vaquero lover, is one true friend who clings to her with dog-like fidelity. Among those fascinated by the spell of her charms is "Doc" Bradley, an El Paso dance hall proprietor, who determines to possess her at any cost. Misrepresenting himself as a Doctor of Medicine to the father and also making a liberal display of cash insures the help of the old man in his "love suit." Papita despises him utterly, and sooner than marry him would sacrifice her life. There is but one alternative, to abduct her. His real intention being to make her his favorite among the habitues of his place. Placing her in a carriage and driving at a frightful pace, he is pursued by Tony and his infuriated Mexican friends. Arriving across the border at his saloon, he has just landed her safely inside when the pursuers arrive and rescue the half-fainting girl. Tony with supreme contempt foregoes his intention of shooting him on sight, and resolves to show "Doc" up as a cowardly cur. New York, APRIL 18th, 1910

Dear Sir:--

I desire to inform my numerous friends and patrons in the Moving Picture Field, that in order to provide facilities for the constantly increasing business of my Film Rental Exchange, I have secured by leasing, the entire building at 110 Fourth Avenue, near the Subway Express Station at 14th St., and the third Ave. "L" Station at 14th St., an ideal central location in New York City, convenient, as well, to all surface car lines.

My new Exchange will be run on "strictly Independent" lines, and it is my intention to purchase the complete output of the best Independent manufacturers.

Should you be suffering from BOX-OFFICE-ITIS, should you be hard pressed by too strenuous competition, should you, in fact for any reason, fail to "get the money" that is justly yours, come and see me; let us have a heart-to-heart talk, and if at the end of our chat, I can't succeed in convincing you by facts and figures, good pictures and plenty of them, that I will not only "save you money" in the cost of your service, but will also show you "how to get the money" to your BOX OFFICE, don't give me your business. Can anything be fairer?

If, on the other hand, with a large stock of Independent reels, augmented by daily purchases of all the releases by the best manufacturers, with handsome 4-color lithograph Picture Posters, and large half-sheet synopses to advertise each picture, free and absolutely without cost to you, with my personal attention and supervision (from years of experience as an exhibitor and exchange owner), to the daily wants of the Exhibitor: if in these circumstances, you believe that I can make good my promises, then I want your business, and if I can't assist you to "get the money" I will tell you so.

Hoping to have the pleasure of welcoming you at my new offices, and shaking you by the hand in the very near future, I am,

Yours for increased business,

WILLIAM STEINER

FOUR REELS A WEEK—Tuesday, a "Bison"—Wednesday, Ambrosio—Friday, a "Bison"—Saturday, Itala

We present for Tuesday's "Bison" release "HAZEL THE HEART BREAKER" an American comedy production which is certainly a screamer, together with a short film entitled "RATTLESNAKES," which is thoroughly realistic and intensely interesting, showing the catching of rattlesnakes and the process of extracting their poisonous fangs. Friday's "Bison" release, "THE RESCUE OF THE PIONEER'S DAUGHTER," is another frontier picture taken in the wilderness of California. It shows the burning of the pioneer's cabin, the captivity of his daughter by the Indians and her final rescue; the photography of this subject being excellent.

Modern Art.

As our eyes rest upon a handsome sepia enlargement of a scene from Pathe's "Cleopatra" which adorns our sanctum through the courtesy of Mr. J. A. Berst, we are stirred with thoughts of the importance and possibilities of an art, yet in its infancy, which has reached such a high state of perfection. Only recently we were shown by an artist friend a portfolio of platinum prints which he had obtained through the courtesy of a member of the Vitagraph Company. Among them were scenes from "The Life of Moses," which, as our artist friend truly remarked, looked like steel engravings from a de luxe edition of the Old Testament. When we consider that the original of any of these pictures is but one from the fifteen thousand more or less which go to make up a reel, we realize the enormous advantages the people of to-day have over their forefathers. The moving picture is to art what the printing press is to literature. And as every printed book is not a literary gem, neither is every picture in the millions reeled off day by day a work of art. But in the plentitude of quantity there is enough of quality to establish the supremacy of this modern form of enlightenment.

The Moving Picture Afloat.

The tide of transatlantic travel is now at its highest, from both these and European shores. And one of the problems of those responsible for the transportation of the enormous number of people who either leave these shores or come to them is to amuse and entertain them on their voyage. Each new leviathan of the deep possesses some special feature in the way of entertainment, such as a palm garden or a roller skating rink; anything, in short, to satisfy the modern craving for novelty and diversion.

Some time ago a well-known British comedian startled the world by giving daily monologues on the pleasure steamers plying in the North Sea. There the idea remained, until the other day when Mr. Charles Frohman, the American theatrical magnate, sprung a surprise upon us by organizing a theatrical performance on board the great Cunarder "Mauretania." So it will be seen that those who make it their business to provide entertainment for us are alert to the opportunities which these densely crowded steamships afford them.

Consider, now, such a steamship as the "George Washington" bringing, maybe 3,000 steerage passengers from Europe. There is surely a fair amount of money to be made out of such a crowd of people in a seven-day voyage, for particularly amongst the poorer travelers on these steamships time occasionally hangs very heavily on their hands.

This brings us to the suggestion, which was recently made to us, and which we desire to say is not entirely original with ourselves, that the moving picture steps in to supply a cheap, attractive and always fresh form of entertainment on these great steamships. There is space to spare, if only in the dining rooms, whilst the cost of the installation would obviously not be very great. Again, the charge for admission might be just what it is ashore—say five or ten cents. There is no reason why, in our minds, the first and second class passengers should not be catered to as well as the third class. Anyhow, looked at from the business point of view, with an audience consisting roughly, on these great ships, of two or three thousands on the spot for a week, the enterprise should surely be remunerative.

We throw out the suggestion in the hope that some enterprising man of business may take it up and bring it to a practical issue. We know from actual personal assurance that several of the great steamship companies are alive to the value of the moving picture as an advertising agency. We believe that if it be brought to their attention as a cheap and effective means of entertaining their millions of passengers they would be sympathetically inclined towards it. The electric current, of course, is obtainable on all modern steamships, most of which have photographic dark rooms. There would be the further possibility of the making of lantern slides on the trip and their exhibition. Moreover, the use of the moving picture camera on board would afford many opportunities of illustrating the life of the voyage. The whole idea, in fact, is full of opportunities.

Silent Drama Music.

By Pilar Morin.

I am glad to see the interest which the lack of silent drama music has aroused among many lovers of silent picture plays. I personally have been begging for such music for many years, ever since I understood the future of silent picture plays, meaning so much to me in connection with the work and art I have had the honor to introduce to America in the wonderful silent play "L'Enfant Prodigue." I knew it would only be a short time before these silent drama plays would be understood and gradually become better in quality. It meant that silent drama had found its representation on the screen. These picture plays begin to be more carefully selected every day. Authors of fame have written the scenarios, understanding the value of action and art such plays can be surrounded with, understanding also that their work through motion photography will live for future generations to study.

But the music, generally, speaking, has remained at a standstill; it has done nothing to illuminate the emotions of acting. This seems almost a sin, especially when one knows what music means to action and the inspiration it gives to listeners. The silent picture play is a pantomime to the eye. Hence, who would ever think of that art separated from its soul, which is music? Richard Wagner became the great man he was when he went to Paris, at the age of seventeen or eighteen, and heard a famous opera partly consisting of silent action. The music illustrated every thought and painted with color tones the emotions of the action, giving feeling to each character. This opera was partly the means of Wagner's awakening, to the inspiration he had aimed at. From that day he said: "I'll be that painter, that musician."

It was silent drama action which helped to give to the world of music the great Wagner; why should it not awaken the desire for some musician to give the public lovers of silent picture plays, at least some pictures with music illustrating feeling and action? Surely it would be the means of forcing the moving picture theater manager to engage a real pianist with ability and knowledge. Such houses would be packed to the doors; everybody loves good music, from the smallest child to the oldest man or woman. Those theaters would then cater to the ear as well as to the eye. Can anyone who saw "L'Enfant Prodigue" think of this play put on the screen without its music? This music is in itself an opera, being the very heart-beats of the silent drama action. How impossible it would be to separate them, and what inspiration this music would create on an audience! The day will yet come when musicians will write for picture plays, manufacturers will print the music for such films, managers will gladly pay for same, pianists will be engaged to enchant the public, who are so willing to go and hear as well as see, that which it craves for, good music in connection with silent picture plays, music that speaks for itself—the music of silent drama.

THE PLAY.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

A New York dramatic critic of wide renown says: "To write above the heads of the people may be foolish, but to write below their heads is sinful. I can not help thinking that the human things called people prefer to look up, even if they have to crick their necks to do so." It is a good thing to turn the spot light on the audience before writing a play, to get at the motives and sensibilities of those who, from some gregarious tendency of human nature, crowd the low-priced theaters. A simple way to do this is to settle down in a chair among the common, conglomerated mass and center all attention on the comments and reflections made on what is visible from the front. The wide diversity of impressions will furnish no end of entertainment, but when the observer becomes conscious of a mental assimilation, that some idea has strongly fixed the attention of the crowd, it is time to sit up and notice the production; there is something doing which reaches into the sentiments, preferences or experiences of the crowd, merging their separate entities. One well-grounded conclusion will result; any play which takes possession of an audience, fixing the attention of its members or holding them breathless with expectation is a success, whether or not it is applauded at the end. It will also be found that popularity, a word misused when it conveys a suggestion of inferiority, becomes attached to a fine motive so presented as to be within the comprehension of all.

The fact that the plays of Shakespeare have survived the ages, instead of standing with "The Inferno" and "Paradise Lost," mile-stones in the slow evolution of human intelligence, is partially due to superior stage settings and improved acting, but largely because the great dramatist knew how to reach the hearts of common people, while appealing to cultivated minds.

The stage upon which events occur is a great source of poetic and emotional suggestion, but no scene painter can produce a perspective which is true from all parts of the house, he often fails to catch the expression of nature's face, and all the improvements in lighting fail to portray her varying moods. The motion picture artist has nature at his beck and call in outdoor scenes. If his sense of beauty is keen, he can fill our souls with the enthusiasm of those who travel for no other purpose than to enjoy the subtle charm of exquisite landscape. Even the indoor scenes are in true perspective. In many of them exquisite harmony is attained, not so much by lavish outlay of money as by the exercise of artistic knowledge and feeling. It is asking a good deal of a hard-working director that he shall demonstrate that he has the soul of an artist, but there is room for improvement in this branch of his work. Many of those who attend the motion picture exhibitions know the rigors of life only too well, they are heart-sick and weary of the commonplace, tired of back yards and dirty streets, and down deep in the hearts of the humblest is a love of beauty. Except in a scene which requires squalid settings, there can be no practical objection to an infusion of loveliness wherever it is not inappropriate. Fine backgrounds add greatly to the effectiveness of the play, they promote harmony to all the parts; to give the playwrights ideals, reality and actors their full opportunity, there should be no jarring note in the scene.

The actors in picture plays are more versatile and interesting than the mummers who repeat the same performance for weeks at a stretch and talk about it for hours at a time. Many of the former are artists of high quality in facial and gestural expression and furnish examples in heroic and romantic drama superior to those seen on the regular stage. When, however, the play approximates real life, when the characters are not those that we never see, but the ones who appear in our daily lives, acting in the silent story becomes a fine art. To give a heightened expression to the actual comedies and tragedies of daily existence, in a restricted space, with a time limit imposed, requires a quick grasp of the situation and alert attention to the smallest details. Villainy unmasks and virtue triumphs before you can say "now I lay me." The mind of the motion picture actor has no more chance to run stale than that of the playwright who is obliged to produce fifty-two masterpieces a year to keep principle of existence in his carcass. It might be well, in rehearsing intelligent men and women for acting in a natural play, especially in genre scenes, to allow them full liberty of movement; to attune their individualities to the large purpose of the whole effect. An interesting personality is quite as attractive on the stage as in real life, and the absence of external incitement leads to a spontaneity of action which is half the charm of the play. In this compressed style of play, the actor must appear wrapt up in what he is doing, notably in moments of intense emotion, hence it might be well to allow him complete freedom of action, to succeed or fail in his own interpretation. The whole production is composite, depending upon the staging, the acting and the material furnished by the playwright.

Robert Louis Stevenson, who would have made a great dramatist, says: "It is sometimes supposed that drama consists of incident. It consists of passion, which gives the actor his opportunity." When the sentiments and passions are those of the spectators, when the action is modern and present, where there is a sharp conflict of interest, one character colliding with another, materials for the drama of action exist. The playwright has only to use his powers of observation to find an abundance of materials in events and scenes occurring habitually, but in order to select those which the audience will accept, he must not allow his study of technics to fix rigid ideas in his mind, but rather adapt himself to conditions as he finds them. Plays of ingenuity are not so generally acceptable as those of feeling; we are all more emotional than intellectual. One of the best all-around plays is a tragi-comedy, involving a situation of extremity or sorrow, containing a light touch of humor mingled with pathos. Another is a simple story of struggle and longing which gets a strong grip on common emotion. The sensational episode with a thread of suspense and relief at the end, the bright comedy with a surprise in store, and the farce of ludicrous situation are also popular, but the laugh is sometimes on the producer. A play came out of the West which portrayed the sensible and wholesome American girl as a weak-minded country maiden who was nearly overcome by the city villain. The "city chap" was arrayed in an outing cap and a linen duster like the one pop wore in 1876, when he went to the Philadelphia Exposition, to indicate that he was an automobilist. When this fascinating creature sat down on the steps of a back porch which needed scrubbing, his pants drew up and disclosed a pair of white socks, such as city men always wear! The climax came when he was billed as the "Treacherous Easterner," but the sub-title failed to indicate whether from Skowhegan, Me., or the cranberry bogs of New Jersey. It is difficult for any man, who knows the West and its people, to understand why they should be typified by a small fry of cowboys. They and the dime-novel Indian are not at all representative of the prairies of to-day, whereas the robust and intelligent young farmer, the man who is becoming one of the greatest factors in our national strength, stands for the character of an enormous and virile class in that section of the country. He is not at all crude, but broad, manly and unconventional, a noble type, who may be used to picture newer conditions and brought into contact with an ultra-refined New York society woman with a character contrast which would be to the detriment of neither and situations that are really American. It is not necessary to dig up the bones of the Immortal Bard and turn poor De Maupassant over in his coffin to find the materials for a play. They exist around us in our business and social fabric, and, when they exhibit our fundamental traits, they can be set forth as characteristically American.

THE OPTICS OF THE MOVING PICTURE.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

CHAPTER III.

The Objective.

Since the second chapter on this subject appeared I have received several communications approving of the projected series of articles, particularly one from a Vancouver friend with whom I worked in photographic and projection matters elsewhere, suggesting the republication of the articles in book form, as in his opinion they promise to be extremely valuable. I have no doubt that by the time I have reached the end of the series I shall have succeeded in imparting much useful information on the subject.

We have considered the fundamental offices which the radiant serves in optical projection. I have not hitherto used the word "radiant"; it is nevertheless a common expression in optical projection. The radiant, in other words is the light, be it electricity, oil, gas, acetylene. But it means something more than light; it means a point whence light radiates in all directions. Light, as we have seen, may be either a fine point or a mass; it may be the electric arc, or it may be daylight, whereas a radiant simply means the point of light whence the rays or pencils that emanate from it diverge. I emphasize this point with regard to the word radiant, because I want the reader, however elementary, to get hold of some easy scientific terms in projection matters. Much of what is written about the optics of the moving picture is loose, ill-informed and in many cases misleading. Therefore it is my object in this series to lead the reader along gently to an understanding of the proper terms. You will find after a bit that it is easier and certainly more useful to be exact than inexact. Scientific men all over the world speak one common language, so that when the word "radiant" is used in this connection it is universally comprehended.

There is another point that I want to make in this article. It is, that though the series is entitled "The Optics of the Moving Picture," the principles about which I am writing apply equally to the magic lantern or the stereopticon. There is only a difference of degree between a picture projector and a lantern slide projector. The principles of both systems are the same; nevertheless it is well that the moving picture end of matters should be emphasized in a moving picture publication.

What the radiant or light does in moving picture projection, and what office the condenser serves in controlling that light or radiant has been explained. We have seen that unless a proper optical system (or lens) were placed at the proper distance from the radiant, or light point, a great deal of the light would be lost or scattered outside the projector, whilst the remainder would not fulfill its office of properly illuminating the picture as it passes in front of the cone of rays thrown from the light.

To recapitulate, what happens when the condensers are placed in their proper position? Simply that a cone of light is formed the diameter of which, roughly speaking, is equal to the diagonal of the picture illuminated. In other words, if the single moving picture is a circle, let us say, of 2½ inches in diameter, it is necessary that the cone of light projected on it by the condensers should also be 2½ inches in diameter. To sum up, the condenser which, as I have pointed out, is a lens, must cover the size of picture, whatever it be, that is to be projected.

Having got our light going, our condenser in position, our picture moving, the uninitiated might imagine that the system is complete, and that all he has to do is to drive a strong concentrated light through the picture to assure that an enlarged image will appear on the screen. It does not and it won't. Supposing that only the condensing system were used and the picture put in motion, what would happen? Simply that on the screen there would be a kind of formless blur. In other words, no image would be formed. This is easily explained. The condenser, while acting the part of a lens, that is, of bringing rays to a definite point, is not a lens in the ordinary acceptation of the term. It does not form a real image like a microscope or a photographic lens. It is not constructed or corrected for that purpose, hence it is that, by itself, it is incapable of projecting on the screen a sharp image of the picture through which it is passing the light. Consequently we have to seek some supplementary means of compensating for the optical deficiencies of the condensing lens. Let the reader refer back to the radiant and consider the functions of the condenser with regard to it. Practically the same state of things exists when the light rays are passing through the moving picture. Here you have the light in a cone. If this travelled on without hindrance it would practically scatter in all directions; some of it would reach the screen and some of it would not. The result of it on the screen would be, as I have pointed out, a formless blur.

It therefore becomes necessary, as the intelligent reader will perceive, to use another lens for precisely the same purpose as the condenser is used at the radiant end of matters. The object is to gather up diverging bundles or rays of light and compress them so that they can be carried on to the screen and give the necessary clearness, illumination, definition and other qualities.

Unlike the condenser, the secondary lens has to be of a definite optical property. It has to be constructed for finely defining purposes. It must, in short, be able to form either on ground glass, or on a sensitized surface, a sharp image of an object placed in front of it. In other words it must be a photographic lens. The condenser, let it be understood, simply controls and condenses light—plain light—no matter what its nature. The lens in front of the moving picture does something more than this. It practically controls the picture, that is to say, it gathers up the rays of light: the lights, the shadows, the half tones, the details, that are projected or sent through the picture by the condenser; it must gather up all these details of the picture and project them on the screen so as to form a perfectly sharp image. The lens must be specially corrected and constructed for these purposes.

Supposing for the sake of illustration we were to place in the position occupied by the projecting lens another condenser or set of condensers resembling those controlling the radiant. Would they do? Would they form a picture on the screen? Would they project a sharp, well defined, non-distorted image? In other words a perfect picture? Assuredly not. The condenser is not constructed for projecting sharp images or for taking sharp images. It is simply a light condensing system, whereas the second lens in front of the moving picture is, as I have pointed out, specially made either for the projection of a picture or the taking of a picture.

This secondary or supplementary lens in a projection system is known as the "objective." I want the reader to get hold of that word "objective," because the word "objective," in a projection system, is another instance of easy scientific language of world-wide comprehension. An English, a French or a German worker would understand it, and there is no reason why an American worker should not. The objective on a moving picture projector is, then, the front lens or object point, which the elements of light, condenser and picture all make for. It is the object point of the system; hence its name, "objective." The term "front lens" is clear enough. It will do, of course, like many other things in the terminology of moving picture making. All the same it is best, I think, for the reader to be accurate as well as correct: a distinction and a difference. In the next article I will more fully discuss the uses and functions of the objective in moving picture projection.

The Construction and Conduct of the Theater

II.—Flooring.

Pending the preparation of some illustrations of interior arrangement and lighting we will discuss this week the various substances available for theater flooring. A plain pine floor offers many disadvantages. The pine is not always well seasoned, and as it dries out, cracks appear between the boards. These afford nests for dust and breeding spots for diseases. Unfortunately, all patrons of moving picture theaters are not scrupulously clean in their habits or persons; certain people cannot be cured of the expectorating habit; the trampling of many feet deposits on the floor the filth of the streets; all of which point to the duty of the purveyor of public amusements to adopt the best available preventives of disease or discomfort. Some places have hardwood floors, but, like cement or mosaic flooring, they are not only noisy but very slippery. As to carpets, rugs or runners, they are most undesirable, being more unsanitary than the plain pine floor, besides being uneconomical.

After much experimentation and comparison I have decided that CORK TILING is the IDEAL FLOORING for moving picture houses. It is non-absorbent; it is non-slippery; it is sanitary; it is noiseless; it is elastic; it is durable. What other substance has so many points in its favor? The price may be high, but it is not prohibitive. It is said to cost seventy-five cents per square foot laid down, and if any of our readers desire other particulars we are at their service.

Now a word as to the manufacture and composition of this ideal flooring: Cork of fine quality is pulverized and compressed into molds by hydraulic pressure. It is then heated to a high temperature, which liquefies a portion of the substance and binds the particles into a dense homogeneous mass—practically a block of natural cork, as no cement is used in its composition. The tiles thus made are one-half inch thick and in natural wood colors from light oak to dark walnut. This tiling can be laid on any existing floor: wood, concrete, stone, or metal. The surface is left in its natural state, or oiled, which gives it a somewhat richer appearance. The only care it ever requires is washing.

Cork tiling or flooring will outwear any hard material, having the toughness and elasticity to save it from abrasion or the effects of friction. It will not rot or deteriorate like rubber tilings, which lose their elasticity and become brittle in a few years. Liquids such as oil, ink, etc., can be washed off the cork without leaving a stain. It is chiefly on account of its great elasticity that it is durable. Besides saving it from abrasion, this quality saves it from cracking and breaking in the unsightly and unsanitary manner of tiling, marble, or any plastic flooring. It yields, but does not break. Its elasticity renders it soft and silent and comfortable to walk and stand upon. It does not tire the feet. It is odorless. The method of laying and finishing the tiling hermetically seals the entire surface, and, being absolutely non-absorbent and impervious to liquids, it is impossible for germs or filth of any kind to obtain an entrance, or for vermin to find a hiding place.

This flooring, as I said, seems to be the ideal one for motion picture houses, and I feel encouraged in recommending same, when I am told that numerous railroad companies have laid cork tiling floors in their passenger stations, including the new New York terminal of the Pennsylvania Railroad. Churches, banks, hospitals, libraries, hotels and other public buildings are users of cork floors, so we can feel safe that the qualities claimed for it have been fully tested.

The great amount of disinfectants sold yearly to moving picture theaters, shows the unsanitary condition of the present floors, absorbing and retaining all the filth carried from the street.

For these various reasons, a non-absorbent, non-slippery, but a sanitary, noiseless, durable floor should be welcomed.

Booths.

I will not attempt to deal with this question, as I do not wish to conflict with the different State and municipal ordinances governing the construction of the booths. I merely want to state that the very best regulations will not offer much safety if the booth is abandoned to a young, inexperienced operator. We cannot deny the danger of the film, yet with good care and first-class operators, the danger is reduced to a minimum.

I well remember that before the erection of the five-cent theaters, the first films were shown in regular theaters. The machines were placed in an open space on the balcony, as they still are in many cases, and I do not remember that we can trace any disaster to this method of showing motion pictures. Personally, I advocate the open booth, like it is operated at the Keith houses in New York City, and my reasons are the following ones: In an open booth, the operator is constantly watched by the audience; he is a sort of attraction, and, knowing it, Mr Operator is more attentive and more careful in his work In an open booth, the operator does not dare to smoke in view of the manager or of the audience, as he sometimes does in a closed booth where no one can see him A closed booth is poorly ventilated; the heat of the lamp house turns it into a regular oven, and it is not to wonder that under such conditions, the operator, exhausted and perhaps dizzy from the great heat and perspiration, gets careless or sleepy. Some operators are negligent in their work, but we must have a little mercy on them when we peep into a closed booth and see what they have to suffer for the sake of a few dollars. Many railroad accidents have been traced to overworked employes; the same can be said of moving picture places: too many of the operators have to work too long hours, and this under very poor conditions.

As I said, I do not wish to conflict with the different authorities, and for this reason I will rest this question of booth on my belief that an open booth is less dangerous than a closed booth.

As the film manufacturers are fast abandoning such subjects as sensational burglaries, murders, infidelity, and the foolish chases, to produce pictures of a higher class and to make of cinematography the greatest educator of the world, it is time that the builders of five and ten-cent theaters abandon the flimsy decorations of a passing fair.

We do not want any more these light plaster buildings to last just one season. We want suitable buildings to house the best pictures. We want an exterior to appeal to the public; that does not flaunt the signs of a mere side show but invites the public to enter and enjoy the greatest library of the world. (Excuse the word "library," but I cannot find a more fitting one for the cinematography of to-day, as we now see on the screen the motion pictures of the best books preserved in libraries.) Numerous of the best known authors have already been presented in motion pictures, while there is not a manufacturer to-day who is not working on a production taken from one of the favorite authors. A library, as there is not a public library where the story of the "Fly Pest" is so forcibly told as it is shown to-day on the screen. The library, as we cannot find in any other library such wonderful scenic records as shown daily in our five-cent theaters.

If New York is spending millions of dollars on a new Public Library; if other cities have been as lavish with the money of the taxpayers, to house in proper style the books of the period, is it not proper that we should erect for cinematography theaters that have the appearance of something solid and lasting? The cheap plaster decorations, or gingerbread decorations, as I call them, were all right for temporary buildings; but for a building to last for years, they are, in the long run, more expensive than carved stone.

In Philadelphia, one of the first moving picture theaters erected was a small affair entirely made of lath and decorative plaster work. It was erected by Mr. Lubin in the grounds of the Industrial Exhibition in 1898 (if the date is correct). It was then all right, as the said building was to last for a few months only. It seems that this first theater served as a type and the idea of fronts elaborately decorated with plaster work is still prevailing.

The plaster decorations have the disadvantage of breaking and of becoming dirty in no time. The dirt of the street, the smoke, etc., land in these ornaments, and, on account of the porous quality of the plaster, the first rain drains all this filth into the ornaments, and in a few months the most elaborate front looks dirty unless it is constantly repainted.

J. M. Beggs.

Biograph Company's troupe of producers and actors returned last Saturday from San Francisco. The little excursion ended in Fairmount Park, which set the pace for quality in moving pictures, is again in active operation and will do duty as headquarters until the completion of the studio in the Bronx.

Isn't it odd how things will develop sometimes? I picked up the last number of the self-anointed champion of the Independent forces during one of my leisure spells this week and my vision fell upon a challenge to the Motion Picture Patents Company attention. I read it and found it contained a story of a San Francisco film exchange declining to run the chance of having its license cancelled by the Patents Company on a charge of selling films. It also made a charge that the films were eventually sold to the party desiring them by a Chicago film exchange, that the Patents Company knew all about the deal, but winked at it because the sale was made by a favored exchange. Following this is a question as to whether the Patents Company overlooked the matter because of the common talk that certain licensed manufacturers are heavy stockholders in the exchange that made the sale. By the way, the sale is stated by the publication to have embraced one hundred reels, and the purchase is said to have been made by a person residing at Manila, P. I. Now, in all fairness, I think the San Francisco exchange is entitled to great credit for abiding by its contract with the Patents Company and should be congratulated upon its sagacity in refusing to be lured into complications by a purchase offer of one hundred reels. This exchange no doubt figured that honesty was the best policy and there was more money to be made in the holding on to its exchange license than could be derived from the sale. As to the exchange that made the sale, I have nothing to say. If the statements made are true there is no room for any but a one-sided comment. If the statements are false the Patents Company should at once make a rigorous investigation and clean the skirts of every licensed film exchange in Chicago. This is an era of investigations and the Patents Company can have no better opportunity. Now, Mr. Licensed Man, do not jump to the conclusion that I am trying to instigate or stir up unpleasantness for the Patents Company; and Mr. Independent do not take my sentiments as a challenge in behalf of that company or its licensees. My motive is honest, the design clear. The dirtiest piece of journalism is that which makes and boosts a charge by insinuations. If the charges made are true, why make them in such a manner that the reading public can only surmise as to their truth or falsity, and because of the manner in which they are made innocent people are besmirched and must suffer as much as the guilty. No fair-minded man will sanction under-cover jabs in the back. They all like to hear the truth, and like to hear it told with some spirit of honest conviction.

I hear someone ask, "How do you think the charges should have been made?" I will frame them as I think they would be better appreciated and receive more attention from both independent and licensed people. Give the name of the man from Manila and show he was a genuine Manila buyer. Then the name of the exchange that was wronged and the name of the exchange that did the wrong. Give evidence of the sale and some evidence that the Patents Company "knows all about it." Give the names of the licensed manufacturers that are interested in the exchange that made the sale.

I realize that many people will say I impose an impossible task upon the accusing paper. Ordinarily this would be true, but it is not, in view of the bold declaration by that paper, "If they desire it we will give them names, prices paid, and dates when shipped, with signatures all galore." Why was not all this information given when the charges were made? Why not be fair to the entire moving picture world and give the facts? It is not the barking cur that bites, neither is he a good watch dog.

Now as to the oddity of developments. Here is the assumed champion of the independent interests making charges in their behalf, but weakening them by waiting for an invitation for facts. Cowardice, or falsity, is shown by the additional declaration, "Our columns are open for the truth of the transaction, or at least the other side of the story. Who'll reply?" But, if I may be allowed to repeat, now as to the oddity of developments. In the same column with the magazine-covered charges appeared the statement, "Is it not, as we have stated in these columns, again and again, that the strongest film exchanges can put their thumb to their nose and spread out their fingers to the Patents Company?"

Yet, at the very time the editor or reporter was writing the accusing article one of the most prominent licensed exchanges in the country was being disciplined for doing the very thing with which the Chicago exchange is charged, and the would-be champion of the independent interests never heard of it. The paper was issued two days after the affair took place, but not a word of it appeared in the self-appointed official organ. The exchange that figured in the affair to which I refer was the Imperial, one of the most prominent in New York City, and having branches in Troy, N. Y., and Washington, D. C. Some doubt has been created as to whether the Patents Company cancelled the Imperial's license, or the Imperial cancelled its own license by withdrawing as a licensee of the Patents Company. I got a tip late in the afternoon of Thursday, April 14, that the Patents Company was holding a meeting and the head of some prominent exchange would in all probability be chopped off before night. I hovered about the Patents Company headquarters for several hours that day, and before I retired for my night's rest I had learned the Imperial license had been cancelled. The notice by the Imperial Exchange that it withdrew as licensee of the Patents Company was dated April 15. (See copy of the notice on page 647 of the Moving Picture World, issue of April 23.) How is it the would-be champion of the independent interests did not have even a copy of this notice in its columns? The Moving Picture World had it because it is always on the job and on the alert for facts, fearlessly, honestly and impartially.

Let me say a few words for "Billy" Steiner, the president of the Imperial Film Exchange. I will quote a statement made to me yesterday by one of his colleagues in the licensed ranks: "No man in the moving picture business has had more experience in that line than 'Billy' Steiner, and no one had a wider circle of friends. He is a genial, whole-souled fellow and no one regretted the turn of affairs more than I did. He was one of the original and most prominent of the Film Service Association members and now holds a very important and responsible position in that organization. Of course, it is quite natural to assume he will withdraw from the organization, since he is now in the independent ranks, but from a personal standpoint he will always have the best wishes of its members. From a business standpoint the relations between Mr. Steiner and his former associates will undergo a radical change."

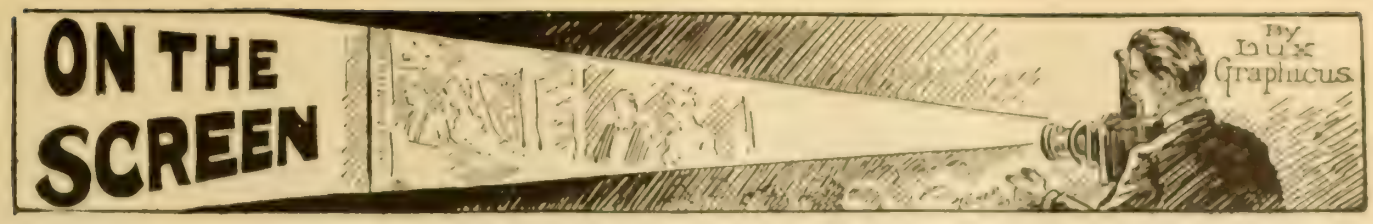
I met Mr. Steiner last night. He carried that customary good-natured smile and that merry, knowing twinkle in the eye. "How do you feel, Bill?" I asked. "Fine, never felt better," he replied. "I hear you intend manufacturing films?" "Sure thing. I have everything going and will have an output ready before the June roses bloom." I told him of the compliments expressed in regard to him by the licensed exchange man I quoted above, and he said most seriously: "The boys are all right. We parted in a most friendly manner and I wish them all they wish me."

Albert E. Smith, of the Vitagraph Company of America, sailed for Europe on Wednesday on the Oceanic. Mr. Smith goes to close a deal which will materially advance Vitagraph supremacy in the moving picture field and he will be back at his desk again inside a month.

"A Manufacturer" sends us anonymously a post-office money order for twenty dollars for us to award to the one who will send in the best name and trade-mark for film manufacturing purposes. If "Manufacturer" is afraid or ashamed to reveal his identity to us, the money order will be turned over to some charitable institution, and he can call his film "Billiken" and adopt as a trade-mark a camera mechanism rampant over a burglar-proof safe and underneath the words, "In hoc signo vinces."



"Sweet are the uses of advertisement," said the late William Shakespeare, or something like it. He wrote "adversity." Adversity and advertisement are pretty much the same thing at times. "Bold advertisement," another Shakespearian and this time a genuine Shakespearian quotation, is good for everybody, and good for everything at times. Not too much bold advertisement, but just bold advertisement enough. Equally so not too much adversity, but just adversity enough. You can have too much of a good thing, and too much of a bad thing, whether it be adversity or advertisement.

Like all new industries, the moving picture field reveals certain aspects which are being grievously overdone, and which are bound, in the nature of things, to have a disagreeable reactionary effect. For example. Since this time last year the gentle press agent has appeared on the scene. Twelve months ago, if the reader will turn back to The Moving Picture World and other publications of that date, which treat of the moving picture, he will discover that the press agent (bless his dear little heart!) was then non est inventus. In other words, he had not yet appeared in the sky to dazzle us with the scintillating brilliancy of his wit and invention.

But, here the press agent is, and the problem is, what to do with him, first of all in his own interest, and then in the interests of his employers. At present, speaking generally, he is doing neither his employers nor himself any particular good. He is making himself look ridiculous; he is making his employers look absurd. The little stories he is inventing influence nobody. What the press agent says about his employers' pictures also influences nobody. He rather handicaps their reception by the exhibitor, because, plainly and bluntly, the exhibitor is fully alive to the ways and wiles of the press agent.

Bumble, the immortal beadle in Charles Dicken's "Oliver Twist," said with true parochial emphasis and stupidity: "The public is a Hass." The public is not. Can you look for any higher authority on this little point than the late Abraham Lincoln? "You can fool the public"—it is unnecessary for a casual alien like myself to complete this renowned sentence. But the moving picture press agent has started out to fool the exhibitor. I do not say designedly, but unconsciously, because it seems to be the natural bent or tendency of the press agent to grossly over-exaggerate every fact or factor with which he has to deal. In the ordinary newspapers, that is the daily and weekly newspapers, the press agent has been found out long ago. He has been sized up. The result is that the two sections of workers, namely the newspaper man and the press agent, thoroughly understand each other. Which is as it should be.

The same thing, of course, has got to happen in the moving picture field and the press agent has got to realize that the public for whom he writes knows just as much about the game as, and a little more than, he does. Ninety per cent. of the people interested in the moving picture were fully alive to the game before the moving picture press agent appeared on the scene. I would like each moving picture press agent to take this little friendly hint from me. Then, again, the profusion of press agent's literature is becoming rather embarrassing to people who conduct theaters. It is questionable in my mind whether this sort of thing does the business on whose behalf it is issued the smallest good. I know many cases where quite a contrary effect is produced. Exhibitors have personally complained to me of the plague of bulletins with which they are perforce suffering. The matter contained in them is of such a high falutin partisan character that it produces an effect entirely contrary to that calculated upon by the press agent. In other words it repels rather than attracts.

These things must cost a great deal of money for printing, mailing and all that kind of thing, and the business returns must be doubtful. I question whether they dignify the business. A house organ, not only in the moving picture field but in others, is looked upon with a certain amount of suspicion. Mind, I [illegible] between a house organ and an ordinary business [illegible]. The latter is conducted because its matter is considered to [illegible] terms of unquestionably leads to business. Whether, however, whether the press agent [illegible]

You see, people are quite wise to the game and they resent a flood of gratuitous literature of a partisan, exaggerated and unsympathetic nature. For the partisanship and irresponsibility of these productions are their chief characteristics. Their regard for accuracy is also inconsiderable. I am putting it as politely as possible, dear brethren of the pen. A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind and one touch of nature makes the whole world kin. I love my brother of the pen, but oh you press agent!!

I hope the friendly hint I am giving to moderate the ardor of things will be taken in good part and not give offense when none is intended. The exhibitor, the master of all our destinies in the moving picture field, is complaining of the press agent and his funny little ways. Sat verbum sat sapientiae, dear brothers. There is only one certain, sure, effective, inexpensive and profitable way of reaching the great moving picture industry of the United States and the adjacent parts of the world, and that is by advertising in the pages of—is it necessary, brothers, for me to say what? I trow not. But you may identify it for yourselves when I inform you strictly in confidence that the subscription to it is $2 per year, that the advertising rates will be found under the title on the front page, and that whatever appears in its pages is, first of all, published in the interests of, and to promote, the prosperity of the moving picture industry as a whole, and of the only impartial representative and unbiased publication in this country, which represents that industry. Pax vobiscum.

WHEN MR. EXHIBITOR RECEIVES CIRCULARS.

THE ROOSEVELT PICTURES.

By H. F. Hoffman.

On Monday I made the rounds of several theaters that were advertising the Roosevelt pictures broadcast. I visited several of them for two reasons—first, to observe the way they took with different audiences, and, second, to see the prints in more than one light, as I had heard that the film was a dark one.

The first house I visited was in Elizabeth, N. J., where I found the management in a state of bitter disappointment. "I can't describe what a frost it is," said one of them; "look at it yourself and then come into the office and tell me what you think of it." I was prepared for the worst as the picture began, but as it progressed I found it quite interesting. To be sure the film seemed to be badly obscured in spots, and as it annoyed me, I know it annoyed others less forgiving than myself. But at the same time I could see yellow and red and blue by turns, and sometimes darkness altogether, so I decided before long that the light was bad and that the operator was not paying attention.

When I returned to the office my verdict did not dispel the gloom. They were indignant when I told them the light was bad. "We've got the best operator and the best light in the country," they declared. (They all say that.) Their idea was that the picture should have been Roosevelt all the way through. The class of people who came there were expecting to see Teddy slaughtering lions and tigers and wallowing in their gore. They wanted to see a hand-to-hand struggle between him and a white rhinoceros. They wanted to see him swing an elephant by the tail or wrestle with a lion or ride an alligator. Elizabeth is a great town for workingmen and the shopgirl element that loves its melodrama. They want the golden-haired hero to get the girl after he has saved her from being sawed in two, and they want to see the villain get his, and get it good at the finish, consequently Teddy was a disappointment to them.

It was of no use to explain the difficulties incidental to the making of such a picture. For my part, I think Mr. Kearton did well to get what he did. Animals in Africa do not stalk abroad at noontime for the convenience of any photographer, not even Kermit himself. It is only when the sun begins to set that they venture forth, and for that reason the pictures are naturally a little dark, but not so dark but what all the animals are plain enough for anyone with normal eyesight, if the "Best Operator in the Country" is only doing his part.

"Yes, but how can we make the people understand this; we are not running our business by excuses?" "Well, you ought to explain it," said I; "a good lecture helps any picture, and in this Roosevelt picture there are a lot of things that would stand a word, even if the print were as clear as crystal." A few remarks on the habits of wild animals would be entirely in keeping in this case, also a few remarks about the difficulty of taking such a picture. A smooth talker could make the audience believe the picture to be more wonderful than it is. I know if I had been in Mr. Kearton's place, when that old white rhino was coming head-on toward the camera, I should have climbed a tree long before he hiked it himself. (Besides this, they had only the one reel at that theater; the second reel, which shows less of Roosevelt than the first one.)

The next theater I visited was on Broadway. There the management was satisfied. The light was fine and the pictures were considerably clearer. An intelligent class of people made up the audience, and I enjoyed the picture more the second time than the first because I knew what was coming and was prepared for a better look. The best test of interest a picture sustains is by counting the number of spectators who get up and go out when it comes on, and there were few who did so at this house. From this, then, it would seem that the Roosevelt pictures are going to take better at houses that cater to the middle class than at those who cater to the shopgirl trade, though much depends upon the advertising. If you lead the public to think that they are going to see Teddy doing the William Tell act, you must not blame them or the manufacturer if they expect it.

Scene I., "Roosevelt Is Coming"; a monkey reading a paper is a clever introduction, but seems to miss the mark. Scene II., Government Buildings, Mombassa; very proper by way of introduction. Scene III., Roosevelt Planting a Tree; a good close view of T. R. Scene IV., Native Amusements in Mombassa, showing something we didn't know before, home-made Ferris wheels in a native village, full of "dark meat" Scene V., Railway Trip from Kiu to Naquro, made by T. R. A scene like this is apropos, giving us a touch of local color and a little preparatory acquaintance with scenes Teddy went through on his way to the hunting ground. Scene VI., Zulu Women at Spring; they are the real thing, but I didn't see any I would care to elope with. Scene VII., Dance of the Rain Maker; nature taker, funny and interesting. Scene VIII., Natives Drawing Water from a Well, typical, but not of much interest. Scene IX., In the Kraal; showing natives living in mud houses; fairly interesting, but awfully chopped up. Scene X., Arabian boys close to camera; on a par with the many other pictures of that kind. Scene XI., Kingfisher Feeding Young; full frame bird picture of the usual kind. Here is where a lecturer would come in handy to stall the patience of those who do not care for that kind of a picture. I have seen much better bird pictures than this one. Scene XII., Jackson's Dancing Bird; a rattling good photograph of this unheard-of creature. The maker has caught his subject standing quietly, and again jumping up and down in a very tireless and unnecessary way. The bird looks like a bantam rooster. Altogether the photographer may be proud of his work in this instance.

Scene XIII., Vultures and Storks Feeding; good stuff. Scene XIV., Woodpecker Feeding Young; usual kind of a bird picture, not overly interesting, but the lecturer could make it so by using the description of it that comes with the printed circular. Scene XV., Camp Roosevelt; the first of a series of camp views, of which the main interest is the Colonel himself, who appears in all of these. Scene XVI., Zulu War Dance in Honor of Bwana Tumbo; a typical and interesting subject; an American negro would probably not relish this, as it depicts too plainly the stock from which he sprang. It is hard to believe that this sort of thing still exists. Scene XVII., T. R. and Party Reviewing Maneuvers; in this, as in many of the others, the Colonel is plainly to be seen. More Zulu business.

Scene XVIII., Zulu Belles; see Scene VI. I love my frau, but O you Zulu gal! Nothing here to cause the Colonel any worry about the race suicide question. Scene XIX., Col. Roosevelt Examining a Gun; according to the Colonel's expression, it's a bum gun. It is a good thing for the maker of the gun that we are not told what make it is, for by that wave of Bwana Tumbo's hand he can make or unmake a maker of guns. Scene XX., Col. Roosevelt Taking the Trail; Roosevelt alone on horseback coming toward the camera. After two false starts the flag is dropped and he gets by. Scene XXI., Home of the Lizard; close study of a big, lazy lizard taking the rest cure. Scene XXII., Young Serval Cat; close study of a beautiful Serval cub, a relation of the leopard; according to Hoyle it is the mildest and most docile of wild felines. A very good and interesting photograph.

Scene XXIII., Giraffe on Their Native Heath; in this picture we begin to get a line on Mr. Kearton's ability. Although it is somewhat dark on account of the time of day, it is probably the best idea any of us will ever get of how a herd of giraffe look in their native home. None of us ever saw a giraffe run, and here we have it, so anyone who can kick on that must indeed be hard to please. Mr. Kearton has managed to get within what appears to be a short city block of these interesting creatures, which is about a quarter of a mile nearer than Kermit Roosevelt ever got. For several moments one can describe the spots on them, which to my mind is going some in the way of photographing giraffe.

Scene XXIV., The Deadly African Spider; he may be deadly and all that, but looked so much like our common or garden variety that no one seemed to have the least fear; this could have been omitted, as it causes impatience. Scene XXV., Giant Land Turtle; another chance for the lecturer to get busy and follow copy, otherwise tame. Scene XXVI., Flashlight of Man-eating Lion in the Jungle; this view should never have gotten into the reel; it casts over the whole series a feeling of patchwork. Flashlight of a lion taken from a still photo print. It looks like a dead lion, or a poor wash drawing of that animal. Altogether inadequate for the matter in hand, and flatter than a pancake. If I were exhibiting those reels, the first thing I would do would be to cut that number out and I would leave it out until it went back to the exchange. The only possible way to make it interesting would be for the lecturer to repeat the printed description, which is too long for the picture, and having done so he would be simply telling the audience how a flashlight photo is taken. If a lion's picture was needed so badly, the combined manufacturers might better have taken the living lion from that old Selig comedy, "Teddy in Jungleland." Don't forget that moving pictures are the thing, first, last, and all the time.

Scene XXVII., Roosevel Party Crossing Stream; the Colonel being carried across by natives, and showing the caravan on the march. Well taken in a strong, sharp light. Scene XXVIII., Chameleons at Play; anyone who had never seen a chameleon would get the idea from this that they are about the size of an alligator. Very sharp and clear. Scene XXIX., Rhinoceros Mother and Baby; here we get a line on Mr. Kearton's nerve. He can take all the photos of rhinos he wants, and I shall be glad to set and look at them, but that is as near to photographing them as I ever want to come. Scene XXX., Rhino Killed by Col. Roosevelt; showing the Colonel superintending the post-mortem examination. Scene XXXI., Hartebeests Running Over Veldt; long-distance view of this very wary animal, but giving a good idea of their abundance. Scene XXXII., Visiting Delegation of Gnus and Zebras; in this picture we see the strange sight of the bovine and the equine herding together. The gnu seems to be a sociable cuss, for sometimes he may be found associating in herds with flocks of ostriches. In this view we get a glimpse of a dandy little zebra who comes well into the foreground.

Scene XXXIII., Hippopotami at Play; the hippo is about the only daytime animal of any size in Africa, and for that reason the photographer has taken, in a clear and sharp light, as interesting and correct a photo of hippopotami at home as ever was or will be taken. A masterpiece it is, and none would have complained at twice the length of it. Scene XXXIV., Crocodile Taking His Morning Plunge; as the title would indicate. Good photography. Scene XXXV., Young Deer; this view is out of place and would have been better placed among the tamer animals, as it is hardly strong enough to follow the hippo. picture and not a good leader for the next and last picture, which is the Colonel himself. Scene XXXVI., Roosevelt Returning; showing him fording another stream. The little coon whose duty it was to transport the American flag brought a laugh.

The picture closes with a view from a flat photo of Roosevelt in his Rough Rider costume, taken ten years ago. Instead of going back ten years for a flat photo, they might as well have dug up an old film portrait of the Colonel, of which there are several in existence, and none of them that old. Nothing is so flat as a still photo in moving pictures.

Elaborate Roosevelt Poster Issued by the Selig Polyscope Company

Among the Moving Picture Theatres.

MILWAUKEE, RACINE AND KENOSHA.

The exhibitors of Milwaukee deserve a good word as they are certainly following the proper and only course to elevate motion pictures and to make of them, not a passing fad, but an everlasting amusement for the people.

Milwaukee exhibitors are not like their brethren of other cities, building cheap, flimsy theaters to last one season, hunting for cheap film service, cutting down the expenses and wages to the lowest limit. No, the Milwaukee exhibitor, in general, seems to be a broad-minded man with high ideals, a business man who knows how to spend money to make money and who believes that nothing is too good for his patrons.

Milwaukee boasts of moving picture theaters that you cannot duplicate in much larger cities; artistic houses built for the future and not for the day. I have been so much impressed by the beauty of many of the houses that I have taken a number of views and collected details for future reference.

The Milwaukee exhibitor does not believe in cheap vaudeville, he does not want it at any price, he claims, and he is right, that he cannot give a good vaudeville act if he wants to meet his obligations and if he wishes to give even a mediocre act he has to reduce the quality of his pictures. The motto seems to be: "Good pictures only; no vaudeville."

The Milwaukee exhibitor is a free spender, he knows how to spend his cash to show good pictures to the best advantage. He has no use for cheap pianists or erratic and discordant music. No, he is not satisfied unless he has an orchestra of several good musicians, a good repertoire of appropriate tunes, sound effects, and, as in the case of the Princess Theater, a pipe organ.

A regular lecturer is found in the majority of the Milwaukee theaters, lecturing on all the films, giving out the announcements, etc. The Milwaukee exhibitor is perhaps the first one to realize that the art, scenic and educational films of to-day need some comments, and when other exhibitors will come to the conclusion that they must add a good lecturer to their staff of employees the manufacturers will not be compelled to give such long sub-stitles, in many cases too long to read.

I am not through with the Milwaukee exhibitor, as if I claim that he is a broad-minded business man, I must add that he is a man of good common sense. He knows that all Milwaukee cannot run the same day to see the same picture and he knows that if he shows the picture one day only he deprives many other patrons from enjoying the said picture. He also knows that if his patrons do not care to see again a foolish chase or a murder they have no objection to see more than once a real good picture. Good pictures advertise his place, and, he says, in many cases the receipts of the second day are far ahead of the receipts of the first day. For these reasons the Milwaukee exhibitor does not brag of changing his pictures 365 times a year; he is satisfied with three changes a week.

Exhibitors from other towns will wonder how their colleagues of Milwaukee can exist under such expense. My answer is: "That money spent judiciously to show pictures as they should be shown means success to the exhibitor." The Milwaukee exhibitors must be making some money as they are all the time improving their properties, and it is reported from good authority that two of the theaters are to be remodeled during the coming Summer at expenses of $18,000 and $5,000, respectively.

The Milwaukee exhibitor knows how to advertise his show; he does not stop at a question of a few dollars when he has a special feature film. I will give an illustration to show to what expense the Vaudette went to advertise one of the war pictures of the Selig Polyscope Company.

Although the Princess Theater is considered the best theater, I have a preference for the Orpheum, at least on the exterior work. The Orpheum is not so rich in decorations and not so gorgeously illuminated, but the design of the front is more classic; in other words, it is a better specimen of architecture. As to the interior, the Princess Theater retains the lead, and it is certainly one of the prettiest auditoriums in the country.

The night illumination of the Princess Theater is not a big white glare, but very soft and splendid tinted effects are obtained from the stained glass windows. The effect is so pleasing that I secured the accompanying illustration, hoping the same would interest some of our readers.

The American, a new theater, is another fine specimen of work and at night offers a perfect illusion. The interior is high of ceiling and, although sombre in decorations, is very artistic in appearance. One feature to be mentioned is that the side lamps are shaded in green, giving a very soft glow in the audtorium, no glare in the eyes of the spectators, yet enough light to see each other and to find a seat, without trampling on the corns of their neighbors.

HOW THE VAUDETTE (MILWAUKEE) ADVERTISED A SELIG FILM.

The Princess Theater (Milwaukee) at Night

The Vaudette Theater has an innovation that I cannot pass. It is a sort of Jim Crow car, not to keep the black from the white, but to keep the big hats from obstructing the view of the little man. A number of rear seats are partitioned off by a neat brass railing and are specially reserved for the ladies who do not wish to remove their hats. It was a rather hazardous thing to do, but the manager made up his mind to enforce his new rules and paid no attention to the numerous protests. One single evening he ejected 23 women who insisted on keeping their hats on in seats not provided for this purpose. The 23 women declared they would boycott the Vaudette, but the great attraction of good and well shown pictures decided them to submit to the inevitable and, to-day ,they have rejoined the ranks of the patrons and obediently remove their hats or take the specially reserved seats. When you can persuade a woman to discard her hat to see motion pictures it is a sure proof that the pictures are of the best quality and are shown as they should be.

Milwaukee has another fad that I do not fancy—uniformed women ushers. It is not the work for a young girl. In case of a fire, of a panic, of a fight, etc., what could a girl do? Add more confusion. Can a young girl eject a man for refusing to behave himself? The tall, handsome doorman of the American, in his new uniform, is the man to impress the public that your place is safe in every respect. He is a sort of moral guardian that, in case of some trouble, you have someone able to protect the feeble ones.

Racine was a great disappointment, as I had expected to find in such a nice town a number of good moving picture theaters. It seems that the folks of Racine do not care for motion pictures or that shrewd exhibitors overlooked this spot on the map. The fine looking stores, the flourishing mills and factories are enough of a sign of prosperity to warrant the building of more than one decent moving picture theater. The Orpheum is housed in an old church. The Imperial, the Dreamland and the Palace are mere store shows.

Kenosha.—Although a smaller place than Racine, we count three theaters, the Grand, the Majestic and the Palace. The business has greatly improved and, to quote the manager of the Grand, the better classes are becoming regular patrons now that our manufacturers have improved their productions and purified the subjects.

MUNCIE'S MOST POPULAR THEATER SOLD.

Leroy Tudor Goes to Marion, Ind.

The Majestic Theater, the most popular theater of its kind in Muncie, Ind., was sold by Leroy Tudor to Mr. E. P. Sumption, of Kalamazoo, Mich., and possession was given on April 18. Mr. Tudor has managed this house for the past five years and has built up the business to be one of the best paying houses in the city. In Muncie Mr. Tudor is well known as one of the coming theatrical managers, and the reason for selling the Majestic was that he had another deal on which will put him in charge of two of the largest theaters in Indiana. Mr. Sumption is known in Muncie as he at one time had charge of the Majestic, and the amusement loving people welcome him, as they know that he will always give them the best in amusement. Mr. H. A. Hallman, who has managed the theater for Mr. Tudor for the past year, will remain with Mr. Sumption in the same capacity. The Majestic will be devoted to vaudeville and moving pictures.

CITY OPERATORS AND SHOWS NEED IMPROVEMENT.

By F. H. Richardson.

Last week I had something to say about the work of operators, so Saturday evening instead of going, as is my habit, to one of the big theaters, I started up Eighth avenue intent on visiting the moving picture houses (take 'em as they come) to view the performance set forth by operators. At none of the three houses visited do I know a single soul. I don't know who the owner, manager or operator of any one of them is, so I can't be accused of any personal bias.

The claim may be made that these are not high class representative places. This makes no manner of difference. The theaters visited are patronized for the most part by working people, I believe, and they are justly entitled to as much in exchange for their money as anyone else. More, if anything, since their nickels and dimes are earned by good, hard labor and there are few enough of them to spare for amusement at best.

My first stop was at the Apollo Theater, 308 Eighth avenue. At this house the light was good, in fact excellent, but while its handling might have been far worse, it was far from perfect, there being frequent shadows at top or bottom of the picture. The picture was fully 8 inches too wide for the curtain and it reached above the screen about 4 inches although it was a foot from the bottom. This is exceedingly bad, and should not and would not be tolerated in any house having proper regard for the excellence of its program. The films were run too fast, but I took notice that whenever speed was reduced there was a very unpleasant flicker. This is, of course, out of control of the operator, the fault being in the machine itself, but such a condition operates to utterly ruin the performance. One of the exit lights situate right beside the curtain was so set, and unshaded, that its rays illuminated fully a quarter of the curtain. There is and could be absolutely no excuse under the sun for this, since a shade could be rigged in ten minutes which would entirely eliminate the trouble. One part of the performance which was particularly rank, and existed in each of the three places visited, consisted in the operator running his machine until the film was all out and in the takeup, thus leaving a blank curtain for several seconds before the light was finally cut off. The effect of this is exceedingly unpleasant to the audience, destroys all the illusion and is utterly without excuse. The song slides were fine so far as clearness and brilliancy went and they were fairly well handled, too; but there were many of the omnipresent finger marks which spoiled the effect. The walls of this house were of pressed steel painted a dingy color and utterly without decoration.

I next visited the theater at 352 Eighth avenue. Here I found something unique in that the curtain is located at the street end and between the entrance and exit doors. The films here were junk, pure and simple. Old, rainy stuff which jumped and vibrated something scandalous. There were frequent shadows due to poor handling of the light and the film was run altogether too fast. An exit light right beside the curtain was unshaded and made a red streak on one side of the screen. Three minutes' work would have fixed it. There was a vaudeville turn (that is what they call 'em) which was simply awful. The whole "show" at this house was too fearfully bad to dwell upon. Please understand that it is no pleasant thing to have to speak of a house in these terms, but such a poor show is an outrage on the public and on the moving picture business as a whole. It is for the business as a whole that I am speaking now. For a house of this type I care nothing. It should get exceedingly busy improving things or else go out of business.

Meandering up the street from this place I paid my dime and entered the house at 409 Eighth avenue. In the other two places the patron was left to rustle for his own seat (or be d—d to him, or her. But here I was escorted to a seat by courteous attendants. So far so good. I really hoped I would find things to praise. The house is tastefully decorated and very pretty, and the show as a whole was passable.

ably better than the other two—but it should be, as the admission fee was just double. I looked at the curtain hopefully, but, alas! the figures were jumping around like they were run by an electric current gone crazy. I looked back at the operating booth and could see the handle of the machine. I timed it and seventy-six per minute was the count. There were frequent shadows on the curtain, but for this the operator was not so much to be blamed, since the peephole through which he must watch his picture is one of those little 8x6 jokes, which are no joke to the operator. I thought probably the excessive speed was caused by reason of the Saturday night rush and consequent orders from the manager to "rush it through! Hurry it up, Bill!" No so, however, for at the last end of the show the house was half empty (it was getting on towards 11 o'clock) and the "operator" still stolidly ground out his close-to-eighty-a-minute. In a ten-cent house I had expected to see some new film, but, while I did not remain for the entire show, none was put on while I was there.

Now to sum all this up: In each of the three houses the work of the operator was exceedingly poor. It showed absolutely no pride in his work. It showed laziness or carelessness, or both. In partial justification, however, of the man at No. 352, let it be said that it would have been utterly useless for him to have tried to put on a decent show with the awful junk provided.

As to the manager's end, only in the last house visited was any regard whatever shown for the comfort or convenience of the audience. Here there were courteous ushers, a tastefully furnished interior and a better show as a whole. Still the show, for a ten-cent house, was distinctly poor. The huge mistake, which seems to be universal, consists in the endeavor to run a long show, regardless of, or at least at the expense of, quality. In other words, the managers seem to prefer two junk films run at top speed (and thus made wholly farcical) to one good film properly put on. And let me say right here that, so far as I have observed, New York moving picture theaters are all tarred with the same stick. Of course I've only seen a few of them to date, but some I have seen are supposed to be of the best and the show put on by them, without exception, has in greater or less degree all the faults I have enumerated, viz.: old film, shadows on curtain, high speed and dirty song slides.

"JANE EYRE" FILMED BY THE THANHOUSER CO.

The Thanhouser Company have completed their production of "Jane Eyre" and announce it for release on Friday, May 6. The subject is one of the most ambitious efforts made by an independent manufacturer to date, and the Thanhouser people say that it will surpass their "St. Elmo" film of a month ago, in that it has been produced under better studio conditions and should show the advantages accruing from improved facilities. Miss Marie Flinn portrays Jane Eyre; Miss Gloria Gallop, Georginia Reed; Frank Crane, Lord Rochester; Martin Faust, Uncle Reed; Charles Compton, John Reed; and Amelia Barleon, the insane Mrs. Rochester. The story of the play, which is from Charlotte Bronte's world-famous novel, runs as follows:

Jane Eyre is left an orphan and penniless at the age of fourteen. She is adopted by her uncle, who has ample means of providing for her, and who also loves her dearly. Her uncle's kin, however, consider her adoption an intrusion, and do all in their power to prevent her becoming a member of the family; but her uncle insists on her remaining, and during his lifetime she receives some degree of kindness and consideration. Unfortunately, Uncle Reed dies and leaves Jane without a friend in the world. She is sent to an orphan asylum by her unfeeling aunt. Five years later she leaves the asylum to accept the position of governess to Lord Rochester's little niece. The child is the daughter of Rochester's dead brother. Her mother has become insane and is living in Lord Rochester's home, under his protection. Jane is engaged by Lord Rochester's housekeeper, during his absence from home, and her first meeting with her employer is both exciting and romantic. She is sitting by the edge of the road reading when Lord Rochester rides up to his ancestral home. The sight of his huge dog, coming upon her suddenly, so startles Jane that she jumps to her feet, causing Lord Rochester's horse to shy and throw its rider. He injures his ankle, and has to be assisted to remount by "the little witch," as he calls her, who is the cause of his accident.

One evening the maniac escapes from her nurse and sets fire to the room in which Lord Rochester has fallen asleep. He is saved from a horrible death by Jane. When next Jane's haughty aunt and cousins call upon Lord Rochester, they are just in time to be introduced to his bride, who is none other than the despised Jane Eyre.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Measuring Lenses.—Franklin, La., asks which end of a projection lens should be next the light and which next the wall when measuring focal length? Also asks if measurement should be from point midway of the lens to the wall.

In measuring projection lenses, stereo or moving picture, I usually hold the lens as it would be in the machine, were the wall the lamphouse and the window the curtain. In other words, with the front end of lens next the window or source of light, and with back end towards the wall. Projection lenses are made up of two sets of lenses mounted in a tube at a distance from each other varying with the focal length of the lens. The longer the focal length the greater will be the distance between the two lenses. The first thing I do when I measure a lens for equivalent focus is to mark on the outer surface of the lens tube, or jacket, the point exactly half way between the two lenses. When I have focused the image of the window, or lamp filament (if I use a lamp as source of light), I measure from this mark for "equivalent focus" or from the back side of lens nearest wall to the wall for "back" focus. Dealers and exchanges usually use the "back" focus, while lens manufacturers generally use the "equivalent" focus. In ordering lenses of a given focal length always state whether you refer to "back" or "equivalent" focus. The difference between the back and equivalent focus of any lens will be the back focus plus half the distance between the front and back lenses. Your sketch No. 1 is correct.

Sprung Shaft, or—Dalls, Tex., writes in effect that when his cam wheel sits in position so that the cam pin is horizontal with the shaft, the pin being back of the shaft, the star and cam fit against each other snugly. When, however, the cam wheel is revolved one-half turn so that cam pin is in front of and horizontal with the cam shaft, then star and cam fit each other loosely. Wants to know what is wrong.

A very excellent drawing accompanies the query.

I should say that either your cam shaft is sprung a trifle, your cam wheel is worn out of round or it is not bored central. Any of these conditions is quite possible and would explain the trouble. Which it may be I could not, of course, say without a personal examination of the machine. But you may easily test it out for yourself. The man who can make as excellent a drawing as the one you sent can surely test out for so simple a mechanical defect as this. I am pretty sure you will find the cam wheel bored a trifle out of center.

Insurance.—West Mineral, Kan., writes: "We are in position to secure new and advantageous location but question of insurance seems to bar the way. Kindly inform us as follows: Can we so arrange our lamphouse and wiring as to not increase rate of insurance of other tenants of building, which is a two-story brick? Is there a lamphouse made which will pass insurance company regulations? If so, by whom? We use 125 volts direct current. Would it make any difference if we used 110 alternating?"

I take it that where West Mineral says "lamphouse," he really means "operating room." The National Board of Fire Underwriters have adopted rules for the installation of theaters, which same are, I believe, recognized by all insurance companies, big or little, throughout the country. Moving picture theaters are in operation in all our large cities. In many cases these theaters are in buildings containing merchandise valued at hundreds of thousands of dollars and fully protected by insurance. The great Seigel-Cooper store, in Chicago, containing merchandise worth into the millions, to say nothing about the building, twelve stories high, covering a half city block, runs a moving picture show on one of its floors and thinks nothing of it. The stock is insured, of course, and it is entirely safe to say that there is not one cent advance on account of the motion picture show. But now as to your questions: I see no reason why your rate should be raised, or the rate of any tenant, if you have a fireproof operating room, properly provided with vent pipe and shutters. Line the interior of your operating room with sheet asbestos ⅛ inch thick. Over this put sheet iron, nailing the joints down thoroughly with shingle nails. Cover top, sides and floor thus. From ceiling of operating room run, if possible, a 16 to 20-inch metal vent pipe to the open air, providing same with proper hood at its outer end to prevent rain blowing in and a damper capable of being manipulated by the operator. Now arrange metal shutters, made of about No. 16 sheet iron, to slide up and down in grooves so as to cover all lens and peep holes in the front wall of operating room. Have these shutters work perfectly free and have them held up by tshline strings running through staples or rings and all attaching to a common ring which slips over a nail near the door of operating room. The idea is that, when a fire occurs the operator can by simply pulling the one ring from the nail cause iron shutters to drop over all peep holes and vent holes in the operating room wall. The vent pipe will carry off all the smoke, the iron and asbestos lining confines the fire to the operating room and the shutters complete the safeguard. With such a room you may burn a whole reel, or two of them for that matter, and the audience never know of it. I know of no ready made operating room which would answer your purpose for a permanent plant. Changing from 125 D. C. to 110 A. C. would make no difference. With a properly constructed operating room there is no earthly legitimate reason for any advance of insurance rates on other tenants of the building. I might add that while all city operating rooms are iron lined, few have the vent pipe as above described. Many cities do not even require the asbestos. That is a Chicago requirement.

Weak Carbon Arms.—Washington, D. C., says he is troubled with his carbon arms burning off where the screw which clamps the the carbon goes through the arm. I think Washington is mistaken in saying the arms "burn off." The lamp which goes with the machine you are using has very weak carbon arms and you are by no means the only one complaining of the arms of these lamps breaking. The carbon arms and clamps are too thin—not enough metal to stand the strain. Have a blacksmith make you a set of arms and clamps of steel and you will have no further trouble.

Condenser Lenes.—J. Z., Peoria, Ill., writes: "Am projecting a 10 by 12-foot picture at 100 feet. What size condenser should I have, front and back?"

You have about an 8-inch equivalent focus projection lens and for that you should have very long focal length condenser lenses. In theory you ought to have two 16-inch condensing lenses, but these you could not get, I believe. You should by all means have at least two 8½ lenses, or two 10's, if you can get them. I believe the Kleine Optical Company, 52 State street, Chicago, can furnish the 8½ lenses and I know the Nicholas Powers Company, 115 Nassau street, New York, can. They can be had from the latter company at $1 each. Don't know the Kleine Company's price.

Small Projector.—Last week I answered Belfast, Me., saying I thought his trouble lay in having a "quarter size" stereo lens. Since then he has written giving diameter of lens and my suspicion was correct. Belfast will do well to get a "half size" stereo lens and when he does this his trouble will disappear. In measuring your condenser for equivalent focus you should measure from center line between the two lenses to the wall, not, as your sketch shows, from flat side of lens furthest from wall. I am unable to tell from your measurement what your condensers are. But taking the thickness of your whole lens casing at 3 inches and subtracting 1½ inches and multiplying by 2, it would indicate 6-inch lenses front and back. There is no such lens however, in use, so my guess is wrong somewhere. Probably you have two 6½-inch or one 6½ and one 7½ lens. With a 14-inch stereo lens you would probably have about a 4-inch projection (motion picture) lens and I think you will find two 7½-inch condensing lenses will be about right. I'm guessing at this to a considerable extent and assuming that you are using the same condenser on stereo and motion pictures, but I am safe in telling you to use 7½-inch condenser lenses front and back, instead of two 6½, as per my answer last week.

Another Answer for "Iowa."—V. F. Caler, manager Erie Amusement Company, Erie, Kan., writes: "Have noted inquiry as to what causes light, or white and shadow to follow an actor in a film. Have just run a film, 'The Engineers' Daughter,' which had this same fault. Am positive it is caused by what a photographer calls 'high lights.' In this film whenever the 'villain,' or Lucy or the surgeon came on a high light would appear. Probably it is caused by over exposure or a warm developer. We have the best show in these parts, Kansas City not excepted, which is saying quite a good deal."

A Bundle.—Roxbury, Mass., whom I answered a couple of weeks ago, comes back at me with a bundle of questions too numerous and complicated to quote in full.

Now, look here, old man, I don't know so very much about the Mullen coil, but I showed your proposition to the electrician at the Powers factory and his idea was the same as mine, that the mere change of cycle ought not to affect the operation of the coil. Increased voltage would tend to overheat it and burn it out but I understand you did not do this—increase voltage. Probably we are both wrong about the matter, however. But this I know: the Mullen or any other choke coil is a very bad form of resistance. You may get a "swell light" as you say, though good light from a choke coil is an exception, but its operation is expensive. If I may be allowed to advise, I would suggest the installation of a low voltage transformer, called Indestro, by the Powers Company, Economizer by Hillberg, Mercury Arc Rectifier by the General Electric, Compensarc by the Fort Wayne Electric Works, and other names by other manufacturers. They are all, regardless of name, nothing more or less than low voltage transformers and they are the most economical form of resistance for alternating current. They will pay for themselves in a short time in saving, as against a choke coil or rheostat. As to the condensers cracking: that is absolutely the hardest problem we have to tackle and sometimes it is difficult to tell just what is causing the trouble even when one is right there on the job. From what you say, however, I am inclined to think you have excessive heat in your lamphouse and little or no ventilation in the condenser casing itself. Clean out the screen in top of lamphouse thoroughly and keep it clean. Allow all the ventilation you can while running, but don't allow drafts to strike lamphouse directly when you open it up. That is about all I can say to you. No, a thin condenser is less likely to crack than a thick one. If you can get a better light by setting you carbons straight up and down, or even as good, as by setting them the same as for D. C. you can do more than I can. One-fourth inch, as you have them, is plenty of space between the condenser lenses. There are no condensers guaranteed from breakage. Non-breakable condensers have been advertised, but (take note) they were not guaranteed. Try placing your new lenses in cold water and bringing it to a boil, then letting the lenses stay in the water until it is cold. Personally, I dont think much of it but some good operators swear by it. Try it, anyhow. If you had two rheostats in multiple, one adjustable and one non-adjustable when you cut out a coil of the adjustable there should have been an increase in current. Probably the connections in the rheostat were not made right. That would be the logical answer. I believe Venetian or moss glass would serve the same purpose as the instrument you describe as well, if not even better. I may be mistaken, however. Many thanks for the sketch and description anyhow.

AN EXCELLENT LETTER.

The answer to the Wilkesbarre problem was published last week, but since then there has come a letter of such excellence that we feel it should have space. If Mr. Young ever does really become an operator it is a foregone conclusion that he will be a good one.

Chicago, Ill., April 9, 1910.

Mr. F. H. Richardson:

Dear Sir—On page 521 of to day's issue of The Moving Picture World there is an article describing an experience of yours which you call unique. On reading it I became much interested in it and have set to work to solve the problem. Following is the hypothesis I have evolved from your data:

I shall take for my postulates the data you have given in The World, and add the following: The shutter I presume to be like that of the Pathe machine, with six equal divisions of exposure and darkness, and the machine gives the usual sixteen changes to one turn of the crank.

The basis of the solution I make is, that when the polarity of the crater is reversed at each cycle of the alternating current and becomes negative, the carbon point assumes the appearance and decreased luminosity of the negative carbon of a direct current arc, i. e., the intensity of the light given off by it is diminished. (I do not know whether or not this is true; if it is, my solution is possibly correct; but if it is not, my solution is wrong, and may as well be thrown into your waste basket.) At 60 cycles per second, then, the light from the crater might be diminished and increased at each reversal of polarity, but this variation would be so rapid that the light would seem to be perfectly continuous.

Secondly, with a three-blade shutter, 16 changes per turn of crank, and 80 turns per minute, the number of exposures per second would be very nearly 64 per second, as is readily seen by a simple computation.

Now, suppose that the first exposure occurs at the time of the cycle when the upper carbon is positive, and that the center of the period of exposure and the center of the period of positive polarity coincide. The next exposure would come a very slight time before that point in the cycle, the next still earlier, and so on. At the end of about 15 seconds, the center of the period of exposure would coincide with the center of the period of negative polarity, and the picture would seem to be fainter. From this point, it would increase in brilliancy until the end of another 15 seconds, when the two periods of exposure and positive polarity would again coincide, and so on.

This solution does not account for the irregular wavering, but a slight variation in the timing of the exposures or of the cycles would account for that. Nor would it necessarily prove true in a case where the blades of the shutter are of unequal size, like those of the Selig Polyscope. Also, I have not considered the effect that the neutral periods of the cycle, where there is no voltage, might have. It would seem that these nodes might decrease the luminosity of the arc more than negative polarity, and most at the node following the negative half a cycle. If the arc light does vary at each cycle, and if the number of exposures per second could be made to agree exactly with the number of cycles, and if the period of exposure could be made to coincide with the period of positive polarity of the upper carbon, it seems to me that the effect would be just that of direct current. Would it?

I am not an operator, and know next to nothing of the actual construction of the machines, but I intend to become an operator some time soon. I have been a picture lover for a very long time, and a constant reader of The Moving Picture World nearly as long as I have been watching the pictures, and have gained a great deal of information from it, especially the many interesting articles written by yourself.

Eagerly awaiting the publication of your own solution to this problem, and wishing The Moving Picture World and yourself all success, I beg to remain

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES YOUNG.

STILL ANOTHER ANSWER TO "THE HARD ONE."

Ligonier, Pa., (H. W. Clark) writes: "In answer to the question, 'A Hard One,' in April 2, will say that I think the trouble is in the lenses. I had almost the same trouble and found it was caused by the center lens being cracked in the projection lenses. It was not cracked enough to affect the picture on stationary objects, but blurred on moving objects. If this isn't the case he may have gotten either the center or back lens in wrong, when cleaning them."

CHICAGO NOTES.

The Three Star Slide Company, of this city, is making a number of clever announcement slides for various occasions. The uniqueness and originality of the subjects make them a very popular novelty and already several hundred have been placed in the hands of theater managers and large commercial houses who use them for window display work.

Earl L. Crabb, of the Unique Film Service, has recently released a reel of films vividly portraying the life and dangers of hunters in the wilds of Africa. This film is accompanied by the slides of the hour, which give different views of Col. Roosevelt and his party during their expedition through the dense jungles. The one real feature in this film is due to the fact that animals are seen at close range in their native country, and the lion hunt is made intensely interesting and realistic. The picture actually shows the tracking of these two beasts and the attack and final killing. In one portion of the film the huge king of the forest is shown making an attack on the horse of the hunters, and by force of his spring downs the animal and kills him. There is not a dull moment in the entire picture, which shows every minute detail of the hunt from start to finish, which is the skinning of the beast.

A recent release of Geo. Kleine is an Urban-Eclipse film entitled "Trawler Fishing in a Hurricane," which is one of the most realistic of modern films. The picture is, in a way, educational, as it vividly portrays the life of the fisherman on the stormy "White Sea," showing the use of the trawler net and the enormous amount of fish that are captured by this method. A feature of the film is the stormy scenes in which the little vessel is tossed about on mountains of sea, and a passing vessel is shown rising and falling in the crest of the mighty ocean, and which at times disappears and to all appearances seems lost forever, but again it rises and plows on through the mighty deep.

LANGFORD AND FLYNN PICTURES.

The pictures of the Langford and Flynn contest present a marvel in photography; the pictures are sharp and clear and realistically portray this eight-round knockout bout, preceded by the usual preliminaries in the training quarters. The fight took place on the 17th of March at Jeffries' Arena, Vernon, Cal., and is truly one of the finest fight pictures ever taken. The pictures were made by the Great Western Film Company, under the direction of Sid Hester and B. E. Clements, who find very little trouble in placing this film, as they did the Nelson-Wolgast fight, before the public eye, as exhibitors who are fortunate enough to secure such an excellent production will find that it will prove a most successful venture. A remarkable thing about these pictures is that they are flickerless and clear as crystal, even though they were taken when the atmosphere was inclined to be misty and offered anything but the right kind of light for such work. Like the Nelson-Wolgast pictures, the Langford-Flynn film gives evidence of an expert hand at moving picture photography and bids fair to be set down in the annals of celluloid history as marking an epoch in the progress of the film world to-day. Both of these productions are composed of several reels each and are being sent out on the road under competent managers, accompanied by sufficient paper to properly announce the event to the ever eager fight-loving public.

INDUSTRIAL FILMS.

Their Uses and Popularity.

That the industrial film serves a very important purpose is unquestionably recognized throughout the length and breadth of the land. In the first place, they set forth the actual accomplishment of the industry, showing the securing of the raw material and its manufacture into the finished article, opening up a knowledge of things which are mysteries to nine-tenths of the world and who would not become acquainted with them in any other way because they do not have time, money or opportunity to see them. Hence they are educational and inspirational.

They give ideas of a great many possibilities of trade and commerce which very often shape their minds in the direction for which they are best suited and adapted. They furnish subjects of composition and essay for the school. The industrial question is a very popular one in this direction; it broadens the mind and acquaints people with the knowledge of how the rest of the world make their living, and displays the physical geography and conditions of the world at large. In this country the Vitagraph Company, Edison, Selig, and Essanay have laid themselves out for industrial subjects, which are issued as fast as they can be absorbed.

The popularity of these films as a drawing card for exhibitions is not fully appreciated, particularly in the communities where they exist. A local industry is a matter of great pecuniary and social benefit for the upbuilding of the local interests, very often unfamiliar in all its details to the community benefited thereby. Thousands of persons who have casually heard the matter mentioned and are prohibited from penetrating its several departments by the "No Admittance" injunction, will flock to see an industry set forth on the screen in all its branches. They will take their friends to see them and tell their acquaintances throughout the country to see them, and thus other thousands are prompted to see what their friends and acquaintances are engaged and interested in.

Invariably these industrial films are entertaining and marvellous, surpassing in their wonderful developments stories stronger and stranger than fiction, and in many cases they are revelations of wonderland. We cannot help recognizing the universal importance of the industrial films, and they should be encouraged and developed to the broadest possible scope. While necessarily they may advertise an industry, this phase is merely incidental and does not in any way lessen the value as a subject of vast and far-reaching importance, a necessity, in fact, in selecting a program varied with a Biograph or Vitagraph drama and an Essanay or Lubin comedy.

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

"The Mask Maker" (Pathe).—A strongly dramatic picture which perhaps one would hardly care to see a second time. It depicts death and for that reason may cause one to feel gloomy, even though one may admire the dramatic work on the film. It may, perhaps, be accepted as a striking illustration of the influence of mental suggestion in some instances. The death of the mask maker seems logical, yet one can scarcely repress a shudder, it is so realistic. The acting of the principal characters will create a profound impression; and this will be strengthened by the excellent photography which makes the picture stand out clearly and distinctly.

"Johnny's Pictures of the Polar Regions" (Pathe).—A caricature representing the progress of Peary and Cook toward the pole, depicting by means of sketches which dissolve, one into another, the curious things they saw en route. Upon their arrival they discover the pole comfortably housed in an igloo, with an Esquimau taking pictures at the door.

"Her First Appearance" (Edison).—This is really Richard Harding Davis' story of Van Bibber. In it are given more details of the mother's life than are given in the story, showing why the father cast the mother off. Then comes the appearance on the stage of the daughter and Van Bibber's determination to restore her to her father. Much pathos and sentiment appear here, and the acting is so sympathetic that one involuntarily sides with Van Bibber in his attempt to induce the father to take the girl to his home and heart. And what smiles of satisfaction appear on the faces of the audience when Van Bibber finally succeeds. It is a happy ending to a sad story, and most patrons of the theater will rejoice that the kindly friend succeeds in his purpose. A special cast was made up for this picture, including Robert Connes in the leading role, a guarantee of successful dramatic work.

"The Bad Man and the Preacher" (Essanay).—An interesting picture, representing a scene which might have occurred almost anywhere in the romantic days of the West. Often one has read stories like this and has thrilled with exultation to learn that a typical bad man has been defeated; and when a preacher, supposedly the most peaceful of men, wins an encounter like this, one feels almost like hurling one's cap in the air and yelling one's self hoarse. Much the same impression is made by this picture and the revival of a sentiment of this character will do much to make the picture popular. Acting and photography are alike adequate and the picture is sure to be popular.

"The Mistaken Bandit" (Essanay).—Another Western tale in which a girl plays the heroine and succeeds in guarding a box of money until her father arrives and rescues her and the money from three desperadoes, capturing them as a part of the program. It is one of those thrilling pictures which arouse and hold one's interest. The story is simple, yet the acting is so sympathetic and there is so much life and action depicted that one is almost breathless in watching the girl in her contest with the bandits. The little love story that begins with the incarceration of the unfortunate cowboy adds heart interest.

"Mephisto at a Masquerade" (Gaumont).—A bit of comedy as lively and interesting as its title indicates. What Mephisto might do at a gathering of this sort is shown in a style that cannot fail to amuse whoever may see it.

"Touring the Canary Islands" (Gaumont).—A beautiful scenic reproduction of these islands, giving an accurate impression of the scenery, the people and their industries. The photographic work was done by an operator who knew how to get the most out of the scenes before him, and his work deserves commendation both for its artistic and technical qualities. It is a welcome addition to the list of scenic films which have done so much to bring distant parts of the world to the attention of audiences in motion pictures everywhere. It is the best method of conveying geographical information next to actually visiting the scenes photographed.

"The Pillagers" (Pathe).—A reproduction of scene which might happen in Arabia. Perhaps many like it have happened. The most interesting feature is the acting of the dog who performs intelligent service in tracking the robbers down and then releasing the captive from her bond. The scenery is interesting, in that it represents a comparatively little known part of the world. While the story possesses no novelty it is worked out in an interesting way.

"The Bully" (Pathe).—A picture beginning in a children's quarrel, developing into something serious and a tragedy and ending happily. The character of Elsa is worthy the attention of all who appreciate the development of real heart and soul attributes in dramatic art. Inasmuch as the others are merely accessories, perhaps little need be said about them. Jean is one to be remembered however and his manners and be pleasant.

"The Merry Widow Takes Another Partner" (Vitagraph).—A humorous skit, certain to make a hit with those who like laugh provoking pictures in a program. Like previous comedies produced by this house, the action is lively and there is much novelty in the picture to keep the audience in good humor throughout.

"Thou Shalt Not" (Biograph).—Here is a picture that should arouse thought and at the same time cement with some emphasis the principles which frequently actuate members of the medical profession in their work. While it is not pleasant to see the effects of a disease unpleasant as are graphically depicted, it is far better than to entail suffering upon others as is shown in a late scene. The film is admirably composed and satisfactorily staged, while the photography is clear enough to make it most effective. This picture should be an influential assistant to the health board in every community and help the tuberculosis committee in their laudable efforts to restrict the ravages of the white plague. It is a striking illustration of how a disagreeable subject can, by proper handling, be transformed into an artistic success.

"When the Cat's Away" (Lubin).—A comedy drama played with the spirit and dash characteristic of this house. The picture is well staged and the acting is sympathetic, while the photography is equally as pleasing.

"The Rival Cooks" (Selig).—A comical skit which shows the disturbance caused by a misunderstood telegram. When the reception committee discovers that it was a plain everyday cook and not the great fakir of the North that arrived, disappointment was very vigorously expressed. Perhaps there is a bit of satire here which is intended to show how impossible it is to keep a secret in a small community.

"Mr. A. Jonah" (Selig).—Perhaps the man who has often felt himself a Jonah will be pleased to see a pictorial representation of the true article. At any rate the Selig players have produced a side-splitting comedy under the above title, and the man who fancies himself the most unfortunate of Jonahs can see how a brother of his fared when engaged in the same business.

"Simone" (Pathe).—A pictorial representation of De Musset's well known story. Two lovers wander through the meadows until, at length, they become tired and seat themselves under a flowering shrub. Pascal plucks one of the blossoms and shortly falls dead at Simone's feet. The villagers cast suspicion on her and she places one of the poisonous blossoms betwen her lips and shortly follows her lover. The acting in this picture is worthy of the story it tells. And the scenic excellencies, the beauty of forest and meadow and hillside is clearly depicted, but it is the story which will appeal to a larger proportion of those who see it. It is simple, but so dramatic that it grips one with its intensity. Once seen, this picture will be regarded as a fitting companion to many other dramatic pieces produced by this house.

"The Greenhorns" (Pathe).—A rather rough house picture which represents the results of the united efforts of two vigorous greenhorn servants, who evidently believe they should give evidence of their ability to perform their work by the application of pure muscle. The unpleasant surprise of the employers is the most laughable feature in the film.

"A Case of Identity" (Edison).—A drama of considerable strength, well staged and well acted, with photographic quality quite in keeping with the reputation of the house. The story is well told and the situations are sufficiently strong to hold the interest of the audience from beginning to end. Like many of the Edison dramas, there is a quality to this one difficult to define, yet plainly apparent to every one who sees it.

"A Penitent of Florence" (Gaumont).—A story of jealousy, induced by love, well told and well acted, with photography so good that the pictorial quality aids materially in helping the picture. There is a good deal of dramatic force in the various situations, though probably the one most likely to linger in the memory is the closing scene where the two brothers meet in a church and unite in singing the Alleluia.

Another strong picture is where one son confesses to his mother that he has stabbed his brother and becomes a fugitive from justice. The settings, representing the Florence of old, so far as it can be reproduced, add materially to the attractiveness of the picture. The story in this way conveys information of value to those interested in historic scenes. We advise every exhibitor who can to present this film with the special music that has been prepared for it. Do things classy when you get the chance.

"A Wise Guy" (Essanay).—A comedy full of all the snap and go usually incorporated in the films sent out by this house. One may imagine, perhaps, the difficulties that befall a wise guy of the type dipicted here, but even though they may possess a vivid imagination, they would never conceive more than a fraction of all the complications which might arise. This picture tells the story in snappy action and illustrates it with clear and even photography.

"She Wanted a Bow-wow" (Essanay).—Others have wanted bow-wows to their discomfiture before dog catchers were abroad in the land, but perhaps the difficulties which beset this aspirant for canine possession have never been equalled. Probably the determination of this phase of the subject had better be left to the judgment of the audience.

"Fighting the Iroquois in Canada" (Kalem).—An Indian picture of importance and developed with care. While the representation of an Indian fight may be interesting as a fight, these pictures have a greater value in reproducing scenes in Indian life and illustrating Indian characteristics. Comparatively few who see these pictures ever saw an Indian and the Kalem Company's success in reproducing Indian characteristics is, in a degree, a work of much educational importance, deserving recognition. The accurate reproduction of Indian manners and customs, including dress, arms and the methods of using them are of more than ordinary value and importance. The onlooker little knows of the time and trouble taken by the Kalem producers and scenic artists to delve into the libraries and art museums to get the correct data for these pictures and the accurate dress of the period.

"Othello" (Pathe).—A successful attempt to reproduce one of Shakespeare's greatest plays in motion pictures. Looking at a picture of this character one must recognize the limitations of the motion picture and realize that Shakespeare may suffer more than a drama written especially for the films. On the other hand, certain great qualities, perhaps one might say personal qualities, stand out in strong relief in Shakespeare's tragedies, and here there is no mistaking the lesson which the play itself teaches. To successfully present a drama of this importance argues a company capable of interpreting the great emotions of the human mind. The tragedies represent these emotions so clearly that once seen they can never be forgotten. And here the characteristic of the Moor of Venice, jealousy, is so plainly represented that it impresses one in an oppressive way. If the overmastering emotion or the personality of the principal character be sympathetically developed what the accessory characters do is of little importance. In this play Desdemona and Iago are successively important and it is essential that the parts be well taken. That a play of this character can be so satisfactorily placed on the screen is strong evidence of the progress of the motion picture. More than mere amusement is involved. It enables thousands to become acquainted with great dramatic masterpieces who would never otherwise know about them. One may read them many times, but not until they are produced by competent actors does one comprehend their meaning, or appreciate their marvelous delineations of human passion. To have successfully performed that is sufficient honor; and it has been done in this instance.

"Love's Awakening" (Vitagraph).—A love story built up around the circus ring. That the young doctor loved his patient seems perfectly natural, and while it gives a bit of heart interest to the piece it is not novel. Probably the glimpses of the circus life will prove the feature that will add most to the attraction of this film. One may not care particularly for the love story, but always interest attaches to anything savoring of, or representing, the circus, and this element will go far to make the picture popular.

INDEPENDENTS.

"Ascending the Sea of Ice" (Eclair).—A realistic reproduction of a struggle up a huge ice sea, photographically up to the high standard set by the Eclair people. The operator chose his vantage points well and his film gives evidence of painstaking care in photographing the scenes. The scenic qualities of the picture are well worthy the highest commendation.

"A 29-Cent Robbery" (Thanhouser).—The story of the theft of a toy bank from a child. It is one of those stories that needs the personality of the child to make it interesting. With that it becomes instinct with life and animation, a picture which will appeal by the lovableness of the little girl. Even though the police laugh they decide to get busy on the case, and when they fail the little girl gets to work herself, with better success. The acting is sympathetic and the technical quality is satisfactory.

"Red Wing's Constancy" (Bison).—A picture in which death is rampant, though possibly it is somewhat softened in its effect by the fact that it comes in each instance in a fair combat. Red Wing could have shown her constancy to her cowboy husband quite as well in some other way than in pursuing and killing his murderer, even though that has some justification. The story is quite in harmony with the subject.

"Her Battle for Existence" (Thanhauser).—Perhaps the chief good this picture will accomplish is to show the difficulties which beset an inexperienced girl who undertakes to battle for existence alone. While the picture ends happily through the intervention of a former lover, the end was too apparent to make the picture altogether convincing. As a stimulant to thought, however, along these lines it is a success. The acting is sympathetic and the photography clear.

"The Three Brothers" (Itala).—A picture with some humor representing the pranks of three youngsters who create disturbance in all the ways they can, yet they succeed in purloining the medal of good behavior from the school and upon taking it home are liberally rewarded by their proud parents for their progress.

"In Africa" (Imp).—This house had an opportunity to choose from 10,000 feet of negative obtained in Africa by W. D. Boyce, a Chicago sportsman, who went over the ground traversed by Mr. Roosevelt. The audience is given a fair idea of the marvels which abound there. It is worth while to see the picture, since it shows clearly the wonders of a little known and marvelous land, marvelous because it is little known and its primitive inhabitants have not yet been disturbed. As an outdoor picture it seems reasonably successful, and in most instances the operator seems to have chosen his viewpoints wisely. A detailed description of the various scenes would be tiresome, and after all would mean nothing. One must see the picture with its wealth of life and movement and its glimpses of a distant part of the world.

"The Re-Making of a Man" (Powers).—A picture of dramatic and pictorial quality, developing a number of interesting situations. The story is well told, the acting is sympathetic and the photography clear. Perhaps not all will care for the story, but this might be true of other pictures, too, consequently it need not be used as an argument against this one. In the main it will be liked.

"The Cowboy and the Lieutenant" (Nestor).—Another of those Western dramas which this house has been putting out. This is the reproduction of a historic incident that reached its height in the uprising in which Custer's command was swept out of existence. It is one succession of thrills from beginning to end. It may seem overdone and in a degree there is an impression that not all the scenes could be reproductions of genuine occurrences. The day has passed when exaggeration may be permitted, even when it increases the picturesque features of a film and thereby tries to add to the interest of the story. The cowboys and Indians of this house seem natural and unquestionably they afford a reasonably accurate view of their picturesque and vigorous personalities. The photography has been generally well done.

"Grandpa's Darling" (Lux).—An emotional picture which represents a trusted old servant accused of a robbery, saved by a child. The picture tells a simple story without being heavy or especially informing. If it amuses it performs all it is expected to do.

"The Heart of a Vagabond" (Ambrosio).—The story of a tramp turned away from house after hause, risking his life in the rescue of the son of a rich miller who but shortly before had treated him with especial severity. Two questions will suggest themselves when one sees this film: Was the boy at the house when the tramp asked for food at the miller's? If he was, how did he reach the mountain ahead of the tramp so as to fall over the precipice into the snow? If he wasn't at the house how did the tramp recognize him as the son of the rich miller, who had so recently turned him away? These points may be clear to most people, but the writer confesses to an inability to see them plainly.

"Petit Jean, Louis d'Or & Co." (Ambrosio).—A comedy from this house which offers some amusing features and creates a few laughs for the manager. It leaves those who see it in good humor.

"Down in Mexico" (Actophone).—The writer does not remember having seen a picture from this house before, and was interested in the action which was injected into this one. The same objection applies to it which has been raised before, the abduction of a girl and her struggles in the hands of a villain, which in this is intensified by the obvious purpose of the abductor. There is some good, strong action when Tony rides after the carriage and rescues the girl. And the half humorous method of dueling by eating one of three pills supposed to be poisoned supplies a novel climax. And the abductor gets his deserts when all turn in and kick him about the place. Technically the film is good—and the work worthy of a better motif.

NOTES FROM FILM MANUFACTURERS.

ESSANAY NOTES.

Essanay's "The Stolen Fortune" a Comedy Masterpiece.

The Essanay Company's release for May 4, "The Stolen Fortune," is the fourth of a series of big comedy pictures which are vastly increasing the reputation of this firm for distinctive comedy productions. Their first big release, "An Interrupted Honeymoon," has undoubtedly proven one of the most popular comedy films released this year, while "His Hunting Trip" and "Their Sea Voyage," both released, are feature films which should not be overlooked by any exhibitor.

"The Stolen Fortune" tells of a young chap who inherits a large fortune from an uncle whom he has known little about. On the strength of his good luck he becomes engaged to a wealthy young society girl, trusting that the bulk of the fortune, which is withheld from him for six months, will be delivered to him in due time. Upon the expiration of six months he is given a note from his uncle intending him not as not the rightful heir, that the uncle had come by his money from an invention he had stolen from a Pole, one Max Huski, and further he asks that his nephew make search for Huski and deliver into his hands the fortune. The knock is a great one for the young man, who realizes that his engagement to the society girl must be broken. Following this he advertises for Max Huski and immediately a great swarm of Jews, Poles, and in fact representatives of nearly every nationality call upon him, each individual claiming to be the rightful heir to the fortune. The situations which follow are extremely ludicrous. He is hounded day and night by the Huskis, but is unable to secure correct proof from any of them. He is about to give up the task as a hopeless job, when his uncle's attorney makes an appearance and declares that no Max Huski exists, that he has been the butt of a joke, perpetrated by his eccentric uncle, who desired to make sure that his nephew would be found worthy of the fortune.

This film will undoubtedly prove one of the most satisfying comedy films released in a long time. The idea is big and wholesome. The comedy is extremely good and true to life. The acting will be found all that can be desired.

The Essanay Company certainly deserve the title "Finders of Lost Men." It might be profitable for them to advertise something like this: "Have you a brother or sister whom you have lost track of? We will find them. Watch our films!" Jean Robinson, who is in Denver, learned his brother William is in Los Angeles, Cal., after having viewed the Essanay Aviation film, made at Los Angeles. They had been separated 20 years and thought each other dead. A similar story, which is going the rounds of the press, is that Mrs. J. Elliott Cochran, of Washington, Pa., saw in the Essanay Company's film, "World Baseball Series," between Pittsburg and Detroit, her brother, Wilford Tedford, whom she had lost track of. The youth had run away from home several years ago, had gone West, then returned to Pennsylvania, locating in Pittsburg, where he had married. The sister took up the search and found her brother.

Miss Martha Spier, the Essanay Company's new leading lady, had her first experience in moving pictures, in a big dramatic subject made in the Chicago studios last week. She expressed herself as delighted with the work. Announcement of the release of this big subject will be made later.

G. N. Anderson and his Western picture crew, in Colorado, are contributing more splendid Western films, which show they are taking advantage of the scenic opportunities where they are working. Practically these subjects are masterpieces, while the good acting and dramatic qualities of the pictures, with the excellent photography, are maintained at their high level.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Talking pictures as well as moving pictures are the latest advancement at the Vitagraph studio, not a mechanical invention but a real bunch of back talk who gives the directors and actors as good as they send whenever they get too funny. This latest addition has become the pet and mascot of the studio and will make its first appearance on the screen in June. It's a bird with a Hebrew cast of features and wears the Irish colors.

What is worth having is worth knowing. Do you know that "One of the Finest" or "One Good Turn Deserves Another" on May 6 is not only one of the finest but one of the best issues you can have? It is a dramatic phase of life in a great metropolis, showing the dangers encountered by the members of the police force in the protection of life and property. One good turn deserves another is shown in the gratitude and bravery of a poor little waif for the kindness extended to her by a finely hearted officer.

The best is none too good, and here it is "Mazie's Swan Song" on May 7. A glimpse of seraphic soulfulness through the life and love of a child musician and the devotion of his old father. If you want to arouse the heart interest of your audience and awaken their human sympathies, here is a chance to give them what they want. They like their hearts stirred as well as their risibles.

"Capital vs. Labor" has been heard from. It has taken big. Some people wrote from Philadelphia to the "Little minister" in the picture: "Can't you come to Philadelphia and settle some of our troubles? You certainly can do things as well as preach them. You are a favorite with our bunch."

SELIG NOTES.

The "Angelus" promises to be one of the best of the season. The [illegible] is an ideal one and the [illegible] and attention given the [illegible] of the reverent hour that tends to mould pious and [illegible] as the strictest system.

The Selig second team left the La Selig Street studio for the great Southwest last Sunday at 6 P. M., carrying the strongest motion [illegible] sent out by a picture concern. The paintings will be under the [illegible] of Professor Gaskins, assisted by trick riders, rocking [illegible] and steeds, cowboy horses and paraphernalia, Indians, chief and [illegible], cowboy and theatrical department. The tour will last until the Summer and is to be the most expensively equipped [illegible] ever sent out by a studio of pictures and great things are expected. Not only expected but absolutely guaranteed.

The Selig Company, noted for their aggressive movements in the picture line, again prove their ability to land the spot beside on the knob. They were prompted by the earnest appeal of some of the most prominent exhibitors for a really first-class picture representing the "Bunco" in motion pictures. We were the first to decide upon furnishing the market with this particular picture, but thinking prevented us to yield to the entreaties of our friends and consequently arrangements were quickly made and the entire National Printing force put to work and turned out ten thousand [illegible] one-sheet posters in five days, setting a world's record for any [illegible] from a single subject. The poster is from a direct scene in the play and [illegible] a modified sense of correctness.

A gigantic production of a notable play, "The First Born," [illegible] produced on a monumental scale by David Belasco and bearing the [illegible] his direction, comes the challenge of holding the record for the longest run ever accorded a dramatic production in Boston, playing to [illegible] for seven weeks. Richard Bennett, who was a member of the original cast, is now with the Selig forces and will be seen in the old part. "The First Born" is the greatest Chinese play ever written.

Foreign agencies to handle the Selig products are now being established in Berlin, Germany; St. Petersburg, Russia; Hongkong, China; Sydney, Australia; Johannesburg, South Africa, and Rio Janeiro, South America. The [illegible] made with the Selig syndicate has proven to be a most [illegible] one, with the present plan especially, running night and day so that it [illegible] to fill the orders. In connection said buildings are now being [illegible] soon will be the most extensive picture plant in the world.

LUBIN MFG. CO.

"This is a true story" is the big [illegible] frequently accompanies the [illegible] picture announcement, for whatever methods we may know true as a rule [illegible] enough in itself to dazzle the story with a romantic effect, but in [illegible] case writer believes that the other day when we offer to the Lubin [illegible] to sell the story of his life for $25.00. Judging from their [illegible] it was worth the money, but the purchase was not made.

One of the Lubin players had part of his face burned off the other day through lack of care in posing with a recreation scene. A mock [illegible] was tied to the stake and the fire [illegible] began [illegible] film stopped running and the director's attention was [illegible] Lubin man's either. On [illegible] it was quite a while [illegible] "Not on your life" was the prompt reply. All the [illegible] in the [illegible] if they have any more stories like "The Cowboy's Devotion."

About four and a half reposes of "The Master Mechanic," one of the Lubin releases early in May, is taken up with scenes in a factory, but the brief showing was picturesque and many hours were occupied for nearly a day and a half in running over scenes and making suggestions that the scenes might be taken to the natural beauty instead of against painted backgrounds.

Already "When the Circus Comes" has proved its popularity and orders for extra prints are coming in from the exhibitors with startling celerity for only one or two reels. Many ordered extra prints to exhibit the night after the exhibitors created the demand for the subject. Another [illegible] a hit "A Hot Time in Atlantic City" was, and the new Atlantic City release is even better.

Something different from the usual Bunnyisms presents in "Mrs. Nagg's," a part of the Lubin release for May 2. In this a modern exploit the leading comedy character with [illegible] effect and some [illegible] funny scenes are shown. Some trick effects counter the fun, but the arrangement of incidents is admirable through to gain the most comedy [illegible].

"The Miner's Sweetheart," which is the Lubin release for May 7, was originally planned for a [illegible] release and was postponed [illegible] September. At the start it was a [illegible] and those [illegible] because of studio [illegible], but [illegible] and about everything else [illegible] happen to a motion picture, but the fourth try brought success and from every point of view the present production is highly successful.

CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL FOR OPERATORS.

We congratulate Mr. F. C. Taylor, of the Taylor School for Moving Picture Operators, 49 West 28th street, New York City, on putting into practice a good idea; one, too, that is thoroughly valuable and likely to benefit those on whose behalf the details of the scheme have been thought out. It is a correspondence school for operators. Mr. Taylor has shown us a detailed syllabus of the lessons he proposes giving his correspondents, together with a set of illustrations of the electrical, optical and mechanical sides of projection work.

This correspondence course has been thought out with great judgment. It is easy enough for men of fair intelligence to profit by it. Our work in the production of the Moving Picture World brings us in touch with large numbers of moving picture operators whose knowledge of the underlying theories and principles of their work is, as a rule, very small. Time after time we meet apparently good men who can show a nice picture when everything is working smoothly—when all is plain sailing with the machine—but the moment a little difficulty, irregularity or uncertainty occurs they are hard put to it to get out of their trouble. Now, a knowledge of first principles which so many despise would put them right. We have a very high regard for practical work, but we have an equally high regard for first principles and underlying theories, which the average moving picture operator unfortunately despises.

Let the operator at a distance who is unable to attend Mr. Taylor's school personally, join this correspondence class. If he knows little or nothing about the subject, he can supply the deficiency by this course. If he is already working and wants his knowledge brushed up, he can do it by means of this correspondence class. If he thinks, rightly or wrongly, that he is thoroughly qualified, thoroughly competent and has nothing more to learn, let him take this course and see if, after all, he is right in his own estimate of his knowledge and abilities. None of us is perfect, not even the youngest of us, to paraphrase a well-known remark. The inefficiency of the operator is a constant theme in the pages of the Moving Picture World. Taylor's Correspondence School should help diminish this state of affairs. We wish Mr. Taylor every success in his work and we will bless him if he will make every operator in the land a good man at his game. For then we should be happier, writing about more congenial aspects of the moving picture than the deficiency of that unspeakable enemy of the picture, the inefficient operator.

THE LEN SPENCER LYCEUM—ITS SCOPE AND ITS FUTURE.

An Interesting By-Path in the Moving Picture Field.

Twenty-eighth street and Broadway has very much the character of our own Twenty-third street, and also Fourteenth street namely that of being somewhat of a center in moving picture matters. On Twenty-eighth street we have such notable businesses as the Taylor School, the Imperial Film Exchange and others. Hereabouts, at one time, song writers, music publishers and others who cater for public entertainment had their offices and business premises. So that when the moving picture industry began to take definite shape it was only natural for those who engaged in the business to go to a street that was already identified with the business of entertainment.

But if we read the signs of the times aright, Twenty-eighth street will ere long be shorn of some of its moving picture glory. All the tendency is for the business to concentrate itself in or about Twenty-third street and Fourteenth street. And amongst those lately established on Twenty-eighth street who have recently made the change is Mr. Len Spencer, of Lyceum fame. Mr. Spencer's business is unique in its way. It is one of the most important businesses in the New York moving picture field and yet, oddly enough, it does not directly concern itself with moving pictures. Mr. Spencer deals in practically everything but the film. When we say "deals," we do not mean in respect of handling goods—we mean people. Mr. Spencer handles the people who contribute the entertainment part of moving picture theaters. Should a pianist be required, Mr. Spencer supplies him. If a pianist needs coaching, Mr. Spencer coaches him. Equally so, if a singer wants a position, Mr. Spencer will find it for him; or if an exhibitor is in search of a singer Mr. Spencer is willing to oblige. Songs, song slides, musicians, singers, vaudevlle performers—all these have their names on Mr. Spencer's books.

We took a peep into the biggest book in Mr. Spencer's office, 46 East 14th street, and there, carefully indexed, were the careers, as it were, of a whole host of entertainers for the moving picture public. The Len Spencer Lyceum is, in short, the greatest intermediary between the performer or the would-be performer and the theater. Spencer's clients include hundreds if not thousands of moving picture theater exhibitors and round about the same number of entertainers. As we have said, it is a unique business, probably the largest agency of its kind in existence. The result is that Mr Spencer has been forced by the demands on his time and attention and for lack of space, to take new premises on Fourteenth street, right in the center of what is commonly known as "Moving Picture Row." We have no doubt that his business will grow. He is an indispensable factor in the moving picture field. Experienced, judgmatical, willing and obliging, an excellent type of the agent.

There is one little suggestion that we want to make to Mr. Spencer and it is this: that he should enlarge the scope of his business, which, as we have already pointed out, is of a comprehensive kind, dealing with every branch of the entertainment, except the film, offered in moving picture theaters. Time after time we have lamented the fact that good moving picture lecturers are scarce. In fact, at the present moment in New York City we do not know of any lecturer on the moving picture stage whom we care to hear twice. Now we put it to Mr. Spencer that here is a scope for the development of his business, namely, the coaching of lecturers and the obtaining of them for service in moving picture theaters. We believe, in fact we are sure, that hundreds of moving picture exhibitors would be only too glad to avail themselves of some means of getting hold of competent lecturers for their theaters.

WILLIAM STEINER IN HIS NEW INDEPENDENT EXCHANGE.

The inevitable has happened, as the inevitable always does, and always will. It is commonly said that the hour brings forth the man and a study of history, either of national or business affairs, reveals this to be not merely a fact, but a truism. All the talk for the last year on the Independent side of the making and selling of moving pictures has been for a Moses. But Moses has at present not eventuated. We think that he is a long way off, and is likely to remain there. Just plain, straightforward, fair dealing business men are needed on the Independent side to give that branch of the moving picture industry credit and esteem. And it is singular to reflect how few there are that answer to this description. There is, first of all, Thomas D. Cochrane; there is—there is—, and now there is William Steiner, a prince of hard workers, a prince of good fellows, and a prince, above all, of men who have confidence in themselves—the best of all attributes.

The other evening, before writing this article, we crossed the Rubicon—meaning Fourteenth street—and two blocks down on our favorite Fourth avenue we looked towards heaven, and in looking towards heaven saw the name of "William Steiner," his very own name, on his own building, on his new offices, for the renting of moving pictures. We said to ourselves: "This man is all right, because he has faith in himself."

Personalities count for much in the moving picture game. It seems superfluous for us to commend William Steiner to the suffrages of the Independent field. It is good, it is right, that the Independent field, which hitherto has been weak in personalities, should attract such a powerful personality as that of William Steiner. Anybody reading the Moving Picture World consecutively for several months past knows that our policy is for the good of the picture. We like strong men, we like combative men, we like fighting men; frankly, we do not care a hang whether they are licensed or independent, so long as their motive is for the making and selling of the moving picture.

There must be, as we said in these pages a few weeks ago, and always will be, a licensed and an independent side. Hitherto the licensed side has been well organized, the independent side has not. Now the independent side receives a fine accession of strength in the vigorous personality of William Steiner, who has the pluck and the self-confidence to put his name on the front of his building. The new Imperial Film Exchange is to be rather more than a center for distributing moving picture films. It is to the credit of Mr. Steiner that his mind does not run in a groove. For example: His new business not merely supplies films to the exhibitor, but gets into direct personal touch with him and tells him how to run his business. It is not merely an exchange in the conventional sense of the term; it is rather an exhibitors' supply house. The exhibitor can get everything that he needs or wants at 110 Fourth avenue. What the average exhibitor of the United States mostly wants is telling how to conduct his house; he needs telling how to advertise his business; what sort of printing he should have; what sort of painted signs he should put up in front of his house; what sort of posters. In other words, the William Steiner exchange of 110 Fourth avenue will tell the exhibitor how to run his business from the printing and advertising standpoint.

WILLIAM STEINER.

Steiner has the talent on the premises who will do this for them: experienced exhibitors like William Steiner himself, who has been through the game, who has made pictures, shown pictures, advertised pictures. We are sorry to note the departure of William Steiner from the licensed side, but we are glad to see, and so will every right-thinking business man be glad to see, that while the licensed side loses a good man, equally so, the independent side, which is weak in effective personalities, has got such a fine recruit as William Steiner. He has already started in to buy the entire independent output, and he says that if he cannot get all the pictures he needs, he will make them. So pin your faith to 110 Fourth avenue and its hustling proprietor.

A PLAY WITHOUT A VILLAIN.

It seems second nature that a playwright, in laying out his dramatis personæ should make first arrangements for his hero and villain; this seems the first order of things—that the good should combat against the evil. Especially is this the case among writers of moving picture scenarios, where such little time is allowed for the development of a plot that all of the story picture (particularly dramas) are bound to have the inevitable hero, in divers shapes, forms and manner, ultimately conquer the villain, and incidentally win the girl, papers, reward, his freedom from prison, or his life. It is not written, however, that man has fought man in order to do him a good turn. Mentioning it as a mere incident, it sounds preposterous that one man should administer a knockout blow to the other, only to lift him bodily and carry him back to the waiting arms of a girl he loves, yet, that is only one situation in a picture play that has no villain in it—"Two Men," the "Imp" release for Monday, May 2. It is a very deep but graphic character portrayal of two individuals who want to sacrifice one for another, and, strange to say the winner loses—the girl!

The Peerless Film Exchange, formerly of 129 Sixth avenue, New York City, have removed to more central and spacious offices at 91 Fifth avenue, near Fourteenth street, in the heart of the moving picture business. Mr. Chas. Pesser, manager of the exchange, states that they are shortly to join the N. I. M. P. A. and will purchase all independent releases which, with their large stock of supplies, will put them in a good way to command a large portion of the independent trade.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PLAGUE OF BULLETINS.

To the Editors:

Dear Sirs—I wish to express the general view taken, by the exhibitor, of the matter of bulletins such as are at present being issued by the film manufacturers, and also the circulars of the exchanges. We are required to read each and every one of these in order to gather a small part of the news and general information that can be gained through the trade papers, and I cannot see the necessity of the accumulation of these booklets; this we would have to do in order to find time to read them, for our time is very limited.

To vividly portray the inconvenience one is liable to be put to, I will cite an incident which happened at my theater not long ago. I was busy in the house, which was crowded and needed my attention, when the City Fire Inspector made an unexpected appearance and ordered me to have my office cleaned up and to have a large bundle of literature disposed of or close my show. I was compelled to leave the house in order to personally dispose of these bulletins, which I was saving for my week's information. This not only caused me a loss of time, but gave my house a suspicion in the fire department's eyes that will be very hard to overcome.

I would appreciate it very much if you could give space to this letter, which expresses the feeling of the exhibitor in regard to this matter of literature. I am enclosing a cartoon, which will give some idea, in picture book form, just how we feel about receiving these circulars.

Hastily,
AN EXHIBITOR.

"ELECTRA" PRAISED BY EXHIBITORS AND PRESS.

Lima, Ohio, April 20, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World,
New York City.

Dear Sir—In regard to your editorial upon "Elektra on the Screen" and your request for exhibitors' opinions on the film, I am enclosing you an editorial clipping from one of our leading daily papers, "Republican Gazette," of April 14, 1910, which expresses my opinion of the film without any exaggeration; and I, too, think the Vitagraph Company have made very rapid strides in the past few months and consider their pictures in the front ranks. The only objections I have to any of their work in any line is their title posters. The public does not seem to take to them. There is too much of a sameness and it causes confusion even with the regular patrons. For if they do not stop to read the title they often pass them by, thinking they have seen them, as they all look alike unless you stop and look them over. I am often obliged to bring them in from the front. I have been an exhibitor for several years and have been a very careful reader of your Moving Picture World, and agree with you as to your idea of running a strictly moving picture show and no vaudeville; also in regard to having the music to suit the picture. This, in my opinion, is very essential. Another important point: I am very much in favor of running good films more than one day. For instance, I ran "Elektra" three days to most refined and intelligent audiences and good receipts, although we all change one reel of pictures each day, holding one over the second day. This, I believe, covers all the points for the present. With all good wishes for the success of your paper and the business in general, I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,
W. B. GANDY,
"Dreamland Theater.

P. S.—Lima has a population of about 40,000.

(From the Lima, Ohio, Republican-Gazette, Thursday Morning, April 14, 1910.)

ELEKTRA.

The Greatest Motion Picture Ever Shown in Lima.

This Grecian Tragedy Is Superbly Acted and Mounted—Do Not Miss It.

It is no exaggeration to say that in "Elektra," now being shown in Dreamland, the people of Lima have an opportunity to see the greatest motion picture ever exhibited here, and one of the most impressive yet produced by any of the companies which are spending millions in the elaboration of picture-drama. This particular film is a creation of the famous Vitagraph Company.

"Elektra" swings imagination back to ancient Greece, to the heroic days of King Agamemnon and of the Trojan King Priam. It deals with the tragic results of jealousy, hatred and awful retribution. It is the theme used by Richard Strauss in his greatest opera.

Agamemnon returns in triumph from Troy, bringing Priam's beautiful daughter, Cassandra. The Queen, impelled by a jealousy craftily inflamed by her lover, kills the King. His daughter, Elektra, and son, Orestes, swear vengeance over Agamemnon's bleeding corpse.

ANOTHER EXHIBITOR HEARD FROM.

New Orleans, La., April 19, 1910.

The Moving Picture World, New York.

Dear Sirs—I have read your article on "Elektra," in this week's World. We ran this picture for four days and many of our patrons came back to see it over again. It has created more favorable comments than any dramatic subject we have ever exhibited; the audience actually applauded as they would in a real play. We also ran the Life of Moses series for eight days to record business. We used the entire five reels in a series and used both piano and organ for musical effects, used the organ behind the screen and had our vocalist to render the "Holy City" as Moses ascends the mountain to die, and blended the song into the "Rock of Ages" at the finish, which got a hand every time. We are now running the Roosevelt in Africa picture to packed houses. We feature Biograph subjects every Tuesday and Wednesday, and Vitagraph and Pathe subjects on Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Some time ago we featured the Edison film, "The President's Special," using the sound effects which we always do, and ran it for an entire week, changing the other subjects Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday, as usual, to capacity houses. I don't see why the manufacturers do not get out more "effect" subjects such as "The President's Special," as they are always popular and we always make a feature of our effects and music. We have a very fine pianist, who studies every subject, and "the music fits the picture." The Biograph subjects are very popular at our theater, although we use all the different releases, using four reels to a program and changing three times weekly. I think the greatest mistake many managers make is in changing their pictures every day, as the subjects that the different manufacturers are getting out now will nearly all stand at least a two days' run: some of them don't run a good picture long enough to create an interest. The class of patrons we have are made up of the best people in the city, and some of them never go to any other picture theaters. The Shubert has a seating capacity of 1,700 and is considered the finest theater in New Orleans, devoted exclusively to moving pictures. We used vaudeville with the pictures for a short time last Summer, but it injured our business and we cut it out, and are now showing only pictures. Industrial subjects are very popular and we always include them in the making up of our programs. We read everything in the "World" and think it is the only paper for the exhibitor, as there are always good suggestions that are very profitable to us all.

Yours very truly,
J. M. DUBBS,
Manager the Shubert Theater.

[This man says a good word for us, but that is not why we print his letter. It is indeed gratifying to know that our preaching is being intelligently followed in some cases. We want to call especial attention to the statement, "The subjects that the different manufacturers are getting out now will nearly all stand at least a two days' run." Turn this over in your minds—manufacturer, exchange manager and exhibitor—especially as of the daily change craze. We will revert to this subject again.—Eds. M. P. W.]

A LESSON IN CHRISTIAN CHARITY

"Let he that is without sin cast the first stone." This is the moral taught by this Biograph story The old priest at the mission is grieved at the negligence of the people in refraining from attending church services. They are either too much taken up with business or seekers of pleasure. His assistant a young priest, determines to follow the Master's footsteps and go among the people. He then learns the extreme selfishness and lack of christian charity, particularly when he finds the very ones who have caused a poor unfortunate young woman's downfall the first ones to crush her deeper into the morass of woe. His kindness, however, awakens in the girl a true spirit, and she, kneeling at the feet of the priest, determines to spend the rest of her life in penance. The scenes of this production are laid at the historic San Gabriel Mission in Southern California.

UP A TREE

A BIOGRAPH COMEDY OF INCIDENTS

Jake, a young country lout, comes into possession of a ladder, and plans to have some fun. Placing the ladder against a tall tree, he climbs up and lodges his cap in the branches. Descending, he waits until an old farmer appears, when he begins to cry that his cap is in the tree, and pretending lameness, asks the farmer to get it. Well, he takes away the ladder leaving the farmer treed. This trick he repeats several times with success. Among his victims are a pair of lovers, who have quarrelled. They are the only happy victims as they settle their tiff while treed. Still the worm will turn, and finally when the victims get together and catch Jake, they carry him to the top of a tall tree and leave him there to think it over on this elevated stool of repentance.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

UP A TREE.—The colloquialism "up a tree" is a metaphor for "in a difficulty, in a mess," etc. But the victims in this story were up a tree both metaphorically and actually, but there was one of them made so happy that this one event in a measure might condone the perpetrator for his misdeed. Jake, a verdant country lout, comes into the possession of a ladder and plans to have some fun. Placing the ladder against a tall tree, he climbs up and lodges his cap in two branches. Descending, he waits at the foot, and when an old farmer appears, Jake begins to blubber, crying that his cap is in the tree, where he tossed it after a bird, and, pretending lameness, he beseeches the farmer to get it. Up the farmer climbs and dislodges the cap, but when he attempts to descend he finds that Jake has removed the ladder. He is "treed" and no mistake. This trick worked so well, that Jake is encouraged to try it again. This time his victims are a couple of lovers who have quarreled. The beau in a huff, refuses when the sweetheart suggests he get the boy's cap, so she to shame him climbs up herself. Fine! The lover follows, paying Jake to do the very thing he intended—remove the ladder. Of course, the girl is wild, but the lover is in his element. Here they are "treed" side by side on the limb. Same thing happens, only Jake drives off in the wagon to find another easy mark, which he does in the person of a Jew carrying two live chickens. Jake has visions of a chicken pie, but his dream fades for the Jew carries the birds up the ladder. Further on Jake sells the horse, wagon and ladder to a painter for four dollars. Cheap, of course, but it is velvet to him. With the money he goes to the summer garden restaurant and purchases four dollars' worth of May wine. Meanwhile, the man with the wagon has retraced the route taken by Jake and comes upon the treed ones. All are anxious to be rescued but the young lover, who spurns their assistance until his sweetheart accepts him, which she finally does. The victims then band to wreak vengeance, and fortune soon favors them, for along comes Jake, their persecutor, lame from head to feet. They pounce upon him, and after administering chastisement, carry him up into one of the trees, where they leave him to think it over.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD.—The old priest is deeply grieved over the empty church, when his young assistant decides to follow the Master's footsteps and go among the people as an example. Donning civilian garb, he goes out into the world to work in the fields. Here he learns the extreme thoughtlessness and selfishness of humanity. There are the two classes—the money seekers and the pleasure seekers. The former are shown in the fields and store houses, each struggling for himself unmindful of the condition of his neighbor, all driven by an unreasonable employer. The latter class is seen spending their time in a dance resort. The first have a standard of morals dependent upon their success in life, while the others have no standard of morals whatever, for the simple reason that they know no better. The young priest, lineg, becomes a worker at the storehouse, dispensing his earnings in charity, while endeavoring to plant the seed of righteousness in the hearts of his fellow laborers, but his endeavors are met with derision. He is almost on the point of giving up when the dance resort is raided by the police and the women of the place flee in a panic, with the exception of one, who turns to the ones who brought her there for protection. Ah, but how like the world, they not only turn from her, but even assist in her ejection from the place and follow her tauntingly down the road, their crowd augmented by many curiosity seekers until there is a howling mob at her heels. At this moment the young priest appears and driving off her persecutors, leads the poor unfortunate Magdalene away to find some place of healthy safety for her, but again the world shows it unchristian spirit by refusing to receive her. Hopeless, the young priest makes his way back to the mission where he tells the old pastor that "They receive me not." He has hardly uttered the words when the girl appears and prostrates herself before the two holy men to ask their prayers for God's grace, determined to spend the rest of her life penitentially. The old father turns to the young curate and exclaims: "Not in vain if one soul is saved." The scenes of the production are laid at the historical San Gabriel Mission, California.

FLAT FOR RENT.—As the story goes, Mr. U. R. Beaten, a real estate agent, calls on one of his tenants, Mrs. Flat-Dweller, with a newly written lease, asking her if she will sign up for another season. But Mrs. Flat-Dweller has resolved to make a move, the flat she is now occupying is too dark and there are other inconveniences besides the rent being too high. Mr. Beaten argues, but she is persistent. Finally, Mr. Beaten gives in, but states that he will have to place a "Flat to Rent" card in the window. After some argument, Mr. Beaten is permitted to place the card in the window and close windows.

The trouble starts immediately when Mrs. Shuffle Brown, a very haughty dame, enters desiring to look at the flat. Mrs. Shuffle Brown is by no means desirable in contemplating examining Mrs. Flat-Dweller's furniture and is finally ejected out by the latter when her comments become too pointed.

Mrs. Flat-Dweller is hardly seated again when Mr. and Mrs. Newlywed ask permission to look at the flat. Their gushy lovemaking exasperates Mrs. Flat-Dweller, who is finally forced to remind them that if they desire to see the flat to quit the billing and cooing and attend to their business.

After the Newlyweds have left Mrs. Flat-Dweller resolves to tear the sign out of the window but is interrupted again by the clamor of the street door bell. She opens the door to Mr. and Mrs. Levinsky with three or four smaller Levinskys and also the Levinsky dog. The younger Levinskys begin to make themselves perfectly at home by climbing over Mrs. Flat-Dweller's furniture and starting a row with the dog. Isaac has an awful time in subduing his children as they are led from the room by Mrs. Flat-Dweller, who is forced to continually reprimand the playful youngsters. In the end she finds it necessary to order the family out of the house. When this is accomplished she pulls the "Flat to Rent" card from the window and beats it to bits.

Mr. U. R. Beaten appears now and finds the card has been taken from the window. He enters and demands furiously that he be permitted to place another card in the window. She refuses. They quarrel and soon come to blows, he endeavoring to protect himself from the fury of the housekeeper. Overturning furniture, smashing vases and statuettes they make the circle of the room. A policeman hearing the cries of the frightened landlord, enters through the window and separates the two. In the name of the law he arrests them for disturbing the peace and orders them to go with him to the station. The whipped agent hesitates and on bended knee asks for just one favor, that he be permitted to place his "Flat to Rent" card in the window. This is granted and the real estate agent with a smile of triumph on his face is led off with Mrs. Flat-Dweller to tell the judge about it.

THE LATEST IN GARTERS.—Trixie Sweet, a pretty society miss, receives a letter and a parcel from an old-time chum in gay Paree. The parcel contains a new style of garter—"the bell garter"—and the letter states that in Paris, as we have expressed above, it is "all the noise." Trixie tries them on. Then to the tinkling of the many little bells, she dances about the room.

Unmindful of the consequences, Trixie resolves to wear the garters on a little trip down the street. She has not gone far before she has quite a following of curious masculines, and is finally forced to seek shelter and hiding in a doorway until the mob has passed by.

A trifle frightened, Trixie hurries back home and is joined shortly by her chum. They have great fun with the garters and finally the chum suggests that they give a little party, and, in inducing the lady guests to wear the new garters, thus popularize them.

The day of the party arrives and the lady guests are induced to slip on the garters. Finally all flock to the ballroom, find their partners, and glide into a dreamy waltz. The tinkling of the bells immediately arouses the curiosity of the men, who finally locate the mysterious tinklings.

The girls are enjoying the fun immensely, and the boys get together and discuss ways and means of getting glimpses of the new garters. One of them gets an idea and hurries out of the room, after instructing the rest to keep the girls busy.

The girls are seated in a semi-circle playing that exciting game of "Simon Says Thumbs Up," when the other fellow returns with a mouse-trap, containing two or three live mice, which are shaken out of the trap at the girls' feet. Screams of silence! The ladies all scramble upon the chairs and pull their skirts up and tight around them, exposing of course those wonderful "bell garters."

A VEIN OF GOD.—Convict No. 999, locked in his prison cell, is handed a letter one morning from his mother. The letter states that the enfeebled old lady is ill and without food or money. The convict's heart saddens as he recalls his life of crime and that he is responsible for the poor old mother's want. He prays for the opportunity to redeem himself.

Later he calls the guard, who is monotonously patrolling the hall outside and begs an interview with the warden of the penitentiary, a just, honest man, to whom he shows the letter and begs for a ticket of leave that he may visit his mother and make some endeavor to relieve her want. The request is granted, and promising to return when his time has expired, No. 999 shakes the warden's hand and goes out.

Beyond the gray walls of the penitentiary Walt Rooney makes haste to catch the next train for his home in the little Western town. He arrives and hurries to his mother's home. The mother embraces him tenderly while Walt turns his head, hiding a tear. "I will find help, mother dear," he finally assures her; "I will find work, we shall have money and you shall have food and a doctor."

Walt realizes his mother's grave condition and

429 S. 2nd Street, Hamilton, Ohio

And she smote twice upon his neck with all her might and she took away his head from him and tumbled his body down from the bed, and pulled down the canopy from the pillars, and anon she went forth and gave Holofernes' his head, to her maid, and she put it in her bag of meat, so they twain went together according to their custom unto prayer, and when they passed the camp, they compassed the valley and went up the mountain of Bethulia and came to the gates thereof.

Then said Judith afar off to the watchman at the gate, Open, open now the gate, God, even our God is with us, to shew his power yet in Jerusalem and his forces against the enemy as he hath even done this day. Now, when the men of the city heard her voice, they made haste to go down to the gate of their city, and they called the elders of the city. And then they all ran together, both small and great, for it was strange unto them that she was come, so they opened the gate and received them, and made a fire for a light, and stood round about them. Then she said to them with a loud voice:

"Praise, praise God, praise God, I say, for he hath not taken away his mercy from the house of Israel but hath destroyed our enemies by mine hands this night."

PAYING ATTENTION. In this film are shown in the following order those listeners: A young lady listens to her lover's words. Three ladies listen to a sermon with great interest. A woman listens to her husband's objections to high millinery bills. Two gossips listen to one another's scandals. An audience and their attitude in listening to a popular tenor. A damsel listens to the words of a fortune teller. Then the final scene shows us how talks on men's rights are received by the opposite sex.

SOLVING THE PUZZLE. The film presents a drawing room meeting of enthusiastic puzzle workers. One gentleman has a new way of solving his puzzle. He puts a handkerchief over the game and immediately the picture is made.

Under the handkerchief, we see how, piece by piece it is put into one finished picture. His success makes him an object of envy, however, and the gentleman meets with considerable trouble before the party is over.

THE POTTER'S WHEEL.—We see the choice and mixture of clays, followed by the grinding; after which comes the throwing or moulding. Here is introduced a very artistic bit of photography, showing the potter, in the light from a side window, engaged in producing on the old-fashioned potter's wheel the quaint and gracefully shaped vases and pots so much admired and sought by lovers of the artistic all the world over.

This is followed by the first firing process and that by glazing, after which comes another firing. The last step is that of decorating and several methods are made clear to us.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

THE LOVERS' ORACLE.—A drama, built around the life of a village witch, who lodges among magnificent old ruins and obtains great renown among the people by her ability to foresee events of their hearts.

By diplomatically advising her maiden customers about certain youths, then with equal care giving the swains corresponding advices she is able to carry on a very successful matrimonial agency.

Our story treats particularly of the experiences of a poet who goes to her for aid and is forced to prove his constancy by a long following after the desire of his heart.

TRAWLER FISHING IN A HURRICANE.—Trawler fishing is the method of securing fish by the use of a heavy, flattened bag net, usually about one hundred feet long, although often longer.

Fishing by this methods is carried on to a greater extent in the stormy winter months than during the rest of the year when the weather is more suitable for other kinds of fishing.

Then, as a great deal of wind is necessary for towing the trawl net over the ground this season is more practical on account of prevailing high winds.

Following the educational portion of the film, which is artistically handled in spite of being of a rather commercial trend, the audience is shown a storm at sea which is worthy of superlative description.

The trawling boat is tossed about like a mere skiff by the gigantic waves. At times, as it drops into the deep troughs between the mountains of water, it is lost to our view, to reappear rocking and trembling in the fury of the wind, while again as it fights its way through walls of water the decks are swept from bow to stern.

THE RIVAL MINERS.—Fraser, a workman in a mining settlement, is deeply in love with Sarah, the daughter of the man for whom he works.

Austin, a stranger from another community, is placed in charge of the men and soon conceives a love for Sarah. In his position as foreman he also makes trouble for Fraser.

During working hours on a day he has made very trying for Fraser—Austin taunts him by talk of Sarah, then states he is going to see her himself and leaves the men at work while he makes the unwelcome call.

Austin disappears while Fraser is made [illegible] to the delight of the other workmen.

Again Fraser is enabled to foil the rogue, who falls into the hands of the [illegible] and is given his just dues.

VOLCANIC ERUPTIONS OF MT. ÆTNA. The pictures will arouse the greatest interest [illegible] as they do the devastation caused by the eruption of this great volcano. The series of [illegible] showing the people fleeing before the lava, the eruptive crater taken from very close to the seething pillar of ashes and flame, lava flowing in great streams even an entire day after leaving the crater, showers of ashes, clouds of smoke and convulsions of the hills.

Etna, or Etna, is the greatest volcano in Europe a mountain 10,900 feet in height. It rises abruptly from the sea, has a circumference of more than two miles and a number of towns and villages are on the lower slopes.

The eruptions of Ætna have been numerous and many of them destructive. It is said some 15,000 persons were buried by the disturbance in 1169, while in 1669 the lava flowed over the country for forty days and killed some 10,000. Again 60,000 perished in the eruptions of 1693.

PATHE FRERES.

THE PARISIAN.—Henry Talmatt, a man whose life has left him blase and cynical, with no affections, no ties, and haunted with the thought of suicide as a possible means of ending his life, which is useless to himself and unprofitable to others, meets with a flowerseller attached to a big Parisian restaurant. The young girl is fresh, charming and graceful, and Talmatt, hoping to instill some interest into his life, offers to marry her and share his fortune with her. The young girl consents, happy enough to be able to dress well and have all that she desires, but she soon wearies of her husband, who is no longer young enough to be a congenial companion to her; forgetful of the source of her present good fortune and all she owes to her husband, she spatelos eagrly at the chances of amusement offered by an admirer, whose tastes are nearer akin to her own. Talmatt, however, one day sees them from the window, walking away together, and bitterly reflecting that his last illusion has gone, he takes up his pistol and puts an end to his wasted life.

VENICE. The open colonnades of the Doge's Palace and the Cathedral of St. Mark, well-known as two of the wonder sights of the world, take precedence, needless to say, in point of interest, and the memory of their rich ornamentation and wealth of priceless carvings is not to be eradicated with the termination of the film. That center of Venetian life, the Square of St. Mark, has also been most skillfully photographed. The same may be said of the column surmounted with the lion of St. Mark standing in the Square, as well as the Clock Tower, which, when it strikes two o'clock, assembles the large flocks of pigeons fed at the expense of the state. A film of this kind would be incomplete without the famous Bridge of Sighs and the beautiful arch of the Rialto Bridge which spans the Grand Canal, and the picturesque effect of gliding gondola, narrow canal and intricate street, needs no comment other than a passing mention.

THE BAGPIPE PLAYER.—Douglas, the bagpipe player, is in love with Flora, the younger daughter of the chief of an unfriendly clan. Through the jealousy of her sister Janet, who feels herself slighted, Flora's secret meetings with her lover come to the ears of her father, and the old chief not only siezes and holds the young man prisoner, but has him marooned on a barren island. One of the clan deputed to convey Douglas by boat to the island is, however, not unfriendly towards him, and he consents to carry a message back to Flora asking her to kindle a beacon fire on the mainland at nightfall. Flora obeys her lover's request and Douglas endeavors to swim across, but the guiding light is suddenly extinguished. Janet's jealousy is again responsible for this, and Douglas, unable to direct his course, becomes exhausted in his battle with the waves. His strength gives out and in the morning his body is washed up by the tide. Flora eagerly on the lookout spots her way to the spot and, heartbroken, sobs bitterly over the unconscious form of her lover. She is interrupted by her father and Janet, and the sound of their voices attracts Nancy, an old wandering gypsy woman commonly looked upon throughout the countryside as a witch. She owes a debt of gratitude to Flora and now is her chance to pay it, so she restores life and animation to him. He rises to his feet, and the old man unable to withstand his daughter's pleadings any longer, relents and clasps him warmly by the hand.

JIM WANTS TO GET PINCHED.—A professional beggar throws up his occupation in disgust at the scanty receipts elicited by his whining appeal to the public. He reads in the paper that better conditions are to prevail in future in the Government prisons, so he decides that his lot would be a better one within the walls of jail. A direct appeal to the police to be arrested is, however, [illegible]

THE SUBTERFUGE. [illegible] the girl's acquaintance he becomes a [illegible] and in her name, under an assumed name. A week or two later he proposes to [illegible] the parents knowing comparatively little of him, wrote to the supposed employer on [illegible] information concerning him. Before a reply is received, a slight incident tends to arouse their suspicions. A ring which Garfield forgets to take off his finger, is remarked upon, and in the face of the young man's confused explanations, the good people do not feel inclined to give their consent. However, a letter arrives, requesting them to call on the following day for the information desired, and on the next day they find, much to their satisfaction, that the workman is none other than the employer, whose second request to be accepted as a son-in-law obtains for him the happiest of replies.

THE MERRY MEDRANO CIRCUS CLOWNS.—Apart from the children, who beyond all doubt will find immense enjoyment in the antics and gambols of these Princes of Mirth, many of more mature years will be agreeably entertained by their clever tricks. In our opinion, this film is ahead of all other of the "variety" kind we have so far patronized. The Medrano Circus in Paris is quite famous for its clowns and certainly these doubtless are evident past masters in the performance of wonderful somersaults and weird contortions admitting of no comparison. Added to this the coloring of the bright costumes of the clowns considerably enhances the effect and attractive powers of the film. Up to the present we have found the vaudeville type film meet with good approval, and have therefore been encouraged to go on with its production in spite of similar perils. In the present instance we have no fears as to the success of our film and respectfully solicit a warmly recommending it to the notice of our customers.

BUD'S ESCAPADE. Hotspuff, [illegible] goes off to meet his best girl [illegible] a [illegible] time. The young lady greets him with a [illegible] and the two lovers [illegible] on a double bench seat for a long talk. Hotspuff [illegible] divesting himself of his light Spring overcoat, which he places on the seat beside him. A tramp [illegible] sees the coat and promptly [illegible] in its place his own ragged apology for a coat covering. Shortly afterwards a gentleman seats himself on the other side of the bench and in so doing sits on Hotspuff's coat tails, which gives way as the latter rises to rise. Upon beholding [illegible] of his double loss the [illegible] gets excited and rages, but is obliged to make the best of a bad job and don the beggar's coat. His troubles are not at an end however, for a sudden gust of wind carries off his purse, which is immediately seized by another wretched looking individual. Again, when he and his lady friend are passing through a stone yard a long rail runs his trousers leg [illegible] he stops to [illegible] while to endeavors to repair the damage in a clumsy and [illegible] manner, [illegible] of [illegible] left for him to pick up unnoticed. To crown all a heavy shower of rain [illegible] and the latter, in a vain attempt to [illegible] protection afforded by the umbrella stands it and [illegible] [illegible] useless adjunct.

DEEP SEA FISHING. This is a subject of [illegible] interest and is moreover a fine [illegible] of work as far as the artistic effects are concerned; the most notable picture in this latter respect is [illegible] of a fleet of gaily decorated boats [illegible] [illegible] while [illegible] the graceful outlines of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

MR. MIX AT THE MARDI GRAS.—Mr. and Mrs. Mix arrive in New Orleans and locate at a fashionable hotel. Mix is impressed with the fair Elaine, just arriving in a taxi. She recognizes in him an easy victim. Cafe de tour is suggested and accepted. Her appetite and familiarity with the refreshment list causes Mix to check up his cash account. He finally resorts to the office clerk, in an effort to raise more on his check. He does so, returns and finds the fair Elaine has enjoyed his wine and departed on the arm of a handsomer man. Mix lands on the sidewalk, much the worse from wear and tear, repairs to the hotel and is met by his wife. She upbraids him, locks his clothes up and turns the key in the door. He finally escapes through a window and falls in the rain barrel, repairs to the costumers and emerges in the crowd in search of his lost amorita, and encounters a strenuous evening, full of ludicrous situations.

THE ANGELUS.—"The Angelus" is a simple home story that might happen at any time in one of a dozen homes. The beautiful threads of sacred romance are woven gently mid the reverent tolling of "The Angelus." The theme suggests itself from Millet's historical painting of the same name and has its premier at the home of a poor parishioner.—Mrs. Graves, a widow with two small boys, Harvey and James, aged ten and twelve respectively; she is ill and the priest is sent for; upon his arrival they find she cannot live, the priest takes the two boys and at their mother's death places Harvey in the Orphan Home and James is adopted by a wealthy family and educated with their only daughter. Twelve years elapse. James is out of college and Harvey has already left the Orphan Home. He opens a broker's office. James joins him. James is in love with Hene, his schoolmate, and daughter of his foster father. She loves Harvey and weds him. The brothers separate and become rivals and enemies, and are finally brought back to brotherhood and happiness by the tolling of "The Angelus."

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE CHIVALROUS STRANGER.—The hero is a former army officer, a chivalrous gentleman of the old school, who has long since discarded his sword for more peaceable equipments. The old gentleman, who outwardly appears most gentle and docile, constitutes himself the champion of a young lady, pestered by the attentions of a blustering braggart in the streets, and escorts her home, afterwards calling upon the bully to challenge him to to fight. The braggart treats the suggestion contemptuously, stating that he does not cross swords with children or old men. Thereupon the other, raising his glove, strikes him lightly in the face, and the challenge is accepted. There is a sly twinkle in the old gentleman's eye as he politely withdraws, which gives place to a little emotion later on, when within the shelter of his own four walls he takes out his old uniform and unfolds it with loving care. On the morrow, antagonists and seconds meet on the chosen spot; an involuntary movement of surprise escapes his opponent, as the old officer takes off his outer coat, exposing to view his uniform. The duel commences, and the champion of beauty in distress, finds that his nerve and skill have not deserted him, a well calculated thrust slightly wounds his adversary, and the duel ends at the very same moment that the lady, having just received word of it, rushes up in a state of charming and solicitous perturbation for the safety of her champion.

THROUGH THE DARKNESS.—Leaving his wife and family well and happy, the leading actor in a well-known theatrical company goes to the theater for his evening performance and carries the house by storm. Elated with his success, and filled with pride and good spirit, he returns to his home to find his little girl very sick with a burning fever which augurs something worse. He is worried and anxious. The crisis must be passed before the doctor can decide the little one's case and give any encouragement as to the outcome. The actor, a man of artistic temperament, tender emotions, and intense love, feels the strain of suspense very keenly.

The next night he must go to the theater again. While he is playing his part with apparently the same zest and vigor as usual his whole being is racked with thoughts of his child. The apprehension is too great and while he is in the midst of his performance he suddenly goes insane. The curtain is rung down and he is taken to a sanitarium. His little girl passes safely through the crisis of her sickness and finally is restored to health.

The actor's wife is in despair. Trouble seems to darken her whole life, but with faithful solicitude she visits the hospital regularly to watch the condition of her husband, who grows worse instead of better.

While one one of these visits she thinks that a visit from his child might help his recovery. The doctor agrees with her, and the child calls at the hospital with her mother. The actor is brought into the reception room and, while he is sitting staring, his child gradually approaches her father while she is singing a little song which she and the father have often sung together. He listens, and then unconsciously hums the air until, little by little, reason dawns in his expression while he looks toward the little singer in whom he recognizes his own child.

He takes her in his arms as if convincing himself that he has not been dreaming. Then he clasps her to his bosom. Looking up, he sees and recognizes his wife, around whom he places his arm and embraces her, and thus, his mind recovered, the actor is himself again.

THE PORTRAIT.—Sketching the beauties of nature in the woods, the young artist is approached by two ladies, the one of middle age who acts as chaperon to her pretty companion knows the artist, speaks to him, and he asks an introduction to the young lady. They converse for a while, and as they are leaving the artist gives his card to them. The following day the young painter's studio is visited by the two ladies and they arrange to have him paint the portrait of the young woman, which seems to be very satisfactory to the young people. The portrait is to be painted at the home of the Countess, where the girl lives. She has several sittings when the young man's father writes the Countess, saying that he will call with several artistes to see her and view the production of his son's portrait of her niece.

The portrait is not finished and the day has come for the arrival of the artist's father and the critics. The young painter and his "model" are greatly agitated until she thinks of a scheme. Cut out the face and she will stand behind the easel and put her own face into the space. Without hesitation the young man carries out the scheme, and his sweetheart puts on the finishing touches with her face in the opening.

The artist's father with the critics are announced. The latter with great dignity and importance examine the picture and condemn it as unnatural, overdrawn likeness, absurd and worthless. The young man's father pronounces it good and very much to his son's credit. While the critics, in extreme pomposity, are wise in their own conceit, the face begins to smile, wink, laugh and grimace. The critics stand aghast, and when the girl withdraws her face and walks from behind the easel they are paralyzed with surprise and chagrin.

The artist and his father, with the Countess, are convulsed with laughter, particularly at the impersonations of the critics which are given by the Countess' niece. In disgust and anger the critics withdraw. The girl throws herself into her lover's arms while his father and the Countess pronounce a hearty "Bless you, my children, bless you."

THE MINOTAUR.—Theseus, the son of the King of Athens, has been brought up by his mother apart from his father with the understanding that when he can wield his father's sword he can present himself to his father, who will put him to a test of valor. He bids his mother good-bye after she has given him his father's sword and goes to meet the King, who does not recognize his son until the bow shows him the weapon.

In Crete, so the legend runs, lived a Minotaur, a powerful monster in human form, with a bull's head, who periodically demanded a provision of seven maidens and seven youths whom he devoured. The King of Crete had sacrificed the last of His desirable maidens to the Minotaur and sent word to the King of Athens that he must secure the minotaur's tribute of fourteen victims from Athens or he would declare war against the Athenian.

Theseus hears the demand and volunteers to go to Crete as one of the victims. His father, the King of Athens, reluctantly consents to have him go. He proceeds to Crete, where he denounces Minos, the King, and wins the love of his daughter. She aids Theseus to escape and he decides to go to the Minotaur's den and slay the Minotaur. The King's daughter goes with him and, to aid him in penetrating the labyrinth and lair of the monster and insure his return, she fastens one end of a silken thread around his wrist while she holds the other end, slowly unwinding it as he, with his father's sword, goes into the cave where he encounters the beast, kills him and cuts off his head as a trophy of his courage.

With the guidance of the thread and his sweetheart he issues from the cave. Theseus, with the daughter of the King of Crete, returns to Athens where he appears before his father. He tells him his story of the destruction of the Minotaur, receives his father's blessing and presents his sweetheart to his father, who marries his son to the beautiful daughter of the King of Crete, who is delighted when he learns that the Minotaur has been slain by his son-in-law.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE CONJUROR.—A portly housekeeper is seen displaying the premises under her control to a gentleman inquirer. In the midst of her voluble explanations the visitor vanishes from her side and reappears on the other side of the room, following this up by suddenly disappearing through the window on to the balcony and thence to the street in a most mysterious manner. A later scene shows the moving operations, and once again the remarkable powers of the new tenant are in evidence—the sofa, mattress, chairs, etc., flying to his hand from the floor, where the men have deposited them. Settled in his lodgings, his faculty proves at once a terror and a boon to the landlady. The former when annoyed by her worrying, the lodger causes her to spin rapidly round the furniture in the room and down into the street, and the latter when she, having broken various articles, he causes the fragments to fly together again and form the complete article in his hand.

THANHOUSER COMPANY.

SHE WANTED TO MARRY A HERO.—Elsie Plush was a dime novel fiend. Laura Jean kind, you know—and it was her boast that there wasn't a thriller published that she hadn't read. In the present Thanhouser picture she purchases a copy of Miss Libby's "A Great Hero" and instantly falls in love with the hero in the book. She forthwith proceeds to measure up the abilities of George Mild, her beau, with those of the Libby hero, and finds that George falls short. When George proposes, Elsie so far forgets the Libby hero as to accept George. Then the Libby hero comes to her—and it is all off with George. She tells him that he is a worthy enough young man, but he isn't a hero. He is unromantic and ordinary and she knew she couldn't live "happily ever after" with anyone but a full-fledged hero—like the one in Laura Jean's book.

Then Elsie meets her hero. He is a handsome military man, resplendent in gold lace and lofty airs. Elsie is pleased to take a stroll with him. He seems all that a hero should be until Elsie falls from a bridge into dangerous depths, when the bold soldier—calls for help! So when an athlete responds and rescues Elsie, she scorns the unheroic man of war and gives the athlete her arm.

But the athlete has his weak points, and one of them is inability to manage a horse. Hence when he tries to drive Elsie's horse the animal promptly runs away. Luckily an expert horseman happens along, stops the horse and basks in Elsie's smiles. HE is a REAL hero! Elsie ignores the athlete. The clever horseman takes the seat the athlete has vacated and guides the horse to Elsie's home. But while handy with the reins the horseman is unhandy with his fists, and in an altercation with the pugilist is pounded and pummeled to a finish—right before Elsie's astonished eyes. Leaving the horseman rubbing his bruises, the hero-seeker marches off with the victorious shoulder-hitter.

An escaped lunatic enters on the scene and the pugilist loses his nerve. Fleeing, he leaves Elsie at the mercy of the maniac. Suddenly she observes a frightened look in the maniac's eyes and turns her head to see a hypnotist approaching and cowing the lunatic. The hypnotist succeeds in leading the maniac back to the asylum, and then joins Elsie, who invites the professor to escort her home. The man of the powerful gaze cheerfully accepts and Elsie is sure that she has found a perfect hero until a footpad sticks a revolver under the professor's nose and snarls, "Every-thing around yer!" In vain does the professor exert his hypnotic power—the gun continues in dangerous proximity and the man behind it means business. So the hypnotist shells up like an ordinary mortal and Elsie loses another ideal—and her jewelry! The policeman who frightens off the highwayman is a sure-enough hero—but investigation shows a wife and five youngsters at home! To add to her troubles, Elsie's pocketbook is lifted by a heroic looking Hamlet who needed the money.

Elsie concludes that no hero is perfect and that book heroes are fakes, so when plain, ordinary George swings by in his new Sunday suit, she tells him he's good enough for her, and he slips a gold band on her shapely finger, and—well, what more do you want?

THE CIGARS HIS WIFE BOUGHT were bad—awful bad. What would you expect? A woman cannot buy cigars. How a suffering hubby tried to get rid of the cigars his better half bought him, and the mess his efforts got him into, is the story the picture tells.

THEY WOULD ROLLER SKATE.—Mr. and Mrs. Jones encounter skaters wherever they go and, reading that patent skates are to be had everywhere, go off to procure some for themselves, but the fun they cause and the scrapes they get into are immense. For beginners we are surprised at the way they mount steps, but in trying to be too tricky they land themselves into a room where the occupants handle them none too gently.

TOMMY AND THE POWDER.—Professor Tweedle has been successful. Starting out with his discovery—a wonderful powder—he sits on a bench deep in thought, laying the precious box of powder by his side. Mischievous Tommy comes along, and before the Professor is aware of his presence, Tommy has opened the box, upsetting some of the powder which places the Professor himself under its spell. With delight the boy rushes off on mischief bent. Seeing a dining-room window open he climbs in, and sprinkling the powder, he awaits events. Plates and dishes collect themselves, serviettes and cloths all slip back into their places, and when Jane returns to finish her duties, she finds the table, which she had left nicely laid, has all vanished, furniture included. This is fine fun for the boy, who rushes off playing pranks everywhere. An old lady who has taken a seat in the open is one of the victims. Not content with pulling the wing off her bonnet, Tommy applies a little powder to the bonnet, the old lady is dismayed to see the bird from her bonnet take flight. But Tommy tires of all this, and throwing the whole of the contents over himself, it causes him to rush backward and forwards, cutting all sorts of capers, until he finally sinks into oblivion.

THE LITTLE BEGGARD MAID.—Lottie and her father have wandered about for months together, but strength is failing the little girl and in despair her father finds she is unable to go farther without food. Tom Brown comes up at the same moment and the kind-hearted fellow takes them off to his home, where he persuads his people to help them.

We next see him with a handsome girl of the gypsy type declaring his love, which she spurns as he has no money. Poor Tom goes home in despair, his parents having retired for the night after bidding good-bye to the poor old man and his daughter. Tom thinks until the temptation to steal comes over him. Unable to resist, he goes to the chest and takes a purse of notes and rushes off to the girl, who readily accepts him with the money. The purse which contained it he casts into the stream, which Lottie, wandering about, pulls out and rushes off to show her father. At the farm the theft has been discovered and the suspected persons are the beggars. Proceeding to their poor home, they find the man and child. He is accused, searched and the missing purse is found. In vain the child pleads that she herself has given it to her father, but he is taken away. Then the poor Lottie is turned out of the home and, hungry and forlorn, goes again to the once kind people to plead with them for her father, but they will not listen to her until Tom, unable to conceal his guilt longer, reveals the truth, begging forgiveness for his folly and wickedness, which is finally given and in return for their suffering the unhappy Lottie and her father find a happy home.

BARBERINE.—Count Ulrich and his wife Barberine were possessed with great love for each other, but being poor and the Count wishing to give his wife all the luxury possible, went to the Court of Queen Beatrice of Aragon where great and riches await them. Barberine, before her husband leaves, gives him her portrait, and he swears to preserve it religiously always.

Ulrich loses himself in the forest where fortunately he meets Archduke de Rosenberg who also is on his way to Court. They decide to travel together. Rosenberg is happy while Ulrich is lost in the recollection of his dear Barberine. At Court the sad demeanor of Ulrich is noticed by the frivolous courtiers, who like and seek him. As tolpine is the most cutting of them all and he has even the temerity to bet that he will succeed in winning Barberine's love. Ulrich accepts the defy and gives Rosenberg all necessary instructions so that he will be received at Barberine's chateau. Arriving there, Rosenberg finds her busily at work on her spinning wheel. She receives Rosenberg joyfully, as he pretends to have been sent by her husband. Without much ado, Rosenberg begins his protestations of love. The young woman is at first indignant but smiles with malice and leads Rosenberg on through the corridors of the chateau. Rosenberg thinks that he is about to triumph and win her love, when she opens the door of a cell and says gracefully to Rosenberg "Enter into this room, my lord, and I will follow thee." Rosenberg, without suspicion, enters and immediately Barberine closes the cell door on him. He is a prisoner. Hunger manifests itself to Rosenberg, who cries menaces and supplicates. Through the grating of the door a servant throws him a few crusts of bread and she tells him that he will not eat anything more until he has woven all the thread on the wheel.

In the meantime, Ulrich and the Queen reach the chateau in great pomp. Barberine speaks from the cell where Rosenberg is at work and his fate. Nothing is left for Rosenberg but to acknowledge that he has lost the bet, and that he has made a serious mistake.

Ulrich is not willing to accept the payment of the wager, as he had never doubted his wife's love. The presumptious Rosenberg recites to the Queen and Ulrich that he has not yet dined and is very hungry. Everyone then goes to the dining room, where a most sumptuous feast is served.

THE BROKEN FRIENDSHIP.—Jack and Gaspard, two firm friends, are looking for work in the harvest field and are directed by a pretty country girl whom they meet to the meadows to her father's farm where they are immediately engaged. The two friends soon become favorites at the farm owing to their willingness, and it is easily discerned as time goes on that the pretty daughter of the household has made an effect upon both. When Gaspard ultimately discovers that Jack is the favored one he is seized with a jealous rage, and after Jack has declared the farmer's consent the former picks a quarrel with his friend and then part angrily. The betrothal feast soon takes place and the sight of the general happiness increases Gaspard's bitterness. Meeting his rival apart Gaspard strikes down his old friend Jack and without a parting glance flees to the neighboring woods. The girl finds her lover senseless and is soon succored and the young man cared for. Meanwhile Gaspard haunted by his guilty conscience, sees a vision in which he is seized by two officers, escaping he flies he makes his way to the wood where he readily meets two officers who, seeing Gaspard's agitation, take him in custody to the village where he is accused of assaulting his friend. Being led to the sick man's bedside for identification Jack remembering that former struck his fatal blow, refuses, stating he is not the guilty man. Gaspard is overcome by his friend's magnanimity and falls on his knees imploring forgiveness.

TWO MEN.—A female detective in a book-binding shop comes to a realization of her love-affair and in a fit of desperation caused by seeing her fellow worker desert her with one hearing her to the care of Bill Fenton, a pilot. Wary to learning of the legacy he objects to the charge, but the lure fix it up and he becomes a regular daddy to the kid.

Seven years pass. The little one has grown into beautiful womanhood and as the ward of Bill Fenton has the admiration and respect of the fishing community. One day a celebrated banker and his sons and Fenton's landing into the harbor, but as the stranger is vigorously defending himself from the pernicious sport of the miners. Something about the stranger's makeup and dash attract Fenton, and it is not long before they are not only firm friends, but business partners, and the new arrival is the welcome guest of Fenton. The sweet girl takes to the stranger, Ward Birch, and in her refreshingly innocent way makes him perfectly at home. It is not long, however, before Birch falls deeply in love with her, and seizes the opportunity, when they are out for a ramble, to plant on her lips a soulful, heartfelt kiss. To the childish, carefully bred girl it opens a new order of things and when she returns to the cabin, and Bill kisses her as he always did, she tells him that a guardian must kiss his ward on the forehead—not on the lips. Bill is stunned, for in his great heart he loves her madly, but he tried never to show it. But he must have shown it, for Birch knows the truth. His nobility of character, however, tells him what to do, and leaving a note to Bill that he knows he is an interloper, he stifles his great passion of love, and with a heart full of anguish, he departs.

Bill Fenton gets the note, and the shock is great. He says nothing, but observes the girl closely. He sees that she is pining—aye, her young heart is suffering—so he puts on his hat and goes out. After a long search out by the canyon, he comes on Ward. "Ward," says he, "come back to the cabin." Ward refuses—can't do it—it's all right, he's willing to sacrifice. Bill insists, Ward is stubborn, and suddenly Bill strikes him squarely on the chin, rendering him unconscious. Then with his huge arms, he slings the form over his shoulder and carries him to the cabin. Of course, when he comes to, he realizes the motive of the knockout blow; but neither he nor the girl of his heart, safe in his arms, know of how big Bill Fenton, after he made the sacrifice, had to go to a lonely spot out among the hills, so that nobody could see him battling to keep down that big, funny lump that just kept coming up in his throat.

AUNT MARIA'S SUBSTITUTE.—Like a good old pal, a young chap writes his chum to come down to his seashore cottage for the week-end. He also writes his best girl to come down. Chaperone? Why—thats fixed! His elderly aunt will attend to that. Both respond favorably, and he prepares to receive them when he gets word from his aunt, who has gone out, that her mother is ill and she will be unable to return.

That's a fine situation for the bachelor! How on earth is he going to get a chaperone for this girl? While he is wondering what to do, his chum arrives. In a torrent of brotherly confidence, he tells him what a predicament he is in. All he gets in return, however, is sympathy, until he conceives a bold plan. The girl doesn't know his aunt, so why not have his portly chum pass for her? Said chum promptly objects to donning skirts, but the other implores, and so strongly pleads the cause of a courtship in jeopardy that his pal consents.

Getting into the skirts is a fine old job, but he finally hurdles the waist lines; no sooner has he dressed and discarded the cigar butt when the lay visitor enters.

The chum welcomes her like a good aunt; in fact, too good, for he kisses her again and again; the bachelor is furious, but he dare not object—any fellow's aunt may kiss his best girl. Well, all through the visit the bogus aunt works the situation for many a kiss and hug, when somethings happens: The real aunt returns! When she comes into the reception room and sees the being in skirts that uses a private moment by putting its feet on the table and smoking a liberal perfecto, she promptly goes off in a faint.

The couple is only in the next room and when they hear the commotion they rush in. Can you imagine how long a man in disguise can stay without shedding his skirts when he has a fainting woman on his hands? Just figure the finish of this picture.

LEGALLY DEAD.—Howard Moore, a young lawyer, is engaged to be married to Marion Brooks, a beautiful girl, who devotes much of her time to volunteer charity work among the poor.

We see a lot of toughs in front of a pool room. A poor Jewish peddler tries to sell them some of his wares. One of the toughs cuts off the Jew's beard, and when he protests they strike him. Marion comes upon the scene and compels the toughs to let the peddler go. The leader of the toughs hugs and kisses the girl, who is struggling to free herself from his grasp, when Richard Carson comes into action. He rescues the girl, and the toughs attack him. Here ensues a terrific fist fight, in which Richard knocks out the toughs in fine style. Marion returns with a policeman, who arrests the leader of the toughs. The girl thanks Richard, who escorts her home. Richard, who is smitten by the girl's charms, calls on Miss Brooks and meets his old college chum, Howard Moore, who is engaged to be married to Miss Brooks.

Two years pass. Moore has become a victim of stock speculation and is neglecting his wife and child. Being hard pushed he asks Carson to loan him money. Carson makes out a check for $2,000. Moore goes out to pay his creditor; he is drawn into a stock broker's office; he sees that a certain stock is advancing in value and determines to plunge. He goes back to his office and raises Carson's check to $22,000. The stock goes down, and Moore is ruined.

A thrilling dramatic scene follows when Carson threatens to send Moore to jail, and Moore's wife enters. Carson generously tears up the check, unseen by Moore and his wife. Moore believes that he will be sent to jail, and he goes away, sending his wife a letter which tells her that by the time she receives it he will be dead.

Seven years pass. Moore is, legally, dead. Carson is to marry Moore's lovely widow. While the ceremony is going on we see the supposedly dead husband outside of the house. He enters the house and hears the conclusion of the ceremony. He will stop it. He is about to enter the room in which the wedding is taking place when his little son enters. The father hugs the boy to his breast, but the child strikes him with his fists and runs from him. Moore starts to go out, when the former wife accompanied by her new husband, Carson, enter the room. Moore, from the doorway, sees his wife in the arms of another man; there is only one thing he can do to make amends for his past wrongdoing. He closes the drapery and goes out of their lives forever.

A DAUGHTER OF THE MINE.—John Brairly kept the only hotel and bar in the camp, so the boys naturally chose this as a storehouse for their gold.

Each night Tess welghed it, gave them a slip with the amount and locked it away in the safe.

She had been secretly pleased to watch the stranger, Ned Carton's, store grow week by week, but as she had feared, before many moons the other newcomer, Jim Kirby, had won every ounce of it from him.

Carlton's hopes rose high in anticipation of the day he would have saved enough to speak to her, but now all this was swept away at one bound. In desperation he picked up his gun to make an end of his humiliation, but Tess quietly took the weapon from him.

That she should have seen his weakness doubly humiliated him, so hatless and wild-eyed he fled to the mine. After a moment's hesitation, Tess ran after him and in her excitement dropped the keys, which Jim Kirby found upon entering.

Instantly he recognized the key of the safe, in a moment more he had opened the safe, put the boys' gold in the sleeve of his coat and was hurrying down the path to seek a hiding place for his treasure.

After vainly calling to Carlton, Tess was about to return, when she observed Kirby hastening along and was dumbfounded to see half a dozen bags of gold fall to the ground. "Could he have won all of that?" Dasbing into the house she found her worst fears were realized—the safe was open and empty!

Both her father and Lee, the Chinaman, were out, but she could at least follow Kirby and see where he went. Retracing her steps with what speed she could, the girl was fortunate enough to see him burying the gold under a tree. Waiting until he had gone, she stole to the spot, snatched the treasure and ran breathlessly back to the house, where she secreted it again.

None too soon for poor Ned Carlton, whom Brairly, the sheriff and a posse of miners had captured—For Brairly, returning in Tess' absence, seeing the safe and Carlton's hat, which the crafty Kirby had placed beside it, together with Carlton's wild exit from the house, naturally made him suppose the young miner to be the thief.

To avoid a hanging, Tess very truthfully declared that she had put the gold in another place, but privately informed the gambler, Kirby, that the country would no longer be healtby for him.

As for Carlton, this experience had taught him a lesson and his pledge that he had done with cards was never broken.

HAZEL, THE HEARTBREAKER.—Turn about is fair play, as will be demonstrated. The cowboys who frequent "Cowboy Mag's" inn find great pleasure in playing all kinds of jokes on the Chinese waiter, but in the end he gets back at them all. Much interest and excitement is caused by the arrival of word from the educated daughter of Mag that she has graduated from school and will soon be among them. When she reaches her home and is introduced to all the habitues of the tavern, her popularity is at once established. "Cowboy Mag" endeavors to ward off all flirtations, but Miss Hazel is well able to manage her followers. She organizes a school for the benefit of the boys but they are more anxious to fool than to learn, and she dismisses them. She seeks solitude in a secluded spot, but even here she is discovered and made love to by all, but she gives no one encouragement. She finally hits upon a joke in which the Chinaman is to play the prominent part. After tacking up a sign saying whoever reaches the parson's house first she will marry, she dresses the Chinaman in her clothes and waits for the sport. The cowboys adopt every means of forestalling one another and the first who reaches the parson's house becomes the happy groom of—the Chinaman. When the joke is discovered there is much fun, at Jack's expense.

THE RESCUE OF THE PIONEER'S DAUGHTER.—A party of pioneers decide upon a site for their new home and unpack their belongings. Some months later they are visited by an Indian chief and two of his companions. The pioneer sits in friendly confab with the Indian until he learns his erand. The chief has come to propose for the hand of the pioneer's daughter. This proposition is listened to with horror and the Indian's gift refused. The other settlers are called and they all drive the intruders away. The Indians resent the repulse and a reward is offered for the capture of the white girl. At a time when the men folks leave the settlemnt to go for provisions the Indians steal upon the women, overcome their guard and, after burning the cabin, make the girl captive. The settlers reach their home in time to save the women and learn of the disaster and all start in pursuit. They are led through hazardous passes but are successful in fighting down most of the Indians. The one bearing the girl, however, reaches the summit of a steep rock and threatens to end her life if the followers come nearer. He is captured from the rear and the girl restored to her father.

THE FASHIONABLE SPORT.—Cretinetti, who has a weakness for the fair sex, meets a lady on the street and offers her his company. The lady is on her way to a skating rink and thinking it might be a good joke Cretinetti accompanies her there. At sght of the skaters flying by on their shining little wheels his enthusiasm cools. However, he also puts on skates and starts to arise from his chair and, of course, a ludicrous somersault is the result of his first attempt. Fortunately the lady has not seen him and he manages to get on his feet and take the arm of his acquaintance. As they proceed he loses his balance and this time drags the lady down with him. She is somewhat humiliated and leaves him to go with another skater. Determined, however, but failing in his attempt to get about alone, he engages the services of two employees of the rink to take him about in pursuit of the lady. Disaster here awaits him and the crowd follows him into the resting room until finally the skaters indignantly throw him out of the place. As he cannot manage to take off his skates he is obliged to go home in a wicker basket, precisely the same way as babies learn to walk. There is a laugh to every foot of this film and it surely is most amusing.

Days of '49

Length 995 Feet

A touching story of the mad rush to the gold fields of California in 1849, with its untold hardships.

This picture tells of the treachery, desertion and robbery of one successful prospector by his partner, but he finally escapes from the Alkali desert with his mind a blank but still in possession of the only map of their claim.

Being unable to get tidings of her husband the wife starts out to cross the plains to find him, only to die in the search and leave her little child in the care of strangers.

The mills of the Gods, it is said, grind slowly but they grind exceeding fine, as the close of our picture shows.

You must order this in advance as the demand for this will be great

This man is on a 220 volt circuit and as his moving picture lamp only requires 35 volts at the arc, he formerly used a rheostat to reduce the voltage. In this way he paid for about 3 times as much "juice" as he actually needed.
Then he figured he needed this money more than the Lighting Company and he bought a Anniversary of my Independence!

One year ago the twenty-sixth of this month, I told the film trust it couldn't play in my back yard any more, withdrew every blessed office of the Laemmle Film Service from the association, rolled up my sleeves, stuck out my tongue at the octopus, hitched up my panties, felt of my muscle to see if it was on the job, drew a long breath of relief and—declared my absolute independence. As I look back from the high point I have attained since then, I have to laugh at myself for being such a mutt as to delay becoming independent as long as I did. Within the first three weeks of my independence, the business of the Laemmle Film Service increased ninety per cent.! For I not only held the vast bulk of the trade I had, but gained new customers faster than I could properly serve them. I had to tell scores and scores of them to hold their business away from me for a few weeks till I could get my bearings. For there never has been one instant since I became a moving picture man that I would sacrifice the quality of my famous service for the gain of a few dollars and cents. Since that day, one year ago, I have become the biggest and best film renter in the world; I have been the bulls-eye for a most villainous attack of vituperation, lying and abuse, all of which was done under cover and not in the open as I have conducted my fight; I have contributed my part toward wiping out the vicious ten per cent. penalty; I have fought with all my might and main, all my resources and bank account to help uplift the quality of goods served to independent theaters. Thousands of you have given me your moral and material support, some of you have gone so far as to try to make a little tin god of me, others to make a little iron devil of me. But the sum and substance, the pith and point, the meat and kernel of the whole year's experience is this:—Old Doctor Laemmle is at the top of the heap, he is happy, he has confounded his enemies and glorified his friends, he has proved once for all that when you sit in a game with an opponent who is a notorious bluffer, the thing to do is to hold fast, sit tight, shove all your chips to the center of the table, stand pat and call his bluff till his feet crack with the cold. After the most wonderful year of my career I simply cannot resist this little cock-a-doodle-doo!

"Scenes Made Famous by Roosevelt"

We feel repaid over and over again for the hard work and the frightful rush necessary to put this glorious scoop on the market. Every person connected with the "Imp" worked with his whole heart and soul. They are tired, but happy. Here are two more masterpieces for Independents only:

"TWO MEN"

Released Monday, May 2d. Length 985 feet

A pippin! The kind of heart story that will bring a lump to your throat. Read the synopsis elsewhere in this issue and just imagine what such a picture will do for your theatre. It is the kind of film that is driving our friend, the enemy, to distraction! Fight for it. Write for it!

"Aunt Maria's Substitute"

Released Thursday May 5th. Length 970 feet

Your whole audience will fairly rock with laughter when they see this rollicking farce. Wait till you see "Aunt Maria" smoking a perfecto and doing a few other astounding stunts and you will wear the smile that won't come off. If you don't get this comedy, you lose real money! Beg!

Two Corking Comedies On One Reel

She Wanted to Marry a Hero

—AND—

The Cigars His Wife Bought

Approximate Length 1,000 Feet. No. 108. Code Word Hero. POSTERS, TOO

Scene from SHE WANTED TO MARRY A HERO

"SHE WANTED TO MARRY A HERO," the opening subject, is a lesson and a warning to young women who delve too deeply into Laura Jean Libby. It's nice enough to read "love stories" occasionally, but don't devour them until they influence and bewilder you. The heroine in the picture wishes she had'nt. The Libby yarns made her throw over her commonplace sweetheart and seek an unusual, heroic one, like those Miss Libby writes about. What a mess of trouble the search got her into, the picture shows.

"THE CIGARS HIS WIFE BOUGHT" were bad—awful bad. What would you expect? A woman CANNOT buy cigars. How a suffering hubby tried to get rid of the cigars his better half bought him, is the story the picture tells, and its funny enough to make you yell! YOU NEED IT IN YOUR BUSINESS—BECAUSE YOUR BILL ALWAYS NEEDS A GOOD "LAUGH" PICTURE.

Thanhouser Film—the Best Advertised in America

It's the best ADVERTISED because it's the best MADE. By "advertised" we don't mean newspaper-advertised but ADVERTISED BY WORD OF MOUTH BY HUNDREDS OF ENTHUSIASTIC EXHIBITORS. Approximate Length 1,000 Feet No 109 Code Word, Eyre POSTERS TOO

We are pleased to announce that we have completed our production of the world-famous "Jane Eyre," that we have slated it for release on Friday, May 6th, and THAT IT WILL EVEN BE A BIGGER MONEY-MAKER FOR THE EXHIBITOR AND THE EXCHANGE THAN OUR MUCH TALKED-OF "ST. ELMO" OF A MONTH AGO.

Do you fully realize what this last means? We predict for "Jane Eyre" MORE success than attended our mighty successful "St. Elmo"! And you certainly know what a hit "St. Elmo" made!

Wm. F. Niel, proprietor of the Crescent Theater, Chattanooga, Tenn., wrote that it doubled his receipts and said: "Just 100 per cent. increase; how's that for a record breaker?" W. F. Crall, Norfolk, Va., wrote: "We have two theaters side by side and yesterday we showed 'St. Elmo' in one and the receipts were nearly double those of the other." T. A. Rogers, of the Edisonia Theater, Jackson, Ohio, wrote that he got a corking lot of advertising out of the picture, and big business. And so on! And so on! And so on! Undoubtedly "St. Elmo" was the prize Independent money-maker of 1910.

SO WHEN WE SAY THAT "JANE EYRE" WILL BEAT "ST. ELMO" AS A MONEY-MAKER, YOU OUGHT TO SIT UP AND TAKE NOTICE! And you ought to make your preparations for handling a film that will mean much to the Independent cause, much to the exhibitor, much to you, and much to us. Our superfine production of "Jane Eyre" is by way of appreciation of THE EXHIBITORS' AND EXCHANGES' KINDLY EXPRESSED APPRECIATION of the merits of "St. Elmo." So please push "Jane Eyre" to the best of your ability—and watch results! Remember, we want this film judged BY THOSE RESULTS. If you can let us know what they are in your own territory, at the proper time, we would very much appreciate it.

The March of Progress.

A year ago, with one single exception, the moving picture had not invaded the greatest amusement artery of the United States,—we mean Broadway between Twenty-third street and Forty-second street. The single exception was the old and foredoomed Manhattan Theater, in which Mr. Ganes was showing his pictures. We refer to the Manhattan Theater as being foredoomed, because that place had long been decided upon for destruction to make way for the Gimbel department store and, in a sense, the Pennsylvania depot, this section of the city having been selected years ago for these vast improvements and alterations.

Since then, what a remarkable change has come over the aspect of things! The new Ganes Theater has become a prominent feature on mid-Broadway at Thirty-first street; then the Majestic Theater took up the picture; next the Circle Theater followed suit. More recently the moving picture has become, apparently, a permanent factor of the entertainment program on the roof of the New York Theater. So it goes. Within the last few weeks a more significant indication of the march of progress has manifested itself on one of New York's most exclusive, fashionable and entertainment thoroughfares. We allude to Thirty-fourth street. Thirty-fourth street, as every inhabitant of New York and probably of the United States knows, is pretty well the center of things in respect of fashion. Here are concentrated many of the best dry goods and costume establishments, hotels and the like. The Manhattan Opera House is also on the street.

Hence it is we think that the Savoy Theater on Thirty-fourth street, New York City, having recently adopted the moving picture as its staple entertainment, is a fact of such significance that it deserves special mention in our pages. As we said before, earlier in this article, none of these signs were apparent in New York City a year ago. What an extraordinary change, or advance, or symptom of progress, whichever the reader pleases, has taken place since then! Whichever aspect most commends itself to him, the one irrefragable fact is that the moving picture, to quote the Gladstonian phrase, "is advancing by leaps and bounds" in public favor. No other construction can be put upon the fact that it has invaded, and successfully invaded, some of New York's best theaters. We cannot, at the moment, give the exact figures, but roughly speaking, as compared with two years ago, when there was not then one good theater in New York City which had the moving picture as its staple entertainment, there must now be at least a dozen. It is fair to suppose, that before this present Summer is over, there will be many additions to this number.

This is a very encouraging state of things, but one with which we are not entirely satisfied. Whilst this form of entertainment has gone ahead in New York City, as we have just pointed out, it is generally admitted that the Empire City is lagging behind the rest of the country in many vital respects. Small country towns can boast of moving picture palaces that put to shame any New York show, except, it may be, the large combination houses formerly devoted to the drama or straight vaudeville such as we have already alluded to. The farther West we go, the more the picture is in evidence as the amusement of the classes, and the more intelligently it is administered. From a report on another page it will be seen that Chicago is the first to demonstrate what can be done with an exclusive picture show and proper music. It is said that "A Penitent of Florence" in the Orpheum with orchestral music, organ, choir voices and sound effects had all the semblance and artistic conviction of grand opera. The crowded houses that were attracted and the widespread approval accorded to this production are indeed encouraging. The other evening at Keith & Proctor's Twenty-third Street Theater, New York, we sat through a long program of mixed vaudeville and picture. One item that brought the loudest applause all over the house was the Biograph picture, "The Way of the World." This picture also called for special music and sound effects, and while these were rather imperfectly produced, yet it did not prevent this marvelous picture from being the star feature of the program. We would like to see the Chicago example bearing fruit here in New York City.

We have headed this short article, "The March of Progress." By that we mean to say that the picture, in all its manifestations, is progressing in the esteem of the great entertainment or pleasure seeking public. This is a discovery, of course, upon which we, ourselves, cannot unduly plume ourselves. It is obvious for all men to perceive, note, and ponder over. But being a fact of vital importance, in connection with an industry whose success we have at heart, we think it should be specifically noted and commented upon, for the encouragement of all connected with it, particularly of the few stupid persons who allow themselves to think or be saddled with the opinion that "cinematography is on the decline" (merely because they have been weighed in the balance and found wanting). All the evidence, all the facts, such as we have just given our readers, point to an entirely opposite state of things.

The Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company.

In the WORLD of January 16 we dealt in detail with the scheme of this company, briefly called the General Sales Company, which appeared to be a combination dominated by two manufacturing firms—the Imp and the New York Motion Picture Company—to form an agency for securing control of all the independent made film of the United States. The scheme seemed to be and was commonly understood to be a close corporation. In effect all the manufacturers were asked to distribute their pictures through a restrictive channel. Moreover, it seemed to be sought to make a profit out of the combination. The profits, plainly put, were to go into the pockets of the two companies most concerned.

The scheme within the last ten days has evoked a storm of criticism and opposition; in fact, we do not remember in the recent history of the moving picture industry in the United States, any scheme which was so openly derided. On the one hand it was called "a little trust"; on the other, an impudent "frame-up" on the part of its promoters. We were loth to accept either view. While we had assurances of the bona fides of the scheme, still we were skeptical of its being conceived in the best interests of the moving picture business.

Events of the last two weeks have shown that our skepticism is well founded. The insurgent manufacturers and importers declined to fall in line with the Sales Company and frankly talked "independence of Independents." They held a meeting, as our columns of April the 16th show, and uttered some very drastic criticisms, indeed, of the projected Sales Company, chiefly on the grounds that the business would be in the hands of two or three firms who sought to control the business of their competitors.

Wiser counsels and much discussion have prevailed in the meanwhile, and the conflicting elements have got together with a result that some sort of agreement or combination has been arrived at. Instead of, to put it bluntly, the New York Motion Picture Company and the Imp Company being the sole arbiters in the case, they seem to have admitted besides themselves, amongst manufacturers, the Powers Company, and amongst importers the Eclair, the Great Northern, the Cines, Itala and Ambrosio. The Thanhouser Company, the Nestor Company have yet to give in their adhesion. A Board of Directors has been decided upon. This Board consists of Carl Laemmle, Mr. Baumann, Mr. Steiner, Mr. Powers and Mr. Brulatour. The scheme is this, as we understand it at the present: that each of the associated Independent manufacturers and importers contributes one hundred dollars per week as a common fund for the Sales Company. This fund will go for the payment of office expenses. In return for this, each manufacturer and importer will have the right of marketing his pictures to the Sales Company at a uniform rate of ten cents per foot. The Sales Company will then distribute the goods amongst the Independent exchanges, who will have the right of buying so many reels a week from a circulated list. These exchanges will be restricted to this list of manufactured and imported films, and will not be allowed, it is to be presumed, to trade outside the productions of the General Sales Company's contributories.

To be just to the organizers of this scheme, there is one feature in it which commends itself to our approval; it is this: that it seems designed to work for the general good of the moving picture business in two aspects. First, the improvement of quality. The manufacturers themselves will act as censors of their own and each others' films before they are sent out. A very fine idea if it can be worked and practiced. Then, again, it is designed to give the Independent renter a chance. Hitherto the Independent renter in this country has been in this position: that he has rarely been able to obtain Independent pictures and when he could obtain them he could not get them in sufficient quantity and of sufficiently good quality.

In the latter regard, again, this scheme earns our praise. Over and over again we have pointed out that the middle man in the moving picture business is a necessary, essential, and vital factor. There must be a distributing agency in every manufacturing business. We perceive that on the licensed side there are indications of an attempt to dispense with the services of the renter. Economically, we believe that in the long run this will be found to be a fallacy, because it violates a fundamental law of modern trading. By the same process of reasoning we uphold the theory that on the Independent side the Independent renter must be taken care of.

These, then, are the main outlines of the scheme of the General Sales Company, so far as they have been presented to us since our issue of April the 16th. It is now a co-operative rather than a monopolistic scheme. It is not a money-making scheme on behalf of its promoters. It insures good quality of pictures. It gives the Independent renter a chance. It assures that the balance of profit shall be more evenly distributed. What we mean by this is that during the past seven or eight months the exhibitor and the manufacturer have got their fair share of profit out of the business and the renter has not got his. Now, it seems that the Independent renter is to be restored to his proper place.

Strictly from the point of view of economics we are bound to support such a scheme, which is founded upon the correct principles of trading. On abstract grounds no possible objection can be taken to it. So the matter stands at present. There has been no ratification of the scheme as yet. This we are told is to be sought at the meeting of the N. I. M. P. A. at Chicago on May the 6th next, where all the details of the scheme are to be threshed out. We reserve our final opinion upon this scheme until the result of that meeting is known.

"GENRE" MOTION PICTURES AND AN EXAMPLE.

Several days have now passed since we sat in a crowded metropolitan theater and enjoyed a long and varied program of vaudeville, interspersed with motion pictures, lecture and songs. With one exception, it is difficult for us to recall at this moment the different numbers of the program. We have a pleasant recollection of having admired some very beautiful slides which illustrated a sentimental song, the title of which we do not remember. We recollect chuckling over the very uncomplimentary remarks passed between two ladies in front of us on the fearfully bad acting in a one-act playlet. But the one number on that program that clings to our memory and which drew the most marked applause from a large and critical audience was—A MOVING PICTURE. True, there were other moving pictures on the program, but, dear reader, have you never visited an art gallery and one single picture that you saw was ever afterwards uppermost in your mind?

And, if you will recollect, it was a picture that TOLD A STORY. You may have admired beautiful landscapes, charming portraits, or even clever character studies; but the picture that stirred your emotions, that you carry away in your mind, that becomes a part of you, is the picture that told a story, or, in academical parlance, a genre picture.

The pseudo artist sits in his garret and turns out "pot-boilers" by the score—marines, landscapes of foreign climes—with no other inspiration save the four walls and the dollars in view. The real artist goes to the scene he essays to paint. He studies its varying moods—for there are moods in Nature. Having decided upon his mode of expression he follows the outlines of the scene before him sufficiently close to give the necessary touch of realism.

Ponder over this, some of ye would-be moving picture artists, for the day has passed for empiricism in moving picture making and you have to deal with a public that has no sympathy with mediocrity. The public will no longer stand for brick houses, telegraph poles and mounted police in Greenland scenes, or Wild West thrillers perpetrated in New Jersey. If the picture does not tell a strong enough story to hold the interest undivided, the public at least look for realism. Studio scenes of outdoor subjects, however well done, rarely impress. In other words the moving picture artist must go to the scenes of his plot and get the atmosphere and realism.

But, as we have intimated, even the correct transcription of Nature is only the lowest form of art.

Shakespeare defined art as the "mirror held up to Nature." There is another definition by Emerson that we like better and it more fittingly applies to the picture we have in mind: "Art is Nature passed through the alembic of man." Shakespeare's definition may be very fittingly applied to the average motion picture, but how few there are to which Emerson's definition can be justly applied! How few motion picture plays there are that give evidence of having been distilled through a master mind! Or, what is equally good or even better, distilled through several intellects.

Last week we drew attention to the pictorial aspect of art in motion pictures. There are many forms, many grades and many classes of pictorial art and these all have their parallels in motography. The allegorical and historical pictures are in a class by themselves. They call for an outlay of patient research for accuracy of detail, but the poetic or creative opportunity is negligible. It is in the genre picture that the moving picture artist can best show the working of his own mind—"the alembic of man." It is the genre picture that stirs the emotions and clings to the memory of the spectator, such a picture as "The Way of the World," which swayed the emotions of the large audience referred to above and every detail of which is yet fresh in our memory.

"The Way of the World" tells a story of a reclaimed life with a force of expression that is convincing. This is strengthened by the realism of the ancient cloisters of San Gabriel Mission and the rugged life of the laborers in the field. It is accentuated by the sharp contrasts between godliness and sin, the former handled with due reverence and the latter delicately, even in its ugliest aspect. The poetic mind is evident in the deft touches that symbolize man's inhumanity to man and woman—which is "the way of the world." But although this great picture may have emanated from one mind, we do not detract from the artist's skill or betray confidences when we say that double distillation in the alembic of other minds is responsible for its being fairly beyond criticism. Moving picture art is so many sided and so exacting in its requirements that critical discussion is required in the studio over a picture before it is signed, sealed and delivered. This is the rule in the studio which told the story of "The Way of the World," and told it so plainly, so artistically and so convincingly, that the spectator cannot fail to understand and appreciate it.

Coming so closely on the heels of another genre masterpiece, "Thou Shalt Not," the highest average of quality surely belongs to the Biograph Company and the world at large is indebted to these able exponents of this modern art.

J. P. CHALMERS.

Curiosities of Independence

The kaleidoscopic changes that are taking place in the moving picture field are bringing about some curious situations. Each day brings forth its crop of rumors, chiefly in respect of movement, and movements, towards "independence." This manufacturer or that renter or that theater is going, or has gone, Independent. This is the kind of news that is reaching us nearly every morning with almost the same regularity as our bottle of milk.

A year ago very few renters went Independent. They were made Independent by logical events. They had no alternative. There were, however, some voluntary Independents, who last year fought their own battles with little or no assistance from Independent manufacturers, because, as a matter of fact, until about last August there were practically no Independent American manufacturers to supply Independent renters with films.

But now the situation has changed. There are several Independent manufacturers. Also there are renters either voluntarily or involuntarily going Independent. A very curious situation has developed out of this. The stalwarts, who went voluntarily Independent last year, view with a certain amount of lack of sympathy, the fact that some men are going Independent now who remained licensed just as long as they could get licensed films. Indeed, we have heard talk of possible objection of voluntary Independents to involuntary Independents.

This is a phase of the matter not foreseen by anybody. Yet, now that it has arisen, it has to be dealt with. We shall be curious to see the issue of it. We are for freedom of trade all around. On the other hand, it seems a bit hard that those who win a battle should not enjoy all the fruits of it. That is the position of affairs which is exciting some little attention.

Vaudeville in Moving Picture Theatres.

By Robert Grau.

No greater injustice can befall the moving picture industry than a perpetuation of the present policy of presenting vaudeville acts in the theaters which came into being as a result of the tremendous vogue of motion photography. Temporarily the public created by the greatest factor in the history of entertaining may welcome the intrusion, but the situation is characterized by features which may well cause serious thinkers who have the future of the world's greatest amusement attraction close to their hearts, to look on in amazement, if not alarm.

It was not vaudeville or any part of that phase of the general amusement scheme which revolutionized the theatrical map and brought into being 30,000 new places of amusement within three years. It was the moving picture, almost despised by the vaudeville manager and used by him as a "chaser" more often than not. Half of New York's best theaters, no longer able to find a source of maintenance, were made paying institutions through the medium of the motion picture. The writer recalls how, on the opening night of Lumiere's Cinematopraphe at Keith's Union Square Theater in July, 1894, he was one of a group who sat spellbound and enthralled at the extraordinary spectacle then on view. That night, J. Austin Fynes made the prophecy that within a full decade vaudeville would have to reckon with this new factor—or be obliterated by it.

That Mr. Fynes' view was also held by Messrs. Keith & Proctor we know now, for they have turned six of their seven theaters in the Manhattan district into moving picture theaters, and the Fifth Avenue Theater is maintained for vaudeville solely that the booking system of which Mr. Keith is the head may have a metropolitan outlet.

I have made observations carefully since the policy of adding acts of vaudeville in these theaters has been inaugurated and have found that while the expenses have been vastly increased the receipts have not kept pace with the new condition, and in cities where theaters are yet conducted on the old policy of strictly picture exhibits those of this class are in greater vogue than ever. Of course a new policy in its early stages will arouse large interest, but on every hand one may hear protests, while time is certain to develop a state of affairs which will admit of no remedy. Already the methods which brought on the original stampede are gradually being shifted.

Every day that this mode of procedure prevails in the motion picture industry is one day nearer for the wishes of vaudeville managers to reach realization. Every vaudeville act added to the program in theaters, resurrected from doom by the men who turned them into gold mines with the aid of the camera man, is a double step in the retrograde march backward.

Men like Marcus Loew, Wm. C. Gane, William Fox and others who have seen their names emblazoned to fame and their fortunes expanded to great proportions, make the error of their lives if they permit their ambitions to defeat them in their operations. The day will come when audiences will "flop" from their theaters to the bigger establishments. The difference in price is growing smaller. These men have created millions of new theatergoers, their service has been public spirited and ennobling, but let them take heed ere it is too late.

The moving picture itself needs no protector, it is here for all time and its vogue will increase, but there is certain to come in the wake of all this vaudeville introduction a new era for the motion picture and with it will trail along a new set of managers who will build enormous sized theaters, and present only films.

Every manager with the least tendency towards showmanship in his makeup will realize the situation as it is. A rising generation of moving picture showmen is looking on; they will come into the field which their predecessors enriched for them and when a return is made to first principles the two will be found in competition. We know that one faction can't lose.

There is a saying, "We do these things better in France," which is strikingly appropriate in view of these impressions. The stars of the Paris opera are found posing for moving pictures, while Bernhardt, Rejane and Mounet Sully, names that have been used in America to conjure our public at double prices, are actually seen interpreting the important roles of their illustrious careers almost within a stone's throw of the theaters they glorify; yet they are glad to succumb to the temptations which it is possible for the big European corporations to offer for the despised moving picture. Verily, vaudeville is not needed in Paris to add to the effect.

PICKING A SHOW.

In his article in these columns, in the issue of April 9, Brother Rothapfel has taken the words out of my mouth and robbed me of a theme I had been nursing for some time past, namely, picking a show.

On second thought, his article might be more properly termed "arranging a show" than selecting it, and I am grateful to Brother Rothapfel in that he did not exhaust the subject in one writing, but rather gracefully paved the way for further discussion of that very important distinction between a real exhibitor and a "rube," the ability to pick a show and pick it right.

I attribute no small measure of my local popularity as an exhibitor to the care I always took in selecting a well balanced program. One of my strongest guiding principles was the title of one of Geo. M. Cohan's songs, slightly altered, "Always Leave Them Laughing When They Say Good-bye." Send them out laughing and they'll come back again for more. Send them out weeping and soon you will find them avoiding your place without their really knowing why.

Many years' experience in show business before moving pictures came around taught me by instinct how to conduct a show when I first found myself an exhibitor of moving pictures. Selecting a program was a matter of second nature to me to which I gave little thought until I came into contact with some of these wise (?) operators and exchange men, a very few of whom had ever trouped with a show in their lives. Green hands, entrusted by managers with all the importance and delicate task of selecting the evening's entertainment.

Please don't think I'm down on operators on account of that kidding article of mine a few weeks ago, called "A New Race of Degenerates." That was a case of "If the shoe fits, put it on." Quite a number put the shoe on and I have been soundly whacked by no less personages than Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S., F. A. Richardson and operators by the score.

However, to repeat, much of my popularity was due to the pains I took in selecting the programs. Patrons often told me that they never enjoyed pictures at any other place as they did at mine, and ventured to remark that I had a way of getting better pictures than the other fellows, when, as a matter of fact, I was getting the same thing, as everybody knows. But one thing my patrons did not know was about the daily scraps I used to go through at the exchange to get what I wanted.

Invariably the bone-headed sauerkraut, whom I love very much, would hand me my two-subject reels with the comedies on first and the dramas last, and invariably I would wrangle and argue until I got them changed about. "Nobody vants de comedy last," pleaded my friend, his name, by the way, is Krousemeyer, I don't mind telling because this is a truthful article. "Everybody vants de drahma," he would say. "All pipples dey likes de drahma de last and dats vy it is how you git it vot it is." Weber and Fields never had anything on Krousemeyer.

Sometimes an East Side operator would get into the argument and say: "That's right, the people like the dramas last," and right there is where I would jump on the butter-in and make him prove the statement if he could. "How do you know?" I would roar, for it always got my goat to hear these one-season showmen telling what the people want. The answer was invariably evasive or non-committal; they couldn't tell why they thought so, but they thought so just the same.

"Now look here, old chap; were you ever with a show in your life?" I would ask.

"Not with a regular show," would be the usual reply.

"Then you admit you don't know anything about show business?"

"Well, not about regular shows, no."

"Can you give me your reasons for saying that the people want the program to close with the most thrilling drama you've got?"

"Well, not specially, only I think it's best to give them the strongest thing last—it sends them out excited."

"Oh, you think it's best, do you? I'm not asking what you think; what do they think—the audience? You haven't given me any reason at all for your argument; now I'll give you reasons for mine. What do you see in most of the heavy stage dramas, when the dramatist has brought his audience to tears and terror? He rounds it up with a quick turn of humor by the comedian that always seems twice as funny as it really is. Remember this, that it is always harder to make people weep after they have been laughing, than it is to make them laugh after crying, so if you want to get the best results out of your comedies, let them follow the dramas instantly and put your illustrated song just ahead of your full-reel drama."

If you want to know how true this is just happen around to some vaudeville stage door after the Monday matinee and hear the holler some actor with a pathetic act is making because he has to follow a screaming comedy act. What closes the show there? Pathetic playlet? Tell it to Krousemeyer.

Mr. Rothapfel's little program is eminently right. A scenic for an appetizer, a dramatic for a climax and a comedy for the anti-climax. At the beginning of a program an audience is in a quieter and more receptive mood because they have not had time to become restless. Those who do not like scenic pictures are willing to sit through them for the sake of what is to follow, while those who do like them are enjoying a treat. Remember there are a lot of different tastes to please.

But pray tell me, where are we going to get the scenics? The operators come in and declare that the people do not want scenics and consequently the exchanges do not buy them. And here we have the old trouble again. The operator or messenger, if you please, claims that the people do not want them, but it is safe to say that the poor public has not been consulted at all and the operator is once more following his own likes and dislikes as a criterion of what the people want. Meanwhile his manager is either too busy or ignorant to notice this state of affairs.

By the time the heavy drama is over the audience is more or less excited and restless, and it becomes necessary to change their mood, not by giving them more drama, but by swinging in with your rippling comedy. If the next reel is half drama, then that drama should be on the reel first in order to finish with the comedy.

Georgie Cohan is a good showman. His judgment is good enough for me, and I believe in the wisdom of his little song, "ALWAYS LEAVE THEM LAUGHING WHEN YOU SAY GOOD-BYE."

THE SINGING AND TALKING PICTURE.

WHAT IS ITS FUTURE?

The passing of the Cameraphone Company closed an interesting and important chapter in the history of the moving picture. Two years ago it seemed, chiefly by the agency of this company, as if we were on the eve of the realization of an old dream of the inventor, that is, the combination of the phonograph with the moving photograph. In other words, of offering to the public what is known as the singing and talking picture. But with the disappearance of the Cameraphone Company from the field, we seem to be suffering a setback in the realization of this dream.

On the other hand, the line of practical work is by no means extinct. In the first place, there is the Gaumont Chronophone, which is popular with audiences in the United States. We heard and favorably commented upon this beautiful piece of apparatus about a year ago. Yet curious to tell, it does not seem to have made its way into the moving picture theater of New York City, and we do not hear so much of it in the country as we should like to. Then there is the Cinephone, which has been the subject, to say the least of it, of a somewhat varied, if not romantic, career in this country since its introduction here a year ago. Fourthly, there is a solitary moving picture house in New York City which gives a display of the singing picture known as the Fotophone. We allude to the Eden Musee, on Twenty-third street.

Matters then stand to-day pretty well where they stood twelve months ago. Perhaps on the whole they are more encouraging now than then, because of the added experience which American and other inventors have acquired It is not our present object to inquire as to why the Cameraphone failed. It seemed to be an excellent scheme for combining phonographic effects with those of the moving picture, yet it is the barest truth to say that it was not a public success. We saw and heard the system under conditions which inclined us to think that there was a great future for it. Apparently, however, it was before its time and has gone the way of many conceptions that are too previous.

From what we hear, public interest in the matter is by no means dead, so that the field before Messrs. Gaumont and the Cinephone and the Fotophone is as large as ever In our opinion the singing and talking moving picture is bound sooner or later to become a permanent feature of the moving picture theater. The immediate object of this article is to place on record the fact that public interest in the matter is not dead, and to advise the reader to keep himself on the qui vive with regard to probable early developments of these singing and talking pictures. Seen and heard under the best possible conditions these subjects are so real, so lifelike, and so attractive, that we never falter in our opinion that the inventive mind will overcome the practical difficulties that are at present in the way, and so pave the ground for the commercial and artistic success of the combined phonograph and photograph.

Reference to the subject would be incomplete without mentioning the fact that it is generally understood the Edison Company are at work in perfecting a synchronizing system for vocalized moving pictures. We do not know how far the company have progressed in their experiments, but it may reasonably be assumed that in due course they will put a satisfactory system on the market. This adds, then, a fourth possibility in the field. Since we started to write this little article we have heard further from Messrs. Gaumont on the subject, and they tell us that their Chronophone, under their recently inaugurated system of educating exhibitors and operators, is acquiring increased popularity. They are booking one-week shows in one theater in every town of New England, and, judging from the demand, they may have to send out other demonstrators. Several exhibitors have written us in glowing terms of the success of the talking picture and its drawing power on the week they had it. The New Bedford (Mass.) "Times" gives the Nickel Theater of that town a good boost on the excellence of the Harry Lauder pictures and the clearness of his songs on the Chronophone.

Answering our own question, then, which forms the sub-title of this article, we would say that the future of the singing and talking photograph is at this moment fuller of promise than ever it was.

Remarkable Demonstration of Moving Pictures.

The splendors of opera would naturally seem to be beyond the reach of the moving picture exhibitor. But the world does move, and progress in moving picture art is one of the wonders of the age we live in. The film manufacturers have proven that they are capable of doing full justice to the spectacular features—Edison has given us "Faust" and others, and the Vitagraph Company scored a recent success with "Elektra." The Moving Picture World has for some time been urging the exhibitor to rise to the occasion and present the work of the film manufacturer in suitable surroundings and with appropriate musical accompaniments. This seemed to be the one thing needed to place this form of entertainment on the highest plane and command the patronage of the better and more intelligent classes.

We do not like to blow our own horn, but we may be allowed to quote the remark of a leading film manufacturer that "the Moving Picture World is the one paper that has led the way by precept and suggestion to better things and higher ideals."

We have worked for and with the exhibitor and find the majority of them ready to fall into step in the march of improvement.

Not even our meanest traducer can deny the fact that the highest pinnacle of perfection yet reached in moving picture exhibition was witnessed last week in Chicago, and due to the efforts of the Moving Picture World. No Judas can rob Mr. Bradlet, our Chicago representative, of the credit and glory of having engineered this brilliant success. When he found that the Orpheum Theater was making great effort to show good pictures with appropriate music and sound effects, he encouraged and helped them. It was a comparatively easy task, as both Mr. Levine, the manager, and Mr. King, the music director, were only too glad to do all in their power to improve their work. The American Film Service, who supply the program to the Orpheum, also entered into the spirit of the thing, and possibly to their loss, as the system of standing orders does not allow either renter or exhibitor to be guided by quality in the selection of the programme.

The result of Mr. Bradlet's work and suggestions was that Chicago theatergoers had the pleasure of witnessing the most unique and impressive moving picture show that has yet flitted across the screen.

The Film Story.

"The Penitent of Florence" is a film that lends itself to the use of impressive music and sound effects. The scenes are laid in the beautiful city of Florence, in the eleventh century. There are three prominent characters, mother and two sons of whom she is boastfully proud. A fit of jealousy rouses the temper of one when he sees the other serenading the lady of his dreams. He grapples with the serenader and fells him to the ground. With the dreadful thought that he has killed his brother he runs and confesses to his mother, who rebukes him for his hideous crime and he slinks away into the world, an outcast. Lorenzino, however, recovers, but Gillio, not knowing this, keeps in hiding and broods over his crime. We find him amongst the merry-makers of the city who thrust wine upon him and he falls asleep, only to dream the truth. His dreams are presented in the picture, which shows him in the days that are past, in company with his mother and brother in the holy sanctuary. He wakens and hurries to Florence and arrives at the cathedral during the holy festivities of Good Friday; he sees his brother led in by the mother, who both seem to pray for his return. The penitent hears the familiar voice of his brother in the rendition of the Alleluia alone; he can hold back no longer, but hurries to his side and blends his charming voice with Lorenzino's, which brings us to the strong finale, the forgiveness of the "Penitent of Florence."

This picture in itself is a beautiful subject and its beauty was greatly enhanced by the rendition of appropriate music which added greatly to the charm. At the Orpheum every possible aid to the success of this film was given. The majestic tones of the organ blending with the deep, melodious harmony of the church-bell chimes, gave rest and repose to many a weary shopper and toiler along State street who was reminded of Longfellow's pretty comment on the restful powers of music:

> "And the night shall be filled with music,
> And the cares that infest the day
> Shall fold their tents like the Arabs,
> And as silently steal away."

At the very first scene, the spectators were amazed. Instead of hearing ragtime music on a piano, they heard the organ pealing the melodious notes of Gounod's "Pontifical March." To complete the church atmosphere, Mr. King had arranged a set of muffled chimes, giving the perfect illusion of bells ringing in the belfry. Another great surprise was sprung on the audience as the two young men appeared in the choir loft; the spectators were spellbound at hearing the soft voices coming from behind the curtain.

SAMUEL I. LEVIN,
Manager of the Orpheum Theater, Chicago. The first house to give a specially arranged musical program with the pictures.

WILLIAM E. KING,
Orchestra Director, who arranged the special musical program for the Gaumont masterpiece, "A Penitent of Florence."

THE ORPHEUM, THEATER, Chicago, Ill.

It was so realistic that persons unfamiliar with motion pictures were sure that the boys shown on the screen were the real singers. Mr. King had arranged to make the scene of the serenade under the window of the lady as true as possible. The orchestra stopped so as to respect the silence of the night, and, when the boy shown on the screen started to serenade, we heard a mandolin in the orchestra.

Talk of all your phonographs, synchronizers, etc.; none can approach the clever work of the Orpheum Theater!

As it would take pages to describe this remarkable rendition, let us say that Mr. King had adapted a special selection for each scene from the best known composers and that every effect was rendered with the minutest details, making the rendition realistic. It was no more a moving picture, it was what one could term an opera; it was a delicious musical treat which called for numerous favorable comments from the spectators. To use an expression freely heard as folks were leaving the theater, "It was sublime."

The fact that the theater was packed at the evening shows is a proof that the well-satisfied patrons of the Orpheum Theater had circulated the good news.

Letters praising the show have been received at the New York and Chicago offices of the World. The Orpheum people say that it outclassed the Roosevelt picture show and had it beaten in receipts. Mr. Bradlet has been approached by other Chicago exhibitors to engineer similar performances. But this one was only undertaken to demonstrate what can be done—and what will be done when more intelligent and unselfish men are in control of the rental and exhibiting end of the business.

DE-E-LIGHTED.

A most pleasant surprise came to us on the 19th of the month, in the shape of a postal card from the Moving Picture World calling our attention to that paper's convenient light for all that is good in moving pictures and especially requesting us to attend a "Moving Picture Show De Luxe" at the Orpheum Theater, to see the Gaumont masterpiece, "A Penitent of Florence," presented with the special musical program arranged by W. E. King, the director of the Orpheum orchestra.

We found upon inquiry that Mr. Bradlet, the Chicago representative of the paper, was the originator of the clever card and that the World had mailed like messages to the number of several thousand.

Needless to say, we were wonderfully pleased to be a representative of the "advanced state of the Art at the present."

LEROY T. GOBEL,

the genial press agent of the Kleine Optical Company, who, as a connoisseur of good motion pictures, took a great interest in the special show at the Orpheum Theater and helped to prove the excellent quality of the Gaumont productions. The success of many a film is due to the personality of the optimist, who introduces them to the audience in a manner that is convincing.

A few nights ago I was stopping in front of a film exchange and the following was handed me, evidently by a person who had identified me with the "Man-About-Town." I turned it over to the editor and he, in turn, turned it over to me for reply:

"Man-About-Town: You tell us to look for the bug-a-boo man. That is all right. Every operator should at all times be able and ready to qualify whenever called upon. He should also set a good example for the 'grinders' who will, in time, apply for a license; but suppose a man who is perfectly qualified goes before the board and is turned down—what can he do? What I want to know is, can a man who has the qualifications present himself to any other body after the electrical board of the city department turns him down? By answering these few questions you will accommodate many operators, including Yours truly,

"AN OLD TIMER."

In replying to this I want to say that I firmly believe no old timer has failed to pass an examination before the local (New York) board of examiners. I also wish to say that the majority of the cases that have come under my examination recently have conclusively shown that a great many operators are bluffs, working for cheap money, and preventing qualified men from getting what belongs to them. In this connection I wish to say that there are a number of operators in the union who have no more right to be there than some men have the right to be President of the United States. I am not violating any oath, or pledge of secrecy, when I say this. I am telling the unvarnished truth. I believe that the course of events will eventually prove, that it is better that one hundred qualified operators should compose a union, than have two hundred and fifty comprise an aggregation. Quality, not numbers, counts. It is for this reason that I endorse the policy of the electrical board. Too many exhibitors have had relatives who have been able "to run a machine." In other words, "I pay for my films and if I burn them up I will pay for them; my brother-in-law is a good man, and I trust him." Yes, he may be the best man on earth, but you must not put the picture business on a par with the chestnut roaster. You may turn the handle of the roaster and put the product in a bag, but the time is past when you can run the films in a bag. The time is past when you can get a machine and films into your house and tell your brother-in-law, or your son, to go to supper and you will run the machine while he is gone. The boo-ge man is around. And let me tell you he is not there to hold the job for the union man. He is there in behalf of the city department as well as the Board of Fire Underwriters, who represent the various insurance companies.

There are many people in this world who think that influence beats the law. In nine cases out of ten it does—for a time. But at a critical period a cog slips and then the smart one finds himself stalled. The safest way is always the best. I was reading the other day about an elephant connected with the Barnum & Bailey circus faltering upon crossing the (new) Manhattan Bridge for the reason that it had been accustomed for years to crossing the old Brooklyn Bridge. I am willing to give the elephant all due credit for its reputed sagacity, but at the same time I look upon the report as a bit of astute press work, for the reason that an elephant will always test to its own satisfaction the strength of a bridge before crossing it, and no doubt could enter the elephantine mind as to the Manhattan Bridge. Now, I am not boosting the city, nor the builders of the new bridge, but I use the simile as a tip to operators. The turning of the handle of a projecting machine can be done by a baby. The real operator knows his machine and all its connections. He can overcome a slight mishap when a novice will lose a show. If his employer decides to discontinue the use of one machine he has enough intelligence to be able to install another without the assistance of a specialist or an expert. In other words, the true operator is a man who knows when he reaches a bridge; and the honest one is the man who has sense enough not to cross the bridge when he is in doubt as to his ability. I believe I voice the sentiments of all union operators when I say there are many among them who do not know a bridge from solid ground, and in voicing that sentiment I am convinced that the city department is actually, if not consciously, co-operating with the union operators in cutting out applicants who cannot toe the scratch.

One point must be considered: A qualified operator is worth a dozen who are not qualified. The qualified man will, in nine out of ten cases, run an entire season without the least concern or worriment to his employer. More than that, being on a union wage scale, he will frequently do, and suggest, things that will more than repay his employer for the difference in salary for first-class labor. Many exhibitors do not realize this, but it is a fact.

* * *

Labor journals and labor advocates are in abundance. It is a pity that better judgment is not shown by some of them. I want to say that the element supervising the moving picture operators have displayed the keenest judgment. One great stroke for the benefit of all that they have made is the co-operation with the municipal authorities in the matter of operators. And I want to say this (I have it upon good authority): The examination of applicants to the union is more strict than that applied by the municipal department. This is no reflection upon the latter. It is simply that the union operators are naturally, on account of their varied and actual experience, better qualified to examine applicants. I can plainly see that this declaration may invoke a challenge from the municipal department. I have but one answer: Let that department enforce a rule that it will not admit to examination an application who cannot produce a certificate that he has passed an examination by the union.

Of course, I can see an immediate objection to this, namely: If a man does not wish to join the union he cannot pass an examination, and this is against public policy, because the municipal board only recognizes citizens, and not any particular class. But who are better qualified to test an applicant than the practical men? If there is so much in the qualification, does it not pay the applicant to join the union? He is not bound to stay there. It is not the purpose of the union to kill a qualified man, but, as I understand it, to keep out of line unqualified men who get licenses to the detriment of men who are qualified.

I have before me copies of a paper that assumes to be the champion of the operators, and in every case find the main arguments are directed towards getting operators "into line." Swell the ranks, as it were, and increase the subscription list. That is not an honest policy. The main point is to tell the truth. It is better to have one hundred operators who are qualified and for whom you are willing to vouch than to have a bloated population of eight hundred. If I were the managing editor of the Moving Picture World I would rather have fifty paid-up subscriptions of bona fide operators than have five hundred borrowing readers who were in doubt as to whether they could pass an examination. To my mind that is the spirit that leads to success in all quarters. It is not quantity—but quality. You may brag about being the friend of the operator, but he is just as cute and keen as any in the business. There are many operators that have more intelligence and know more than the men who run the shows. Unfortunately, some of them get a swelled head and make a mistake in showing this. But the fact still stands that in all points of the game, quality, and not quantity, should be the guiding rule. I know of some operators who could manage shows in a manner that would eclipse fully sixty per cent. of some of the managers. But you know the way of the world—some are halt, lame or blind—and in this case it is the want of capital.

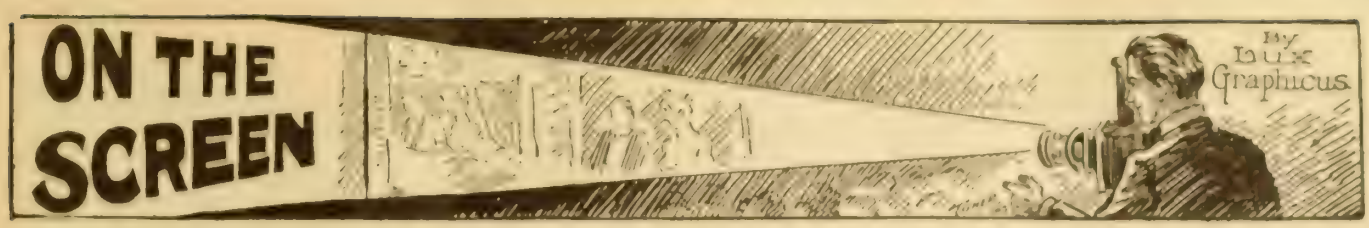
To go back to the original question, as asked by "An Old Timer," I would say I have nothing authoritative on the question, but I believe that if any applicant feels he has been unjustly turned down by the Department of Electricity he has the right to go before the Supreme Court and secure a mandamus for a re-examination. Of course, in such an event it is up to the applicant to test the bridge and satisfy himself that it (the examination) is safe—like the elephant.



The Roosevelt pictures—the genuine Roosevelt pictures—are the sensation of the hour in the United States. Interest in them is not likely to diminish for a considerable time. I should not be surprised if they are in vogue at the time when Mr. Roosevelt himself returns to this country in June. For interest in the remarkable man himself seems to be accumulative, and he will probably have the biggest reception of all, when, to quote the popular phrase, he "returns from Elba." Let us hope, however, that like the other great man who returned from Elba to France last century he will not meet with his Waterloo in his native land. Perish the thought!

As I have a remote personal interest in the personality of the producer of these pictures (I mean Mr. Kearton, who made the negatives), I have thought that it might heighten interest in them amongst the thousands of readers of The World if I say a few words this week about Mr. Kearton. It is many years since the Brothers Kearton, two British photographers, turned their attention to animal and bird photography. Amongst naturalists the work of these men in recording the habits and life of animal creation is justly renowned, even in the United States. Before Mr. Roosevelt left the Presidential chair, Richard Kearton paid him a visit at Washington and it is probable that on that occasion some arrangement was come to whereby Kearton was to have the opportunity of making moving pictures of Mr. Roosevelt's African wanderings.

The results of the Keartons is embodied in a series of beautiful books of British bird and animal life. One brother took the photographs and the other wrote the books. I have some of those books with me now, and they form very delightful reading. Moreover, I have had some experience in animal photography. I have taken photographs in Zoological Gardens, photographs of gulls on the wing, ducks, peacocks, horses and the like. So in a small way I know something about the practical difficulties of the work. The Kearton, however, soared higher than the majority of us who are content with making snap shots on terra firma of the animal kingdom.

What would you say to a man letting himself down by means of a rope three or four hundred feet on the face of a cliff, beneath him being the swirling waters of the North Sea, dashing on the rocks some hundred feet below? Slung around his neck would be the photographic apparatus, so that while being suspended in mid-air, he would have to manipulate the camera, open the lens on some rare wild fowl in its nest in order to make an exposure! This would require considerable nerve, would it not? Yet, it would be quite an ordinary achievement for Mr. Kearton. Or, again, what exemplary patience would be required for a photographer to secrete himself in an artificial tree for many hours, with the lens of the camera pointed through a little hole, in order that an exposure might be made on some timid bird or animal, who would be scared right away by the slightest sound of movement either of the man in the tree or the noise of the shutter on the camera. But this is the kind of work that Kearton cheerfully undertook in order to get his results.

The difficulties of making these African negatives were, of course, great. Then, the exposures being obtained, there was the carrying of the film through all sorts of climates likely to damage the sensitized ribbon and mar the effects to be obtained in development. Everybody who has had anything to do with photography in tropical and sub-tropical climates will know that the damp, humidity, and variation of temperature are factors which have to be reckoned with. Work of this kind has not the sweet simplicity of crank turning in the wilds of New Jersey for the purpose of making wild West dramas for presentation on the screen. Every allowance must be made for the difficulties which confronted Kearton in his work.

Years and years of photographing birds, animals and the like with the ordinary camera led Kearton by a natural process of transition to adopt the moving picture camera for his work, or part of it. Some time ago I read with interest that he had been successful in rendering the mechanism of the moving picture camera so noiseless in its action that he was enabled to conceal himself amongst the vegetation of the country side in order that he could obtain moving pictures of rare birds in their habits as they live. It will be seen, therefore, that Kearton brought to bear on his work in Africa a highly trained intelligence and unequalled knowledge of the difficulties to be encountered and surmounted.

That the Roosevelt pictures do not show the very highest kind of photography is therefore explicable on very simple grounds. Work of the kind is necessarily a compromise. The conditions are not under the photographer's control; he cannot pose his objects; he cannot control the light; he has to battle with circumstances that arise on the instant and are absolutely unforeseen. Therefore, from every aspect, the pictures must be considered a triumph of opportunist moving picture photography.

Another man who has made a name in the photography of birds and animals is Oliver Pike. Pathe, a little while ago, released a picture of his, illustrative of bird life, which was highly successful. Pike is another man who has turned his camera upon the animal creation with good results and, like Kearton, has translated himself from stationary work to moving picture work. It is probable that an audience when looking upon these pictures do not realize the difficulties of making them. With regard to the Roosevelt pictures, exhibitors generally do not seem to be aware of those difficulties. They, in fact, have not advertised them so well as they might have done. Very probably they have relied upon the personality of Mr. Roosevelt for attracting the public. I think they might have made more of the fact that the photographs were obtained under extraordinary difficulties. Whether the public cares to know or not is another matter. Possibly not. The public looks for results and does not concern itself much how they are obtained. I speak of the public generally; but there are enormous numbers of visitors to moving picture theaters who appreciate the technical difficulties of the work and are interested in knowing how those difficulties are surmounted.

While I am on the subject of Mr. Roosevelt and his wanderings, it is to be hoped that we may see in this country some moving pictures of the principal scenes of his European tour. I have not seen in any of the newspapers that moving pictures of him have been shown in Italy, France, Austria and the other places he has so far visited. But it is a tolerably sure thing that when he goes to London, which is the center of topical photography, on May the 15th next, many moving pictures will be made and shown in the music halls on that same evening. Here, then, will be the opportunity for somebody in this country to get pictures showing the kind of reception an ex-President of the United States receives abroad. It is the first time that an ex-President has had such a reception. It will be remembered that Grant went around the world and was made much of. But in those days photography had not reached its present zenith, and the moving picture camera was unknown.

From my point of view the European pictures of Mr. Roosevelt should be of just as much interest as the African pictures. Outside the moving picture theaters in New York City just now one reads the legendary inscription, "Roosevelt in Africa." And why not have a few reels devoted to "Roosevelt in Europe?" There are quite two months ahead of us before Mr. Roosevelt lands in New York. It is to be hoped that advantage will be taken of the hint I am here giving.

CHICAGO NOTES.

B. E. Clements, who represents the Sid Hester interests in Chicago and, in fact, all of the Eastern territory, returned last week from New York, where he has been spending a week in pushing his fight pictures to the front. He is elated over his successful visit and gives us news of his success in a statement that he has opened a New York office in the Holland Building, where he will direct exhibits throughout the New England States, Pennsylvania and New York. The Great Western Film Company, who manufacture the films for Messrs. Clements and Hester, will, beginning with the 15th of May, issue regular releases in addition to the special fight pictures. The next fight picture release will be that of the McFarland-Welsh bout to be held soon in London, England.

Extensive preparations are now under way for the exhibition of the Hester fight pictures in Europe. Mr. Clements seems very enthusiastic over this new venture, which bids fair to prove a most successful one. It is a known fact that very few large matches are "pulled off" in Europe, and the fight fans being just as thick there as here, it looks like a winning move for the Hester people. As proof of the interest of the Europeans in this sport, we cite the plan of an Englishman, which was recently published in one of the daily papers. It appears that some aggressive fan has made arrangements to charter a liner and carry a load of fans over for the Jeffries-Johnson fight, to take place in California on the 4th of July, 1910. This shows the interest displayed on the other side of the water in this sport, and Mr. Clements, realizing this, has made the above arrangements in order to satisfy the demands of the European public and give them the fight in his true-to-life pictures, which give as vivid a portrayal as the actual contest.

After a conversation on the future of his own interests, Mr. Clements was asked what his views on the general moving picture field were at present. His answer was rather short, but nevertheless bore weight. He predicts many radical changes in the near future and states that, in his opinion, the Independents' future is assured of success and that new life added to the Sales Company will place it permanently on the pinnacle of success.

E. E. Fulton, who is the Western representative for the Lubin films in Chicago, has recently opened spacious offices at 22 Fifth avenue, where he promises to surprise us with a model exhibit room of his own conception. It is his plan to exhibit the releases of the Lubin Company each week and establish a name for his model exhibit rooms among the exhibitors of the Lubin films in this city.

L. Zahler, manager and proprietor of the Liberty Theater, of Peoria, Ill., paid us a visit while in Chicago recently and told of his success in exhibiting feature pictures, and claims that these, when enhanced by the proper music and sound effects, bring forth the best obtainable results.

Homer W. Johnson, proprietor of the Lyric Electric Theater in Charles City, Iowa, sent the following letter of appreciation for the Imp films to Mr. Laemmle, of the Laemmle Film Service:

"Mr. Carl Laemmle, President,
"Laemmle Film Service,

"Dear Sir—I am showing 'His Second Wife,' and I feel that I want to thank you for producing pictures of this class. 'Imp' films are certainly doing their share in putting moving pictures in a place of permanency in the entertainment business. The serious part of running Independent service is that there are too few manufacturers that can, or do, furnish film service that is satisfactory to the better class of exhibitors. I hope you will keep on improving and meet with the success you deserve. Very truly,

"HOMER W. JOHNSON."

The Boston Theater, on Madison street, is the last of the houses along "Celluloid Row" to obliterate from their program the names of vaudeville performers, who have been playing there throughout the Winter. This move completes the list, so that Madison street is devoid of vaudeville and is given up entirely to films, to which they have added the expense saved by the omission of variety to better service and effects. If all managers of picture houses would realize this fact and give up their entire efforts to making their films a feature by the addition of special effects and music, they would find that their profits would rise.

Wm. G. Spurrier, proprietor of the Savoy Theater, of Seattle, Wash., dropped off for a visit in Chicago, on his way to New York City. It is his special and personal mission to determine for his own satisfaction the relation between the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance and the new Sales Company. He cordially invited us to visit his house in Seattle, which he claims to be one of the best equipped on the Coast.

Mr. Berkson, of the Roseland Theater, Chicago, is constructing a beautiful new theater at Indian Harbor, Mich. The question of a name for this new house was, for a time, quite a worry to Mr. Berkson, but as our Mr. Bradlet, in a previous article on the Roseland Theater, mentioned it as a typical "Family" theater, Mr. Berkson has decided to give this name to his new house.

The farmers are not the only ones to feel the loss caused by the December snow enjoyed at this late day, for all Chicago exhibitors are wearing long faces beneath fur collars, on account of the loss of patronage. We would suggest a correction in the old adage, "March winds and April showers," etc., to "March winds and April snows make it bad for picture shows."

CLARENCE J. PERFITT.

MR. CLINTON FINDS FILM MEN OF SOUTH OPTIMISTIC.

J. B. Clinton returned to Chicago last week from a tour of the Southern States, where he reports the film business, in most instances, in pretty good shape. In St. Louis, Mr. Clinton found the building laws so construed by the officials as to make them opposed to vaudeville in connection with the moving picture shows. The film business in St. Louis seemed in fairly good shape, there being two licensed and two independent exchanges. The innovation of the night inspection by the Western Film Exchange seems to have eliminated all the old-time morning confusion.

At Memphis, Tenn., Mr. Clinton spent most of the time with "Montgomery, the Moving Picture Man of Memphis," who had, just the previous day, bought out his only competitor. This man's whole life seems to be bound up in moving pictures, and Mr. Clinton is of the opinion that he will soon rise to international fame in the film world.

In New Orleans the licensed films are controlled by Pierce, while Fichenberg controls the independent. The business of both is prospering and they are in such shape as to entertain their guests in a most elaborate fashion. New Orleans is unique in one respect, that the downtown picture shows exhibiting independent films all charge 10 cents admission, while the licensed store shows charge but 5 cents. At Crawford's Theater during Holy Week the Vitagraph subject, "The Life of Moses," was packing the house, day and night. Many other men who had not thought of this appropriate film for Holy Week seemed rather sore to think that they had not realized the situation and obtained it.

Houston, San Antonio and El Paso, Texas, were revelations. Houston seems to be enjoying a real estate boom both central and suburban. The influx of the Northerners seems responsible for the suburban boom, while the moving picture houses deserve the credit for the boom downtown. Mr. Clinton relates many instances of Western life along the road from El Paso to Los Angeles, which touch somewhat along the lines of "Diamond Dick" and his adventures.

In Los Angeles he found three licensed exchanges and several independent, each trying its best to down its competitor. On both sides business seemed prospering, for in all 5-cent theaters, as a general rule, four first-run films are exhibited. A week was spent in 'Frisco, where reports show that the rental conditions are worse than anywhere in the United States. Mr. Clinton was told by one licensed exchange man that he hoped the officers of the Patents Company would soon realize that there was a Far West. One incident of importance that happened during Mr. Clinton's stay in 'Frisco was the fight between the soldiers and sailors and the police of 'Frico, in which the local authorities came out with colors flying. Mr. Clinton seems extremely sorry to think that this fight occurred at night, so that it was impossible to cinematograph this event.

In Seattle, Wash., and Portland, Ore., the independents are completely disorganized. Mr. Clinton feels that with the cooperation of our Eastern film manufacturers the South will soon become as important and successful in the field as the Eastern States are to-day.

The Motograff Company, of Philadelphia, a new manufacturing concern, promises to begin selling in about a week. Mr. Graff, the president of the company, was in New York this week and said that they had a finely equipped plant in one of the fashionable suburbs of Philadelphia and that neither effort nor expense would be spared to make their product first class.

MOVING PICTURE MACHINES.

By F. H. Richardson.

Very few there are who realize the difficulty of making a motion picture projection machine or the cost of even getting ready to make one. Simple as is the mechanism, every part must be made and fitted with the utmost nicety to secure the best possible result on the curtain. To a great extent the making of the different parts is automatic; that is to say, the operations are largely done in a semi-automatic way. Aperture plates, fire shields, shutters, gates and practically all the thin metal parts are punched out. The cost for dies to do this work alone runs up into the thousands of dollars. The frame as it reaches the factory is a rough casting upon which more than a dozen operations are necessary before it is ready to receive the various parts it is to support. Each one of these operations must be done just exactly so, too, or there will be trouble when it reaches the fitters. It is introduced to emery wheels, files, milling machines, grinding machines, drills and what not, until finally it reaches the fitter's bench just exactly like all its predecessors, to the thousandth of an inch, in so far as the various shaft holes and dressed surfaces are concerned. It is really wonderful how such accurate work is possible on a rough piece of cast iron of awkward shape, but to the machinist this is a mere trifle. The many shafts must all be turned up to the thousandth of an inch and the bushings must fit their holes precisely. Each little screw hole must be made exactly in the right place and made to receive a certain sized screw easily, yet snugly. The Geneva movement must fit to a nicety, and when the whole machine is finished it must run like a sewing machine, giving precisely the result that it is made for and expected to give. The changing of the model of a machine entails the outlay of hundreds and perhaps thousands of dollars for new tools and dies, so that naturally the manufacturer is exceedingly careful to know that his proposed "improvement" is indeed such. Even minor changes in a machine may not be the simple matter one would suppose. It may require the changing of expensive dies or perhaps the making of entirely new ones, even though the proposed change be very slight. This explains why manufacturers are slow to adopt suggestions for change. The suggestion may be excellent, still it may not be of sufficient benefit to justify expensive changes in dies, patterns, etc. It would be an eye-opener to the average operator or exhibitor to go through some large picture machine factory. They would entertain a higher respect for the manufacturer and treasure and care for their machine as they would an expensive watch.

MAKING A SENSATIONAL FILM IN PARIS.

"Stroller," in "The Kinematograph," describes a visit to the works of the "Editions des Films Negatifes," Paris, where he saw the making of a sensational film. We condense the essential parts of his interesting account:

Can my readers imagine a structure, he writes, 36 metres long by 20 metres wide, built of thin ironwork, and entirely walled and roofed with specially prepared glass? This was the first portion of the works that I visited with Mr. Harry Ray, the secretaire-general of the company, who claims to be a Scotsman, but can only speak a word or two of English. In this huge structure eight different scenes can be prepared at one time—and, mind you, not ordinary scenes which would have a dead appearance when filmed, but wonderfully airy and complete apartments which have unique stereoscopic effects when projected.

For instance, take a drawing room scene that I saw in use. Here we had a full sized room furnished with every detail of a mansion. At the back the beautiful conservatory opened on to a real landscape garden, with real trees and plants, and a fountain, from which stone steps lead to a kitchen garden. The perspective was for close on 100 yards, when looking in this direction, and yet a door on the right led to a real dining room which was being laid for dinner by a footman, and we could see doors opening from this room to the hall and to the library. The actors were flitting from one room to the others, men were at work in the garden, a lady was gathering flowers in a recess of the conservatory, and the ensemble gave the impression of reality and life which could not fail to leave its mark on the production. Little details such as real flowers, real froth when the champagne was opened, real canary in the bird cage, showed us with what determination the management catered for success. It was an important lesson for those makers who wish to survive competition.

I was indeed fortunate in witnessing the bedroom scene from a new series called "Doctor Fantoame," which was being produced in three subjects for Urban, Raleigh & Roberts. M. Isnart, the artistic director of the Hippodrome, was in charge of the scenes, and as a clever artistic and picturesque scene rehearsal could note only the actresses' movements for the particular scene to be enacted. Time after time the leading lady of the Theatre Cormier returned to her room after presenting another woman's types and she made to enter with wild, mixed sentiment, until her perfect performance sent a thrill of excitement through each onlooker, and then to the whir of the camera the record was taken—only too fast, which was twice photographed in order to secure nothing but the best.

The patience, tact and ability of each member of the staff were surprising. A rug was changed, the position of the toilet glass altered, even such a small point as the shifting of the powder puff from off to right of the toilette table, when the actress, having somewhat calmed her feelings, looked at herself in the glass and calmly powdered her face where tears of remorse had left their stain, were suggested by the interested actors waiting their turn, and each strove to suggest improvements or modifications to the stage manager. No question of getting through in the quickest time, but all attempting to obtain the best and most perfect result.

I went to the scenery store and saw men painting and building scenes in a novel fashion. Each scene could be altered to six variations, being built of interchangeable sections. Thus, a marble staircase can quickly be converted into a rickety wooden one leading to a garret, or the style can be altered from Louis XIV. to a modern type. A window in a scene is altered to a doorway, a blank wall can be hung with pictures and converted into a library or kitchen, etc., with astonishing ease. Scene painters, carpenters, upholsterers and mechanics are on the spot to manufacture material not already included.

I next went to the property rooms, the dressing rooms, the stores, the wig room, the kennels (where I saw poodles, terriers, and a huge ferocious mastiff), and to many other necessary adjuncts, but was particularly interested in the gardens. Perhaps no other ground has been converted to so many varied purposes. You can have to order a real terrace garden, an old world garden with its stone well and arbors; a modern landscape garden, an orchard with real fruit trees (and I picked some peaches from the loaded trees and enjoyed their luscious reality myself), a market garden, or a slovenly back yard or farm with real animals. Characters could walk a distance of half a mile, the effect in the film afterwards being absolutely natural. I was also struck by seeing a curious brick wall, in appearance at least 400 years old, built before my eyes of property cork bricks.

One would think the establishment would finish here and that the mechanical part of the concern would play a small part in the establishment, and yet I found that the whole of the mechanical and photographic apparatus is specially manufactured at the engineer's shop and laboratories on the estate. In the former were eight men with the most modern machinery, such as lathes, drills, planes, etc., all driven by electricity. I was introduced to the head engineer, who explained a new camera he had invented, the use of which would be restricted to this particular firm. By a simple turn of a screw the size of the shutter could be increased or decreased, and the lenses could be changed without opening the compact camera. Every picture taken was registered and every inch of film counted. The photographer could go back to any particular picture, and all was driven mechanically. Then, too, the printer was made on the premises. So struck was I with the many improvements that I offered to purchase the English rights, but they knew the value of their improved mechanism and they would not allow it to go from the firm. I was fortunate in this machinery hall to find an English mechanician, who had been resident in Paris for fifteen years. From him I learned a lot, and I could see with what fascination he worked with his comrades in trying to originate apparatus which would prove advantageous to the firm and raise the standard of their productions.

I next passed on to the photographic department. In the developing room one could see how useful the engineer's shop had been by the curious appliances in use. Tanks were made to open in a special and curious manner; baths of chemicals, carefully labeled, of various strengths, were emptied at the top by specially constructed syphons; the whole place was tiled and exceedingly clean and contained special dark chambers and storage cupboards, whose uses I did not discover. The lift, which is "light tight," takes the films to the drying room—an enameled compartment built without corners, with air shafts, fans and electric heating apparatus, which allowed the 500 metres on each drum to be dried with air currents at a varying temperature. Here, again, special appliances were very much in evidence and cleanliness particularly noticeable.

OPERATOR'S COLUMN.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

A Bundle of Queries.—Bluffington, Ind., writes asking the following questions: (1) Have Edison machine in good condition, serial number 4,956; don't know model. Machine runs fine until a heavy patch goes through, when picture jumps badly on the screen and there is a clacking noise in the machine. Can feel the jerking in the handle. The lower loop also often is lost and sometimes it tears out the sprocket holes. Sometimes by turning the handle backward a quarter of a turn the lower loop is regained without stopping. Have tightened springs on tension rollers so that they exert more pressure on sprockets. This has stopped some of the annoyance but not all. (2) How do you take out a cam pin and put in a new one? (3) Would a worn cam pin or the sides of the star being worn cause extra loud clacking sound between star and cam? (4) In your articles you mention your handbooks. Would they teach me anything about operating? If so, how much is their cost? (5) Can you give me an idea as to what the examination one has to take to become a licensed operator consists of? (6) What are the "idlers" on a machine? (7) Does not the intermittent act sixteen times to each turn of the crank? (8) How many pounds pull does the intermittent exert in starting the film? (9) Is there a correspondence course for operators? (10) Do you know of any book that would be of assistance to an operator?

(1) A wide, heavy patch is likely to act just the way you describe in any machine, but you make a mistake in attempting to stop it by increasing pressure on the sprocket idlers (not "tension rollers," since their office is not to in any way produce tension). These idlers should be set away from the sprockets by a trifle more than the thickness of the film. Never allow them to ride the film, since this has a decided tendency to cause it, the film, to climb the sprocket teeth. It is quite possible that your lower loop is crooked. That is to say, the film does not leave the gate and pass down, around and up onto the takeup sprocket squarely. This would also help make it climb, thus loosing the lower loop. Not knowing the model of machine I cannot direct you how to overcome this, but the fault lies in the apron back of the loop. It is quite possible, too, that your takeup tension is too tight. This would have a decided tendency to cause your machine to loose its lower loop, especially when a bad patch goes through. Turning the handle backward to catch up the lower loop is mighty hard on the film. I am inclined to think this latter is where considerable of your trouble lies. The takeup tension should be just enough to take up the film at the last end of the run and no more. Anything above this is bad from any and every point of view. I take it you are running pretty old stuff. The really best remedy is to look over your films and cut out the bad patches. That may not be practical, however. Watch your takeup tension closely. (2) You had best not attempt to remove and replace a cam pin. Get a whole new cam wheel is my advice. There is not one chance in a hundred that you could or would make a satisfactory job of putting in a cam pin. (3) Yes, most decidedly so. Get new parts. It don't pay to run a machine with badly worn parts. (4) The Moving Picture World will very soon issue a complete operators' and managers' handbook by your humble servant. The price will be $1.50. Send your money to The Moving Picture World and the book will be mailed you as soon as it is off the press. Yes, it will teach you many things. It ought to, at least. (5) You are examined as to your knowledge of electricity, lenses, wiring, appliances, the mechanism and your general knowledge of operating. (6) The rollers which hold film on sprockets and the rollers at top or bottom of film gate are "idlers." (7) Now look here, old man, why ask me that? Couldn't you turn the handle and count? Yes, in all standard machines the intermittent acts sixteen times to one turn of the crank. (8) It varies with the speed of the movement. With a six to one movement, the tension springs being just about right, the intermittent exerts about seventy-five (75) pounds pull in starting the film. This decreases as the speed decreases, of course. With the old two-pin movement, which was comparatively very slow, the pull was much less. (9) Yes, the Taylor School for Operators puts out an excellent correspondence course. Their address is 51 West Twenty-eighth street, New York City. (10) Answered in No. 4. This writer encloses four cents in stamps and requests reply by mail. Really, I have to laugh. A stenographer would charge him something like a quarter merely to copy off the reply as above.

Carbons Needle.—Sapulpa, Okla., writes setting forth his troubles as follows: "My carbons burn back from the point, sometimes as much as an inch or two. There are two other houses here and we all use current from the same generator. One of these houses and myself are using compensarcs and the other fellow has a rheostat for resistance. They both seem to be using more current than I do yet their carbons burn fine. The same trouble has existed in this house for a long time—long before I became its operator. Can you suggest a remedy or tell me what is wrong?"

I have not quoted all this letter, but sufficient to show what Sapulpa is up against. By "burning his carbons back," Sapulpa undoubtedly means what is called "needling." That is to say, his carbons burn to a long, slim point. This is caused by undue heating in the carbon, the effect of which is to burn out the binder and allow the carbon to drop away (disintegrate) without being consumed (volatilized) in the arc. Sapulpa will find a heap of fine, black carbon in the bottom of his lamphouse just under the carbons. Needling may indicate several things, or any one of several, rather. You may be using carbons which are too soft. You may be using carbons of poor quality. It may be that your transformer (Compensarc) is giving an excess of current, some error having been made in its construction (windings). I would suggest that you have the electric light company test your current flow with an ammeter, if possible. But first proceed as follows: With a file clean out the inside of your carbon arms thoroughly so that the carbon will make good electrical contact with the arms. Get a few of the other fellow's carbons and put them in your lamp for a trial. Let the other fellow try some of your carbons. Thus you will determine whether or no the fault is in the carbons themselves. If not, then it is pretty near a cinch that you are getting too much current. I assume that you are using ⅝ cored carbons, of course. Because the other fellow seems to be drawing more current than you it does not follow that it is the fact. Remember this: needling is caused by poor binder in the carbon or else by excessive heat in the carbons. The first is an easily discoverable fault, since one has but to try other carbons. The latter can be found by searching for the cause of the heating. I would be glad to hear the experience of other operators with needling.

A Bunch of Them.—New York City writes, propounding the following queries: (1) What size condenser should I use for 9 x 12 picture? Have 3½-inch G. M. lens. (2) Have bluish-white spot in center of picture. What is cause? Have tried condenser lenses of various focal lengths. Same trouble with them all. (3) How would you start to set up dissolving and moving picture machine? Which lens would you register first? (4) What size lens should be used for 9 x 12 picture at 60 feet? At 80 feet? (5) What size lens would project a 16-foot picture at each of the above distances? What size condensers should be used in each case? (6) How would you measure film approximately? (7) How many pounds pull does the intermittent exert in starting the film each time? Please find stamp enclosed for reply!

(1) You don't say whether it is 3½-inch back or equivalent focus, but two 7½-inch condensing lenses won't be too long in either case. (2) Probable cause is that you haven't your carbons set right and get a shadow from the lower tip. If this is not the case write again and I will go more deeply into the matter. (3) It doesn't make the least particle of difference. Set one lens to register where you want it and the other to match. That's all there is to it. (4) Instead of giving you the individual answers will tell you how to get them for yourself. To find out focal length of lens required to project a picture at a given distance, multiply throw (in feet) by width of aperture (in inches) and divide result by width of desired picture (in feet). Now to use this rule take 3 as the width of the stereo aperture, that being width of ordinary slide mat. The aperture in the moving picture machine must be carefully measured with a pair of inside calipers for accurate results. Usually it will be found to be about 15-16 of an inch. You would then have (first No. 4 query) 60 multiplied by 15-16, divided by 12. (5) The equivalent focal length of the condenser should, in theory, be the same as the equivalent focal length of the projection lens. But this is seldom or never the case. Would suggest you take a course in the Taylor School and learn to figure out all these things for yourself. (6) Run it through the machine and count turns of the crank. Standard moving picture machines pass precisely one foot of film at each turn of the crank. (7) Incredible as it seems, the pull is from 50 to 75 pounds, varying with pressure of tension springs and speed of intermittent movement. See answer to Bluffton, Ind. Letters will not be answered by mail unless one dollar is enclosed. They will then also be answered in The World for the benefit of all.

Size Lens, Etc. Fulton, N. Y., asks: We cannot get clear, white light. Are using a ——— coil for resistance. Arco carbons. Powers No. 5 machine. Throwing 40½ feet. Size of picture, 8½ x 11¼. What size is our projection lens and what size should our condensers be? Have a "ghost" in center of curtain.

You are using a choke coil and this is a mighty poor form of resistance. The writer never yet succeeded in getting good light from a coil. Better install a transformer (the Powers, Hallberg, General Electric, Edison, Bell & Howell and other companies make them) or, better yet, a motor-generator set such as is put out by the Powers Company. You have a 4-inch equivalent focus projection lens and two 7½ condensers will fill the bill nicely. It is quite likely you haven't your carbons set rightly and that the "ghost" is the shadow of the lower carbon tip which is interfering in the light from the upper crater. Mind you, I don't assert this to be the case, but most likely it is. I would recommend that you send in an order for the operators' and managers' handbook, to be issued by The Moving Picture World soon. It will have drawings showing just how carbons should be set, both for alternating and direct. Price $1.50.

Lens Difficulty.—R. F. Foote writes: "Have noted the difficulty of 'Belfast, Me.,' in regard to failure of stereo lens to cut clear to the edges of slide, and as this problem held me up for quite a while perhaps I can be of some assistance. It takes a lens of about 20-inch focus to give the size picture he mentions at a distance of 75 feet. By using a 6½-inch condenser to the front he will find that the light will cut clear to the edge of the slide. In my case this scheme worked well and solved the slide difficulty, but presented a new problem, inasmuch as the light focused at a point 6 or 8 inches in front, or beyond the aperture where it struck the film. In other words, it made two large a spot of light and much of the illumination on the moving picture was lost. I found it necessary to remove the clips which secure the lamphouse to the board of the machine and extend the lamphouse so that the front of the lamphouse is just at the back of the board which forms the base of the (Powers) machine. This focused the light just right for the moving picture and by moving the stereo lens back to focus the whole difficulty was solved. I enclose diagrams to make my remarks clear, and will be glad if the information is useful to a fellow exhibitor."

Belfast had a "half size" stereo lens. That was his trouble, but nevertheless I give this excellent letter space since it is of real value. I believe Brother Foote's idea is quite plain without reproducing the sketches.

Books on Operating.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "I am taking lessons in operating in this city and cannot understand the electrical terms. Where can I get books treating on practical electricity as applied to operating; how to figure ohms, resistance, amperage, voltage, etc? Want it in simple form. Have been unable to find such a work. Can you suggest one?"

The Moving Picture World will presently issue an operator's handbook which I believe will meet your needs. It will be complete, comprehensive and simple. Price $1.50. Send in your order and it will be sent you as soon as they are off the press. The instruction you are now getting must be something pretty fine—I don't think!

Look this Over.—Marshalltown, Ia., writes as follows: "We do not get a good light. Have an 80-foot throw, 6½-inch motion picture lens, 21-inch focus, have used two 6 and tried one 6 and one 7½-inch condenser. Can you tell what to do? Have A. C. current, Electric carbons, ⅝ soft C top and bottom 60 amperes 110 volts."

I have quoted the Marshalltown letter in full, just as it is written, that you may see what data is often given me from which to evolve the solution of a difficulty. No doubt Marshalltown fully expects me to give him helpful information, but how can I do so from the data at hand? He says he has a 6½-inch moving picture lens, 21-inch focus. Presumably he means that he has a 6½-inch moving picture lens (but he may mean either back or equivalent focus) and a 21-inch stereo lens. Presumably he is using a current saving device (transformer) of some sort and using it on its highest contact. Well, Mr. Marshalltown, I will do the best I can anyhow. If you have a 6½-inch moving picture lens, either equivalent or back focus, and a 21-inch stereo lens you should have not less than two 7½-inch condensing lenses. It may be that your carbons are not set right. Set them the same as for direct current, being very careful that they are in exact line sidewise and that the lower carbon tip is advanced just enough to make the crater on the upper carbon form as squarely facing the condensing lens as possible, but so that the lower tip does not come up in front of it and thus interfere with the light from the upper crater. Be very sure that your electrical connections are very clean and tight and that the wires inside the lamphouse are not charred from excessive heat. More than this I cannot say unless you send in more complete data covering your case. I am more than glad to help but I must have complete data in order to "prescribe" with any reasonable degree of intelligence.

A LETTER FROM A MAN WITH IDEAS.

By F. H. Richardson.

A few days ago I received a letter from a man out in Dakota, whom I have known for quite a while as a "man with ideas." He is one of those real operators who are not satisfied to merely turn a crank, but wants to know "what makes the wheels go round." In other words, Mr. Crowe is one of those men who study their business and are constantly experimenting and finding out things for themselves. In this letter he advances an idea and in so doing swipes a pile of my powder, for I have been figuring on taking this matter up for some time, but haven't gotten to it yet. The matter of having everything in exact line from arc to center of picture is of much importance, yet it is doubtful if one operator in a thousand ever even dreamed of such a thing as lining up his machine in any other way than by moving the whole machine until the register was where he wanted it. That is exactly the thing that should be done, too, so I guess I didn't put that very well. I should have said that they don't line up the condenser, aperture and projection lens so that they are each and all exactly square with each other. There, is that plain? Read Mr. Crowe's letter carefully. It is chock full of meat.

"Watertown, S. D.

"F. H. Richardson:

"Dear Sir—I notice that a number of operators are having trouble with their pictures being out of focus, their machines being in good condition. Allow me to express my humble opinion that much of the difficulty lies in lack of proper care of the films. A film that is too damp or too dry so that it buckles in or out as it passes the aperture will not give a perfect picture on the screen, of course. I have found no set rule for keeping film in good condition, since the temperature and humidity of each individual operating room is different, but with a little intelligent experiment any operator should be able to keep his film in proper shape so that they will remain perfectly flat. If his machine is in first class condition and perfect repair there will be no distorted pictures. Now, as regards the matter of poor light: I believe I am safe in asserting that there is not one out of ten machines throughout the country that you would find to be in perfect line from arc to center of picture on the screen. (You are perfectly safe, neighbor Crowe.) Unless the light travels through the center of the lenses in perfect line you cannot get a good light or perfect field, and most certainly not the full benefit of same at any rate. When I took my present position I found the machine badly out of line. The light was coming out of one side of the projection lens. The picture was sharp in its center with both sides off. Chicago Stage Lighting lamphouse with nothing to hold the condensing lenses in line, and they were ¼ inch off centers. It required 35 ampers from a 220 volt A. C. line to get a picture. After lining up the machine and fixing the condensing lenses I got a better illumination on 20 amperes and my pictures are bright and clear at all times. If you think this will be of any benefit to brother operators use what you think best of it, or ditch the whole thing.

"A. W. CROWE."

Easthampton, Mass.—The Majestic Theater, which is being built here by Henry Walz, will open about May 15, and will be one of the best equipped theaters in this section. It will have a capacity of 950, including boxes, and will cost about $25,000. The program will be mixed, pictures and vaudeville as a rule, with an occasional one-night attraction. Wm. D. Friel, now manager of the Bijou, will be in charge.

The Pittsburg Calcium Light and Film Company, Omaha, Neb., branch has moved to 1212 Farnam street, where they have taken an entire floor. This sounds like prosperity—and it is due to the demands of the exhibitor who clamors for the "Premier Film Service."

"A Child of the Sea" (Lubin).—A dramatic picture of the type which has been made popular by this house. Some of the scenes are picturesque, and all contain the essence of dramatic strength. While it doesn't tell a story of any special novelty it is, nevertheless, well told and the acting is sympathetic. The photography is clear and the operator performed his part of the work well.

"On Time for Business" (Lubin).—A comedy from the Lubin studio which contains much that is amusing. The difficulties which sometimes beset men when getting to business on time are graphically portrayed.

"The Parisian" (Pathe).—Dramatic, if not entirely pleasing. A blase man of the world, cynical and unattractive, is probably not an object to inspire much interest. When he blows out his brains one feels as though he had done the right thing. The use of a flower girl as a foil to make his cynicism and disagreeable characteristics more prominent is a good bit of dramatic work, though it doesn't leave a pleasant impression. In this picture we must commend the acting and pictorial work, though deprecating the use of such a subject.

"Venice" (Pathe).—Beautiful Venice, with its wealth of architectural beauties and wonders, brought to one's door. It is a marvelous film in many ways, and leaves an impression upon one almost as strong as the original scene. There is the Doge's Palace, and the Cathedral of St. Mark, and that center of Venetian life, the Square of St. Mark, has been photographed with an unusual appreciation of the beauties and marvels which make it notable. It is a travel picture well worth a place in the long list of similar films produced by this house.

"Mr. Mix at the Mardi Gras" (Selig).—A comedy from Selig which illustrates the adventures of Mr. Mix in a way that will satisfy the most fastidious individual.

"Gallegher" (Edison).—A good story by Richard Harding Davis, one of lively incident, but requiring too many subtitles to tell it. An office boy loses his job in a newspaper organization and recovers it by shadowing a suspected criminal who has lost one finger. We are not let into the secret of why the four-fingered gentleman was suspected of the crime, nor why this one in particular was suspected—there might be others similarly deformed—but those are mere details. The boy steals a cab in order to get the news to his office, and for this meritorious action he is given another chance. Probably many will remember with what delight they read this story by Richard Harding Davis when it first appeared, and probably if the truth were known, a good many who enjoyed it then have returned to it again and again since. It had that unexplainable quality which made it popular as soon as issued, and it has remained so ever since. In this Edison film the narrative is closely followed, and the picturesque portions are sufficiently emphasized to make them appear even more real than it does under the magic of Mr. Davis' pen. It is a story that lends itself acceptably to motion picture production, allowing opportunity for picturesque presentation. The work has been well done, and the film should prove as popular as the story has been. Further, it will stimulate interest in a type of story which should be even more popular than it ever has been before, a type which, like the film which reproduces this one, has elements of attractiveness beyond the ordinary.

"Paying Attention" (Gaumont).—A series of pictures showing how different persons under different circumstances listen to different stories. It is meant for a humorous picture, but it contains serious elements because it is true to life. The work is cleverly done, and even though it may be considered funny, really it depicts actual life so graphically that it seems to have been prepared for that purpose alone.

"Solving the Puzzle" (Gaumont).—A drawing-room scene representing a number of people, each engaged in solving a puzzle. One gentleman gets into difficulties because he appears to have some means unknown to the other players for solving his puzzles. The picture is of the light sort, but is of considerable interest because it is so well done.

"The Potter's Wheel" (Gaumont).—An industrial film illustrating the methods employed by old-time potteries in making the vases and other wares by hand on the potter's wheel. The selection and grinding of the clay, the gradual building up on the wheel and finally the firing are all graphically presented. The photography of the potter at work at the wheel by the light of a side window is an excellent bit of technical work. Altogether it is an excellent film and deserves inclusion in the long list of good industrials which Gaumont has produced.

"Through the Darkness" (Vitagraph).—A story of insanity superinduced by excessive mental strain and its cure through sight of the person supposed to have been beyond recall. The principal interest is in the acting, which works out the unusual dramatic situations with fidelity and close attention to details. It is a film which will appeal to a large number because of its strength, though until the close it is rather depressing in its effect. This may have been why it was received without any applause. But it is a pleasure to find this company producing plays of strong human interest, thus affording their actors opportunity to show their mettle. The settings of the play are admirable, and the acting of a superior character.

"Flat for Rent" (Essanay).—A comedy of every-day life in the flat dweller's world. In reality it is the experience of those unfortunates who are compelled to allow everyone that desires to enter and go through the flat because a "To Let" appears in the window. The way the people who enter the flat act is perilously near the truth. The rough house is a bit exaggerated, but is the feature which serves as a sort of climax that convinces the audience of the reality of the scene. Not all go to court to tell the judge about it, yet if they gave such vigorous expression to their feelings they would probably land there in more than one instance.

"The Latest in Garters" (Essanay).—Here is a comedy that will make them sit up and look. The boys were determined to see those garters with bells on. Who but an ingenious youngster would ever think of introducing mice as a means of causing the girls to disclose where the tinkling music came from? Anyhow, the most austere will have to admit that this comedy has a sparkle and a denouement altogether unexpected. It is one of those pictures altogether indescribable, yet intensely realistic as it runs. From the exciting game of Simon-Says-Thumbs-Up to the prosaic display of bell garters, all in an instant, is contrast enough to suit the most blase motion picture patron, and here it is, served up with such frills as seem necessary to intensify the effect of the display.

"The Sacred Turquoise of the Zuni" (Kalem).—A novel and effective Indian production, introducing many unexpected scenes and offering novel changes that are interesting and add strength to the picture. The reproduction of the life represented is, perhaps, the most interesting feature of the play. The story upon which it is based centers around what purports to be a sacred stone. The picturesque life depicted, and the careful attention to details in working it out, are matters which deserve more than ordinary praise from the audience. It is a good picture, well conceived and well worked out.

"The Bagpipe Players" (Pathe).—A love story apparently laid in the highlands of Scotland, since a bagpipe player is the hero. Heart interest is developed in the love affair between the piper and the daughter of an unfriendly chief. The piper is marooned on a barren island, and after nearly losing his life because his sweetheart's jealous sister extinguishes the beacon fire, he is rescued by a gypsy who is friendly to the girl. Isn't this an interesting complication? Next the girl's father relents and the story ends happily. Some of the scenery is exceptionally good, many picturesque views, photographically perfect, being included in the film.

"Jim Wants to Get Pinched" (Pathe).—Yes, he tried all sorts of methods to get into prison, but fails. Then when he tries to be honest the person he benefits has him arrested and he lands where he originally desired. But even yet he shows his disgust plainly by finding fault with the cuisine.

"Volcanic Eruption of Mt. Aetna" (Urban).—A striking photograph, bringing the scenes of destruction and devastation very close. The picturesque features are not forgotten and if one thrills with terror at the fleeing multitude, he will feel more or less admiration when the pillar of fire, the flowing lava and other attractive scenic features appear on the screen. The operator did his work close to the scene of disturbance and the effect is more than ordinarily impressive. One may commend this as a remarkably good picture, giving an accurate impression of what occurs during an eruption of this character.

"The Rival Miners" (Urban).—A love story, with the usual actors, including a prig who insists upon forcing his attentions upon a girl. The ultimate result is that the interloper is forced to leave and the honest lover is finally accepted. While the acting is good, and the story is not uninteresting, probably the principal attraction of this picture lies in the excellent photography and its reproduction of much picturesque outdoor society. The Urban photographs are always good when considered as photographs merely, and this is no exception to the rule.

"The Tenderfoot's Triumph" (Biograph).—Something in the victory of a tenderfoot or a greenhorn, in anything, makes one thrill with a sort of exultation that is unexplainable, but none the less real. And when the young, and apparently innocent, minister falls into the horse thieve's camp and succeeds in taking the entire gang into camp one must needs join in the thrill of pleasure over his success. Like all Biograph pictures, the story is remarkably well told and there isn't a dull moment from the beginning to the end. The acting of the hero, the innocent minister, is as well adapted to the peculiar part as it possibly can be, and at the climax, when he receives his $500 and the hand of the girl, one almost wants to hurrah with the rest of the cowboys.

"The Angel of Dawson's Claim" (Lubin).—It would be difficult to conceive a more sweet and engaging child picture. Perhaps the effect is heightened by the surroundings which have all the characteristics of the average mining camp. And here is a veritable angel set down among them. It cannot help but attract favorable attention. If those who criticise motion pictures could see this one, and then could comprehend all the good qualities which go to make them attractive perhaps they would learn that the motion picture possesses unusual qualities for good. The work of the Lubin players in this picture deserves cordial commendation, and one is almost ready to say that it will long rank among the sweetest and most attractive pictures of the year.

"Davy Crockett" (Selig).—The presentation of the emotions of humanity adequately is certain to attract attention. In this film, a reproduction of striking scenes in the life of a historical character, the Selig players have accomplished something worth while. The exhibition of elemental emotions will always make people think, and when that is accomplished one of the most important functions of either pictures or books has been developed. This film is strong, presenting pictures of life and emotion which will appeal with a more than ordinary degree of strength to every person, no matter what his station or occupation may be. A historic character adequately presented is well worth the consideration of every serious person. Selig, in this presentation, may well claim the right to feel proud of what a motion picture can be made to say.

"The Cowboy's Sweetheart" (Essanay).—A love story complication with Western trimmings. The arrival of a new woman at the ranch, the winning of the cowboy from his former sweetheart, and the attempt at revenge on the part of a discomfited suitor are features in the picture. All the dash and spirit of the ranch are in it, albeit the story is a bit trite. When the complications are all made straight and the little Western girl takes back her sweetheart, one feels relieved and is disposed to think how important a happy ending to a story of this sort is. The Essanay players are adepts at this kind of work, and in their hands the story acquires added interest as it proceeds. With the creditable acting goes good photography.

"The Chivalrous Stranger" (Pathe).—A comedy which depicts some of the complications arising from the attempt of a stranger to be chivalrous. Like the Pathe comedies, the acting is satisfactory and the photographer has performed his part of the program well enough to make a good picture.

"The Storm" (Pathe).—Really a series of views of the ocean lashed into fury on the rockbound coasts of Normandy. The tragedy in it may, for some, add a certain degree of heart interest, but wouldn't it have been better to have caught the spirit of the storm, the grandeur of it, and its weird and overwhelming beauty, rather than to depict its destructiveness? In a tempest man is but an incident. Even though the winds and waves destroy life and property, if either comes in their way, the grandeur and the majesty of it are not dimnished. Interpret the storm in all its majesty and strength, but do not detract from the impression it would make by introducing the element of human anguish. It spoils the beauty of the storm without offering anything adequate in return. The photography in this film, representing the breakers, white as wool, and the spray, dashed in clouds above the rocks, is marvelous and may well be looked upon as an unusual achievement.

"St. Elmo" (Vitagraph).—An adequate representation of the main theme of Augusta Evans Wilson's novel of the same name. It is a story of a hater of humanity, retrieved through religious influences. The novel has been very popular. Some are disposed to criticise, while others read it over and over. An acquaintance of the writer's has read it seven times. Miss Wilson long refused to permit its dramatization, but finally consented. Apparently she was right, since the play fell flat everywhere, with the exception of one city. Several lead companies are now out with it, with varying success. The film follows the original narrative as closely as possible. The book has nearly 600 pages, consequently to compress it into a film requires condensation of no mean order. The Vitagraph people have done this with a reasonable degree of success, and the main incidents of the story are presented with nicety. The dramatic incidents have been emphasized with sufficient force to make them stand out prominently, holding one's attention from beginning to end. Probably the verdict on the film will be as varied as the verdict on the book, not because of inadequate or faulty presentation, but because of the same difference of opinion that followed the publication of the book.

"The Miner and Camille" (Edison).—A humorous film, having as its theme the vigorous action of a miner who sees Camille for the first time and jumps on the stage and throws Armand off bodily when he is upbraiding Camille. It is humorous in its action, but in description seems dull and uninteresting. The excellent work of the Edison players and the good clear photography make it a fairly attractive picture.

"Ready in a Minute" (Edison).—A novel comedy based upon the declaration of a pretty girl in a pretty gown that she must change it for a prettier gown before going to the theater, but she will be ready in a minute. Then as time flies and all sorts of changes occur, even the young man becoming old and gray, it seems like years. Suddenly she appears and it all vanishes. Really, it hasn't been so long, only, like married life, it seemed long, and they got to the theater before the third act ended. The picture is one of those subtly humorous productions which prove how well adapted the motion picture is to express anything really funny.

"The Bravest Girl in the South" (Kalem).—One of those thrilling stories which have been coming from the Kalem firm of late, filled with emotion and the exhibition of bravery. Such films are scarcely susceptible to criticism. The story is told with such fidelity to what may be imagined as facts in this instance, that the audience is quite likely to lose sight of anything beyond the narrative. The circumstances are about what one would expect under such conditions, and as situation after situation develops one forgets to watch for inconsequential details that may be wrong, if any such there are, and gives up to the enjoyment of the narrative itself.

"The Wreath" (Pathe).—If this films sets some young man or woman thinking with reference to his or her conduct toward father or mother it will accomplish some good. It is not amusing. It is not instructive, but perhaps as a reproduction of a domestic tragedy, such as might occur in any home, it is worth while. It is a relapse to the heartbreaking type of film common a year or two ago, but recently left off the screens by most manufacturers. No one can question its dramatic quality, yet perhaps one may not exactly like the subject.

"Delhi" (Pathe).—Here is Delhi, first seen when a great Mohammedan festival is in progress. It is an excellent reproduction of the scene, giving a good impression of what occurs during one of those great festivals. This old city of Delhi is one of the most remarkable towns in British India, retaining the old characteristics in an even more marked degree than most of the others. In this film these characteristics are clearly represented, bringing clearly to Western eyes the strange manners, customs and dress of the old East. It is an educational film of merit and deserves a place on any manager's list.

"The Way of the World" (Biograph).—This remarkable play, presented as a lesson in Christian charity, was received by a mixed audience with a spontaneous outburst of applause. Such approval is rarely shown after a motion picture exhibition by an audience of that character, and indicates a keen appreciation of what is truly artistic in moving pictures. The bell tolls in an old tower but there is no response in the hearts of the people. The sanctuary is deserted, the altar is veiled, the lamps are extinguished, and the heart of the old priest is depressed. A young priest goes out among the toilers and revelers and tries to lead them into the fold by imitating Christ's example. He meets with harrowing selfishness among those laboring for a livelihood, and insufferable egotism among those engaged in the pursuit of pleasure. He returns completely discouraged, but is followed by a Magdalene of to-day, a woman as "despised and rejected of men" as was the greatest character in human history. The church fails because it considers what we have been, and not what we are, but the aged priest finds pathetic consolation, the effort was not vain if one soul was saved. This simple and poetic idea seemed to reach dull hearts, and its exquisite presentation is creditable to author, actors and producers alike. Thoughtful persons who see this film will ask the question seriously, is this, or is this not "The Way of the World" before it disappears from the screen and its memory will haunt them many an hour afterward. It is a graphic sermon, a sermon so strong and preached with such a direct appeal that one can scarcely shake off its influence. Do those busily engaged in the work of the world turn away from the proffers of good? Do those in the lower depths of degradation also turn away? One almost answers yes to this silent question, and yet, even here, one penitent was found, and perhaps in the actual world the proportion would be even greater. One doesn't like to condemn the world. It is not all self-absorbed. It is not all given to degrading pursuits. There are many unselfish people who are ready to pause in their work and aid others; and even in resorts like the one depicted there are some who are not bad. At least, one may harbor the comforting thought without danger of receiving an impression that is far wrong. The setting of the picture is particularly good. The San Gabriel Mission in California is utilized as a background.

INDEPENDENT FILMS.

"A Newspaper Error" (Powers).—Here are many of the elements of a strong drama, and the settings in the Mexican scene are eminently satisfactory, but the "Newspaper Error" is set forth too late in the action for the audience to fully grasp the situation during the principal scenes of development. The error involves a misalliance, the marriage of an American with a Mexican girl, but the latter is entirely too attractive for the audience to feel that there is anything particularly degrading about the affair until the graceful Senora philosophically announces that she has several other husbands. Except for one fault of construction, the story is a good one.

"Hazel, the Heart Breaker" (Bison).—A story, the scene of which is laid on a Western ranch, in which a prank plays an important part. Anyhow, the cowboy who wins and finds himself the bridegroom of a Chinaman dressed in a girl's clothes was made the recipient of the jokes of all his comrades, each one of whom was equally anxious to be there at first. A film like this is original enough to be attractive, and, after all, one likes to see the good-natured horseplay of the cowboy and his companions.

"The Six Legged Sheep" (Eclair).—A light comedy from this house which performs its object—it makes the audience laugh. Whatever might be one's opinion of it, one need not express it. If a picture performs its mission nothing further is expected.

"The Conjuror" (Great Northern).—A trick film that produces numerous amusing complications. To see a gentleman disappear and reappear at will is startling enough, but when he moves furniture and mends broken articles in the same mysterious way the marvel seems all the greater. Clever work was done in this film and it cannot fail to astonish and amuse with its surprises.

"The Four Seasons" (Great Northern).—A solo dance by a graceful poser, Mlle. Adelaide Girard, typifying the four seasons as she goes through the various evolutions. It is beautifully colored, reproducing the most delicate tints satisfactorily. While the film is short, it is of high quality and deserves a place on any program.

"A Day Off" (Great Northern).—A comedy depicting graphically the difficulties which befel a gentleman who was fortunate enough to get a day off and unfortunate enough to lose the benefit through moving accidents that either met him or overtook him during the day.

"The Power of a Smile" (Imp).—Yes, the power of a smile, the mysterious, evanescent smile, that has changed the course of history and wrought anew the fate of empires. In this instance it changes the career of a criminal, transforms him into an honest man and leads up to a series of events which enable the transformed man to be of service to the husband of the woman who smiled. It is a good story, full of genuine life interest and told with intelligence and appreciation by the Imp players.

"The Broken Friendship" (Eclair).—In this film the well known theme of the love of two companions for the same maiden is used, terminating in assault, battery and murder. Fortunately in this case the disappointed lover merely resorts to the use of a blackjack and is later forgiven. This is an improvement, as we looked for murder in the first degree. Later the offending gentleman is pardoned after due repentance. Photography and scenic selections are of admirable quality.

"My Maid Is Too Slow" (Eclair).—In this picture we have a repetition of the famous electric belt picture of some two years ago. The idea is merely that of applying an electric battery to a slow servant, "unbeknown," and the consequences are similar to those of the electric belt picture, though not so genuinely funny. The acting and staging deserve praise, and the Eclair people are to be congratulated on the artistic quality of their production.

"The Prisoner of the Golden Isle" (Eclair).—An admirable romantic story showing the gratitude of a jailer's daughter to the Duke de Belliers by rescuing him from the prison of the Golden Isle in return for a rescue with his hands from a band of villains. This picture shows some excellent medieval scenic effects which will be appreciated. Notwithstanding that this film ends in a tragedy, of a natural and logical kind in the circumstances, it is a pleasing one.

"Barberine" (Eclair).—A film d'art taken from the comedy of Alfred de Musset, combining excellent photography, acting and the best of staging. The idea is of a wager between two men as to the faithfulness of the wife of one of them at home. The manner in which the wager is lost is not only a lesson to all good wives, but a source of interest and amusement in the picture. The film deserves the highest praise from every point of view. Distinctly a comedy of the subtle kind, ending in a pleasing and satisfactory manner. It should not be omitted from any program.

"The Maelstrom" (Imp).—This picture will exert a strange fascination upon many who see it. Others will see it and fail to understand. Passing over the first part, which is a repetition of the oft-told story of a girl marrying a man whom she did not love because she was forced to do it, and looking at the second part, where the couple suddenly realize what they are to each other, an intensely dramatic series of views is presented. They are simple enough, yet they contain elemental human passion, and because they do contain it will appeal to many hearts. One of the most striking features is the emphasized fact that the lion among men needs love quite as much, more, perhaps, than the weakling. Often some little woman is quite as necessary to the daily life of this lion as are other of his essentials. The woman's mistake in this was the same as women make in everyday life—they do not understand lions; and so they drift apart, and not always do stock panics come just in time to overcome the evil and tell them how to heal their differences. The scene in the stock exchange is realistic, but nothing can overshadow the dramatic qualities inherent in the last part of the picture.

"Isabella of Arragon" (Itala).—Scenes from the life of the queen of Philip V. of Spain, she who introduced the inquisition, favored Columbus, and thereby assisted, unwittingly, in the discovery of a new world, and cruelly persecuted the Jews. The work is done with a sumptuousness and a fidelity to historical narrative which makes it interesting, even though the personality of the queen is revolting in many particulars. The benefit of pictures of this class is that they arouse interest in historical persons and thereby lead to a wider diffusion of historical research. The stage setting for this film was a sumptuous piece of work, liberally conceived and adequately worked out. To this can be added good work on the part of the operator, and the combination produced a very satisfactory picture.

"Adventures of a Cowpuncher" (Bison).—An epidemic of pictures representing the abduction of girls seems to have broken out, and here is a Bison which is an offender. It is a thrilling enough picture, depicting with substantial accuracy the wild life of the plains, but objectionable because of this abduction and the struggle of a girl in the clutches of a villain. True, she is rescued, but even so the impression is unpleasant, and no real good results from the story.. It is not amusing and it is not instructive. The Bison Company is too clever to require anything like this to make its work popular. No fault can be found with the rest of the picture, and one is disposed to offer congratulations when the cowboy is given the girl by her father.

"Her Battle for Existence" (Thanhouser).—A romantic story representing too vividly for comfort what might befall any girl left alone without some occupation sufficient to insure her a support. In this instance all is well that ends well, and when a former sweetheart finds her and takes care of her one is disposed to offer congratulations upon the result. The acting is good and the photography is clear and correct. The film will be certain to please because it tells a good story and tells it well.

"A Doctor's Revenge" (Ambrosio).—The story of a doctor arrested for interfering in behalf of two friends, who after impassioned pleadings cures the governor's daughter, and his two friends are released. The story is not uninteresting and some of the acting reaches real dramatic power. The photography is reasonably good in most instances, weak places appearing here and there.

"Fricot Is Learning a Handicraft" (Ambrosio).—This unfortunate individual has appeared in a number of situations that seemed to mark him as a butt for fate. He is now disclosed learning a handicraft and the same misadventures follow him there. At any rate it is a humorous skit, affording numerous opportunities to discover what not to do. What to do is suggested rather than taught.

"The Days of '49" (Nestor).—A film which deserves mention because it produces with a good deal of accuracy scenes of days long past. The actors have interpreted the stirring scenes of those times with sufficient fidelity to facts to convey a fairly accurate impression of the times and the men who were then active. It is an improvement on Nestor quality, and the photography is clear.

better class theaters throughout the country have reinstituted their shows and are devoting their time to the moving picture. Throughout the United States and Canada there are 24 burlesque theaters that is, 22 in the United States and 2 in Canada. Since the moving picture has come upon the scene the only way we can cope with the onslaught is to put on the very best of acts, such as we would never think of producing two or three years ago for the same admission as today. I myself used to take out one night shows in the different small towns and make money, and a good piece of money, too; but you can't do that now, for every town in the United States large enough to support any kind of a business at all has at least one moving picture theater and crowds flock to them. I used to clean up a thousand or two on an ordinary stock circuit. I lost in my last adventure and came back home four thousand dollars to the bad. Why? Because the people figure out that for an investment of five or ten cents they can see a good clean show and one, or maybe two, acts of vaudeville for an hour or two, and have to pay at least five times that amount to see an ordinary vaudeville show for the same length of time.

"We must grin and bear it, but I am in hopes that I, too,

SCENE FROM "JANE EYRE" FILMED BY THE THANHOUSER CO.

"JANE EYRE."

The clever work of the latest American independent manufacturer has been the subject of general comment. We referred last week to the filming of a popular novel by the Thanhouser Company and this week we were invited to view an advance copy of the film "Jane Eyre." The story is very clearly told and is acted with a degree of perfection that would do credit to many older concerns. All except one scene in particular, which is supposed to show a fall from a horse. This could have been suggested far better than it has been reproduced, which looks simply like a clumsy dismount. But apart from this trivial blemish the film is very good. There is an ailment known as caput augmenti, which sometimes attacks grown-ups as well as precocious youngsters, and if more praise is bestowed on Mr. Thanhouser he may succumb to flattery, and be satisfied with the progress that he has made. But, after all, there are many ear-marks of inexperience in even his best work, and only time and careful attention to details will round out the quality of his product. This, we know, it is his ambition to do.

A THEATRICAL MANAGER DISCUSSES THE INFLUENCE AND FUTURE OF M. P. HOUSES.

Talking to the manager and owner of a popular burlesque theater a few days ago, he made a few remarks on the moving picture theater as a fixed and safe investment for future gain.

He started off by saying: "This moving picture business certainly gave us poor devils a slap in the eye, closing one and almost closing the other; in fact, it knocked us down so hard that we are only getting back on our feet again with slow and painful exertion. A very large percentage of the some day will be in a large theater of my own in which moving pictures alone and only those of the best makes will be the feature. This man will have some class about his place, no dirty, little, 250-seat house of the five-cent variety for mine; but a large, clean, airy place, such as my burlesque house is now.

"Keep me on your mailing list. I am more interested than ever in moving pictures since I started to read your sheet. Chorus of theater managers: 'We have met the enemy and we are theirs!' Sad, but true."

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

Frank L. Rutter, who has operated at the Princess Theater, Bellefontaine, O., has been promoted to the management. This proves that some operators at least are a credit to their profession. A Bellefontaine paper gives Mr. Rutter a nice notice on his promotion and prints a very excellent letter from his pen in reply to some agitator who had said something in that paper against the picture game. Mr. Rutter very emphatically proves the educational value of the pictures by argument and proof.

In the Peoria, Ill., Journal, we notice a large advertisement of the Liberty Theater in which they feature a portrait of Miss Lawrence, the Imp lady who is known as "the girl of a thousand faces." This is bringing the personal element forth as the attraction, and while it has the feature of novelty, yet we believe in featuring the subject of the film or the work of the artist rather than the personal equation. After all it is the work that counts.

The Bronx Airdome at 137th street and Third avenue, New York City, is to be opened on May 1, thus signalizing the entry of the moving picture into the Summer season. This airdome has a seating capacity of 3,000 and standing room for 2,000 more. The ground has been very well and carefully drained off and every attention given to the question of providing for the comfort and convenience of the public. Pictures and vaudeville are to be supplied by the Peoples' Vaudeville Company. We have no doubt that the Bronx Airdome will be immensely successful. In future numbers of the Moving Picture World we shall give our impressions of the entertainment provided here.

The removal of the Leo Circuit booking offices from the Long Acre Building to the Holland Building at 1440 Broadway, marks another step in the progress of the company. Joseph J. Leo, president of the Leo Circuit, states that owing to the increased amount of bookings they are handling daily, they are compelled to move to more spacious offices, where accommodation for dispatching a large volume of business can be obtained, thus insuring greater speed and accuracy in its transaction.

We recommend moving picture exhibitors who find it necessary to include vaudeville in their entertainment to get in touch with the Leo Circuit, and take advantage of its exceptional facilities for providing high-class talent.

The Saxe Amusement Company (Inc.), of 110 West 34th street, have been incorporated under the New York State laws, with a paid-up capital of $10,000, to conduct places of amusement such as moving picture and vaudeville theaters, and have leased the site at 1446 Broadway, the old home of the Riccadonna Hotel, upon which they will erect a modern up-to-date theater containing 299 seats, for the exhibition of moving pictures only. M. A. Saxe, president of the new corporation, states that an expenditure of $10,000 will be invested in the renovation of this building.

The Paramount Film Exchange, with an eye to future success, have secured the services of I. Bernstein, of Harrisburg, Pa., for the position of manager of the company. Although a comparatively new exchange, they have come to the fore in the Independent field and have secured a large volume of business. Mr. Bernstein has been in the moving picture business since its inception, and being the owner of the Union Film Exchange at Harrisburg and Altoona, Pa., he possesses considerable experience, which, being now associated with the Paramount Exchange, will no doubt enable it to take an even more prominent position in the Independent field than it has hitherto done.

SPECIAL SELIG RELEASE.

During the Pilgrimage just brought to a close at New Orleans the Selig Polyscope Company secured an excellent negative of the proceedings, the first and only licensed picture ever taken of a Shrine Pilgrimage. Wherever this picture is exhibited it will prove an attraction and a source of much enjoyment to every Shriner as well as Mason. The photography of the picture, Selig says, is the clearest and best he has ever made of a public demonstration. Progressive exhibitors will demand it, and, as the release date is announced as May 7th, orders should be placed at once.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MOVING PICTURE AFLOAT.

Champaign, Ill., April 26, 1910.

To the Editors:

Gentlemen—We have just read your valuable item in the Moving Picture World, "The Moving Picture Afloat," and beg to inform you that we have made an effort to realize your suggestion, which proved to be a great success.

Our manager, Mr. Julius Levin, who sailed March 5 to Capetown, South Africa, on the steamer German with an outfit of a Model Cinematograph and Power's machines and two reels of American films, gave an exhibition of some films on the steamer which were very highly appreciated by all the crew and passengers of all classes and stations.

No admission fee was charged, but the passengers have presented a purse of $25 to the operator for his work.

By the way, it may be interesting for you to know that the manager of our company, Mr. Julius Levin, went to South Africa to introduce there the American films and machines. He is accompanied by a thoroughly experienced operator, he just arrived in Cape Town and reports that there are four moving picture theaters and hopes to succeed there.

Yours very truly,

VARSITY AMUSEMENT CO.
for Herman Lipton.

[It pleases us to learn that our friends have introduced "the thin edge of the wedge." We want to see the moving picture theater a permanent feature of ocean going entertainment.—Eds. M. P. W.]

THE LIGHTING OF THEATERS.

Chicago, Ill., April 25, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—In the issue of the Moving Picture World for April 16, under the head of "Chicago Notes," Mr. Levin, manager of the Orpheum Theater, takes exception very strongly to the writer's statements regarding the lighting of his theater, and it is very properly pointed out that this, the lighting of the house, is a vital matter for moving picture theater managers to study.

Mr. Levin claims that since the lights are some 80 feet distant from the screen, they do not affect the pictures in any way. He says that the picture is no sharper with all the lights off than with the side lights on. I grant this; it is easily seen to be true at the opening of the show, when an announcement slide is thrown on the screen while all the house lights are on. The outlines are sharp enough, but there is a lack of brilliancy and the picture appears flat.

I wish here to bring up the point: What is "black" represented by in a projected picture? Simply this: That the black opaque deposit of silver in the dark parts of the picture on the film allows little or no light to pass through it, and none is reflected from the screen where the image of these shadows falls; consequently these parts appear dark on the curtain, and by contrast with the brightly illuminated high lights, seem to be really quite black. Now, if light from some external source strikes the screen, some of it will be reflected, and if any is reflected from the darker portions of the picture, the contrast between them and the high lights will be lessened, the "blacks" will cease to be blacks, the half-tones will be nearly destroyed, and the result will be a flat picture, lacking in brilliance and perspective.

Moreover, when the house lights are of a distinctly different color from the color of the projected picture, as they are generally incandescent lamps, this color is yellowish or brownish. This color as reflected by the screen is noticeable only in the dark portion of the picture, but it generally suffices to materially injure their effect. It is very noticeable, and unpleasantly, in a blue-tinted or blue-printed scene such as are so well done by the Edison Company, furnishing a background to the lighter portions of the picture of a color complementary to the color of the picture as a whole.

Another thing that injures the picture at many theaters, including the Orpheum, the picture itself on the screen is far too large. It is about 14 x 18 feet in dimensions, and has a magnification of about 250 diameters. Not all films are of such photographic quality as to bear this extreme magnification, and the texture of the film seems to be very coarse though on a screen of ordinary size it might not be noticed. And, last, it goes without saying that such a great picture cannot be well and brilliantly lighted. Also, a picture of this size cannot be really sharp, no matter how good the projector may be. The only picture I ever saw here that was absolutely steady was the Biograph, "Going to War A.D." and it moved about the screen less than two inches; on a smaller screen its steadiness would have been absolute. Again, with this size of picture, objects are magnified to nearly twice their normal height, and the actors appear like giants, which is unnatural. In most pictures, the proportions of the actors are such that they would be very nearly life size on a screen about 9 x 12 feet. With a screen of this size much better illumination and projection generally can be secured; and it is also possible to get a mirror screen in this size, which is another advantage.

I do not consider the arrangement of many of the large theaters the best possible for moving picture projection. The relation of the projecting machine to the screen is not by any means ideal, and the pictures show it. There are too many unfavorable seats; too many near the screen, and too many at the sides, where the picture is viewed at an angle, causing foreshortening. Even the most favorable seats, those in the center of the balcony and just under it, are so far from the pictures that they seem faint merely because of the distance of the spectator from them.

If anyone should ask me what I consider a well-arranged moving picture theater, I should name one of the following: The Garfield, Halsted and Fifty-fifth streets, which installed the first mirror screen in Chicago; the Janet, on North avenue, which is giving independent pictures a beautiful exhibition; the Bell Theater, Madison and Western avenue, or the Glamour, Sixty-third street and Wentworth avenue, all of which theaters are well designed and well managed, and a credit to the moving picture show business.

And for a lighting system, I have seen no theater so well and yet so simply lighted as the little Theatorium at 44 State street, in which the lamps, located on the ceiling, are enclosed in deep cone shades, which confine the light to the place where it is needed, and protect the screen at the same time. (This theater is owned by the same management as the Alcazar Theater, on Madison street, but the latter does not seem to realize that its own pictures could be improved by copying the lighting system of its sister house.)

In my own humble opinion, the Orpheum Theater presents no better pictures on the screen than some other downtown houses, yet it is the best moving picture theater in Chicago, simply because of the associations of the pictures: the theater is refined in atmosphere, the music is good and suits the pictures, and the sound effects are appropriate and well timed. The operators there, too, deserve much credit; the pictures are always run smoothly and well timed, and they never seem to "grind up" a film merely because a crowd is waiting outside. Yet, in spite of their good work, the picture on the screen is not the very best possible, and I venture to make the statement that if it were not for the associations of the pictures, the music, etc., the pictures alone as presented on the screen would scarcely draw the crowds that frequent the Orpheum.

Respectfully yours,
C. Y.

IN DEFENCE OF OPERATORS.

Washington, D. C., April 26, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—In the Moving Picture World some time ago I read an article in which operators were criticised very strongly for the way in which many of them run the films through their machines. The article went on to tell the results of this gross carelessness on the operators' part, under which topic two or three points were made, one of them being the tearing and wearing of the perforation on the films by operators running their machines at excess speed. The author of this article seemed disposed to put all the blame for this running at "top-notch" speed on carelessness on the part of the operator, and, no doubt, in 99 cases out of every 100 it is the operator's fault. But I believe that there are exceptions, and my object in writing this letter is to expose a case where, in my opinion, it was not the fault of the operator that he ran the film through his machine at so high a rate of speed.

The theater in which the following incident took place is a small family theater in the northwest section of this city. I had seen the poster of an attractive independent film in front of the house, and went in to see it on the screen. The presentation of the picture was very good, the operator keeping the film steady and in sharp focus, while his lighting brought out the shadows beautifully. The house was crowded and I was standing in the rear of the hall, near the operator's booth. When the reel was about three-quarters finished, with about four or five minutes yet to run, the manager, evidently being in a hurry to end that particular performance, went to the door of the operator's booth and called up to the operator, "Grind her up there, T——, grind her up!" The operator, of course, did what he was told, and made the picture literally dance in its frame. There is no doubt in my mind that that poor film suffered more in that five minutes than it had during its run for two or three days previous, and possibly more.

This incident goes to show that it is not always the fault of the operator that a film is sometimes run at excess speed. Of course, there are people who will say that the operator could have refused to run the film faster than ordinarily required, but I believe that if these people will kindly take into consideration the fact that the manager is in charge of the theater, and furthermore that the operator must live, they will readily see that the real fault lies with the manager, and not with the operator. I had a short talk with the operator after the show, and he stated that he was often required to run films through with a rush, the manager being anxious to clear the house for the next show.

I am not an operator, and know very little about the practical side of operating, but it is my intention to become an operator soon, and I certainly welcomed the announcement of a Correspondence Course in Operating by F. C. Taylor of New York City, which appeared on page 713 of the Moving Picture World for April 30. I have acquired much information about moving pictures through the columns of the Moving Picture World, which I receive regularly every Monday morning. I may be wrong in saying that it is not the operator's fault in all cases for running films at excess speed, but this particular incident started me thinking, and I resolved to ask you about it, knowing that you would be willing to give your advice on a question of this kind.

With best wishes for the success of the Moving Picture World, I beg to remain, Very respectfully,

RAYMOND J. WEIR.

A FILM THAT STIRS THE AUDIENCE.

Chicago, Ill., April 23, 1910.

To the Trade:

As the card of invitation issued for the exhibition of "A Penitent of Florence" at the Orpheum may arouse a feeling of jealousy on the part of other film manufacturers and exhibitors, a word of explanation is necessary. I had no axe to grind when I searched for a film suitable to demonstrate the possibilities of good music with motion pictures. This was only following up with a practical demonstration the theme on which the Moving Picture World has been harping for weeks. Of course the plum fell to the one manufacturer who had courteously extended me the invitation to view his releases well in advance. Other manufacturers are producing an average of good pictures. Occasionally they excel themselves by producing a masterpiece and there is the possibility that if any manufacturer had been as courteous as George Kleine, I could have found another film suitable for my purpose.

My personal ambition as well as the mission of the Moving Picture World, is to uplift the motion picture—to make of it not a tail-ender to a vaudeville show but a satisfying amusement feature—to elevate them to their proper sphere as the greatest educator of the world. When I came to Chicago I visited the theaters, saw where reforms were needed and stirred up the exhibitors. I was dubbed a "crank" by a contemporary who has since tried to follow in my footsteps. I encouraged the theater managers to rig out their employees in uniforms, to make more tasteful lobby display, to use sound effects and music appropriate to the picture. One by one the theater managers fell in line, and the Orpheum made such good progress that I began a hunt for a film that would give them a chance to render a fine musical program and show that moving picture exhibiting is only yet in its swaddling clothes.

Needless to say that the phenomenal success of the show justified my efforts and if it will serve as an inspiration to others to keep up the good work, my object has been gained.

I must thank George Kleine and his office staff for their kind assistance, also Mr. Van Ronkle of the American Film Service. As to the Orpheum Theater, I cannot sufficiently thank Messrs. Jones, Linick & Schaeffer, the owners, for the great interest they took in my work, Mr. Samuel L. Levin, the manager, for his able collaboration, and Mr. William E. King, the director of the orchestra, for his splendid musical program. It would take more than one whole copy of the Moving Picture World to contain the words of praise spoken about the exhibition of "The Penitent of Florence" at the Orpheum. Suffice to say that it marked an epoch in moving picture presentation.

NOTES FROM THE FILM MANUFACTURERS.

VITAGRAPH.

The impromptu sentiment and expression given on the impulse of the moment in the performing of motion pictures is exceedingly impressive, particularly so in this particular instance. A child actress ten years old of the Vitagraph Stock Company addressing her supposed baby sister, a native Japanese, in one of the Japanese Dramatic "Orchids" to be presented by the Vitagraph said: "I swear by all the gods to protect you through all my life—through all my life, I swear it."

"The Lost Trail," which will blaze its way to the front next Friday, May 6, is so full of extraordinary naturalness that we are lost in wonder at the blizzard as it bursts upon us and sweeps us through the forest, and the picture makes us shiver, rub our hands and clap them, too. The underbrush swaying with the drifting snow and the loose leaves skipping and whirling over the glistening snow takes us right along with them into the picture with the poor fellows who are trudging and struggling along against the storm. This sort of picture is the kind we need; it makes us think about other things and forget ourselves; reddens our blood and exhilarates our minds.

One breath of nature puts the whole world atune. That's what "Mario's Swan Song" will do on May 7. It is a sonnet of love and sentiment that touches the heart until the silent dropping of a tear wears away the indifferences and stoicism of the enobling emotions of the soul. The beautiful story of child love and sacrifice for his grandfather and the despair of the aged man at the loss of his little companion; the blending of the morning and evening of life into the glorious dawn of the spirit. This little emotional drama will make you think, feel the well springs of your heart bubble with crystal globules of your better self.

MELIES.

It is a great satisfaction to tell about the good things in store for others. We would rather keep the pleasure in suspense, but then you would miss a great opportunity of getting the next Melies picture of Indian life and pioneer experience upon the plains. "The Debt Repaid." You remember the Indians in Fenimore Cooper's novels, the aborigines of this country, the prairie schooners and the early settlers? You have heard about them. Well, here they are right before us in the living present in all their war paint and feathers. This will give the people of this generation, old and young, an idea of what it meant and means to prepare the home of the free and the land of the brave to carry out the progress of the nation.

LUBIN.

The first pictures were made in the new Lubin Studio on Monday, April 25, two of the directors taking possession of the new building, while the others will remain for the present at the old studio on Market street. Some big productions are planned to mark the opening of the new building; presentations that will cause even more talk than the splendid stories now being offered by the Lubin Manufacturing Company.

The Lubin release for Decoration Day should not be overlooked. The story is strongly dramatic in its appeal and tinged with patriotic sentiment, but, as in the case of "The Irish Boy," the notable St. Patrick's Day release, sentiment is not forced. The story of the pending release is vital and gripping in every scene and its appeal is not to be denied.

"The Cowboy's Devotion," the Lubin release for May 12, is an unusual one in many ways and the director charged with its production has done unusually well with the staging. The outdoor scenes are wonderfully picturesque and the interior of the bunk house, where a part of the action passes, gives to Easterners a glimpse of the real thing, the setting being copied from a photograph of an actual bunk house in New Mexico.

vertises for Max Iluski and introduces a great variety of Jews. Poles and, in fact, representatives of many [illegible], each individual claiming to be the rightful heir to the heritage. The complications which follow are extremely ludicrous. He is hounded day and night by the Iluskis, but is unable to secure actual proof [illegible]. He is about to give up the task as a hopeless job, when he receives a letter which makes an appearance and declares that no Max Iluski exists and that he has been the butt of a joke perpetrated by his eccentric uncle who desired to make sure that his nephew would be found worthy of the fortune. The film will undoubtedly prove one of the most satisfying comedy films released in a long time. The idea is big and wholesome. The comedy is extremely good and true to life. The acting will be found all that can be desired.

The Essanay Company certainly deserve the title, "Finders of Lost Men." It might be profitable for them to advertise something like this: "Have you a brother or sister whom you have lost track of? We will find them. Watch our films!" John Robinson, while in Denver, located his brother William in Los Angeles, Cal., after having viewed the Essanay aviation film, made at Los Angeles. They had been separated twenty years and thought each other dead. A similar story, which is going the rounds of the press, is that Mrs. J. Elbert Carothers, of Washington, Pa., saw in the Essanay Company's film, "World's Baseball Series Between Pittsburg and Detroit," her brother, Wilford Telford, whom she had lost track of. The youth had run away from home several years ago, had gone West, then returned to Pennsylvania, locating in Pittsburg, where he had married. The sister took up the search and found her brother.

Miss Martha Spier, the Essanay Company's new leading lady, had her first experience in moving pictures in a big dramatic subject, made in the Chicago studios last week. She expressed herself as delighted with the work. Announcement of the release of this big subject will be made later.

G. M. Anderson and his Western picture crew, in Colorado, are contributing more splendid Western films, which show they are taking advantage of the scenic opportunities where they are working. Scenically, these pictures are masterpieces, while the good tone and dramatic qualities of the pictures, with the excellent photography, are maintained at their high level.

The Essanay Bulletin of releases from May 15 to 21 offers an especially attractive combination of variety, its first a film d'art drama a thousand feet Western comedy, with two comedies from the Chicago producers and a Western drama. The first two are advertised as features of unusual merit.

"The Danger Line" is an exceedingly fine portrayal of a famous French story, broad and deep in its meaning and intelligibly pictured by a talented cast. It tells the story of a husband and wife who are estranged through their differences of ambition and taste. The wife is brought suddenly to realize the great divide between herself and her husband and is offered a temptation which she nobly resists. The husband engages his traitor friend in a duel in which the former is wounded, and thus, through suffering, the two are finally brought together. The film is full of dramatic incident, skillfully interpreted by a very talented cast. Photographically it is pronounced one of the most beautiful ever released by the Essanay Company.

"The Little Doctor of the Foothills" is the most humorous of G. M. Anderson's Western comedies. It tells of the experiences of a little lady doctor in a Western town. None of the cowboys are aware that "Carol Burton, M.D.," is a pretty little lassie of their opposite sex, and of course there is no real enthusiasm until the doctor arrives. It is then that all the boys find they are suffering with grave and serious ailments and they keep "the little doctor" busy until she learns she is really needed. A cowpuncher is shot accidentally, and she is filled with remorse and anxiety when the wounded cowboy is carried into her office. This is the beginning of a love affair and we are left at the end of the film fully convinced that a wedding will soon take place. The film is exquisite in its sweetness, uproarious in its fun, and entirely satisfying. It ought to break all records.

He eventually strikes it rich, but is almost cheated out of his claim by a couple of scoundrels, who have seen him stake the claim, and try to reach the agent before the miner's wife, who, accompanied by the boy, goes to file it. Suggested by Charles Kingsley's Poem, "The Three Fishers."

There is perhaps no work from the pen of the eminent English clergyman and poet, Charles Kingsley, better known than his tragic poem, "The Three Fishers." It so tersely illustrates the lot of the honest fisherfolk. While this Biograph subject was suggested by the poem it uses it simply as a preamble or introduction to a story of sympathetic interest. The scenic beauty of the subject is exceptional, being taken at a fishing village of Southern California.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE UNCHANGING SEA.—There is perhaps no work from the pen of the eminent English clergyman and poet, Charles Kingsley, better known from his tragic poem, "The Three Fishers" It so typically illustrates the lot of the hardy fisherfolk. While this Biograph subject was suggested by the poem it uses it simply as a preamble or introduction to a story of sympathetic interest. A young married couple are living happily in the little fishing village and at the opening of the story the young husband is one of the Three fishers went sailing away to the West,

Away to the West as the sun went down,
Each thought on the woman who loved him best,
And the women stood watching them out of the town,
For men must work and women must weep,
And there's little to earn and many to keep,
Though the harbor bar be moaning.

As the days rolled by the "three wives sat up in the lighthouse tower . . . They looked at the squall, and they looked at the shower," but no sign of their husbands' return could be seen. Ah! little did they know that on a distant shore "Three fishers lay out on the sliding sands, In the morning gleam as the tide went down." When the rescue party brings the fishers in they find life in one, the young husband. With the tender care of the folk in this distant land he regains his health, but his memory is a blank. All efforts to recall the past prove futile. Meanwhile, the poor wife, with her baby, sits gazing out to sea, still hopeful of his return, but in vain. The years roll by and her child grows into young womanhood to be courted by one of the young fishermen of the coast village, and it is upon the day that the young couple are preparing for their wedding that the long lost husband, having started out to sea once more lands on the shore of his native village. The familiar scenes restore his memory. It seems to him that it was only on the yesterday he left, and he rushes eagerly along the coast to meet his wife. There she stands, ever hopeful. At first they fondly recognize each other time having wrought such a change, but enwrapped in each others' arms they realize fate's injunction—

For men must work and women must weep,
And the sooner it's over the sooner to sleep,
And good-bye to the bar and its moaning.

The scenic beauty of the subject is exceptional, being taken at a fishing village of southern California.

THE GOLD-SEEKERS.—The maxim, "'Tis darkest just before dawn," was certainly verified in the case of the despairing prospector who is the subject of this Biograph story. All his searching for the coveted yellow ore has been fruitless, and he starts out to make his last effort to find pay dirt. The privations he has suffered do not affect him as much as the hardships endured by his patient wife with their little child, a boy of ten years. To see them subjected to hunger and exposure almost drives him mad, and this final effort is almost maniacal. As usual, his endeavors seem to be in vain, until in a fit of rage he hurls his pick away from him and sinks despairingly on the ground. Here he sits hopeless, when he sees something shining in the earth that the pick's point had upturned when he hurled it from him. He is dazed, and can scarcely believe his sight. However, a pan of the dirt taken to the brook and washed proves he has at last struck pay dirt. Wild with joy, he rushes to his camp to give the news to his wife. She reminds him of the importance of filing his claim at once, and to this end the three—man, wife and child—go back to the place and he stakes the claim, guarding it, while the wife hurries to the agent's office to file it, she taking the little boy with her. Two mountain reprobates from a distance see the staking of the claim, and knowing that the first one filing the claim may secure it, try to reach the agent before her, but as she is on horseback and they on foot, she reaches there first. When she arrives she finds the office not yet open and a line of prospectors awaiting the agent's arrival. The two scoundrels now scheme to get the wife's place in the line, and to effect this they play upon her sympathy by getting an unconscionable old woman to feign illness and ask to be assisted to her home. This the wife does, the scoundrels following and locking her in a room with her little boy. They go back to the agent to secure his recognition of their claim. After futile efforts to burst the door, the wife lets the baby through the transom on a rope, telling him to run for help. This the little fellow manfully does, and after a time engages the attention of a couple of ranchers, who release the poor woman, rushing her to the land agent's office just as he is about to sign the claim of the scoundrels. The agent listens to the woman's story, backed up by the ranchers and the baby, and signs the claim, handing it to her, at the same time pushing a pistol in the scoundrels' faces with the injunction "Now, git," and they very wisely "get."

THE STOLEN FORTUNE.—[illegible] contract created to a rich society girl, [illegible] ment lands possession by her mother's wealth after the death of his uncle. His office left a sealed letter bearing the inscription "to be opened by my nephew six months after I am dead," and when Frank opens the letter shortly after he has slipped the engagement ring on Helen's finger he learns to his great dismay that his uncle had stolen a valuable invention from a Pole, one Max Huskl. And now he ordered his nephew to refund every penny of the stolen fortune to this Max Huskl, who would be found residing somewhere in New York City.

Frank sorrowfully breaks the engagement, despite the girl's pleadings, and sets out to find Max Huskl, wishing to wash his hands of the matter as soon as possible. He advertises in the evening paper and lo! the following morning fully a score of Huskls, each claiming to be the only real, genuine Huskl, call upon him at his hotel and insist upon the fortune being returned to the rightful owner. Also his mailing's mail is overflowing with letters from Huskl, et al, insisting, demanding, begging for the money.

Frank meets the vagabonds in the corridor of the hotel. He is set upon by violent hands and escapes death miraculously when he dashes through the mob, out of the hotel and into a taxi.

He meets Helen in the park but they are hardly seated on a bench when two or three more Huskls, as faithful as shadows, come wriggling about him. Frank starts to wipe the payment with them when a policeman interferes and hustles the two knaves out of view. Helen is rushed into a taxi and sent home while Frank hurries away, another crowd of Huskls at his heels.

He makes his way back to the hotel in a taxi by dodging up side streets and through alleys. In his room he finds two more Huskls. They have been fighting and have partially demolished the young man's suite, but after an effort to rids himself of the pests and settles himself quietly to think it over.

There is a knock at the door and Helen and Mrs. Holcombe enter, escaping notice from Frank's stout cane by his timely perception that they are not Huskls. Both Helen and Mrs. Holcombe are all sympathy and more, they urge Frank to return the engagement ring to Helen, who really loves him and who cares little whether her fiancee is wealthy or poor. He is "saving the moment with a kiss" when a bellboy enters, steering in a gentleman, who proffers a card on which is written: "Max Huskl."

The gentleman explains that he is the late Thomas Wentworth's partner that no Max Huskl exists and that Frank has been the butt of a joke perpetrated upon him by his eccentric uncle, who desired only to see what sort of stuff his nephew was made of. The fortune, Mr. Wharton explains is his for keeps.

It is a happy trio who turn to leave, following Mr. Wharton, the uncle's partner, when from under the bed in Frank's other apartment is heard a still, small voice, whining persistently:

"O Meester Ventvort I am Max Duski and I can proof it." The Yiddisher enters the room and offers his proofs, but the "Meester Ventvort" and his party have left without paying any attention to him.

THE SHERIFF'S SACRIFICE.—Allan Egan, the young sheriff of Jessimine county, loves the pretty Wilma Allerton, the daughter of a wealthy Texas ranchman. He is rejected by the girl for her father's foreman, a handsome young Texan, whose one serious fault is the desire to gamble.

On the day our story opens Odell is sent to the village post office to cash a money order for his employer. While in town he is seduced into a gambling house by a friendly cowboy, where he loses his money and also that of his employer. Disheartened, he leaves but returns to the gambling house in an effort to get the money back. He is kicked out now that he is broke.

Fearful of facing his employer without the money Odell resolves to hold up the chap who won his money. In a lonely spot at the base of a cliff he waits until the other fellow saunters by. The hold-up is successful and Odell, who had masked himself with a black handkerchief hurries away confident that he can again establish himself in the good graces of Allerton. Unmindful of the fact, Odell had been watched by two children from the top of the cliff and at the time of the hold-up, the little chap who carried a kodak, took a picture of the affair and hurried away to the sheriff's office.

The hero in town have been apprised of the hold-up and have left to search for the culprit when the little boy hurries into the sheriff's office, excitedly explaining about the robbery.

The sheriff hurries with him to the village photographer, where the negative is developed. Egan immediately identifies the robber as Edgar Odell and with the convincing negative carefully wrapped he mounts his horse and rides to the Allerton ranch.

He finds Odell nervously pacing in front of the house and confronts him with the accusation that he is a highwayman and further proves it by producing the negative. Odell is completely unstrung when he finds he is discovered and begs mercy from the young sheriff.

THE BANKS OF THE DANUBE. Here we watch [illegible] the streets of Buda Pest which is divided by the famous river, Danube, spanned by [illegible] magnificent bridges which we see both from the boats and from the shore.

We then visit a number of the more important public buildings.

It is interesting to note here that Buda Pest is the official title of two united towns, Buda, on the left bank of the Danube, and Pest on the right.

On the Buda side we see the high hills crowned by the Koongsburg and Fisherman's Bastion. The river front of Pest is exceedingly modern, and includes the new houses of parliament, the academy and numerous other public buildings of beauty.

CALLED TO SEA. News of a ship in distress is carried to a fisherman's cottage, and two generations of hardy toilers respond to the call, leaving a third, a small boy, with his mother.

The lifeboat is launched and proceeds on its errand to the vessel outside the bay.

Weeping wives and mothers witness from the shore the total loss of vessel and rescuers. Not a soul saved. Grandly pathetic scene as the waves beat against the rocks. The lad comforts his mother.

The widow and fatherless. "The sea shall not have you" is the cry of the mother to the son. "You shall be a priest."

Interior of seminary. The reluctant boy is handed over to the priests, to be trained for sacred service.

Ten years later, the boy now a priest, visits his mother.

Another alarm. Help needed. Vessel stranded on the cruel rocks.

"Bred in the Bone." The priest insists upon going the rescue party. Grief of his mother.

Again the lifeboat is launched, while the women wait as before.

The breakwater. Successful return of the rescuers. They tell the story of the priest's bravery in saving life.

The cottage. The priest and his mother. "Forgive my disobedience, mother; it was the order of my father." Dissolving effect. The dead father appears and raises his hands in blessing.

THE MASTER MECHANIC.—The master mechanic has been entrusted with the perfecting of a new machine on which the proprietor of the factory bases great hopes for the future, for it will revolutionize certain lines of business and make him a millionaire. The machine has not yet reached the stage where it is ready for patent and no caveat had been filed lest a hint reach business rivals. The machine is developed in the special shop where the workmen are to be trusted and the proprietor's daughter takes a great interest in the progress of the work. Soon her interest is greater in the young mechanic than in the machine, and the superintendent surprises them, so intent upon their love making that they have not heard his footsteps. He has planned to marry the daughter and so succeed to the business, and he looks with little favor upon the mechanic who dares aspire to be his rival. Business enemies of the firm have approached him with a proposition that he sell them the plans of the new invention, and now, partly through greed but more in the hope of discrediting his rival, he steals the plans and sends them to the other concern. The mechanic is taxed with the deed and not even his genuine surprise at their loss is believed. In the presence of the other employees and the girl he loves he is driven from the shop to start life over again with the act of treachery standing against him. He is unable to obtain employment and things look dark when the girl's visit to the bank accidentally reveals the true culprit. The superintendent is just ahead of her in the line at the paying teller's window, though he does not see her. He is getting cashed the check that is the final payment on his bribe and he drops the short note which accompanied the check. He does not perceive the loss, but as the girl turns from the window she sees the fragment of paper and picks it up. Hurrying to the home of the mechanic, she tells him the goods news and together they seek the factory office, where the letter tells its own tale and the tables are turned against the superintendent. Approval of their engagement is the father's apology and all ends happily.

SHELBYVILLE - - - - - INDIANA

in pursuit of her and her deliverer who is mortally shot and captured while the girl rides frantically to her father's ranch and tells him and the ranchmen of Swift Arrow's plight. They prepare to go to his rescue.

Mounting their horses, they ride off the girl joins them and they reach the Indian encampment just in time to snatch Swift Arrow from the burning pile and the stake to which he is bound after a fierce battle in which the Indians are routed and defeated. With a last lingering look of gratitude Swift Arrow gazing into the faces of his friends, starts for the "happy hunting grounds."

SPEED VERSUS DEATH.—Braggs, the young Western settler, comes into view leading his horse to water and pulls a little child on the grass back. Placing her child on the ground and watering her pony, he takes his knife from his pocket to make an extra hole in the saddle strap. The knife slips and penetrates his wrist, severing an artery. His wife comes to his assistance, makes a tourniquet with straps of her gown, jumps on the horse's back, bids to her husband to care for the child and keep up courage while she rides to town for the Doctor.

Urging her horse to its top speed, she flies like the wind while she rides against the possibility of her husband's bleeding to death before she can bring him aid.

The young rancher struggles against the loss of blood and is just approaching unconsciousness while his mind is tracked with fear lest his child, playing dangerously near the cactus, should fall into it.

The wife reaches the small settlement where she encounters a crowd of drunken cowboys and loungers who tantalizingly detain her, asking her the purpose of her errand. She tries to explain and then realizes her way is blocked and, leaping to the Doctor's horse. In response to her entreaties and the urgency of the case the Doctor mounts his horse and with the wife starts on a terrific race against death to the cause of the young rancher, making Paul Revere's ride a mere joy ride compared with the fighting like speed and fearless horsemanship displayed by the Doctor and his wife, who reach the wounded man just in time to save his life and rescue the child from falling into the cistern.

PATHE FRERES.

ONLY A FADED FLOWER.—At twenty years of age their sweetest memories linger around a faded bunch of violets, once fresh and sweet as last picked when Mary was suffering as a child.

Fred is a carpenter, whilst Mary is employed at a milliners. One of Fred's fellow workmen sees Mary as she stops into a motor with another who is trying to win her love, and hearing the address of the cafe given to the chauffeur, immediately tells Fred.

Fred throws down his tools and follows the couple to the beautiful garden, where lunch is being served to them. There, disguised as a flower seller, he manages to hand to Mary the faded bunch of violets. These remind her of her old time love and recognizing him she throws herself into his arms to the discomfiture of her companion, who is there and then dismissed.

PICTURESQUE PYRENEES.—A trip through the Pyrenees in the neighborhood of Bagneres de Luchon, giving an impressive view of the wild and precipitous granite peaks of the Maladetta, standing out clearly in the crisp air with torrents and cascades leaping from rock to rock.

THE WITCH OF THE RUINS.—No sooner had John, a big, hearty farmer, left for work after kissing his wife, Mary, and their little daughter, Lucy, good-bye than Frank drives up in his cart and frightens Mary by speaking again of his old love for her. Mary runs inside her cottage and Frank, returning to the cart, finds little Lucy holding out a piece of sugar to his horse. He offers to give her a ride and takes her to the ruins of an ancient castle and leaves her there with only a cloak as a covering.

Mary meets Frank on his return, and overcome by her entreaties, promises to restore her to her child. John seeing her leaving off with Frank, becomes suspicious and follows.

Meanwhile Lucy has been cared for by a witch living amongst the ruins and when Frank and Mary reach the spot where the former left the child, she has disappeared. Mary, believing herself to be duped, calls aloud for help. John rushes forward and a struggle takes place between the two men, the issue of which is decided by the witch brought to the spot a second time by the sound of the struggle striking Frank unconscious with her stick. Lucy is quickly restored to her parents who leave hand in hand, whilst the witch remains behind to bathe the forehead of Frank.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND.—Mrs. Mountmorency, perceiving that her husband is following her, coaxes a friend whom she meets in a fashionable restaurant, and who is dressed in a similar gown to her own, to pass out again in her place. Waiting outside is the husband, and as his supposed wife comes out, he follows. Enraged at seeing her in animated conversation with an elegant gallant, he is about to demand an explanation when he feels a soft caress against his face. Standing at his side, is his laughing wife.

What a fool he felt the motion picture camera is not able yet to show.

A ROMANTIC YOUNG LADY.—A young girl with the thrilling traits of Arsene Lupin, lady detective, young enough to be the pretty sweetheart of the dear Arsene herself.

The most ardent of her admirers is young Max, naturally. Max, who accepts the challenge with alacrity.

After a few moments' thought Max announces that he will stand a supper to Polly and the likely present welcome paying fee. The suggestion is accepted with glee, and with Polly proudly at the head the party assembles at the restaurant named by Max.

The supper is a huge success, but the time for reckoning soon arrives. Max, however, is quite unperturbed, and calmly requests the guests each to make a point of being exact to pay his bill when it is presented. The waiter is promptly approached and it is therefore suggested that the waiter be bandicoted and the one caught by him shall pay. The waiter agrees, refuses himself to be blindfolded, and eventually succeeds in grabbing the proprietor of the restaurant long after Max and his guests have got away through the open window.

CUSTOMS OF THE BUDDHISTS IN INDIA.—We first see the wonderful Buddhist Temple at Kandy together with pictures of the natives at prayer concluding with very fine views of the sacred elephants bathing and dispelling themselves.

MEDIUM WANTED AS SON-IN-LAW.—Jenny's father, a crank and a spiritualist, wanting to obtain a medium to aid him in his researches, inserts an advertisement in the paper to the effect that he desires to marry his daughter to a medium.

Jenny thereupon runs away with her lover Reggie, and the two concoct a little plan by which they can get married. Disguised as a Turk, Reggie calls and states he is willing to marry the spiritualist's daughter. Jenny's father is distracted at the loss of his daughter, so he begs the supposed medium to trace his daughter by occult means. Needless to say this is not a difficult matter to Reggie, who after leading the spiritualist a wild goose chase over the country, brings him back to his own home (to which Jenny has returned in the meantime) and shows him his daughter hidden away in a cupboard. Taken of delighted father, unmasking and blessings on the young couple.

THE LOST TRAIL.—"One thousand dollars reward for the capture of Antonio Bentayon, 'the outlaw, dead or alive.'" This notice posted throughout the country has aroused the people and started the Sheriff in pursuit of the quarry. Accompanied by his aides they are making their way through the forest when a fierce blizzard envelops them and they are separated.

The Sheriff, facing the blinding drifts of snow and hail, is over come and falls exhausted. Recovering a little strength, he fires his revolver in hope of bringing the help of his comrades. In this he is not successful, but he arouses the attention of a young woman in a nearby lone cabin. She goes to his assistance, and half dragging, half supporting him, she leads him into the cabin, where he falls helpless upon the floor.

The girl administers to him, and while she is aiding him her husband, Antonio Bentayon comes in. She is reproved at her husband's safe arrival. He at once turns his attention to restoring the stricken man to consciousness. After doing all he can, he leaves the cabin to keep an appointment. While he is gone the sick man recovers and asks for his tobacco.

The young woman goes into the next room, where she has hung his hat and coat, to get his tobacco pouch. In taking the pouch from his coat pocket, she finds a pair of handcuffs and a circular offering a reward for the arrest of her husband. Then she discovers the Sheriff's badge pinned on the inside of his coat.

She goes back to the man and gives him the tobacco. He makes advances and, regardless of her aversion, she encourages him until she succeeds in getting possession of his revolver. At this moment her husband returns, and the Sheriff recognizes him and reaches for his revolver, which is now in the hands of the woman and pointed in his face. She tells her husband that the man is the Sheriff of the county.

Approaching footsteps are heard, and the outlaw obliges the Sheriff to go into the bedroom with him while his wife meets the newcomers. Covering up the bedroom doorway with a blanket and furniture, she greets the new arrivals, who happen to be the Sheriff's companions. She feeds them and they leave. The husband, with the Sheriff, come from the bedroom, and the wife pleads with the Sheriff to let her and her husband escape. He consents after some hesitancy, and the outlaw and his wife leave the cabin. Alone, the Sheriff is wrapt in reverie of the woman who so generously rescued him from death. He sees her shawl and reverently lifts it to his lips and then buries his face in its folds.

ONE OF THE FINEST.—Sorrowfully and reminiscently looking through the contents of a little trunk, Mrs. Hennessey is indulging in a sort of memorial service on the anniversary of the death of her child. Sadly she views each memento of the little one until her husband, Sergeant Hennessey, comes into the room and comforts her.

THE COWBOY GIRLS.—In the shaded lawn of a New England home, the admirers and friends of Hazel Hemyst are seen indulging in various and most outdoor sports. All is happiness and the happy arrival of a messenger boy causes a flutter in Hazel which proves to suggest an idea for a merry outing. The next day word came from the L. Z. Ranch that her consent and the horses are ready. In three weeks and Hazel is reunited together with her girl friends, to say the reason is real.

Lucy has secured there to get a nice young fellow. The ranch soon is to meet the party at the station, the saddle and compliments of the rugged cowpunchers and the horses in a general and unexpected parade to the ranch. We see them landing at the station of Cattle Valley and Hi Low standing by the station and some men to the L. Z. Ranch. Their arrival and being a success, of the best horses, and general turmoil prevails.

PAPINTA.—Juan and Papinta are lovers. Pedro, an Indian, asks their consent and they refuse to tell the girl's uncle. Pedro, who intends that she shall marry Juan. The latter hold a secret meeting and determine to elope. They meet Father Vallejo, who agrees to marry them. Pedro sends again summonses and follows. The young couple enter the chapel, Carmelo runs back to inform Pedro the uncle.

The party go to Juan's ranch when an Indian girl Wilma comes and tells that Pedro the uncle and Juan the rejected suitor are approaching near an orchard. The young people surrender here. They are searched by Pedro and Juan. Juan is promised Anna and Papinta is about to be married when Father Vallejo enters and reconciles Pedro's uncle. Again the young people rejoice and Juan interchanges rings with his second Maryanna. Fear not as with Juan and Papinta, but are presented to an American surveyor, who goes to be help the young couple.

GREAT NORTHERN.

SAVED FROM THE SULTAN'S JUDGMENT.—Suleika, a young and pretty Oriental girl who has been taken away from her parents, is to spend a very monotonous life as one of the wives of the Sultan. One day as she comes back from a short ride she sees a young American, who is impressed by her fine appearance. Suleika has watched this young fellow, who is attached to the foreign embassy, from her window, and he has always made an impression upon her. As she notices that the interest she takes in him is returned, she makes up her mind with his help to escape from her prison. A few days later one of the secretaries of the embassy, and superior officer of the young fellow, has to pay a diplomatic call on the Sultan, and he is accompanied by his wife and daughter. The ladies are issued to visit the harem, and Suleika thinking that this will be a good opportunity, secretly passes a letter in the hand of the young American lady and requests her to hand it over to the young man. Unfortunately, she has given the letter to the wrong person, because the secretary's daughter has herself a secret admiration for the same young man. She is therefore terribly jealous of the young harem woman, and in her jealousy she arranges that the letter reaches the Sultan. The latter is furious about the attempt which his favorite wife has made to escape, and he orders her to be punished according to the law of the country, which means that she is to be put into a sack and thrown into the river. Suleika, who is horrified at the sentence which is passed on her by her master, can only induce one of her servants to go to the young American and tell him that she has to die that very night. As soon as the young man receives the message, he watches all night by the banks of the river, and manages to get near the spot where the death sentence is carried out. He waits until the sack with its living contents is thrown into the water, and thanks to his skill in swimming, he manages with hard work to get the sack into his boat, and, arriving at the shore, he liberates the poor girl, who, after reviving, is most happy to go away with him and to leave all the horrors of the Orient behind.

"IMP."

A RURAL ROMEO.—The advent of the swift-speeding automobile has certainly brought our country centers nearer to us, and every day we hear of romantic occurrences thus brought about. Your tired business man finds an auto ride into the country the best holiday diversion. In this particular case he has taken his pretty daughter with him, and they are speeding along on a fine stretch of road, when suddenly something goes wrong with the gears and they are catapulted against a tree, the auto describing half a parabola.

In the neighborhood there dwells a youth—a stalwart, big-hearted, loving lad, whose all in life is his mother and their little home. He hears the crash, speeds to the scene and in a short time his strong arms have carried the injured girl to his home, where his kind mother makes her comfortable.

She does not suffer long, for by the grace of the able administration of mother and son, she is soon around the house, feeding chickens and enjoying the fresh farm life. Her father would fain remain there, too, but business calls him away, and he leaves his daughter to gather the vigor of the fine air and free life.

Since the day he first carried her in, the youth has had that peculiar affectionate feeling for her; in his simple way he bore it bravely, for he did not know that his ecstatic misery and heavenly heart-pain was love. Nor did she, a wealthy sophisticated miss of high social circles, dream that she was gradually being drawn to him, until one day her father calls for her, to take her home. Ah! the parting is the test, but all she allows herself is to shake his hand and give him a sprig of the posy he has gathered for her.

We now see her in her fine home, a striking contrast to the humble farm house. Her mind is not at ease; thoughts of him—he is with her always, and finally she writes him to come to town for a visit.

He loses no time; this country boy has determined to press his suit, so we soon see him ushered in. But it was not what he thought. Why? This girl is in elaborate evening dress, such as he never saw before; the luxury of the home staggers him. She and her father try to make him feel at home, but cannot.

Quietly she slips away, and in a few minutes he is ushered into another room, and there he cannot keep down a whoop of joy as he sees that the elaborately gowned, bejeweled miss has been re-transformed into the rollicking, pinafored, sunbonneted little lady of his heart.

Well, he promptly gets into the shade of that bonnet, and although one can't see their faces, it doesn't take a strong imagination to divine how he stands—or kissed!

THE TURN OF THE DICE.—The brute instinct, inherent in primitive man, though acceptably absent for ages, will occasionally come into evidence in the life of the world. Such a character is Rolfe, the trapper, a product of the Canadian wilds, who as the story opens, is terrorizing his pretty wife—a fit of anger to which, notwithstanding its frequency, she is not yet accustomed. She runs out in fear, and Percy, the sheriff, who happens to be a rich customer, etc. He is interested in the young wife's welfare and [illegible] Rolfe. The latter, at parting, [illegible] But the cheerful business will accept cards, and [illegible] young woman begs for his consent. He yields.

A subsequent scene shows us that the young loves her, but she does not [illegible] age now. When she leaves the cabin after an visit, Rolfe, who has learned the state of affairs, follows him.

In the barroom he comes upon the sheriff playing a little friendly game, and sneaking up behind him makes a cowardly attempt to assassinate him. Luckily, bystanders interfere. Then, out of his case, he invites Percy to follow him for the final shot in a pistol duel. Pierre quietly accepts, and throws two dice, Rolfe to [illegible] the loser. Without further ado, Percy stands up against the bar prepared to die. Rolfe takes his pistol to aim very slowly, a fiendish smile on his face. This desire to torture his victims [illegible] against him, however, for just as he is about to fire, a disheveled figure dashes in and throws itself before his pistol. It is his wife, who has followed him, and she explains that she did not tell Pierre she was married. In the face of all this, all that Rolfe can do is to withdraw.

Justice is slow but sure, a long time elapses, and one day Rolfe, while setting a trap, falls on his bowie knife. As if it were fate, Pierre finds him and carries him back to the cabin, where, before he breathes his last, Rolfe appoints him the helpmate of the widow.

"SALVATION" SMITH.—"Salvation" Smith is a traveling preacher, who stops at Cattleville, Ariz., for the purpose of introducing religion among the cowboys.

Our first scene shows the cowboys having a lot of fun with the new preacher. The next day we see the cowboys doing some very amusing dancing and acrobatic stunts when "Salvation" comes in and announces that he is going to hold a prayer meeting. The boys laugh, but Nellie, the daughter of old Pop Greyson, who keeps the hotel, comes in and insists that the parson be given a show. Smith prays, and the cowboys, touched by his fervor, respond to his preaching.

"Salvation" becomes interested in Nellie, and he tries to teach her something about the Bible. Big Bill comes in, and thinking the minister is trying to court the girl, he strikes Smith. Jim Roberts, who is Nellie's real sweetheart, enters and calls Bill down good and hard. Bill and Jim agree to fight it out in the woods, where they meet. A thrilling duel ensues in which both men are shot. Bill seriously. Jim thinks he has killed Bill, and he crawls away. "Salvation" finds Bill and carries him to the hotel, where he is pronounced dead, and is laid out on the table. The sheriff goes after Jim, who, being wounded in the leg, has crawled to "Salvation" Smith's cabin. The sheriff is heard coming, and Jim begs Smith to save his life. A tantalizing dramatic situation follows when the gentle preacher decides to protect the cowboy, and when, in answer to the sheriff's question, "Have you seen Jim Roberts?" Smith tell his first lie. That night Smith helps Jim escape on his horse.

A very funny comedy scene follows in which Big Bill, who is laid out under a sheet as a corpse, comes to life and makes the watching cowboys believe he is a ghost.

"Salvation" Smith leaves for other fields. While preaching on the street Jim Roberts, who believes he is a murderer, comes up. Smith stops preaching, grabs Jim and tells him the truth.

Our last scene shows Jim and Smith being received by the cowboys back at Cattleville.

THE PRISONER OF THE GOLDEN ISLE.—The Duke de Belliers successfully defended the daughter of the Jailer of the Golden Isle one day, when she was attacked by vagabonds. The young girl has always a sentiment of eternal gratitude for the Duke who so valorously saved her.

Belliers is arrested for conspiring against King Louis XI. and is taken to the Chateau Plessis where Louis XI., instilled as usual by Oliver, his Prime Minister, condemns Belliers to imprisonment for life in the Chateau of the Golden Isle, where there is absolutely no hope of escape. The prisoner is brought to the isle and turned over to the custody of the jailers.

Helen is much surprised when she recognizes the prisoner as the one whom, at the peril of his life, had saved her own. Immediately her resolution is mentally made. Penetrating into the cell, she causes the Duke, who had forgotten her adventure, to remember her. She brings the clothing of her fiance and has the prisoner put them on. She herself puts on the clothing of the Duke. She then leads him through the Chateau, of which she of course knows every nook and corner. The fugitives are escaping over the rocks when a soldier sees them and gives the alarm. They are about to be captured, when the Duke, with the borrowed clothes, jumps into a boat while Helen decamps, pursued by the guard. One of the soldiers finally reaching her, and deceived by the clothing, wounds her by a sword thrust. Helen falls and

HER TWO SUITORS.—Mr. Jenkins does not approve of his daughter's choice of suitors and on receiving a letter from the rival in which he learns that Smith is not the man for Miss Jenkins, being financially embarrassed and otherwise not straightforward. Off Pa goes to Smith's rooms, wishing to learn the true state of affairs, hides himself in a large cabinet and awaits events. Smith arrives looking very disconsolate, for on his heels is the man in possession, who gives orders for the goods to be disposed of. Amongst the many things to go is the cabinet with poor Pa, who has been locked in unwittingly by Smith himself. It is carried with much difficulty and finally deposited outside an antique shop. Now Harry Montgomery, having done a little harm, wishes to do some good for himself and, espying the cabinet, writes to dear Miss Jenkins that from a friend in Japan he has received a handsome cabinet which he would be most happy to offer her as a present. The offer is accepted and Harry arrives with the present elated with the good prospects in view. Whilst explaining its many qualities, Smith arrives, and recognizing his piece of furniture, disputes the argument, verifying his statement by producing the key, and proceeds to open the cabinet, when the nearly lifeless form of poor old Pa Jenkins rolls out, to the astonishment of all, but on recovering Harry Montgomery is not lightly treated, whilst Smith becomes triumphant.

A SISTER'S DEVOTION.—The village blacksmith takes an affectionate leave of his wife and two children and goes to his shop with cheerfulness. About this time two sailors, in a different location, have got into an argument and the one who masters the other, fearing he has ended his life, dashes away. He flies from this place to the blacksmith's cottage to ask his sister's aid. When he makes himself known to her their salutation is one of affection and it is at this time that the gossip uses her knowledge and hastens to the blacksmith's shop. Without hesitation he goes to his cottage and peers in the window. What he sees does not reassure him. His wife is caressing the sailor, and after giving him money, leads him from the house. The smithy follows at a safe distance and sees them enter an old shack. Waiting until his wife takes leave of the man, he is about to enter, but changes his mind and goes off hurriedly. Ere long he returns with staples, and without listening to the sailor's explanation, fastens him to the door. Well satisfied with his act he goes in search of his wife to show her the sorry plight of her companion. When she discovers what her husband has done she is overcome with grief. The smithy's revenge is not yet complete—he sets fire to the shack. His wife tries her best to make him understand that the man he is torturing is her brother. Eventually it enters his brain that she is telling him the truth and he tears down the door and saves the sailor from the flames. Carrying the door to the shop he releases his wife's brother and supports him to the cottage, where forgiveness is asked and granted, and all resume their happy ways.

LOVE AND MONEY.—Evelyn begs her sweetheart to decline the appointment as Government Surveyor in Idaho. Notwithstanding her pleas he goes, leaving his photograph in her possession. Some months later he tempts Dame Fortune at a roulette table and wins a large amount of money. After extending hospitality to all he goes on his way. As night falls Frank is robbed by one who has followed him from town. Fearing that Frank would disclose his identity, his assailant stuns him and leaves him on the prairie, where he is discovered by an Indian tribe, who take Frank with them. In the meantime, Jack, with his ill-gotten gains, has gone to the city, and made Evelyn's acquaintance. He is amazed to learn that the former sweetheart of whom Evelyn speaks was none other than Frank. Missionaries visit the Indian encampment and discover Frank. They endeavor to learn something about him but the Indians intimate that he has lost his reason. The missionaries pay a goodly sum and Frank is turned over into their custody. Frank later recovers and hastens to visit his former sweetheart. He tells her of all his misfortune and in answer to his question if she still loves hm, he is broken-hearted to learn he has been supplanted. At this moment a message comes from Jack bidding Evelyn come to his bedside as he would marry her and thus be able to leave her his possessions. She goes to the hospital taking with her Frank and her mother as witnesses. The ceremony is about to be performed when the two men recognize each other and Frank pulls Evelyn away, denouncing Jack. Forgiveness is asked and in view of his approaching end is granted.

AMBROSIO—

WHO KILLED HER?—"Who killed her?" was the question put to the girl servant by the coroner when he entered the room where the unfortunate Mrs. Louise Sullivan lay on the floor. In front of her mistress the girl answered with great conviction: "Nobody did; the footman and myself were in the adjoining room when we heard the noise of the fall; we ran into this room and found the lady lying as she is now." All the words of this woman were superfluous, for on a sheet of paper was related the whole truth. On that piece of paper, in fact, Mrs. Sullivan had written the following: "I kill myself with my own hands and by my own will." It was strange, though, that the lettering should have been so ill drawn and irregular! However, in the face of such clear proof the jury withdrew, bowing to fatality. Well, then, nobody has killed her! Mrs. Sullivan has died of her own free will. Mankind will ignore forever the circumstances surrounding such a dreadful deed. To-day only a man knows the truth and remembers now and then his guilt. He is so self-concerned, however, that he will never betray himself. In view of such cases we must believe that some mysterious forces are existing, concealed without analysis; and when they are used to the detriment of our fellow creatures may give birth to the most fatal ends. Man may accumulate as much of his law as he likes, but the criminal who wants to succeed and knows how, will escape the law. Meanwhile his perfidies will keep forever unpunished.

This Picture Tells the Tale!

The very simplest announcement that "IMP" films are to be shown in any theater serves to pack it to capacity. This is the sort of approval you cannot dodge. It comes from the people—the people who hand you their money! The "Imp" craze is marvelous! It is sweeping the whole country and is the sensation of the moving picture business. If your exchange man cannot give you "Imp" films, it's a safe bet he is not buying any new stuff whatever, but is operating on old subjects. We've advised you a dozen times to keep ding-donging at your exchange till it gives you "Imp" films. Don't let up. Hammer away till you get what you demand! Here are two more wonderful films for Independents only!

"A Rural Romeo"

(Released Monday, May 9. Length, 980 feet.)

This is one of the simplest plots in the world, yet therein lies its very strength. Clean, wholesome, bound to have a softening influence on the toughest old heart that ever beat. A country boy falls in love with a city girl with interesting results. Tell your exchange you want it!

"The Turn of the Dice"

(Released Thursday, May 12. Length, 970 feet.)

Here's one which will curl your very teeth. It deals with a sheriff, another man and the latter's wife—the eternal triangle. But it deals with the subject in a new way and maintains the intensest interest from jump to finish. Write your exchange every week till you get it!

LISTEN:—We naturally get dozens of fine letters like the following every blessed day of our lives: E. E. De Long, Dublin, Texas: "I have two Edisons and two Vitas. My customers look to him when they want to rent. I have had them in the theater and find business could be done by them." Mr. Gordon LeFevre, Toronto, Ont.:—Imp films are certainly head and shoulders above the rest. I would rather buy them than any other brand made. Yours for Independence!"

"SWEEPING THE COUNTRY!"

"My Biggest Friday Night Due to a 'Thanhouser'!"

J. George O'Donnell, Lincoln Theater, Chicago.—It pleases me very much to tell you that my patrons and myself like your pictures. I have run several of them, including "St. Elmo," which I ran to the biggest Friday night's business I have had since I opened my theater two years ago. I have heard only favorable comments about it, and the picture, to my way of thinking, was one of the best ever turned out.

"They've Won Favor Among My Patrons!"

Philip Collins, Mgr., Star Theater, Utica, N. Y.—Your films have won favor among my patrons. They are certainly good.

"Make More of Them!"

Wm. J. Ferry, Mgr., Grand Theater, Newark, O.—The only way you can make your films more valuable is to make more of them.

C. W. Brown, Mgr., Grand, Chillicothe, O.—Your films are above the average and should draw big houses everywhere.

"I Want Thanhouser Film Always!"

Charles R. Holmes, 1067 Dolores St., San Francisco, Cal.—To tell the honest truth, I have never seen anything better than "The Actor's Children." I want Thanhouser Film always.

"As Good as Any on the Market!"

E. R. Jones, Mgr., Dreamland, Arcanum, O.—Your film is as good as any on the market.

"Please All My Patrons!"

"All Made a Big Hit!"

Louis Zahler, Liberty Theater, Peoria, Ill.—I ran all your films. They all made a big hit, especially "St. Elmo." Hope you will keep up the good work for the Independent cause.

"Your Actors Are Great!"

W. H. Esch, Mgr., Majestic Theater, La Porte, Ind.—I have run all your releases up to April 22, and think you have as good an output of films as can be made. They are as clear as day, and the actors are great.

Will It Last?

We, whose names are on the top of this page, went through practical photographic work and the journalistic end of it from the days of wet collodion to the Kodak era. Our observation extended, to be quite accurate, exactly one-quarter of a century, namely from the year 1880 to the year 1905, and we are enabled to say by actual experience here in the moving picture industry to-day that what happened in the photographic field between the years 1880 and 1905 is happening in the moving picture field at this moment.

What is happening? People are asking. "Will it last?" "Will the moving picture retain its hold upon public favor?" "Will the business last?" "How long will it last?" "I think it will last so long." "I don't think it will last much longer," etc., etc. Especially during the last few weeks have we had these questions presented to us by men interested in the business in the United States and in other parts of the world. We have had it addressed to us by people in all classes of society.

"Of course it will last," has been our unhesitating reply. It will not only last, but the business of the moving picture will expand in the next few years in a ratio hardly dreamed of by those who are at present interested in it. History repeats itself. Harking back to our stationary photographic experiences. The wet collodion process, as many of our readers know, was superseded by the dry gelatine bromide of silver film—the dry plate of to-day. Then came the rollable celluloid film in the early eighties. Simultaneously there was a great growth of amateur photography. You could buy a camera very cheaply and use either dry plates or dry films. The practice of making photographs was robbed of half its difficulty. So, just about twenty-five years ago, amateur photography began to spread all over the country. Then, even in those days, we remember people saying of the amateur craze, as it was then called: "Will it last?" "I don't think it will last;" "I don't think it will last long;" "I don't think it will last much longer," etc. But it has lasted, to expand, as we have said, in respect of the moving picture in the ratio not dreamed of by those who, a quarter of a century ago, thought amateur photography had reached its zenith.

To repeat the answer to our own question at the heading of this article, "Of course it will last." It will last just as long as the moving picture itself goes on moving. Just as long as nature itself goes on moving. The picture is a complementary of life, consequently while life, that is, motion, exists, the moving picture will exist. It may contain a few germs of disintegration or decay. So does everything human. But the elements that make for stability, longevity and permanency, infinitely outnumber those which make for decay. For the moving picture gratifies a fundamental craving of all our natures, namely, to see the movement of life reproduced by scientific means. Consequently, again, we arrive at a very sound reasoning from these premises, that so long as men, women and children walk the earth the moving picture, like the poor, will always be with them. But, to descend from these possibly too aerial flights, let the reader of this article, whenever he hears the question asked: "Will the moving picture last?" fortify himself by the experience we have had in the other field of photographic work referred to. Amateur photography was inferentially killed and buried over and over again a score of years or more ago. But it still lives a prosperous art, because it satisfies another fundamental craving of human nature to-day, that of transferring to paper by photographic means a representation of a scene or an object or person seen by the eye.

Some weeks ago we took a learned professor to task and pointed out to him that the moving picture was not a fad like roller skating, diabolo, ping pong and the like. These things are mere variants on the general desire for physical amusement, just like the child's skipping rope or the little boy's top, etc. These are either momentary or intermittent fads. Of these things it is impossible to ask, "Will it last?" We saw that such things as diabolo, ping pong and the like do not last.

That rinking is threatened, like many other kinds of physical recreation intermittent in character.

The picture not being a fad, but being practically a desideratum, there can be no question of any permanent diminution of the interest which people take in it. It may and probably will, ebb and flow in public favor according to the times and the circumstances, such as, for example, years of depression. But, speaking generally, the moving picture would appear to have as much vitality and as great a chance of longevity as any of the other arts, crafts and sciences of which the picture itself is wholly or in part a manifestation. In other words, the moving picture will surely last out the life of any individual who happens to be on earth at this moment. And that is long enough for anybody and everybody now concerned in the matter.

The Picture and the Summer.

The moving picture during the past few years has played a considerable but not a large part in the Summer entertainments of the American people. At every open air resort, of which the incomparable Coney Island is the chief exemplar, the picture has been shown. We have seen it there many a time. We have seen it at South Beach, North Beach, Midland Beach; we have seen it in the open at Rochester, Chicago and other great cities of the Union, and still, with it all, the effect made upon our mind has been that it is merely a tentative adjunct to the scheme of pleasure of these places. We think it should not merely be a tentative feature, but a primary and well established one.

Another phase of the matter in New York City and other large cities of the Union is the airdome which is an obvious effort, on the part of those who conduct these places, to take advantage of what is known as the "continental idea" in entertainments. The "continental idea" in Summer entertainments is roughly this, that the people of France, Spain, Germany, Italy and other countries sufficiently near the equator—in other words, whose climates are sufficiently warm in the Summer months—"sit out" at night and provide themselves with every possible opportunity of indulging in al fresco entertainments without personal inconvenience. It is a matter of climate—of longitude and latitude. New York is happily situated in this respect. It is comparable to Madrid, which is a warm city. Hence it is that New York, from what we can hear, will this Summer have dozens of airdomes. Airdomes, as their name implies mean that the moving picture will be exhibited in the open, or out of doors,—an opportunity for countless masses of people to inspect the picture in agreeable open-air surroundings. A mere glance at the map of the United States will show that New York occupies a central position. There is a vast tract of country south of New York which also admits of the airdome idea. It is all a matter of temperature and very largely so of temperament. The American people are great on out-door entertainments and in the Summer months no inducement to them to indulge in out-door pleasure or entertainment is ever lost. Our object in writing this article is to commend the airdome idea to those of our readers who are so circumstanced and so situated as to be able to adopt out-door life in popular cities where the thermometer is not apt to rise or fall suddenly. People seek relief in the open at every possible opportunity. The airdome, in which the moving picture is shown, gives them a chance of gratifying their reasonable ideas in this respect.

We want our exhibiting readers, then, to profit by this opportunity for supplementing their Winter business by an out-door business in which the picture plays a predominant part. After all, in this we are going back to first principles. Hundreds of years ago the first plays of the modern era (we allude to the time of Shakespeare and others) were presented in the open air. We see a survival of this in the "Ben Greet Pastoral Plays." What we want to perceive is the modern parallel of the moving picture where the masses can sit in the open air at night in comfort and convenience, studying a modern representation of the drama which is none the less effective because it is silent and does not rely upon the presence of actual actors and actresses for its representation.

II.

Continuing our article on this subject from page 591, April 16, we point out that a moving picture play is nothing more nor less than a number of Miss Lawrences. But not all have that lady's supreme ability of exhibiting emotion on the stage. What is needed, then, in order that the silent drama can be made into the non-vocal music drama? That is what the moving picture might become. What is needed? we ask. Simply that the music should be chosen to harmonize or synchronize with the emotions shown on the moving picture screen. That is the whole problem in a nutshell.

In last week's MOVING PICTURE WORLD we printed an article on "Silent Drama Music," by Mme. Pilar Morin, who had some very interesting ideas on the subject.

It is easy to conceive that were this done, were the music fitted to the picture, the pleasure of the moving picture theater visitor would be immensely augmented. But how is it to be done? Clearly, we suppose, by some sort of co-operation between the film manufacturer and music publishers and the executants of the music at the various theaters. We wonder if it is within the bounds of possibility that there will be issued, let us say, a fine Essanay comedy, while, at the same time, suitable music for either the piano or other instruments will be especially made for it, and purchasable by the exhibitor. This seems to us to be the logical outcome of the scheme. Indeed, a well-known music publisher of our acquaintance has made the suggestion to us.

We pass on this suggestion to those most interested, with the earnest hope that they will take charge of it. Much has been done in the way of sound effects in the moving picture theater. These, as Mr. Lyman H. Howe demonstrates, wonderfully heighten the effect. Probably there is still more to be done in the way of preparing sound effects for the motion picture. The ground is almost virgin, while as for instrumental music of the orchestrated kind nothing yet has been attempted. We hope to see some move made in this direction. The moving picture will never come into its own as a production until it is as well treated as the other branch of the drama and given proper music. Just take one of our own favorite operas, "Carmen." See how well the music fits the emotions, the passions and the sentiment of that play. Or take a great oratorio such as the Messiah, the Creation. Note, again, how finely the great masters have interpreted the sentiments of those devotional poems!

Some of the films offered by the film manufacturers should largely stimulate music composition. The Biograph pictures, for example, with all their wealth of fine comedy and dramatic acting; the Pathe pictures; the historical and other subjects put out by the Vitagraph Company; the Western subjects of Selig; the pretty little poems of Kalem, and the comedies of Essanay. Here are the subjects ready made for the composer who will gain fame and riches by becoming the music composer of the moving picture.

WHAT IS A MOVING PICTURE.

I.

If we were to address this question to the various classes of our readers—manufacturers, renters and exhibitors—we should, no doubt, get a series of very divergent replies. Probably very few indeed of them have given a single thought to the matter. The majority would say, no doubt, "Well, a moving picture is a moving picture and that is all there is to it." But the question is not to be so easily dismissed in this way. We always desire to interest our readers in the scientific aspects of the moving picture. We want now to devote one or two articles towards answering our own question, in order that greater knowledge of the subject may be diffused in the moving picture field.

How often did we hear, when working in another field of photography, this remark, "Oh, never mind theory; why bother about the scientific side of the photograph?" And yet, oddly enough, in many cases Nemesis arrived to teach the value of theory to the objector. One very conspicuous instance occurs to us. A few years ago, in England, an Australian photographer was introduced to us. He gratuitously informed us that he did not read our paper and did not care about the theory of photography, and yet within a few months he was writing to us, asking us to help him out of a very elementary difficulty in toning a photograph!

Now, it is conceivable that if we all, manufacturers, renters, and exhibitors, understand what a moving picture exactly is—in other words, regard it purely from the point of view of applied science—the interest awakened in the subject will be so great that improvement in quality must manifest itself all along the line. We are glad to perceive that interest in the subject is on the increase.

The shortest answer to our own question is this: The moving picture is simply a record of light sensations or vibrations. The only difference between it and the stationary photograph is that one moves and the other does not. Having some knowledge of what goes on in the stationary photographic field, the almost tender care with which the clever amateur and the advanced pictorial portraitist treats his prints, we want to put in a similar plea for the moving picture as it passes through the hands of the various people responsible for its production and exhibition. Especially by you, gentlemen outside of the manufacture of moving pictures. It is not a piece of iron or wood to be handled roughly and thoughtlessly as we often watch you doing. It is a very tender product, indeed, demanding, pari passu, as much care in the handling as a platinum photograph on Japanese paper. Except that in the case of your moving picture you simply have a film, or rather a layer, of very finely divided metallic silver in clear gelatine on translucent celluloid. Thus the difference between the moving picture and the stationary photograph is merely a difference in kind and not a difference in essence. Gelatine and celluloid are very delicate, tender bodies. Then pigmentary silver, in other words, the metal which goes to form the image of the picture, is also matter in a fine state of division, demanding great care in its treatment. So that, from the purely physical point of view, it is up to the renter, the operator, or the exhibitor of a theater to treat the moving picture reels with just as much care as he would a fine photograph produced by a Fifth avenue photographer, or a fine engraving. Therefore, to give another of many answers to our own question, "What is a moving picture?" Simply regarded from the point of view of chemical technology, it is a very delicate production demanding very delicate treatment in the handling. There are other answers to our own question which we shall give in subsequent articles.

STAGECRAFT.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

Mr. Erlanger is reported to have said that the present interest in moving pictures is only a craze which will die out as suddenly as it came. This opinion may be lightly regarded by those who are flushed with present success, but is worthy of revised consideration. The Napoleon of the Drama is a keen and unprejudiced observer; in the same article he is quoted as saying that some of the picture plays display greater ingenuity than is shown by "our dramatists." His judgment of matters theatrical is notoriously good, and he is a man of few words. It is quite possible that Mr. Erlanger has seen as many picture dramas as the average man engaged in the business of producing them; very few of the latter go to the exhibitions for obvious reasons; the novelty has worn off and most plays are so lacking in originality as to be uninteresting. What is now true of the producers can become equally true of the people who are now swarming to the exhibitions, and, when the public is weary of the monotonous repetitions now being released, it may be seen that Mr. Erlanger's remarks were characterized by good common-sense.

The drama, in all its phases, is a democratic institution, depending on the will of the people, and the American people are progressive; they crave what is new and stimulating to the mind rather than the wearisome repetition which stales even a good joke, and may be justly said that many of the reel makers are not keeping pace with our individual and national growth. There is no reason in dodging the issue by ascribing to the character of the audiences the quality of plays produced, for the theaters are controlled by men who incline to variety performances, and the production of films and picture reels is in the hands of comparatively few houses. The managers of these houses are directly responsible. They are in the business for commercial purposes and, as long as audiences pay for this class of entertainment, it may be thought that the demand is being supplied, but, while ten-cent patrons are good-natured because of the low price paid, enduring the poor pictures for the sake of the good ones, it would be a good thing for the producer if he adopted the policy of the playwright and studied the people in front.

The common people are not lacking in good taste, as may be seen in the enormous circulation of high-class periodicals, and little people of the next generation are not lacking in discrimination. The latter are sharp observers. A tiny tot sat watching a picture drama, much affected by the distress of a little girl in the play who had lost her mother. The child in the play wandered away, all alone, and stood crying in the middle of the street where an automobile belonging to some rich-and-childless man could run over her without hurting her very much. The car came along, the man could not steer it, perhaps he did not know that there was an emergency brake, anyway he supposedly ran over the motherless girl. He picked her up, unconscious and unbroken, and carried her to his beautiful home. Three years elapsed. The motherless girl had not grown but she wore a pretty dress. All seemed well until the tiny tot in the audience remarked: "She's got on the same shoes she had when her mama died." Some small boys were watching a pistol-drama. In the play, the dare-devil villain escaped from the cowboys. They chased him on horse, and they chased him on foot. They chased him through rugged ravines, near lovely waterfalls and over pretty streams. Most of the time they were only ten or twenty feet behind him and blazing away with pistols and guns, but they could not hit him. He acted as though he thought they were throwing bouquets and banged away at them dozens of times with some kind of a self-loading revolver. It was very thrilling and dime-novely until a small, uncombed boy in front said in disgust: "If my kid brudder wuz only dere wid his air-gun!" when the people laughed, and everything was spoiled.

These inconsequential criticisms indicate that the American child's head is not solid ivory, and may further indicate that the smallest incongruities and inconsistencies have a comedy effect in a tragic situation.

Weak plays make a shallow impression on the mind, whereas the great majority of those who attend the exhibitions hope for a mental imprint of something definite, something to stimulate the emotions, to quicken the sympathies, that has a reason for being and may even serve as a stimulus to new thought. Most of those who go to the picture shows known something about the bitter side of the endless struggle for existence and that i why a situation of stress or of sorrow rings such a quick response in human hearts. The constant effort to accomplish what is seemingly beyond our powers, the struggle to rise out of unendurable conditions, the conflict with adverse circumstances, all furnish the material for dramatic situations, and if a tragic end is the only one acceptable to common sense, such an end is not to be avoided as unsatisfactory. The love-making of Romeo and Juliet thrills us because we know of their peril. Their story would not be as effective if they embraced or wedded at the end. We like to watch the progress of other careers, especially when the air is heavy with the storm of impending passion, even if the storm wrecks instead of clearing, but a ray of light upon the scene adds to the effect and makes the tragi-comedy the best all-around play.

"The Treacherous Easterner" reappears in the sub-titles of a Western reel-maker and it seems too bad that the American people of any great section are treacherous, but a worse slight is put on the Western women in the play. They are badly dressed, and not nice to look at, and are frightfully immoral. "The Treacherous Easterner," in white socks and a linen duster, is so fascinating that it takes him about five minutes to lead his host's wife away, then, after a lapse of years, he goes back and gets the daughter in less than three minutes. The latter has been brought up by the cowboys and is their "pride," but they let a total stranger carry her off in an automobile when he points to the engagement ring he has put on her finger. How easy! These pictures, and others, depicting the Western men as a lot of bad-mannered swill-pots, who pass their days crossing their legs or pouring out rum, are shown to the women and children of our families as characteristically Western, and are taken abroad to be typically American. The pictures which come to us from abroad are not misrepresentations. Our people, regardless of section, are well educated, are tremendous readers of high-class periodicals, the homes of our women are in clear evidence of their superior taste and refinement, the women themselves are incomparable, our men are broad and cosmopolitan, not provincial or sectional, hence pictures set forth from a low view-point do us injustice as a people and an infinite amount of other harm. It is dispiriting to lovers of motion pictures that such junk is shoveled in with the superior productions, and possibly discouraging to high-class producers, but with them, not the public, lies the remedy.

The difficulty of putting over a great stage-play or a fine novel will eventually lead to the abandonment of this form of picture-drama. Any play which requires several hundred feet of sub-titles to make it capable of being understood is unsuited to the theater; people go there to see the story, not to read it; besides, such plays lack harmony of action and contemporaneous interest. The three unities of time, place and action, mean now, here and in our daily lives. We are most interested in the comedies and tragedies of present existence, and these are not to be found in the improbabilities of other days. The events of past ages interest the scholarly, but what is going on to-day, affecting our business and social affairs, is of interest to every man, woman and child in the country. The materials of the picture-drama are in present experiences, with settings of the office, the workshop, the factory, the store, the street, the fields, the open, and, above all things, the home. The pictured scenes are a means to an end, and that end is that we shall be strongly affected by the play. It must cheer us, interest us, or make us think; we must laugh over it, cry over it, or get something from it. We can read books at home. The picturing of stories is a graphic art with a message. To present in it a modern, effective situation typifying an experience which enlists our sympathies is an art of unquestioned value to the producer; IT IS STAGECRAFT.

DISHONEST JOURNALISM—A PROTEST.

Continuing its marauding policy of attacking those interests in the moving picture field whose support it fails to obtain, the "Show World" of Chicago in its issue of April 30th gives a further illustration of the depths of degradation to which even a Chicago newspaper man can sink. There are depths of depravity in journalism; and lower depths; and even lower depths still. The "Show World" seems determined to go on sinking in these depths until it touches rock bottom. Some weeks ago the moving pictures issued by Pathe Freres were subjected in the Chicago sheet to a series of attacks, so absurdly irrational and wild that only one construction could possibly be assigned to the performance, which was this: that the writers were inspired by malice or disappointment; probably caused by the fact that Pathes refused their advertising support to the "Show World." The attacks temporarily, we are told, injured Messrs. Pathe's local business, doubtless the object of the "Show World." But Pathe go on in their business just the same. The only consolation which those connected with the "Show World" can possibly derive from the performance is the reflection that its pages are regarded with contempt by all honest men. It is only a sense of duty to the trade which compels us to notice this publication, because if its policy of misrepresentation is allowed to go unchallenged and uncontradicted, it is only too probable that some measure of credence may be attached to it by those who have no means of getting at the truth. In its April 30th issue it published a tribute to the late Walt Mackee, formerly on its editorial staff, who seems to have been,

according to the writer, a "beautiful character, soaring high above the world's passions, pure and clean-minded." We wish we could say the same for the late Mr. Mackee's associates or those responsible for the April 30th issue.

On page 4 of that issue there is an article by a London press agent which is a malicious attack on George Kleine of Chicago, one of the most honorable men engaged in the business. Mr. Kleine needs no defense from us, but what is to be said of the policy which received an attack of this kind and printed it without endeavoring to ascertain its truth or falsehood? On the same page J. Stuart Blackton of the Vitagraph Company also comes in for a series of attacks of a peculiarly venemous character. They are just cowardly stabs in the back. Blackton is made to say that the public wants sensational subjects, "raw red meat, the rawer the better." He is accused of "venting his spleen on the guardians of the law and in his raving, blundering way would force his judgment upon the millions of Chicago people." He is also said to have bitterly attacked the police censorship of Chicago. There is more in this screed of base fabrications which it is unnecessary to quote.

Those who know Mr. Blackton hardly need assuring that he never said anything of the kind that is attributed to him, and, moreover, that he is not antagonistic to the Chicago police or the public authorities. These libels refute themselves. But the malignancy of this attack personally on Mr. Blackton is only apparent at a second glance at the way in which the name of the Vitagraph Company, Mr. Blackton's company, is drawn in. Interestingly the Vitagraph Company is accused of putting out "raw red meat" in the shape of moving picture films.

A fouler libel was never printed in the columns of a newspaper. The Vitagraph Company, whose work we follow with pleasure week by week, is conspicuous for the harmlessness, the cleanliness, one might almost say the innocuousness of the themes which it films. Depravity, immorality, the baser passions, generally and absolutely no place in this company's repertoire. It is only yesterday since all the world applauded the enterprise which actuated them in putting the vast production, entitled "Moses," on the screen. Its most conspicuously successful recent release, "Elektra," was so handled that there was nothing in the nature of the sordid or horrible in its story. Indeed, speaking generally, it may be said that Mr. Blackton and his associates in the Vitagraph Company keep as far off from "raw red meat" in their productions as the "Show World" keeps away from truthfulness, honesty, and respectability in the editing of its deplorable pages.

REALISM IN MOVING PICTURES.

In speaking of the genre picture last week we typified it as the highest form of art, and defined it as the picture that told a story and told it in a way that was convincing. Broadly speaking, the majority of moving picture stories may be termed genre studies, but many of them fall short of conveying the sentiment of the story, far less the emotions of the characters, to the beholder. The majority may be said to describe a story, or to picture the incidents in a story, and, like the average book illustration, some of them do it very well.

There are some genre moving pictures that can be well executed in a studio from suitable models, but there are certain subjects that should not be attempted without the atmosphere and realism of the natural scenery. Many more or less successful attempts have been made to illustrate popular novels or historical events by means of the motion picture. Needless to say that realism in work of this kind can only be obtained by going to the locations described, regardless of the expense or inconveniences. And this is what the Biograph Company has done in the making of a film that will be seen on the screen in about another week. It is an illustration of the story of

"Ramona," by Helen Jackson, a very popular writer, and filmed by arrangement with the publishers. Those who have read the book, while interested in the thread of the story, cannot fail to see that Helen Jackson merely introduced the characters as accessories to her word picture of the persecution of the Indian by the whites. Her story is intensely interesting and it contains many dramatic episodes that would have been seized upon by the average producer to make one of those Wild Western thrillers with plenty of action and no motive. Not so the Biograph artist. He interprets the true spirit of the book and merely uses certain incidents to bring out the ill-treatment the Indian has received at the hands of the white settlers. It is not a Biograph masterpiece, but it comes very near to being pictorially perfect. The scenes are laid around the actual places selected by the authoress of the story. The Biograph Company climbed into the mountains of Camulos to show the bleak and bare regions into which the Indians were driven to starve or exist by stealing. The artistic quality of these pictures is [illegible]

PICTURE PERSONALITIES.

Mr. Nicholas Power.

Time and opportunity alone are required to reveal to the great moving picture public the fact that in the working world of the picture there are many interesting personalities, not probably hiding their light under a bushel with deliberate purpose, but quite content to pursue the noiseless tenor of their way without ever thinking of stepping into the limelight. A poet once wrote that the "world knows nothing of its greatest men." This is true. Every man of observation is constantly encountering characters quite as great, quite as interesting, as those whose names are ever before us in the newspapers and elsewhere. Some men are born great, some achieve greatness, some have greatness thrust upon them; some men do not care a tinker's cuss for greatness. And thank God they do not! For life would be intolerable if everybody, like a certain eminent American now in Europe (who shall be nameless), always wanted to be in the limelight.

The many users of the Nicholas Power machine might like to know something about the personality of the man whose name this beautiful piece of mechanism bears. So this week we give his portrait. The other day we haled Mr. Power before the bar of the great moving picture public, choosing a moment when he had just returned from a 22 weeks' trip to India, Japan, Egypt and other parts of the Orient—a well-earned trip after years of hard work in the mechanics of optical projection. Mr. Power was full of the glamor of the East and made us look forward to the time when we, too, may see the sights that he saw. But that will be, as Kipling says, "another story."

NICHOLAS POWER.

The moving picture in all its phases, we are constantly discovering, is a development of, and from, stationary photography. The work, and the people who do the work, have sprung and are springing from stationary photography. Mr. Power is one of those whose mechanical mind first exercised itself in the projection of still photographs. His earlier successes were made in what is known as opaque projection. Many of our older readers will remember the dark lantern or Aphengescope. This is a very old device whereby a print may be set angularly to a radiant or source of illumination, with the result that the image of the print or photograph is projected on the screen. It is, roughly, right angle projection by reflection, instead of by direct projection by refraction.

Refraction, we may explain, is projection through a lens as in stereopticon or moving picture work. The dark lantern or Aphengescope, as it is known, is simply a device whereby an image may be projected without the use of a lens. We see in popular magazines that this device is still on the market for projecting postal cards.

After this kind of work, Mr. Power naturally took up the ordinary stereopticon or magic lantern. This, in turn, some years ago was succeeded by the well-known Power's Cameragraph, which has passed through various stages until now it stands forth as a splendid type of the efficiently working projector that is popular all over the United States.

The Power's Cameragraph, as Mr. Power modestly claims, embodies no real novelty of fundamental principle. The principles of moving picture and optical projection are, and must be, universally the same. But what Mr. Power does claim is the fact that the Cameragraph is an evolution of progress. The machine that is made to-day bears only a general resemblance to the machine, let us say, of three years ago. It differs in detail, because, in the meanwhile, experience has taught that here and there it may be modified; that a part may be altered or strengthened to advantage; that this or that movement may be simplified or changed; that the weight of the machine may be reduced, etc. At one time the craze was for extreme lightness of machine on account of the fact that Cameragraph users were in the habit of traveling about; therefore they required to lighten their impedimenta as much as possible. To-day the moving picture man is not a peripatetic, in the majority of cases. The exhibitor is generally a fixed institution and so he wants his projector to be the same. And he wants it to be solid and to stand wear and tear and at the same time to be accurate and sweet of movement in all its working parts. The Power's Cameragraph, then, is a development of experience and the result of Mr. Power's personal application to, and study of, the mechanical problems of machine construction.

It is good to learn of the existence in the moving picture field of modest, well qualified, and experienced men like Nicholas Power. We are pleased to add this description of his personality and life work to our little gallery of picture personalities.

Moving Pictures Please the Classes.

On Wednesday evening, May 4, the Knickerbocker Field Club, of Brooklyn, gave one of their regular entertainments in the large assembly hall of the Club. Several hundred of the elite of Brooklyn's most fashionable suburb packed the hall to overflowing, and, at the close of the entertainment, the general opinion was that it was the best and most enjoyable affair of the season. Through the courtesy of Mr. J. Stuart Blackton, chairman of the entertainment committee, the program consisted almost entirely of Vitagraph "Life Portrayals" and dramatic renderings by members of the Vitagraph stock company. Miss Florence Turner was the star of the evening, and when the song, "The Vitagraph Girl," was rendered, which showed this popular actress in fetching poses, everyone joined in the chorus. The first film shown was "Maria's Swan Song," a very pathetic story of a fatal accident that happened to a little boy violinist who was his old father's only support. At the close there was scarcely a dry eye in the audience, and after a few moments, when the true beauty of the picture dawned on the spectators, the applause was general and deafening.

The feature number of the program, however, was the silent acting of one of the Vitagraph films of recent release, "A Pair of Schemers," by Miss Florence Turner and Messrs. Maurice Costello and Edward Phillips. The applause which greeted their efforts proved that subtitles were not needed to explain a story to an intelligent audience.

The program closed with the classic film, "Elektra," rendered with appropriate music played by Mr. Albert Doyle and sound effects by a member of the Vitagraph staff. We have seen this film on the screen in several theaters, but never saw it so well put on and never saw anything to equal the applause and verbal appreciation it received. It gave us great pleasure to watch the effect of a moving picture entertainment on a select audience of cultured people, and the president of the Club tendered Mr. Blackton a very hearty vote of thanks and high compliment on the quality of the entertainment he had provided.

The projection end of matters was skillfully handled by Mr. Charles Burton, a member of the Vitagraph staff.

PATHE'S AMERICAN FILM.

Pathe Freres announce for release on Monday, May 16, their first American production, entitled "The Girl from Arizona," about 950 feet. This film combines with Pathe perfection in photography and technique the qualities which make their productions so popular in this country. It has long been conceded that Pathe Freres excel in photography and finish and now that they are giving subjects posed for by American actors with American scenes, and under the stage management of one who is stated to be the highest priced producer in the world, they are indeed setting a high standard. In announcing this film, Pathe Freres invite criticism from the exhibitor, for they are frank enough to state that they are the ones they have to please. It is, therefore, up to the exhibitor. On Friday, May 20, Pathe Freres will release "Gee! I'm Late," a screaming comedy, a fitting successor to that king of comedies, "The Runaway Horse."

Buffalo, N. Y.—The Holy Angels' Catholic Church of this city are running moving pictures twice a week in their assembly hall. A carefully selected program is, of course, given and the priest has warned his congregation not to patronize certain moving picture houses in his parish, as the shows were immoral. This is a case of the church entering into competition with the theater. The antagonism of the church has been aroused by the fact that the picture houses open on Sunday and prove a greater attraction than the churches. All the large popular priced theaters are showing pictures on Sunday, and the Academy of Music, Buffalo's popular priced home of melodrama, with a seating capacity of 1,800, has installed pictures; also the Savoy Theater, and all are doing good business. The Victor Independent Exchange have all the business they can handle and the outlook seems encouraging. G. KELLER.

The American Kinograph Company, a newly formed corporation, has taken the premises at 125 East Twenty-fifth street, New York City, formerly occupied by Messrs. Gaumont. No less than fourteen of the most eminent European makers have placed their American agencies in the hands of the American Kinograph Company, who will shortly be releasing six reels per week. The General Manager of the company is Mr. G. A. Magie. The company is strongly backed up financially, and will probably play a leading part in the Independent field. We shall be referring in greater detail to the company's prospects next week.

PICTURE PERSONALITIES.

Mr. Baxter Morton.

Mr. Baxter Morton quietly passed before our eyes on the occasion of the recent Convention of the F. S. A. in New York City. There were about half a dozen sentences that passed between us when we met and we were just conscious of his presence at the dinner that night. If we remember aright—well, we do remember aright—he made a short speech and a very terse speech, and the impression which it made on our minds was this, that there was a personality whom it was both our duty and our wish to meet on his own stalking ground. The opportunity of doing so came by fortuitous means. This week at the office of the Nicholas Power Company in that ever-busy, ever-restive hive of human movement, Nassau street, New York City, Morton and ourselves met and talked over things in general, and things in particular, for four solid hours, to our intellectual delight and surprise.

BAXTER MORTON.

Morton, if he will forgive us for dropping his front name, is the modern brain of the Nicholas Power Company. He has a many-sided mind. The ideal mind, to our way of thinking, may be compared to a well-cut diamond. That is to say, it has many facets or surfaces. Each facet or surface, in physical parlance, absorbs light and reflects light: hence its brilliancy, due primarily to its absorptive capacity, and secondly to its reflective capacity.

Morton during his career has been absorbing knowledge. Now he is reflecting it. A young looking man with a young looking face, he has pretty well boxed the compass of chemical, physical and mechanical knowledge, all of which has fitted him for the profession of patent lawyer. He has been chemist, professor of chemistry; he has been an author; he has been a mechanician. Above all things he is a man of education and scientific inclinations; a man of close, diversified, but exact training—a man of technical knowledge, which means, in plain English, that he is a master of scientific first principles. A "hot man," as the phrase goes, when dealing with men of mind from the university standpoint.

In writing this notice of Mr. Morton we are possibly running the risk of his disapprobation, but we shall survive all possible displeasure at his hands. The Power's Cameragraph in his hands is a perfect piece of projection mechanism which, having made its way on the United States market, has got to make its way on the other markets of the world, because he has faith in its performances—a faith which is based upon intimate mechanical knowledge of what this beautiful machine does and can do.

To handle the most modern Power's Cameragraph is equivalent to experiencing a sensation that we ourselves are experiencing as we are writing this article; that is by taking out of our pocket a beautifully made English lever watch and winding it up. It goes with only that sweetness which a mechanically perfect projection machine can go. Looking at the machine and handling the machine we feel that an operator who works it is either a fool or a criminal if he maltreats it.

Morton's outlook in the moving picture field is best expressed in a phrase which he himself uttered to us. It is this: "I only regret that the moving picture field is not larger." This characterizes the man, with his broad field of knowledge and his fine ambitions—ambitions to which we are privy and which in the strictly personal sense we hope will not be realized, because in their realization they may take him out of the moving picture field, a thing which we do not want to happen. We want to keep Morton in the moving picture field and get all out of him that is in his mind.

The MOVING PICTURE WORLD since the beginning of this year has made a point of introducing to its readers some of the more prominent, if retiring, personalities which take part in the work of producing the picture and placing it before the public. Morton is one of those returning ones who do not seek advertisement. We sought him out, not for the purpose of giving him advertisement, because he is not that kind of man, but because we thought it right that the limited field with which he has hitherto come into contact, should not have a monopoly of knowledge of the man, and secondly, because as a man of close thinking and applied scientific knowledge, we think it our duty to turn the limelight on Mr. Morton in this article. We thought it his duty to stand just for a few seconds while the moving picture field at large had an opportunity of observing the character and personality of one of those quiet, well-informed forces in moving picturedom which are making—we hesitate to say for its uplift—but for its general betterment. Which means, of course, its best scientific and material progress.

Animated Photography.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

[I am indebted to my friend, Mr. William N. Selig, of Chicago, for kindly loaning me the volume of an annual of which I was formerly editor. This is the "British Journal Photographic Alamanac," the largest and most widely circulated photographic annual in the world. In this book for the year 1898 I devoted a series of chapters to the then aspects of animated photography. This treatise was written in the Fall of 1897, that is, nearly thirteen years ago. The matter reads, I am told, as if it were written to-day. Some of the chapters are here appended. I have a personal reason for reprinting these articles. It is this: That the ignorant and degenerate operator who quitted his native heath under a cloud and has the impudence in the United States to pose as an authority on moving picture matters, has the equal impudence to suggest that I derived some of my knowledge of the subject from him. The article I am reprinting proves this illiterate charlatan to be a deliberate traducer and a contemptible perverter of facts relating to the careers of better men than himself.—T. B.]

The widespread interest with which what is conveniently called "Animated Photography" is regarded by photographers and the general public, possibly justifies both the belief that its selection as the topic of the principal article in this Almanac will be acceptable to its readers, and the hope that the information here presented may be of service to those of them who have not had an opportunity of studying the subject. I at once admit that the following chapters are by no means exhaustive, but it is probable that they give, in a connected form, a fuller reference to the matter than has hitherto appeared in a photographic publication.

Animated photography, at the time of writing, is obviously only in the earlier stages of development. The wonder and interest which the contemplation on the lantern screen of the representation of objects appearing to move in the order of nature still provokes does not, of course, disguise the fact that much remains to be accomplished in the mechanics of this branch of photography before it can reasonably be claimed that the fullest justice has been done to its possibilities.

It will be observed that I have chosen the term "animated photography" as the title of this series of chapters. Strictly speaking, its accuracy as a descriptive term is open to question; but, of the innumerable names that have been applied to this branch of photography, it is, perhaps, the one which most easily conveys what is meant in a universally understood form; hence its adoption here.

I.—Persistence of Vision.

To understand the principles upon which animated photography is based necessitates some knowledge of the underlying theory involved, viz., persistence of vision; but, unfortunately, this does not place a heavy tax on the understanding, as that theory is exceedingly simple to realise. "The retina of the eye has the physiological property of retaining for a brief time the impression of an image after the object which has produced it has disappeared. The duration of this retinal picture is estimated at one-tenth of a second; so that if an image is placed before our eyes ten times in a second the idea of discontinuity is lost, and the images appear to be in continual evidence. If the images shown to us are represented in the successive positions assumed by the object in motion, the impression conveyed to the eye is that of a continuous movement without intermission. If the photographs are presented to the eye at the same intervals as separate the successive exposures, the movement will appear as if it actually took place." (Movement, by E. J. Marey 1895. P. 305. Published by William Heinemann, Bedford street, Strand.)

This property of the retina is termed persistence of vision and it will be easily understood, from the clear definition given in the preceding paragraph, what bearing the phenomenon has upon animated photography. When the series of photographs is being passed across the surface upon which they are projected, the eye is receiving probably between ten and thirty impressions per second; and, although these impressions reach the retina separately, it will be understood that in consequence of the fact that each impression remains for an appreciable length of time upon the retina before it is, so to speak, obliterated by those which succeed it, the effect upon the brain is not that of a series of disconnected and independent communications, but of a continuous and persistent sensation. Hence it is that we get the phenomena of apparent motion on the screen with which every one is now familiar.

In a valuable paper (Journal of the Camera Club, March, 1897) on the Cinematograph for attaching to the lantern to which I shall again make reference, Mr. F. C. B. Cole illustrates, or rather defines, this phenomenon of the persistence of vision in a way which those who are acquainted with electricity may particularly appreciate.

"Describing it to an electrician," he says, "I might speak of it as 'self-induction of the optic nerve.' We find several analogies to this in electrical matters; for instance, the 'persistence' of the arc in an ordinary arc lamp is just the property which enables it to be run on an alternating current circuit, for the reason that in a direct current system the arc appears to exist for a short time after the current has been cut off; thus, when run on an alternating system, the arc is maintained during the period of reversal; should the period of alteration become longer than the persistence of the arc, the light fails. However, the whole thing is summed up in this, that, when an image momentarily falls upon the retina of the eye, under ordinary conditions, it gradually fades away, and an appreciable time elapses before it entirely disappears."

I quoted above from Marey's book on Movement. To avoid misconception, it may be well to state that this valuable work does not deal at any length with the subject of animated photography. It is what is termed chrono-photography that has long formed an object of study and experiment with this eminent savant, and by its aid he has been enabled to obtain much valuable photographic information relating to the analysis of movement of animals, fish, insects human beings, quadrupeds, etc. But the synthetic reconstruction of those movements is obviously of secondary importance to the analysis of the various methods of locomotion, with which M. Marey has almost entirely occupied himself, so that the book lies somewhat outside the scope of animated photography. Nevertheless, the two branches of work parallelise at times, so that it is difficult for anybody who is interested in the photographic reproduction of the curves and positions taken by animals and moving bodies in their progression to be wholly indifferent to the purely pictorial side of the subject which animated photography clearly is. M. Marey's book, aside of these considerations, is a masterly treatise on the subject of the analysis of movement, and well deserves studying for itself.

II.—Historical Notes.

The history of animated photography may be said to begin with the enunciation of the principles of the persistence of vision, about 100 years ago by Plateau who put those principles into practice by the production of an instrument termed the Phenakistoscope. This consisted of a cardboard disc perforated at equal distances round the periphery by small slits. One side of the disc was blackened, and on the other a series of images were arranged representing men or animals in the various attitudes which corresponded to the successive stages of movement. When the disc was spun round on its axis opposite to a mirror and the eye applied to the blackened side on a level with the revolving slits, the reflections of the various images were seen one after another corresponding to the different attitudes assumed by the original object; thus conveying the impression of actual movement (Marey, p. 307). It is worthy of note that, as early as a century ago, we have a fulfilment of the essential conditions of successful animated photography—the rapid presentation to the eye of a series of successive pictures, each differing slightly from those that precede and follow it.

Plateau's instrument was, of course, improved upon in detail, but its principle has never wholly been departed from. Typical of the various adaptations to which it gave rise may be mentioned the well-known Zoetrope, or wheel of life (introduced about 1845), which still survives, and is capable of affording endless amusement in the family circle, and to young people. The Zoetrope consisted of a cylindrical chamber revolving on a vertical axis. Narrow upright slits were made round the brim, and inside the cylindrical wall a strip of paper was pasted, a series of images depicting the successive attitudes of a figure in motion. The cylinder being revolved, and the eye being placed axially to the slits, the impression of movement was, of course, obtained.

I am reminded by a friend that recently there was an article in the Photographische Correspondenz, by R. J. Sachers, of New York, on the projection of consecutive pictures. He points out that Captain Franz von Uchatius was the first to produce moving pictures in such a manner that a large number of people could see them simultaneously. Lieut. Field Marshal Ritter von Hauslab commissioned Captain Uchatius to endeavour to construct an instrument that would enable a number of spectators to see pictures by the Stampfer method—the stroboskopic disc. Uchatius invented such a machine, and obtained satisfactory results in 1845. He perfected his machine, and exhibited it in 1853 before the Imperial Academy of Science. The pictures were printed in transparent colours, and inserted in a wooden disc in the form of a circle, with equal intervening spaces. A second disc was provided with apertures in the form of a sector of a circle, each aperture corresponding to one of the pictures. This answered the purpose of the slits in Stampfer's disc. Both discs were mounted on the same axis, and turned by a handle. The whole was enclosed in a light-tight case, the only apertures being for the objective and the handle. When the discs were rotated, the images formed a moving picture.

Mr. Cole tells us that "about 1869 or 1870 came the Praxinoscope, by Raynaud, an instrument which was of the same style as the Zoetrope, only the pictures were seen reflected in revolving mirrors. At this time we also hear of a Photoscope, by Mr. Talbot, in which microscopic views on glass were viewed through a lens as transparencies, and, as they rapidly succeeded each other, the effect of animation was produced; this," he remarks, "appears to be the first instrument of the kind to take advantage of photography."

On the other hand, Mr. Snowden Ward (Knowledge, September 1, 1897) credits Louis Ducos du Hauron, the French experimentalist in three-colour photography, with the invention in 1864, two French patents standing in his name, presumably for the photographic application of the principle, although it is not so expressly stated.

The Zoetrope and its congeners did not exhaust the non-photographic applications of the idea. Muybridge painted from his photographs of horses on to glass discs, and projected them by means of the lantern. Solid figures, too, were used in the Zoetrope, and the latter was subsequently adopted by Anschutz for reproductions of photographs, and is now sold or exhibited under the name of the Tachyscope. Muybridge and Anschutz, by their photographic studies of animal locomotion, and the exhibition by projection of the results, undoubtedly brought us appreciably nearer to the realisation of animated photography as we now know it. Muybridge, as is well known, used a series of electrically controlled cameras for recording the phases of movement of a horse passing in front of them.

It appears to have escaped notice that, at the Chester meeting of the Photographic Convention of the United Kingdom, in June, 1890 (The British Journal of Photography, vol. xxxvii., p. 423), Mr. Friese-Greene introduced his camera for taking a series of photographs in rapid succession. Negatives by its agency were shown in the form of a long ribbon of celluloid impressed with a large number of negatives. The apparatus by which the pictures were to have been shown on the screen was, however, deranged, so that the audience were deprived of the opportunity of witnessing the full effects intended to be reproduced. He exhibited a camera which, he stated, would take a series of negatives at the rate of 600 per minute. He also read a paper dealing with the subject of persistence of vision, and its relation to the production and projection of animated photographs.

But the greatest impetus to animated photography was probably given by Mr. Edison, who, in 1893, produced series of photographs of moving objects on perforated strips of sensitive celluloid films, such as we are now familiar with. The positives from the negatives thus made were converted into endless bands, and these, being electrically driven, and illuminated, were viewed through a magnifying eyepiece, and, as between the eyepiece and the moving band a rotating slotted disc was interposed, which presented a new picture to the eye at each successive revolution, the observer obtained all the impressions of movement in the pictures. Tre Kinetoscope, as it was called, was exceedingly popular for a time, and there is no doubt that it was the immediate forerunner of the present system of viewing animated photographs on the screen, rather than as translucent films.

Probably the earliest to take advantage of Mr. Edison's obvious hint were Messrs. A. & L. Lumiere (The British Journal of Photography, Supplement, September 6, 1895, p. 72), who, on July 11, 1895, gave an exhibition of animated photographs, at the offices of the Revue Generale des Sciences, in Paris, at which the evolutions of cuirassiers, a house on fire, a factory, street scenes, and a dinner party were shown on the screen, and much admired. In view of subsequent developments, it may be interesting to reproduce the brief description of Messrs. Lumiere's Cinematograph as it was then given: "The principal features are a mechanism whereby the film is at rest during illumination, and an arrangement for projecting the images upon a screen so as to be visible to a large meeting. Under these circumstances, fifteen images a second are all that is necessary. The film is at rest for two-thirds of the time of the passage of each image. During the remaining third the film is grasped and pulled forward as far as the next image by a set of teeth attached to a frame, whose motion is governed by a cam, working by a revolvinng handle. The same apparatus also serves for taking the photographs, and for printing transparencies from the negative film. For this purpose two films are passed over the rollers, the negative and the film to be printed on, and exposure is made for a very short time as each negative image is placed on the field."

On January 14, 1896, Mr. Birt Acres gave, at the Royal Photographic Society, a demonstration of what he then termed the Kinetic lantern for the projection of animated photographs (The British Journal of Photography, vol. xlii., January 7, 1896). These were taken at the rate of about forty per second, and were projected at the rate of about fifteen per second. The examples included boxers, a review at Kiel by the German Emperor, Epsom Downs, and the Derby, serpentine dancing, breaking waves, etc.

Let it be observed that, in this very brief account of the historical development of animated photography, I have eschewed all mention of Patent Office records, and have not sought to discuss the question of priority in whatever inventions animated photography may rely upon.

The Powers Company announce that they have commenced to release two reels each week of their popular picture plays. This adds another release each week to the output of the Independent manufacturers, and will be welcome news to exchanges and exhibitors. It is also indisputable evidence of the intrinsic worth of their film, the demand for which has justified them in increasing their output to two reels each week instead of one.

OPERATOR'S COLUMN.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Too Tight a Tension or——.—Denver, Col., writes: "Have an Edison, Model B. Some films go through all right while others jump the lower sprocket so badly that I can do nothing with them. Have put in upper and lower sprockets, and rubber rollers and new tension springs and have ordered a new intermittent. Your article in the World of April 23 regarding ignorance of some operators is true and I am not ashamed to admit that I am one of the poor ones. I am not ashamed for the reason that I have done my utmost to become a good one. I keep my machine clean and in as good shape as my ability admits. Have been operating three years, but have been compelled to 'pick up' everything, since there was no instruction available. I have the reputation of being a good operator, but fully realize that I have much to learn. Could I get a position in New York where I could learn the business thoroughly and get enough salary to enable me to live while doing it?"

Denver is doing one of two things, I think, viz.: running with too tight a takeup tension, or else has his sprocket idlers riding on the film with considerable pressure. Either of these conditions will tend to make the film climb the takeup sprocket. Loosen up the takeup tension if it is too tight and set the idlers away from the sprockets by about twice the thickness of a piece of film. It is quite possible, however, that other faults exist. It may be that the lower loop is not straight. That is to say, it may not leave the intermittent sprocket and come squarely around onto the takeup sprocket. This condition would mean that something, probably the apron behind the lower loop, is out of line. It may be also that the lower magazine is out of line and is pulling the film sidewise. Examine all these things closely and I think you will discover the difficulty all right. The machine you have has only room for a very short lower loop and this feature is very, very bad.

Denver's letter has the right ring. He is, I am firmly convinced, within the limits of his knowledge, an excellent man. There is always hope for the man who don't know, knows he don't, and is willing to frankly admit it and learn. I would suggest to Denver that he correspond with the Taylor School for Operators, 51 West Twenty-eighth street, New York City, concerning their correspondence course. I believe this course is worth all the school asks for it at the least. I would not recommend you to come to New York to learn. Wages for operators are very low here, hours considered, and the performance is not the best. Chicago would be nearer and better, while Kansas City or St. Louis would be all right too.

Bad Lens or——.—Arenzville, Ill., writes: "We have trouble. Use a Powers machine and get a splendid picture, considering that we use gas, but looks like it is not quite in focus. We are 31 feet from the screen."

Arenzville has one of those very short focal length lenses in all probability, though he don't say what size picture he is throwing. Short focal length lenses are notoriously poor. It is extremely difficult to get a good one. It is also quite possible that there is oil on the inner end of the lens. If the lens is perfectly clean I think there is no doubt but that the fault lies in the lens itself, and you must get another one. The parties who sold you the machine should, and doubtless will, supply one without cost, but make them actually test it before they ship it to you.

Wants Books.—Washington writes: "Your article in last issue of The World hit me very forcibly. Kindly give me list of books necessary to make a first-class operator out of a rather poor one, combining the book lore with practical experience, of course."

I'm working on that very thing right now, Washington—the selection of a set of books for operators. Send in your order for the one soon to be issued by the Moving Picture World (by your humble servant). Price $1.50.

Size of Picture, etc.—California (name suppressed) writes: "What size picture should I throw at 84 feet and what focal length condenser and projection lens should I have? How much current should I use (A. C.) to get good results at this distance? How may I determine the exact current flow? The more information you give in your column of the World the greater the value of the paper, especially to us poor unfortunates, away off in the jungles, who have no opportunity to learn 'operating as an art.' Please, Mr. Richardson, give us lots of pointers no matter how apparently simple. Maybe we don't know, eh."

I cannot answer your query except in this way: The size picture you should project does not depend at all on the length of throw. It depends on the area of your screen. Decide what size picture you want and then tell you the arc lenses necessary to give it, but remember this, while the throw has practically nothing at all to do with the picture's brilliancy, its size has and the larger you make your picture the more current you must use to secure a given certain brilliancy. You have a certain amount of light, you understand, and when you increase the size of your picture you spread that light around over more surface. Do you see the point? A picture 12x12 has more than twice the number of square feet surface to illuminate that has one 8 x 10. You must therefore have twice the light to secure the same brilliancy to each square foot—do you see the point? You cannot determine the exact number of amperes used without a reliable ammeter. You know approximately the number your rheostat or transformer is supposed to give, however. The manufacturer carefully computes the amount of resistance necessary to pass a given current on a given voltage and builts his rheostat or transformer accordingly. You may compute the horse-power of your arc by multiplying the voltage by the number of amperes flowing, which gives watts. Seven hundred and forty-six watts equals one horse power. I am glad to know you appreciate my poor efforts. The World wants to give a real bona fide help to all.

Information Wanted.—Dallas, Tex., writes at considerable length, the gist of the matter being that he cannot get books with which to post himself thoroughly regarding all the points of his profession. Dallas specifically names "the pull of the film on the intermittent sprocket," mentioned by me in an article some weeks since, and says he does not know where such information can be had.

You are correct, Dallas! That particular piece of information probably is not contained in any book and is known to practically none but the machine manufacturers, and quite possibly by not all of them. In that article, which seems to have stirred up some hornets, I purposely named some of the unusual information. I might have named some very simple things and safely asserted that few operators would know the answer. In fact I did. I named the matter of measuring film and half a dozen letters received since have indirectly indicated that the writers did not know how. I'll tell you: Run it through your machine and count the turns of the crank. All standard machines pass exactly one foot of film to each turn of the crank! The Viascope is the exception. It passes 8 inches. But to get back to the point. Dallas wants to know what books I can recommend. In reply will say that I intend to see what I can do toward selecting an operator's library, and in course of a week or so may have an announcement to make concerning that matter. The Moving Picture World will put out a complete handbook soon (price $1.50), by the Editor of this column, and I intend to try to get up a complete, cheap, operator's library.

Information Wanted.—Ash Grove, Mo., writes: "Have taken The World for some time and regard it as the best magazine published for moving picture people (so do my brother). I look forward eagerly every Monday to its receipt. I have a machine, but feel that I do not understand it as well as I should. I desire to become a No. 1 operator. Will you kindly tell me how best to acquire additional knowledge?"

Send in your order for the handbook we shall issue soon, price $1.50, and in addition to that write the Taylor School for Operators, 51 West Twenty-eighth street, concerning their correspondence course for operators. Read The World carefully and cut out the "Questions and Answers" column and paste same in a scrap book. Nearly every difficulty and trouble that an operator is heir to will likely be treated of in this column sooner or later.

Operators' Faults.—Why do you continue to jump on the operators? They are a high class of tradesmen and are a high class mentally. They must be quick, accurate and level-headed, when trouble comes; and such a man must be far above the average morally. He is the mainspring of the show. He is the one that puts life and feeling into the pictures and is the main factor in making the show a good show.

I don't care whether my operator knows what celluloid is or not—or how to measure a reel of film; but he must, in case of trouble, be able to locate and fix it with promptness and certainty. He must be able to tell to a minute by looking at a reel how long it will take to run it. He may not know how many times the intermittent wheel moves to each turn of the crank, but he must be able to take hold of any machine with his eyes shut and tell by the feeling whether he is running too slow or too fast.

You say there are nine thousand poor operators in the United States. I think you are entirely wrong. There may be nine thousand old, rattle-trap machines that the operators are expected to get good pictures with—old machines that ought to be in the scrap heap—old, weak rheostats that are worked red hot and white hot every night; cramped booths that are not 6 feet from floor to ceiling—but bad operators, no! There are some, of course, but most of them are patient, hard working, clever men. Give us a good word some time, Richardson.—F. G. Robinson, owner Electric Theater.

P. S.—If I ask you why my condensers break and give a description of the lamphouse and operating room, why must you know what kind of a projection lens I have in?

The above excellent letter is reproduced in full. Commenting, I will say that I have had several letters commending what I said and several criticising. But the fact remains that the operator, as a class, does not study his business as he should. He is satisfied with too little knowledge. It is not necessary to his being a good operator that he should know what celluloid is made of—true. But if he is the right man in the right place he will want to know, and will find out, too. In other words, the man who is satisfied with anything short of complete knowledge of everything pertaining to his business is not the best man possible. As regards the P. S., that is simple! It was quite possible you were using short focal length lenses on a long focal length projector, which would very decidedly affect the distance of the arc from the condensing lenses. I have not the issue containing your inquiry and answer here and do not remember just what it was. But it is safe to say that if I asked for focal length of projector it was for the above reason. As to there being many, very many, miserable projection plants throughout the country, neighbor Robinson is perfectly correct. But, if he had been called into some of the operating rooms I have been and found such an absolutely incompetent jackass in charge, and you had gone into show after show after show after show without finding a single one in which there were not projection faults chargeable directly to the operator and to nothing and no one else, you might conclude, friend Robinson, that there is just ground for my roasting articles. It is not a pleasant task to roast, but if by so doing I can succeed in waking a few of the boys up and getting them to really study their business, I shall feel that my effort has not been wasted. This, however, I will say: The work of Western operators, taken as a whole, is distinctly higher in class than is the work of the Eastern men. Here in New York it is something awful, as far as I have seen to date.

Chicago Notes.

It is our plan to visit the family theaters from time to time to show what these people are doing in their small way for the uplift or degradation of the moving picture as a popular form of entertainment. Last week our representative had occasion to attend a performance at the Washington Theater, located at Forty-third street and Cottage Grove avenue, Chicago. This beautiful little house is ably managed by C. C. Whelan, who was not formerly a butcher or a harness maker in the neighborhood, but a tried and true showman who has been in the amusement business for some seventeen years and fully understands how any place of amusement and entertainment should be run in order to satisfy the wants of the patrons.

In the first place Mr. Whelan has a well constructed house with a pleasing front and large seating capacity, the seats being raised upward from the front, giving all a splendid view of the screen. Mr. Whelan has one other point in his favor in the way of running a house successfully and that is the fact that he, himself, is on the job continually, never leaving the front of the house longer than it is necessary for him to render a song or two during the entertaininment.

In the running of the show Mr. Whelan shows excellent taste in that he does not tire the audience's eyes by running pictures incessantly, but instead relieves with an illustrated song and a number with the house fully lighted, giving the eyes a complete change and rest during the rendition. He has a clear, true baritone voice which he uses to good advantage with more of the classical type of songs, which reach home much faster than the slap-jack popular numbers, sung by an inexperienced person with a rasping voice and assisted by a noisy drummer, whose business it is to cover up the defects as best he can.

Another thing that Mr. Whelan has studied out is the use of good music with his pictures. His piano player is not an amateur by any means and keeps her eye on the pictures constantly, as well as does the drummer, who adds his sound effects, which greatly enhance the pictures in their vividness.

There are two things of vital importance in the running of a house successfully which we wish to call to the attention of those progressive managers who are continually on the lookout for something that may be for the betterment of their house or the delectation of their patrons.

The first topic is one which should be avoided at all times, as it tends to place the picture show into the "bunko" class of cheap sideshow entertainment. This matter was brought to the notice of one of our representatives in Chicago last week when a small house had evidently run shy on posters, and had the title of "Faust" of Edison Company cut off the poster and had placed in its stead the name of "Joan of Arc" of Pathe Freres to accompany the film. While this shows a certain trend of ambition in the makeup of the manager, it tends to dissatisfy the audience who are inveigled into the show thinking they are going to see the picture represented, and living in anticipation of seeing it are not satisfied when the picture does not appear, and people who had paid their nickel to see Mephisto and his horns had to be satisfied with a picture of Charles VIII.

Another point which is a common neglect on the part of managers is the fact that they allow their musicians to talk with friends during the run of a film, when these people, above all, should keep their minds and eyes constantly on the picture in order to accompany it with the appropriate music. When the piano player's mind is taken from her work by conversing with a friend she not only plays poorly, but has no thought as to what music is needed at different stages in the run of the film. At one South Side theater this happened last week, and during the run of a beautifully sentimental subject the player, who was holding converse with a friend, played a continual rag-time, accompanied by a noisy drummer who was busy framing up a "date" with his lady friend who sat near by. If the managers go to the trouble and expense to employ musicians, why not make the musicians reciprocate with their undivided attention to their duties?

A remarkable piece of photography is exhibited in Selig's special release of May 7, portraying the scenes of the Shrine Pilgrimage to a close at New Orleans. This picture vividly portrays the wonderful drill which took place and the gorgeous costumes displayed in what is truly a marvel of the photographer's art. The drill and the attendant crowds are so realistic that it makes everyone who has the opportunity of seeing this film feel the uselessness of taking the time to visit New Orleans at that time when it can be viewed from an advantageous point through the aid of the great method that is lessening the distance of travel in this age of everlasting wonders.

In order to remove all the doubt from the minds of those who may not yet realize the worth of proper music with the exhibition of a film, we will put, for example, the subject of "The Latest in Garters" to the test. This film is a recent release of the Essanay Manufacturing Company and although it is resplendent with comedy it seems to need a little something to bring the audience to a high pitch of hilarity. The story deals with the present of several pairs of French garters which are bedecked with small bells, which when the wearer is walking, peal forth their tiny tinkles to the amusement of the bystander. It naturally follows that in order to bring out the comedy in a vivid manner the picture must be accompanied with the tinkle of the bells. At the Orpheum Theater where recently it was shown to its best advantage, Mr. W. E. King, as generally is the case, solved the question by the use of these bells. This film, as well as the Biograph release, "The Way of the World," were both materially enhanced by the accompaniment of the bells and appropriate music. Distances are studied very carefully and as a result the Orpheum, under the direction of Mr. S. I. Levin, has become widely known in Chicago and the well pleased public that are his daily patrons are giving voice to their appreciation of good films so that the Orpheum is getting the best publicity known to-day, "The great American tongue."

The Premier Title Company of Chicago has spread a unique advertising novelty among the trade in this city. It is in the form of a card and serves that purpose, as well as a blotter. There are two layers of blotting paper of two striking colors topped by a descriptive card with about four inches of title film attached. The arrangement is a very clever idea and its originator deserves much credit for the artistic manner in which it is made up.

The Brayton Manufacturing Company, who have convinced the trade of the superiority of their slides, have vacated their old quarters, at 122 Randolph street, in order to obtain larger space for their rapidly increasing business. They are now located in new spacious quarters at 77 South Clark street, Chicago.

Last Tuesday, May 2, a notice was sent out from the Chief of Exhibitors of the City of Chicago to all film exchanges in the city to the effect that they should have representatives in his office by 10 o'clock. The outcome of the conference was that each must take out a license, for which an application must be made to the chief, who will order the exchange inspected and if same passes the rigid inspection that will be made, the license will then be issued.

The Technische Verein of Chicago, a German society of engineers, chemists and other professional men, held a fortnightly meeting at the Union Hussars on Wednesday evening, April 27. A lecture on cinematography by Mr. Heinrich H. Brunner, of the Lexanale Film Service, opened the way for the animated pictures that followed, which proved to be of great interest to those in attendance. The motion picture outfit and the operator were furnished by the Lexanale Film Service of Chicago.

THE POWER'S NO. 6 CAMERAGRAPH.

Modifications and Improvements.

The new model No. 6 Cameragraph machine, which was described in the columns of this paper some time ago, was put on the market by the Nicholas Power Company late in 1909 and given a practical tryout and test under actual operating room conditions. It became apparent, however, that while this mechanism produced splendid results on the screen, certain features could be altered with beneficial results. Pursuing the policy of the Power Company to produce only the best possible apparatus in projection machinery, steps were immediately taken to incorporate such improvements as were deemed to be possible, and this has now been accomplished, although in the process the appearance of the machine has been materially changed. When the No. 6 was first put out, it had metal shoes in place of intermittent and takeup idler rollers, and instead of pivoted top sprocket rollers there were two fixed rollers, set something like 3/8 inch away from the sprocket. All this was found impracticable with the new non-inflammable film. The top sprocket now has an idler, the same as the No. 5 machine; the intermittent sprocket has been equipped with an idler roller, in place of the shoe, and the lower, or takeup sprocket, has a double idler which will entirely obviate and prevent the losing of the lower loop. In the first model of the No. 6 the intermittent movement was in the flywheel on the left side of the machine. This has been changed, the flywheel being placed on the operating side of the machine and the intermittent movement enclosed in an oil-tight casing. This improvement secures the double advantage of making a better balanced machine, a better appearing machine as well as providing a casing in which oil is retained, so that the star, or cross, and cam run continuously in a well of oil. The intermittent movement of this machine is in itself unique, involving an entirely new form of star and cam, as will be seen by reference to the three illustrations. The smaller of these figures shows the star, or rather the heavy steel cross, which replaces the old-style light star. This cross is tempered hard as glass, as is also the diamond and ends of the cam-ring, thus assuring a minimum of friction as well as a maximum of durability. The two larger figures are full-size drawings of the heavy steel cam-ring and cross. A glance at these illustrations will enable the reader to grasp the relation of cross and cam to each other as well as to see just how they act. One immense advantage in this movement is that the cross and cam run in the same direction, instead of exactly opposite as in the old-style geneva movement. This not only lessens the wear but tends to hold all lost motion out of the way of the intermittent. By reason of this fact, lost motion in the intermittent sprocket has no effect on the picture.

FIG. NO 42

In the first type of the No. 6 machine a small, two-blade shutter was placed inside the machine, just back of the aperture plate. This shutter has been dispensed with and in its place is a three wing shutter which cuts the light in front of the projection lens. This feature absolutely eliminates all flicker on the screen. The main feature of improvement, however, lies in the fact that by merely loosening a few screws the whole intermittent movement, including cross, cam, flywheel, intermittent sprocket and shaft and the camshaft, may be readily removed for renewal or repair. It may just as readily be put together again, the whole operation consuming only a matter of three or four minutes. Another feature of improvement is the automatic fire shutter, which is not made of aluminum and counter-balanced. This allows of a much less amount of governor tension, or friction, thus reducing the power required to operate the machine. By reference to the illustrations it will be seen that the No. 6 Cameragraph is not only a solid, substantial piece of mechanism, but it is a handsome machine as well. Taking it all in all the company feels that the No. 6 mechanism, as it now stands, very nearly approaches perfection in projection machinery. It is absolutely flickerless, strong, durable, simple, noiseless and light running and beyond any question of a doubt will outwear any mechanism now on the American market. In pursuance of its established policy of giving a square deal, the Powers Company proposes to, without cost to the customer, equip all No. 6 machines now in use with the new improvement.

GAUMONT CO. MOVES.

The Gaumont Company have removed their offices from 124 East Twenty-fifth street, New York City, to an office building which has been erected adjacent to the studio and laboratory in Flushing, Long Island. There they will carry on the work of making subjects for the Chronophone, which is at present being so successfully demonstrated throughout New England.

"HALLBERG" EQUIPMENT FOR CLASSON POINT PARK THEATER.

Mr. A. Kauffman, president of the Marvel Amusement Company, will open a high-class moving picture theater at Classon Point Park, New York City. He has ordered from J. H. Hallberg, 30 Greenwich avenue, New York City, the following equipment: One Motiograph No. 1 moving picture machine with "Hallberg" Automatic Electric Economizer, and two 4,000 c.p. flaming arc lamps. This theater is scheduled to open within ten days.

Washington, D. C.—Mr. Maurice Davis, proprietor of the M Street Theater, will open his new park May 30 with pictures and vaudeville; seating capacity, 1,550. The entire park is covered with a roof, which will enable him to do business in all kinds of weather. The M Street Theater will be reconstructed, doubling its capacity, and will be ready for the Fall and Winter business and will show pictures only.

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

"The Merry Medrano Circus Clowns" (Pathe).—A reproduction of the amusing antics of the clowns in the Medrano circus in Paris. The clever work of these humorous contortionists will please everybody who looks at them. The coloring is bright, adding a cheerful note to the picture and increasing its attractiveness. It is, perhaps, the most successful vaudeville film yet put out by the Pathes and cannot fail to please with its excellent qualities.

"The Subterfuge" (Pathe).—A prettily worked out romance in which a wealthy manufacturer resorts to the subterfuge of posing as a mechanic to win a proud working girl whom he has learned to love. It is a pretty story, worked out with careful attention to details and ends very happily. The photography, like that in all the Pathe films, is excellent.

"The Love Romance of the Girl Spy" (Kalem).—The last and perhaps the best picture in the series depicting the life of the girl spy. It is full of exciting incidents and contains in addition an interesting heart story to increase its attractiveness. It is told with all the sprightliness which has characterized other pictures of the series, and the climax is an important link in the tale. The series has been interesting in two ways, first as exciting stories of adventure and second as showing something of what actually occurred during the war. The Girl Spy series will long remain as a concrete example of the Kalem players in reproducing much of the historic life which was an important feature of that time and occasion.

"The Portrait" (Vitagraph).—If you were an art critic and had condemned a portrait as unnatural and charged it with all the other sins which portrait painters may be supposed to commit, how would you like it to have the young woman withdraw her face from the frame and make sport of you? This is exactly the situation depicted in this picture. There is a love story in which the girl and the artist are vitally interested, and after the wise critics have retired in disgust the young man's father gives them the usual "bless you, my children." It is a capital picture without an unpleasant feature in it.

"Drowsy Dick, Officer No. 73" (Edison).—A short and lively farce comedy, depicting very graphically some of the amusing complications into which the sleepiness of a new recruit on the police force plunged him. These complications are accentuated by new and clever tricks of photography, the whole making a farce which cannot fail to make your audience laugh. It is worked out with all the Edison care for details.

"A Yorkshire School" (Edison).—The famous Dotheboys Hall from Nicholas Nickelby. Here are the well known characters, Nicholas himself, Mr. Squeers, the overbearing schoolmaster, Smike, the unfortunate drudge and others who figure in that immortal work by Dickens. The costumes are historically correct, affording opportunity to see and understand something of the dress, the manners and customs of that time in England. Indeed, the Dickens atmosphere is so carefully reproduced, that for the time one seems to be dwelling in the England of his day. The reproduction of scenes like this deserve commendation. Of course, almost everybody has read Dickens' novels, yet when one sees a series of scenes depicting the main incidents in a novel presented upon a screen they assume a different aspect and the characters which, when reading of them, appeared somewhat shadowy, perhaps, become concrete personalities and one comes to know them almost as real persons. The benefit of such acquaintance is made apparent when one comes to examine one's understanding of the scenes described. The Edison Company has performed a distinct literary and historical service in this production from one of Dickens' novels.

"The Cirgarette Maker of Seville" (Edison).—Only another name for Carmen; Carmen, the dramatic, the voluptuous, the ardent, the selfish, the heartless. It is the second of the Edison grand opera series with Mlle. Pilar-Morin in the title role. Everyone knows Carmen, the story of love, deceit and revenge that has few equals in dramatic strength, and it has never been better acted than for this film. One almost hears the words, so vivid is the action. Irresistibly charming, the play offers one of the most vivid presentations of the vivacious, alluring and heartlessly cruel Carmen. One needs not to say that this or that scene is better than another. One needs only to watch the play through to the end. Then all scenes, or parts of scenes, excepting possibly the last, will dissolve into one attractive picture. The closing scene, when Don Jose in jealous rage deals Carmen the fatal stroke, will stand out more vividly than the others, representing the climax—the close—of an intensely dramatic picture. Admirably acted, excellently photographed, the Edison Company deserves the highest commendation for this reproduction of a popular opera.

"The Money Bag" (Gaumont).—A bit of domestic tragedy caused by a boy finding an empty satchel in the road from which a tramp had previously abstracted the money. The real culprit is found, the unfortunate laborer is released and rewarded and all goes smoothly shortly afterward. While the story told is not uninteresting, there is nothing very striking about it, and possibly the romantic background, enhanced in some degree by the excellent photography, will be quite as important a feature in holding attention as the story itself.

"The Banks of the Danube" (Gaumont).—Really a visit to the two cities of Buda and Pest, one on one side of the Danube and the other on the other side, together forming the well known city of Buda-Pest, the capital of Hungary, containing some 500,000 people. Like all old towns in Europe, it is picturesque and most of the views shown emphasize this feature. A view of the Konigsburg, crowning the hilltop, is one of the best scenes. It affords an excellent impression of the castle. Then the audience is conducted along the banks of the Danube and shown some of the most attractive scenes, all of which are individual and were selected by an artist. Unfortunately, however, for those who delight in the older portions of foreign cities, a considerable part of the river front of Buda-Pest is modern. It has had to be to keep pace with the commercial development of the place. Altogether it is a satisfactory picture and affords a half hour of excellent travel impressions.

"The Lost Trail" (Vitagraph).—If this film is intended to teach anything it probably is that the pleadings of a woman, based upon gratitude for favors received at her hands, will sometimes soften the heart of an officer and induce him to forget his dutf. Many times the films have told the story of the stern officer who has refused to listen to such pleadings. Often they do not seem to be human. It is so much like a man to betray his weakness at such a juncture that this picture comes as a species of confirmation of the real humanity in one. To perform one's duty is right and proper; but it does not require a heart to do that. Quite the contrary. And when one sees a picture like this, one almost feels ready to confess that men are still moved by emotions and impulses in a quite human way and that women's pleadings for loved ones do not always fall on deaf ears, stopped by the unemotional shibboleth of official duty.

"Up a Tree" (Biograph).—A novel comedy which represents a young country boy getting people up a tree and removing the ladder so they have to stay. All but one of the victims, a young man who has quarreled with his sweetheart, are ready to take it out on him, but the young man who gets the girl at a disadvantage and makes her promise to marry him is not particularly anxious to chastise him. But the rest are, and what he gets when they finally catch him must be seen to be appreciated.

"Indian Blood" (Lubin).—An unusual dramatic subject, unusually well interpreted by Lubin's capable company of players. It will be popular, not alone for the dramatic qualities, but the scenes are laid among unusually picturesque natural surroundings. The photographer has done better work with the scenes than he ordinarily does. The story is well told. A miner who has married an Indian wife finds wealth and goes home, deserting his Indian wife and taking their little daughter with him. After she grows up the Indian blood predominates and the father is punished for his early crime against his Indian wife. The dramatic possibilities are beyond the ordinary, and the company has worked them out with sympathy and intelligence. The result is a film which possesses many unusual elements and which will contribute much to the pleasure of an audience that enjoys drama.

"The Seal of the Church" (Melies).—A dramatic picture of more than ordinary power, yet it is such a tragedy that one can scarcely say that one likes it. There are two deaths, one a murder committed in a rage of jealous passion, and the other is the shooting dead of the murderer. A priest is accused of the murder, but because the murderer confessed to him he cannot tell the truth. And the girl, after exonerating the priest, repairs to a convent to expiate her share in the tragedy by service in the church. There is some wildly picturesque scenery, well worth seeing. There is no question about the strength of the picture, nor of the dramatic qualities of the story, of which a well balanced company of sympathetic actors have made the most. After seeing the film one is almost ready to exclaim that indeed all is vanity and the old preacher who so eloquently deplored its prevalence was correct in his description.

"The Angelus" (Selig).—Patrons of motion picture theaters have come to look upon the Selig players as especially adapted to the production of pictures having a dash and go in them, such as are embodied in their Western dramas. This film will be a surprise to them. Gathering inspiration from Millet's famous painting of the same name, the players have produced a series of delightful home scenes, all illustrative of the "peace on earth" idea. The scenes are all sympathetically rendered and are quite as remarkable in their way as are the pictures which have heretofore come from the Selig studio in their particular department. Probably everyone who sees this series would like to see more. There are other great pictures, great poems or great books upon which a series of this character could be developed that would be quite as beautiful and quite as satisfactory.

"The Gold Seekers" (Biagraph).—A story of the gold country graphically told and enriched by reproductions of the picturesque scenery which is evidently fairly representative of the land in which the action is supposed to take place. Despair seizes the prospector, and he hurls his pick from him, and just to prove the perversity of fate, the pick strikes pay dirt. Then follows some exciting moments when the miner's wife is enticed away to prevent her filing the claim, but the despicable scoundrels are foiled and she receives her paper. It is a thrilling story, told with considerable attention to details, and depicting life in the mines in a reasonably accurate manner.

"The Master Mechanic" (Lubin).—A drama in which jealousy plays its accustomed part. But somehow it seems a bit incongruous that the plans are permitted to get into the hands of the rival concern, since it would seem better to stop that portion of the story just enough before to prevent any harm being done. A broken love match is easily mended, but stolen plans mean a loss not made necessary by the requirements of the picture. Stories in which jealousy plays an important part seem satisfactory to a large number of people, but there is a sameness about them which would gradually pall on the regular theater patron's taste.

"Mrs. Nosey" (Lubin).—A rough-house picture representing a long series of scrapes into which a portly and extremely inquisitive female successively plunges. The picture raises a laugh. Of its kind it is a good enough picture.

"Only a Faded Flower" (Pathe).—The rather surprising denouement adds to the interest of this picture. To see a girl in a fashionable cafe throw herself into the arms of a flower seller is sufficiently exciting to cause the onlookers to gaze with surprise. The story is touching, but not so dramatic as many that come from the Pathe studio. However, it is interesting and the heart will be touched by the revival of the old love in the girl's breast.

"The Picturesque Pyrenees" (Pathe).—A trip through the Pyrenees in the vicinity of Bagneres de Luchon. It gives an impressive view of the wild crags of the Maledetta. The peak stands out clearly in the sharp air and one feels as though it was almost real, so well has the operator done his work. The torrents dashing from rock to rock add a touch of life in the movement of the water which increases the beauty without detracting from the grandeur of the scenery. The operator did his work well, leaving nothing to be desired in that direction.

"The Cowboy Girls" (Selig).—A lively picture illustrating the general turmoil which results when a party of athletic New England girls take possession of a Western ranch. There is plenty of life and action, lots of fun and wholesale activities as the picture runs. It is done in the characteristic Selig way and maintains interest until the close.

"A Vein of Gold" (Essanay).—A strongly dramatic picture, developing some novelties. First, the warden permits the prisoner to leave the prison to see his mother merely upon his promise to return. Next, the prisoner holds up the storekeeper in the village to obtain money to supply his mother's wants, and escapes detection. He returns to prison, serves out his term, goes prospecting in the gold fields, strikes it rich and returns just in time to buy up the property of the storekeeper, who is being sold out under a mortgage foreclosure. Here is a whole string of novel situations, each one more so than the one before it, excepting possibly the last. But, as the boys say, it is a rattling good story and everyone who sees the picture will thrill with emotion more than once. First, when the warden allows the prisoner to go; it isn't regular, but there is something about it that touches one, unconsciously perhaps, yet none the less certainly. Next, there will be a thrill when the prisoner returns that isn't regular, either, yet somehow it seems quite the thing to do and it rather strengthens one's faith in human nature to see the prisoner come walking back to finish his sentence merely because he gave his word that he would do so. And the last scene, leaving the property and returning it to the unfortunate man, the plans of reparation and understanding that is a fitting climax for a picture of an altogether unusual sort. There should be no question about the popularity of this picture. It contains elements which will exert an exceptionally strong appeal.

"Bud's Escapade" (Pathe).—A chapter of comical incidents, consisting of the stealing or spoiling of a young man's clothes, and resulting in a scene thrashing for him at the hands of the young woman with him. The heavy shower which came up, affording the young woman an excuse for the bell-bottoms, completing the young man's discomfiture. If a more disagreeable and altogether exhausting set of circumstances could be devised than in here shown, one wonders what they could be.

"Deep Sea Fishing" (Pathe).—A subject of practical interest, depicting life on board a fishing vessel. Every phase has been carefully photographed, but the camera exercised restraint and produced no tiresome, long-drawn-out scenes. Some of the scenes are beautiful, for example the twilight effects, and there is a picturesque quality to the entire film which makes it appear more than commonly attractive. The information conveyed is well worth consideration, since it illustrates an industry but little understood by those who live away from the coast.

"The Minotaur" (Vitagraph).—A reproduction of the old Greek legend of Theseus, who aided only by his sweetheart, slays the Minotaur, a monster in human form with a bull's head, that annually demanded a tribute of seven youths and seven maidens, and cuts off his head, freeing Crete and Athens from the monster's oppression. He marries his sweetheart, daughter of the King of Crete, and both kingdoms are happy afterward. The beauty of this legend and the excellence of the reproduction cannot be questioned, but there is always the danger that very many will not comprehend it. In this instance the audience is assisted by the clear subtitling. If, however, a picture like this sends those who see it to the libraries to look up these myths and legends, it will confer a double benefit. It will afford an opportunity to see a good picture and brush up the knowledge of Greek mythology.

INDEPENDENT FILMS.

"Saved from the Sultan's Sentence" (Great Northern).—An Oriental film of great merit and absorbing interest. Dramatic in its conception and picturesque in its development, the picture has many excellencies which must be seen to be appreciated. Anything which adequately illustrates any of the features of the mysterious Orient, with its wealth of imagery, appealing directly to the curiosity, is certain to be popular, and this picture is no exception to the rule. The players have performed their parts to perfection and the photographer has not been dilatory in his portion. The result is a highly satisfactory rendering of an interesting subject.

"The Fashionable Sport" (Itala).—An amusing illustration of what happens when a man ventures first on roller skates. In this instance, after creating no end of disturbance, the man is ejected from the rink and goes home in a wicker basket, quite as babies learn to walk. While some of the tumbles and their consequences approach dangerously near the rough-house line, as a whole the film is funny and does not fail to make the audience laugh.

"The False Friar" (Itala).—A dramatic film worked out with close attention to the features which compel and hold the interest of the audience. The acting is sympathetic, rising in places to more than ordinary dramatic strength, and the photographer has performed his part of the work with intelligence and discretion.

"Rattlesnakes" (Bison).—A little too realistic, if anything. It illustrates very vividly the capture of rattlesnakes and the process of removing their poison fangs. Few have any particular love for snakes, and their appreciation of the disagreeable creatures will not be enhanced by this picture. Its excellence will not be questioned, but few will care for a repetition of it. The picture has been made altogether too realistic. The impression it makes and the feeling it engenders should be accepted as complimentary by the makers.

"My Maid Is Too Slow" (Eclair).—One of the liquid electricity type of films, in which the slow-moving domestic is given the hurry up impetus by sewing batteries in her waist. It is one of those rough-house films that is funny, but lacks the delicacy of many humorous pictures in these days. Action and photography are both as good as the average for such films.

"A Sister's Devotion" (Bison).—A case of mistaken identity which arouses the jealousy of a blacksmith who sees his wife caressing a strange man, her brother. The smith, desiring revenge, fastens the man to the door of a shack, in which he has hidden, with staples and then invites his wife to see him burn. All this tension on the nerves is released by the understanding that comes to the smith regarding the real situation. Fortunately it is a story and no harm is done, except the burning of the worthless shack.

"Legally Dead" (Powers).—Whether one likes this picture or not, one must admit that it is strongly dramatic, and that it is based upon a novel situation. A man legally dead, yet alive, is sufficiently unusual to make one follow closely the story as it runs. When the legally dead man appears, just as the marriage ceremony of his supposed widow is concluded, a complication seems inevitable; but realizing his own faults, he considerately retires, leaving the newly married couple to their happiness. One feels almost unconsciously that it is better so.

"The New Shawl" (Imp).—A picture intended for serious drama, but filled with infinite possibilities for mischief, that runs into a comedy when the denouement comes. Of course one can understand how a lost shawl and a fleeing woman could be so compromisingly placed that they would excite jealousy in the husband, and that is exactly what they did. And doesn't he feel foolish and silly when he discovers his mistake? This is all graphically told and develops into a very interesting story as it proceeds. The Imp players perform their parts to perfection and the picture is indeed satisfactory.

"The Artist's Child" (Lux).—A story of a son turned away and absent for years because he dared marry the woman of his choice, and his discovery in poverty and want in later years when the child falls exhausted from hunger and exposure. One scarcely likes it, yet there is a degree of dramatic quality which makes it interesting, though one may say that one scarcely likes the type of story selected for illustration. It is too depressing in its influence.

"Rescue of the Pioneer's Daughter" (Bison).—Here is an exciting picture, well acted, placed in a background of picturesque and characteristic scenery, though possibly marred by the capture of a girl by a party of Indians. As has been said before, it is not pleasant to see a girl or woman seized by a ruffian, or a band of ruffians, rudely thrown on a horse and carried away.

"She Wanted to Marry a Hero" (Thanhouser).—A nice little moral is not very closely concealed in this picture. It may be well to read love stories, but the hot-house type is quite apt to create dangerous ideas in the minds of impressionable girls, and when this one throws over her honest sweetheart for a hero, like those in the novels, she begins a string of troubles that teach her a lesson. Perhaps the exhibition of these troubles in the film will point out the danger of this method to others similarly afflicted.

FILMS D'ART FOR THE INDEPENDENTS.

The Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company has secured the American rights to the products of the Film d'Art Company of Paris. The work of this company, which is composed of members of the Comedie Francaise and other prominent French actors, is already well known in this country, having been exploited for some time by one of the licensed manufacturers. Beautifully staged, faultless in acting and in the technical rendering, yet, for some reason or reasons, the productions of the Film d'Art Company did not catch on with the American public and the exploiting company could not market enough copies to make it mutually interesting. Many of the subjects did not pass the Board of Censors and some that did, chiefly on account of their technical excellence, were severely censured. Brilliant actors all, in their speaking parts, the Film d'Art actors did not seem to grasp the necessities of the silent drama or the niceties of pictorial representation of the grewsome and the suggestive, hence the cause of discord between them and the company that formerly handled their product. Now, whether they have learned their lesson or not, remains to be seen; at any rate, one of their films, shown to us in the office of the Sales Company, had none of the objectionable features. Needless to say it was sumptuous in its staging, the acting superb and the photography and toning all that could be desired. The subject, "Carlos," and its manner of presentation, impressed us as being over the heads of the popular moving picture audience. Perhaps we are wrong. We hope so for the benefit of the Sales Company and their laudable ambition to furnish the independent exchanges with dramatic subjects of a high order and in a class by themselves. The first subject, "Werther," an adaptation from Goethe, will be released on May 19 and thereafter one reel on Thursday of each week.

Scene from "Mario's Swan Song" (Vitagraph).

"The Danger Line."

SCENE FROM "THE DANGER LINE."

The above illustration is a scene from the Essanay Company's dramatic film "The Danger Line," the first big subject of this nature coming from their Chicago studios since "The Hand of Uncle Sam," and will appear on Wednesday, May 18. This subject is a modified drama and treats a theme of universal heart interest. A husband and wife are estranged through different ambitions and ideals, the former, a sportsman, who is entirely enwrapped in his manly pleasures, while most of his time is spent at his kennels and stables, to the neglect of his wife. She is of an entirely different nature and seeks solace and comfort in her books and her own meditations. There is introduced here a friend of the husband's, a poet, whose works have had the greatest influence in the wife's life. The poet proves a traitor and endeavors to persuade the young wife to go away with him. She resists the temptation and endeavors to send her admirer away, when there is a scene and the husband discovers his friend's treachery, believing, also, his wife to be untrue to him. A duel follows in which the husband is wounded by the cowardly friend, who takes unjust advantage of his adversary and in so doing violates the rules of the code. The poet is sent from the field in disgrace while the husband is taken home to his wife, who, he is now convinced, was true to him. A complete reconciliation follows and husband and wife resolve that in the future they will more closely merge their two lives together. The subject is interpreted by Mr. J. H. Gilmour, as the husband, who played leading parts in "Justified," "The Adventuress" and other Essanay dramatic films, with an excellent cast, especially obtained for the picture. Mr. Gilmour rehearsed his company several weeks and as a result the acting is incomparable. This is the first of a number of high quality dramatic films which will be released by the Essanay Company occasionally through the Summer months. The second, "A Victim of Hate," with Miss Martha Spier, will probably appear some time in June.

TRADE NOTES.

The Agfa film for moving picture positives will shortly be introduced into this country. It is too premature to give particulars, but we may say that this film is the product of one of the most renowned manufacturers in the world and will surely attract considerable notice. In all branches of photography, for many years, Agfa products have been noted for their excellence, so that when this film gets on the American market manufacturers may be sure of having a reliable product, technically good, clean and certain in manipulation.

As per advertisement on another page of The World, our readers will note the advent of another manufacturer, the Motograph Company of America, whose product is to be known as "Motofilm." They have been in active operation since the first of the year and expect to announce releases at an early date. The company is incorporated under the laws of Maryland with Mr. Harry R. Raver, president; Mr. Elmer J. Walters, vice-president and secretary, and Mr. W. C. Hooper, treasurer. Their factory of two floors, 42 x 60 feet, and ground glass studio, 40 x 65 feet, in Dupont Park, is admirably situated for producing high class work. The production will be under the direction of Mr. Walters, who is the author of several well known plays. The photographic departments are to be in charge of Mr. James Gunby.

Das Lebende Litchtbild, by Von F. Paul Liesegang, with 53 illustrations and drawings, published at Leipsig, is the name of a 54-page pamphlet dealing with the history and making of moving pictures. The author, Mr. Paul Liesegang, is the son of that Dr. E. Liesegang, who has contributed so much to our knowledge of photography. The book before us is notable as showing that in Germany as much interest is taken in the moving picture as in the United States. The illustrations are excellent and enable any one unfamiliar with the German language to follow the author in its purpose.

Exhibitors in and around Baltimore and Washington report good business and quite a few new places have opened. I was amazed at the wonderful effect of the Mirror Screen at the Blue Mouse Theater, in Baltimore, also at the Circle and Empress, in Washington. Mr. P. P. Craft, 416 North Ninth street, Washington, is the agent for the Mirror Screen, and I was so well pleased with its showing and the interest it created that I applied for the agency for Philadelphia and will place a screen in the Electric Theater, at Forty-ninth street and Woodland avenue, where Philadelphia exhibitors can see its wonderful effect. NOTES FROM THE FILM MANUFACTURERS.

Vitagraph.

May 25 seems a long way ahead, but it will soon be here and not a day too soon to please the wideawake exhibitor, for "The Dove of Chrysanthemum" watch the calendar and put a mark on the twenty-fifth of this month, the day when this uniquely beautiful and beautifully unique Japanese drama will be released by The Vitagraph Company of America. It surpasses in its scenic coloring, atmospheric localized Japanese effects, perfection of furnishings and all the splendor of the "Flowery Kingdom," anything that has been done in animated art.

The Vitagraph pictures announced for the next three release days give us a varied choice of subjects. You have "Three Wishes," on Tuesday, May 10. This film contains three or more of the funniest and yet most wonderful glimpses of woodland imps, comical gnomes and peeps into the mystic. "The Closed Door," on Friday, May 13, will open to packed houses and delighted audiences. This is an eye opener to those who want to get in on a good thing. "The Special Agent," Saturday, May 14. This has been spoken of before. It is meant to create talk and we expect it will be subject to favorable comment. What is worth talking about is worth seeing and having. Ask for "The Special Agent."

ESSANAY NOTES.

Mr. George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Company, spent a few days of last week with Mr. G. M. Anderson, the Essanay Company's Western producer, now at Morrison, Col. Mr. Spoor expressed himself as particularly delighted with the Western picture prospects, that Mr. Anderson is ideally locatedf and has in preparation numerous big things in Western dramatic subjects.

"Mr. Anderson," said Mr. Spoor, "could hardly obtain a better location than he has selected for his Summer work. His scenic surroundings are all that could be wished for and decidedly typical of the West. Mr. Anderson is splendidly equipped with the best of everything for picture taking and is in a position to obtain the best talent possible for his pictures. We now have on hand in Chicago and ready for release the first of Mr. Anderson's big dramatic pictures from Mt. Morrison, which is decidedly one of the most beautiful of his Western productions, and many more will be forthcoming."

The subject referred to by Mr. Spoor is a dramatic film entitled "Away Out West," a story of the gold-seekers. The photographic work in this picture is entirely out of the ordinary and introduces certain effects which are quite novel to the majority of picture audiences. The picture is booked for release at an early date.

Released for May 14, the Essanay Company's Western dramatic film, "The Cowpuncher's Ward," contains a big story with an exceptional heart interest motif. In brief, it tells the story of a little girl, whose rascally father is hanged for horse stealing, and who is taken under the care of a number of sympathetic cowboys. The educate her "down to Tucson," she returns to the ranch and after other dramatic complications, is married to one of "the boys." The picture is photographically perfect.

THANHOUSER NOTES.

"Stop! You've drank the poison!"

This cry echoed through the Thanhouser studio one morning recently and caused all eyes to focus on Barry O'Neil, the stage director and the man responsible for the thrill. Of course it came out that the cry was a stage direction, but withal it was so odd that the usually blasé studio workers wanted to know the reason wherefor. This is it: In the bar room scene in "The Writing on the Wall," a coming Thanhouser release, then in the process of production, two villains drink with the hero at a rough pine table and manage to drug his brandy. The hero raised the glass to his lips, but the director discovered that it wasn't the drugged one. One of the villains had got it in the mixup—he was foiling himself!—a strong but unlooked for situation! Hence the director's call.

O, the critics! Sometimes even they make mistakes and subject themselves to criticism! Why not? Let the worm turn! In a theatrical journal's critique of the Thanhouser reel carrying the comedies "She Wanted to Marry a Hero" and "The Cigars His Wife Bought," it was solemnly asserted that the same woman [illegible] daughter play the lead in both subjects. Shucks! The critic should clean his spectacles

The leading lady in "She Wanted to Marry a Hero" was Miss Rosemonde and the leading lady in the "cigar picture" Miss Gloria Gallop, two entirely different persons in face, form and action. Had the figures been diminutive on the screen there may have been an excuse for the reviewer's error, but as the Thanhouser way in picture making calls for "large figures," via the close-to-camera method, the mistake is unpardonable—in a critic!

The next Thanhouser release, "The Best Man Wins," released Friday, May 13, is a realistic presentation of a cracker-jack human interest story. Miss Rosemonde portrays a rich heiress who is courted by a wealthy physician (Martin Faust) and a poor lawyer (Frank Crane). Both suitors propose on the same evening and the heiress tells them to give her one month to decide, and to return at the end of that time for her answer. The scene shifts to the hovel of a poor charwoman, who is dying and about to be evicted with her tiny daughter. The child rushes for a doctor. She finds the rich doctor, who is one of the suitors. As she has no money he turns her away. She meets the other suitor, the poor lawyer, who cheerfully does what he can for the dying mother and leaves. The rich heiress, on a charity tour, visits the dying mother. When the woman dies the heiress adopts the child. One month having elapsed, the suitors ask the heiress for her answer. The adopted child is present. She runs out at sight of the rich doctor and tells the heiress how he turned her away. The child recognizes the lawyer as the friend in need and tells the heiress so. The heiress orders the doctor out of her presence and says "Yes" to the lawyer, to the little one's delight.

MELIES' REMINDER.

There seems to be but one opinion about the Melies releases, they have met the approval and expectations of the public and more favorable criticism everywhere. There are more of these "boomers" for this month, all full of Western "snap" and go, full of life and action that gives one something to think about and keep us all alive. They do things in the West a little differently from the East; but they are not slow in doing "Stuff."

CORRESPONDENCE.

A PROTEST.

Sandusky, Ohio, April 19, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—I wish to protest against such pictures as "Courting the Merry Widow" and "The Merry Widow Takes a New Partner." There is nothing to either subject, the characters are no good, and the widows in both pictures are faxed up as old maids. The two men take up too much time doing nothing. The scenes of both pictures are the same, the men even meeting at the gate in the same way, and both reels finish by the men taking a drink. Let's have something better for our money.

Also "The Kid," by the Biograph Company, was not up to their usual standard.

(Signed) EXHIBITOR.

ANOTHER PROTEST.

Terre Haute, Ind., April 18, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Pictures with an immoral tendency or "risque" subjects do much to injure the exhibitor who has a patronage consisting of the best element. If in the future we should receive such a picture as "Their Sea Voyage," which our exchange sent us to-day, we shall, after the first exhibition, close our house and post a sign similar to the following:

"The picture sent us to-day by our exchange is an ———, and as it is, in our judgment, unfit for the audiences of this theater to witness, we will remain closed for the day."

Truly yours,

SAM M. YOUNG,
Manager, Savoy Theater.

HE TOOK THE TIP.

Mr. F. H. Richardson,

Editor "Operators' Column," Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir—You cannot realize how much pleasure it affords me to be able to write you this letter to inform you that I have discovered the cause of the trouble that has kept me awake nights.

The blurred effect, or traveling ghost, was caused in my picture by the lens. I never looked for my trouble at this point, for the reason that they were never changed since I received them from the factory, at least I had thought they were never changed; my operator said he never changed the glasses, so if they were right when received they must be right all the time. Last night I put the operator's helper through the "third degree" and he admitted taking the glasses out to clean them one time. With this information I jumped to the conclusion that they must have been reversed in placing them back, so I just swung them around and the result was "immense," my picture is now perfect. I desire to thank you for your kindly help in my trouble.

Respectfully,

CHAS. F. KEAR.

THE ROOSEVELT PICTURES.

Nampa, Ida., April 28, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Allow me to saw a few words in praise of your paper and the fair way you deal with both licensed and Independent pictures. I have not run any Independent pictures for some time, as I have been with a licensed house for over a year and a half now, but I have heard different managers and operators say that the Independent product was very poor. I can say that I have run some very poor licensed films. I ran the film "Roosevelt in Africa" a few days ago. That is a good frost on the licensed exhibitor. There is not a picture in the 2,000 feet that is fit to be called a picture. To tell you the honest truth, most any operator would be ashamed to run such a thing through a machine. It looks as if the camera man was afraid that that poor, helpless lion, or some of the other animals, were going to make a breakfast of him. People thought they were going to see something exciting. Anybody could take a .22 rifle and go out in the sagebrush in Idaho and get more excitement hunting jack rabbits. I am,

Very respectfully,

C. D. WEBB,
Operator of Orpheum Theater.

[Our correspondent overlooks the exceptional difficulties encountered in the taking of the Roosevelt pictures, as pointed out by "Lux Graphicus" last week.—Ed. M. P. W.]

MORE ABOUT THE BULLETIN.

Temple, Tex., April 25, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—I have noted with interest the article in this week's World in regard to bulletins sent to exhibitors by the manufacturers. I for one, differ very much from our friend, the writer, as I make good use of them. I use them in full in the two daily papers and find that they are my best advertising method, as practically all my patrons read the synopsis every day and they tell me it is nearly as good as having a lecture. The synopsis is especially good where you have heavy dramatic pictures. I am enclosing one of the papers showing how I use them.

Yours truly,

W. F. LUCAS,
Majestic Theater.

[It was not the manufacturers' synopses of the films to which our correspondent took exception, but the patents bulletins, containing more or less boil-up. We know that the synopsis bulletins are appreciated and none more so than those of the Biograph Company, which are always printed on one side and giving only the bare particulars of the picture for pasting on bulletin boards or for copy to the local papers, such as friend Lucas so effectively uses in the Temple "Daily Telegram," this is all that is necessary and, we believe, all that the exhibitor wants or cares to read.—Eds. M. P. W.]

A LETTER FROM A SUCCESSFUL EXHIBITOR.

Chicago, Ill., April 25, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—Being an exhibitor, I take great interest in the various articles and criticisms published in your paper each week and wish to say that I am not in sympathy with the sentiment voiced by a great many of your writers against the sensational pictures. By sensational I mean the war pictures, Indian and cowboy pictures, etc. It may be true that these pictures are not as acceptable to some classes of theaters as the scenics, industrial, educational, etc., are, yet, on the other hand, some of us would starve to death on that class of films. I find that the pictures which arouse the greatest amount of enthusiasm are those showing battles between Indians and cowboys, Indians and early settlers, Indians and soldiers and Northern and Southern soldiers. And right here let me ask if there is a more thrilling scene than the rescue of a little band of heroic settlers or cowboys by a company of Uncle Sam's soldiers? The audience in our theater will give cheer upon cheer at the climax of one of these pictures, go out with smiling faces, boost the show to their friends and come again the next night. Now, why oppose subjects that will do this for us? A shooting affray may wring the soul of some over-sensitive spectator, yet I notice when going through the audience while one of these pictures is on that these very people are giving it their rapt and undivided attention and sometimes stay for two shows.

I do not think we are getting too many Western shows and would not like to see their production reduced. We have plenty of the other sort, including the drama involving the two lovers with the invariable ending. Give us plenty of soldiers, cowboys, Indians, trappers, etc., along with good comedies and you will please the majority of motion picture patrons.

I wish also to say that I consider the vaudeville a pleasing part of our entertainment and have frequently seen the same acts which we show in the largest and best vaudeville houses in Chicago.

In conclusion let me state that ours is a family theater patronized almost exclusively by father, mother and the children. It is one of four located in our immediate neighborhood and has been in existence about a year. That I am right in my statements is proven by this fact: Two of my three competitors, with the same class of house, same seating capacity, etc., have failed during the past year on pictures without vaudeville and pictures of the milder sort, whereas our receipts have increased $15 per day in the last six month.

Yours very truly,

IRVING WALLACE LANDGRAF.

1901 Fremont street, Chicago, Ill.

N. B.—Why don't you open a department for managers of the various theaters to trade ideas on how to increase box office receipts? Great good would be derived from an interchange of this kind. Who'll trade? I. W. L.

[We print this letter in full because of its note of sincerity and because it comes from a successful exhibitor who is not above letting others in on the secret of his success. Whether his policy would be equally successful in other sections is another question. But we do invite and have always invited exhibitors to make free use of their trade paper.—Eds.

LOVE AMONG THE ROSES

A BEAUTIFUL MOTION PICTURE FANTASIA.

The story of this Biograph production runs along rather novel lines. It shows in symbolism the powerful influence of love. The characters are more mythical than real, and the scenes are laid in a land of romance. The great lady of the land falls in love with the lowly gardener, while the great lord loves an humble but pretty lace-maker. The scenic beauty of the subject has never been equalled, being a series of wonderfully beautiful floral bowers.

THE TWO BROTHERS

IN THE DAYS OF THE PADRES.

This subject is undoubtedly one of the most pretentious ever undertaken. It is convincing and thrilling throughout its entire length, comprising as it does an interesting story, magnificent scenery and most daring feats of horsemanship. It tells the story of two brothers in the Spanish Dominion, one a noble, upright fellow, while the other is a profligate. The disreputable boy, however, is reclaimed by the love of a little Spanish girl. The production was made at San Juan Capistrano, California.

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE TWO BROTHERS.—One of the most peculiar complexities of custom in the extreme Spanish land of Andalusia is the custom of primogeniture, by which estates go to the eldest son. Brought up in the same environment, with the same customs, they are often so opposite in character as it is possible for human beings to be. In Granada, the capital of the Spanish Dominion, there lived two sons, brothers, Jose and Manuel. Born in a noble Spanish family and reared by a mother noble in both station and character, they were vastly different mentally. Jose was a dutiful son and an apt young man, while Manuel was the black sheep. It was on Easter Sunday morning during the processional that Manuel appears in an intoxicated condition and badly insults the priests and acolytes as they enter the chapel of the old mission. At this the mother's pride is hurt beyond endurance and she exiles her profligate son from her forever. Manuel is shunned as a viper and while making his way along the road, meets Pedro, the notorious political outlaw, who sympathizes with him and offers him inducements to join him, and so takes him to his camp. Meanwhile, Jose woos and wins the Red Rose of Capistrano and the day for the wedding is set. Manuel finds the life in the outlaws' camp palls, and, drawn by irresistible memories, he visits his home village. Here he is shot in the arm by his brother, who hounds him, and escapes further injury by hiding among the ruins of the mission, where he is discovered later by the Rose and her girl companion, who relieve his agony by dressing his wounded arm. He goes back to the outlaw camp with a firm purpose of revenge. The wedding of Jose and the Red Rose has taken place and the young couple start for their new home with their friends, in the coach. On this coach is also the rich dowry chest. Thus the outlaw learns and here appears the brother's chance for revenge. So gathering together the band to pursue the wedding party, they overtake the coach, but not until Pedro has fallen and Manuel assumes leadership. Jose is dragged from the conveyance and brought before his brother, who is about to dispatch him, when the bride and her friend rush up. He now sees that they and his succor when wounded at the mission are the same, hence he allows all to go on their way unmolested. The little friend of the bride who assisted in aiding the wounded brother at the mission, fell in love with him at first sight, and at this second meeting she makes clear her feeling for him. He, on the other hand, is struck by the artlessness of the pretty little Senorita and later finds himself her willing slave, and it is with amazement that the villagers see her lead Manuel into the chapel. Thus he finds love the master to curb and finally dissipate his impious inclinations.

LOVE AMONG THE ROSES.—In the Kingdom of Never-Never Land there live a great Lord and Lady, each presiding over their own demesne. This great Lord goes for a stroll through his estate and coming to parlieu of his own land he is struck by the entrancing beauty of the contiguous estate, so like his own, that the inclination to intrude is irresistible. His peregrination is halted by the appearance of the great Lady, who is indeed as fair as the flowers that clothe her land. He introduces himself and invites her to stroll with him in his gardens. She is in like manner entranced by the beauty of his possessions. How alike in beauty are they; a veritable fairyland. If they were only one, for it seems they should be. This thought is mutual, and the Lord proposes a way—a marriage—and so a betrothal of convenience ensues. They know nothing of love and so are content in the anticipation of being Lord and Lady of all Never-Never Land. Little do they dream of the subtle workings of fate, which is, of course, the natural egotism of humankind, but, nevertheless, the lines are being drawn, for as we have viewed the paradisiacal side of life, we now go to the homely side, by visiting the sad house in Never-Never Land. Here we find sorrow, toiling and want, and yet we find as in the other a betrothal of convenience between the poor little lace-maker and the humble gardener. They reason that their lot may be more bountiful by joining their meager fortunes. The gardener secures a position in the gardens of the Lady and the lace-maker goes out to mail purchasers of her handiwork. The Lord meets the pretty lace-maker and is attracted by her beauty, for he learns for the first time what love is. The Lady meets the gardener and is struck by his rugged, manly beauty and herculean strength, so different from the Lord, her neighbor. She also realizes the power of love, for her inclination to be near the gardener is irresistible. Despite the apparent mesalliance in such a step, the Lady confesses she can only be happy with the humble gardener. This intelligence the Lord receives with ill-concealed delight, as it leaves him free to marry the pretty lace maker.

THE CALL OF THE FOREST.—This film is the old story of the pretty country girl and the handsome tourist. The girl, persuaded to leave her home for the brighter sphere of the town, writes a note bidding her parents good-bye, leaving them heartbroken.

The next scene finds the old people looking for their child, but in vain. In time a feeling for the old surroundings comes back to the daughter, and one again visits the home of her childhood. Here she is recognized by her smaller sister, who quickly warns the parents of the return of her sister. The father, a little beside himself at his daughter's daring to return, after leaving them in such a manner, picks up a gun, intending to shoot her lover, but his hand being somewhat unsteady, his wife perceives the shot. She is but slightly wounded. The secret lover makes his escape, the daughter is forgiven, and the scene closes with her hands consenting to her marriage with the sweetheart of her childhood. The whole of this picture is taken under beautiful natural scenery.

GIGANTIC WAVES.—Ever a strange fascination is exercised over us by natural wonders. People seem never to tire of watching the elements, especially when in battle.

In this film are introduced realistic scenes of rocky headlands, surging waves, and their magnificent struggle against one another.

The stormy surf seen first far out toward the horizon is one vast plain of frothy billows gradually rolls in, white-capped and flecked with floating foam, to beat mercilessly against rocks, throwing over them a shining spray of marvellous beauty.

The angry sea dashes through narrow channels, over rocky pinnacles, and against the majestic sea wall.

Several hours were used in making the picture and the waves at first roll in with only a moderate force which gradually increases until they are of such size to perfectly justify the title used.

THE LITTLE VAGRANT.—Raymond, the son of rich parents, is very fond of birds, and is in the habit of buying chickweed for them from a poor boy. The two youngsters become great friends. one day Raymond returns unexpectedly from a stroll to his home. Hearing a noise in a room, he peeps through the keyhole and sees one of the servants stealing his father's money. He flies to his parents and warns them. They return to the house and the servant is dismissed, vowing vengeance. The next day Raymond sets out to buy his chickweed, when he is seized by the disguised servant and bundled into a large basket. The deed is witnessed by his poor little friend, who follows the wagon. The man carries him to a secluded hut, where he discusses the boy's fate with two comrades. They are disturbed by a ruse the little chickweed seller has originated and make off, leaving the basket and child. While they are absent the little salesman liberates Raymond. The man later returns and in order that the crime shall not be discovered, throws the basket into the sea. When he next comes back to the hut, he is met by the child and his parents, the chickweed seller and officers of the law. The man is arrested. The little hero is adopted by Raymond's parents and becomes his brother.

A SEA OF CLOUDS.—In this film it is made possible for the audience to indulge in an experience absolutely new to most of them: that of being above the clouds.

Presented in a carefully tinted production, is a succession of picturesque views in mountain scenery taken from the high mountains around Grenoble, France.

The village is shown from various points on the mountains as we climb until we pass up through the clouds and it is lost to view.

The film closes with views of a cloudy morning against the misty mountains. From the higher points the billows of silver mist spread like an ocean at our feet, silently rolling against the rocks.

3. The second year. Good "frame" house, excellent crop, two binders in use for harvesting operations.

4. After five years. A prosperous farmer. Imposing homestead and outbuildings—48 horses, motor car, miles of wheat lands, numberless binders at work.

5. Methods of harvesting wheat. Gasoline engine drawing four binders, which cut, bind and sheave the wheat at one operation.

6. Scenes at Davidson. Harvesting wheat with fifteen binders, horse drawn—a wonderful spectacle. Threshing and sacking processes by machinery.

She writes them a letter and sends it to the hotel. "The best one presenting [illegible] and me can claim me as his bride." They all get on the job, the motorist by the aid of a [illegible] and the bicyclist on foot. They all [illegible] the bicyclist in the road [illegible] to [illegible] horseman who is closely pursued by the motorist down hill through wood and across country.

One [illegible] not count one's chickens before they are hatched. The wheel strikes a rut in the road and over they go sprawling in the dust and dirt, and while the cyclist is endeavoring to straighten his bent wheel the horseman coming up seizes the parson, and getting him on his horse, gallops away to win his bride.

The horse with its double burden has been jogging along and they are nearing the widow's hotel. The motorist and cyclist have repaired their machines and are putting on extra speed to make up for lost time and the pace becomes fast and furious. The cyclist is overtaken after making a splendid effort to keep ahead. It is now a question as to whether the motorist can catch up with the rapidly. Hearing the approaching motor car, struck on his horse, and the gallant animal responding, takes its owner to victory.

The parson lends the [illegible] again by making the two one. The belated bicyclist and motorist arrive upon the scene only to [illegible] have lost the prize. Disappointedly but gracefully they accept their defeat and congratulate their victorious rival and his bride.

A ROUGH NIGHT ON THE BRIDGE.—In happy mood, a [illegible] good-natured party of "Jass Tars" on shore leave are out for a good time, and get themselves well under way in song and several good cheer by visiting the only place of entertainment and refreshment within the little seaport town affords. Under full sail they are steering their way through the streets of the village, running foul of trees and posts, bowing in humble apology for their seeming rudeness and disturbance. They have apparently lost their "sea legs" and are a little bit unsteady in the joints, but merrily they roll along until they come to a swinging bridge crossing the river.

Here is where they strike rough weather. The bridge begins to sway and they grasp the guard rails as for "old bark" begins to toss and the seas run high. The jovial crew are overjoyed with laughter as the danger of being thrown into the water below increases. She's heaving mightily now, and threatens to turn turtle, when "scuttle me timbers," one after the other the whole mass is hurled into the gurgling stream and lost they have to take water. This do-king is part of their sport and adds to the fun of it.

Our tailth [illegible] with them at every step of the bridge, and does not stop until we find ourselves [illegible] in chorus with the festive salts to the [illegible] smilingly at us from the screen.

THE CHERRIES.—Two lovers go one Sunday's day to gather wild cherries in the woods. It is the most pleasurable day of their lives and encouraged by the unalloyed joy of a few golden hours they swear to cleave each other to return to the scene day by day in the following year to repeat their experience.

Their promise, however, is not to be fulfilled, for sickness comes to the young girl, and lack of employment brings the other young lover face to face with many needful cares.

The anniversary comes round to the hour, and she continued to the scene to her illness, tells her lover when he calls of her longing for the taste of the wild cherry.

He, half crazed with grief, goes out hoping against hope that something will turn up to permit him to satisfy her desire. Nothing does turn up, however, and the poor fellow is tempted to steal a basket of cherries from a store. He is soon arrested, and about to be handed to the police, when a sympathetic lady passenger intervenes, and he tells her the story of his sweetheart's illness and of her longing for cherries. Touched, she buys for him a pony, buys a large basket of cherries, and accompanied by the lover, carries it to the [illegible]

Taking a long stick which a house decorator has left by a pot of paint he sharpens it, pushes his head and shoulders through the iron bars of the grating of an underground bakehouse and adroitly secures the fresh cakes one by one. Then setting the pot of paint to boundless its contents over his head and shoulders of the baker.

SEVEN DAYS.—The passing of the Spring chill, the advent of the emerald lawn and the festive of Robin Redbreast invariably creates a desire among the city dwellers to seek the hill and desert lanes. Lovers and tourists were no exception, however; they decide to send the wives abroad and bear them at the close of the week's business. So both of their plans put into execution, they repair to a cafe by dispenser of cool beverages and proceed to celebrate the wives' departure for the country. Drinks move along quite lively, eluding the beverage. Their celebration became so lively that they were given a free ride to the bastile. As the clouds began to clear the thought of their wives learning of their arrest, they arrive at a hasty conclusion and wire their dear girls that they can't join them for seven days, as they were called away on business and it was impossible to send them any money as they had given all they had for a policeman's benefit. The situations are extremely characteristic and furnish a comedy of absorbing interest.

"THERE, LITTLE GIRL, DON'T CRY."—How soothing to our minds are the scenes of our childhood and the happy remembrance of the quaint old mothers and fathers. In this great study of human nature the producer has based his theme upon the dear little old-fashioned poem by our greatest American poet, James Whitcomb Riley, entitled "A Life's Story," embodying therein all that is good and pure in the innocent prattle of childhood, from the breaking of the doll and the little teapot, too; then it's the slate in the country school, and then, just naturally, it's the heart that's broke; but that, unlike the rest, can be mended and healed; and how many of our girls, misses and wives, have been cheered by someone saying, "There, little girl, don't cry"?

On Same Reel—"Chicken," a comedy showing old Mose Allen and family feasting on a chicken purloined from a neighbor's coop. He dreams that night of nothing but chicken; everything turns into one of the feathery tribe. Finally he is picked up and carried to the clouds; is dropped; at the same time he falls out of bed; this awakens him and he finds it was only a dream.

THE THREE WISHES.—Becoming dissatisfied with the brew of their favorite beverage, the gnomes of the Black Forest assemble together and discuss the possibility of improving it and producing another and better brew. The chief brewer is discouraged and retires from the rest of the band to think the matter over. In the depths of his meditations, he falls into a sound sleep, during which a good fairy appears in a vision and gives him a talisman granting him three wishes.

Awakening the next morning, the chief finds the talisman and a bottle of crystal, amber-colored liquid which immediately arouses his curiosity. Remembering his dream, he rushes off with the talisman and the bottle to tell his companions all about it. They decide to use the first wish to learn how to open the bottle, and the wish is granted. They all taste the liquid and find it is a beverage so far surpassing any other that they have ever tasted that [illegible] know how and where it is made.

The second wish is granted and they should just how and where it is made so as [illegible] of it. The chief brewer is overjoyed [illegible] of the tooth-like flood; he tears [illegible] to bet one wish left, and they [illegible] of no better way to use it than wishing [illegible] supply of the magic-like drink. The third and last wish is granted and all is serenity, [illegible] happiness reigns and wit and jollity [illegible] good fellowship.

THE CLOSED DOOR.—"To [illegible] price [illegible] is the [illegible]" that a woman [illegible] her husband and child for the sake of [illegible] jewelry of the home, only to be deserted [illegible] and left a hopeless outcast of despair. [illegible] is a case in point. The wife does not appreciate her husband and resents [illegible] efforts and duties of domesticity, [illegible] "freedom" and the attention of another [illegible] to her vanity. Six months [illegible] deckes in the gazettes of the great "White Way."

Twelve years later her daughter, now almost a young womanhood is about to be married. Her wedding day has come, everything is in readiness. The wretched wife and mother has drowned her life; remorseful and alone she now longs to see her husband and child. With pattering feet she goes to her once happy home, is met and repulsed by her husband. She pleads forgiveness. He reproaches her heartless desertion of their child for dishonor and disregard of all but her own selfish indulgence and pleasures.

Her child comes into the room during this scene and pities the poor woman, entirely ignorant of her identity. The husband points to the door and commands the woman to leave. After the mother leaves, the daughter returns and asks her father who the woman was, and when he tells her the woman is her mother, the girl rushes from the house, followed by her father, and they find her prostrate on the stoop. Lifting her to her feet they carry her into the house, and the daughter throws herself upon her mother's bosom, and, tenderly looking into her face, the poor woman lovingly caresses her child, while the father looks on overcome with pity and emotion.

THE SPECIAL AGENT.—Reports are received by the chief of the mounted police that an illicit still is being operated in the mountains of Kentucky, and at once they get busy to bring about the arrest of the moonshiners.

A special agent, a young officer, is appointed to visit the district and, if possible, bring about the detection and arrest of the culprits. Disguising himself as a lumberman, the young officer starts in quest of his prey.

He travels over a wild stretch of wood until he comes to the edge of the mountain. Hiding his portable telephone instrument at the foot of the telegraph pole, he plunges up the side of the mountain and into the forest until he reaches a cabin, where he finds a party of mountaineers. The cabin is owned by a rough and desperate man whose daughter acts as housekeeper. She is a pretty girl, and subjected to the ill temper of her father and the attentions of an objectionable lover.

The special agent is asked to partake of their evening meal, and while the girl is pouring coffee [illegible]

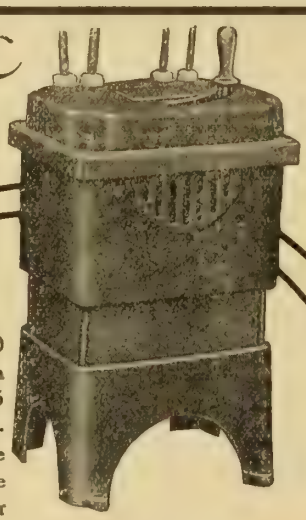
COMPENSARC

This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills



Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

DO NOT FORGET

That there are certain film exchanges which claim to be independent but which, as a matter of fact, are not buying a red cent's worth of new films, independent or otherwise. Others are operating on old stuff, made by independents years ago, but of no earthly use to you. Just because films are "independent" is no positive assurance of their merit. The only sure way to get high quality independent films is to deal with the house that is buying all the new reels every week and buying in vast quantities—meaning ME! I tell you the people are making it a point to attend independent theatres and if you show them the real stuff, you'll boost your receipts enormously!

"IMP."

THE DOCTOR'S PERFIDY.—When, after years of hard labor, a medical student is finally awarded his degree and diploma, it becomes his sacred duty to save a patient no matter what malice or cruelty he may harbor. Medical practice in this way is saved the indignity of being turned into a tool for the vengeful or villainous designs of men. Our story deals with a violation of this solemn oath.

A girl has already spurned the crooked leg from her sweetheart and is entering that serious period of life when she expects to elope into matrimony. But lately money has been known to spell more good looks and so in this case it follows when she happens to the tattooed depot and sees our leg-less kissing station girl. She soon has learned that a greeting at visiting period does not do. Call to find out but with that inclusive romantic bent of mind she can't be quite positive she is not. It is not funny.

As his condition is not precarious one can easily imagine the explanations he eventually has coming and the scene settles on cupid and Polly, and the old fat woman is forgotten.

The surgeon is not slow to see the condition of affairs although he does not know the ultimating consequences. His jealousy becomes an overwhelming passion and he loses in his assaults itself.

Unseen he drops some liquid from a vial into the patient's medicine as the latter sleeps and sees the nurse about to administer it. But a boy lovelad of the ward has seen the doctor's act and crawling from his bed he stays her arm and tells her what he saw. In another moment she has gone to the good superintendent of the hospital who promptly analyzes the ingredient in the medicine as poison.

The perfidious doctor is summoned to the office and by the testimony of the boy and the vial in his pocket is given into the hands of the police.

The nurse goes back to her patient, and she certainly takes to flowers on her sweetheart's medicine thereafter.

FRUITS AND FLOWERS.—It may be the height of presumption on the part of two office clerks to be in love with their employer's daughter, but they are so that settles it. What is more, the boss' daughter seems to return to a mustache, and don't they make sweethearts! One buys a box of beautiful flowers and the other gets a basket of fine fruit. But there's many a slip as 'tis said for a fellow clerk sees a chance to spill things and the result is trouble. When they arrive at the young lady's home one of them reaches for his gift, and is just tickled to death at the prospect of making a hit with those flowers. He is raising to her while he tinkles about in the box, really drawing out roses! No dear reader, turnips! True, it cannot be denied that a rose does not lose its sweetness if called a turnip, but a real turnip does not smell sweetly if called a rose—and this is a real turnip. His garland of roses has become a vegetable dormitory.

The girl stood aghast but before the baffled clerk can recover his smiling rival is removing the covering from his basket. It is his supreme moment and he crackles gleefully as he discovers—fruit! No, cabbages and turnips. The girl does recoil, and the two facing each other for a moment, suddenly begin to bombard each other with the vegetables. Some of the stuff goes through the portieres and into the conservatory, beaning onto the guests and a French pianist, who is passionately executing a rhapsodie. The party breaks up and the two young men beat an ignoble retreat.

Needless to add they are both fired next morning and the clerk who injected the bitterness into their lives (via the vegetables) bids them a tearful farewell. We next see the pair out on a park bench, from where one of them suddenly catches sight of their amorita. He sneaks away, but the other soon follows and overtakes them in a Summer garden, where he wins her attention from his rival. The other chap is seated at the same table, but is ignored. So he settles down to read a paper and all at once he bursts forth in a fit of laughter. The other man thinks he's crazy, but ignores him until a third young fellow comes on the scene and marches off with the girl. Then the new magistrate clerk stops laughing long enough to show him what he read in the paper—an announcement of her engagement, and to the very fellow she has just walked away with! Wouldn't it drive you to drink?

THE POWERS COMPANY

THE CARD PARTY.—Thompson has invited some friends to a quiet game of poker. While awaiting them he falls asleep. He is startled by the entrance of his friends, among whom is Wilson who is very attentive to Thompson's wife, a very beautiful woman. At the supper which follows the game, Thompson imagines that he sees Wilson dancing with his wife. All the boys go out to continue their game, except Wilson and his wife. Thompson returns and sees Wilson leading his wife. Mad with jealous rage he seizes a cutting knife and stabs Wilson. He then gets rid of the dead man and comes back to the dining room to find Wilson alive. There is a struggle and Thompson runs out followed by Wilson. Thompson jumps into a buggy, and Wilson steps and catches an automobile. An exciting chase ensues. The auto smashes into the buggy and upsets it, and Wilson comes after Thompson. They have a fighting spot on the edge of the cliff. Wilson throws Thompson over the cliff. We see Thompson at the bottom falling on his head and dying.

Thompson wakes up to find himself in the same chair as he originally fell asleep in. He is playing with Wilson and his other friends.

THE MINISTER'S NEW SUIT.—The minister has just received from his tailor a new suit of clothes of the conventional pattern and style. And the suit is left on the library table. Jones a young orderly and steals the suit putting it on and leaving his own rags in the suit box.

Next we see Dick Gray taking love to Mary's May. Myrtle accepts Dick who places a diamond engagement ring on her finger. Jones the thief enters Myrtle's house in search of a true meal. He hears a noise and escapes through. Percy Peep, a silly dude calls on Myrtle and a ludicrous love scene ensues. Dick quietly sees the young couple quarreling and it seems to him to play a little trick on Myrtle. He proceeds then to tell all his friends and then proceeds to marry them despite Myrtle's protests. Percy is overjoyed, and gives a funeral for the supposed minister who calls Peter Dick Gray, Myrtle's real lover. He sees the girl in the arms of Percy and insists that he is married to her. Dick speaks. Peter's lying game is out and then starts after the supposed minister, who is arrested by the cop, who recognizes him as a well-known crook. Jones is brought back to the house of Myrtle, who identifies him and tells them Percy enters. He sees the supposed minister, and says "Didn't you marry me?" Jones hangs, confesses and is taken out by the policemen. Dick kisses the girl, and Percy departs, saying, "Oh, fudge!"

ECLAIR.

A DESPERATE DUEL.—Owing to a disagreement between their respective wives, two citizens each challenged the other which results in a duel. Just as they are about to "settle it" a stranger gets hungry, rides up and suggests that they continue the fight on the same lines as those followed in his own country, that is "a la cowboy." Accordingly the two foes disappear and soon emerge from their houses "dressed to the teeth." The two wives become alarmed for the safety of their husbands and to prevent their outraged feelings, both fall upon the stranger, and administer a second thrashing.

But if the enemies have an abundance of sinister weapons, they have not much of the commodity called "courage" and their meanness to get to a wound without injury to self are amusing in the extreme. Finally, after endangering the lives of the community by their hackneyed shooting they decide they would rather be friends than continue the deadly feat. Accordingly they shake hands and in order to seal their renewed friendship they repair to a nearby hotel. There however they are so hilarious over the dangers of the combat past that they attract the attention of the police, who promptly arrest our friends for "disturbing the peace"!

JUAN, THE PELOTA PLAYER.—Juan, a famous player of the Spanish game of pelota, is soon in company with his sweetheart Joaquina, when they are interrupted by Miguel, her brother, who forcibly parts the lovers. Miguel's ill feeling towards Juan is so intense that he looks about for an opportunity to do him an injury, and later strikes Juan heavily on the head with the peculiar club used by the pelota players. Juan falls insensible, while Miguel after being accused by his sister, goes home and tells his mother his version of the incident. The girl following tells the mother the truth, and the latter sends her son upstairs to bed. Both Joaquin and her mother profess ignorance of the brother's whereabouts, but the former is forced into denouncing his hiding place by being told that Juan is dead. Miguel is carried off to prison, and the girl, believing her lover dead, goes to the cliffs and throws herself into the sea. Her insensible body is picked up by some fishermen and carried home. Meanwhile, Juan, convalescent, is confronted with Miguel, and remembering that the other is his sweetheart's brother, surprises everybody by declaring the affair an accident. His magnanimity causing Miguel to fall on his knees and implore pardon. The two together go to Joaquina's room, and the sight of her lover restored to health has a wonderful effect upon the sick girl, who is soon well on the road to recovery.

"LOST FOR MANY YEARS."—Lady Ramsden's small son, five years of age, is the only one who stands between Lord Ravenscroft and a vast estate. When he is unsuccessful in getting control of it through a marriage with Lady Ramsden, he engages the services of Saunders, the gardener, to get rid of the boy. Saunders accepts the money for the deed and carries the youngster off. They go to the west and little Lord Edward is deposited on the post-office steps, where he is discovered by Mr. and Mrs. Dobson, who take him into their home. The little chap is made much of by the cowboys and seems happy enough in his new surroundings. Fifteen years later, in a moment of contrition, Saunders writes home, telling Lady Ramsden where she can find her boy. When the letter reaches England it is delivered into the hands of Lord Ravenscroft, who, upon seeing the postmark, goes to a secluded nook and reads it. Lady Ramsden, secreted behind a tree, watches him destroy the epistle, and when he goes, gathers the pieces together. These she succeeds in joining and finds her son is living. Her joy is unbounded. Ravenscroft goes to Eagle Crag but is accorded no welcome. Knowing that Lady Ramsden is coming for her boy he plans a hold up of the stage coach. Saunders foils him here and Lady Ramsden is escorted in safety to the post-office, where she and her son are reunited.

AMBROSIO

THE SECRET OF THE LAKE.—Ivanhoe, the beautiful wife of a tyrannical man, succumbs to the love song of a minstrel, and, against her better judgment, meets him. Through the offices of a kindly page, she learns of her husband's approach. She mounts her horse in all haste, dropping a bracelet. This her lord and master finds and his suspicions are aroused. When he discovers his wife and the minstrel together, he chains and casts them into prison; and fearing that he might some day repent the deed, flings the key of the cell into the lake, burying thus this tale of love and his vengeance in the silent depth of the pool that holds to this day the mystery of the two lovers' stony grave.

NESTOR

THE INDIAN PRINCESS.—As Tetona sat before the camp-fire gazing at the sweet fact of the white woman in her locket, she pondered for the millionth time as to the owner of that face.

Her foster-father, the old chief, professed total ignorance on the subject, but Tetona found that her skin was only darkened when exposed to the sun, and that, together with the locket and apparent inborn abhorrence for some of the Indian customs, caused her to sometimes question whether, after all, she was a real Indian Princess.

Since Tetona, then Elletta Barnett, had been carried off during the attack on the prairie schooner, nine years ago, the chief had been kindness itself to the "Princess Tetona." Only now he commanded her to wed the Prince, his son, creeping cautiously from her tent. Tetona stole quietly toward the woods. She could not, she would not marry the young brave.

Fate favored her, for, ere the pursuing Indians could drag her back, Dick Morley galloped past and seeing the maiden in distress, caught her up on his horse and made a mad dash for the Barnett Rranch.

The mother's instinct, Tetona's face, and locket thoroughly convinced Mrs. Barnett that at last she had found their long-lost daughter, and, overjoyed at the wonderful discovery, she went to call her husband.

The Indians, however, had followed close upon the cowboy's heels, and the instant they observed their Princess alone, crept softly behind her and throwing a blanket over her head, bore her hastily outside.

Here again Dick might have saved her had not the crafty Prince attacked him from the rear.

He revived sufficiently, however, to tell the distracted father and mother which way the Indians had taken their daughter, but as Barnett ran to get the cowboys to rescue Tetona, the Indians surrounded him, and taking him captive, hurried him before their chief.

To vent his wrath upon the maiden would have been unbecoming his dignity, but when the chief found Barnett in his power, his anger burst forth.

Tetona, seeing the tribe engaged in a war dance around the unfortunate man, mounted the horse they had taken as they returned with her to the camp, and galloped back to the ranch.

Luckily the cowboys lost not a moment in responding to her call, for the infuriated chief had stripped Barnett to the waist, painted a target on his breast, and had his braves drawn up to take aim, when they dashed to the rescue, and would gladly have placed the chief in his place, had not the girl told them of his unvarying kindness to her, and insisted upon giving him his freedom.

A DAUGHTER OF THE MINE.—John Brairly kept the only hotel and bar in the camp, so the boys naturally chose this as a storehouse for their gold.

Each night Tess weighed it, gave them a slip with the amount, and locked it away in the safe.

She had been secretly pleased to watch the stranger, Ned Carton's, store grow week by week, but as she had feared, before many moons the other newcomer, Jim Kirby, had won every ounce of it from him.

Carlton's hopes rose high in anticipation of the day when he would have enough saved to speak to her, but now all this was swept away at one bound. In desperation he picked up his gun to make an end of his humiliation, but Tess quietly took the weapon from him.

That she should have seen his weakness doubly humiliated him, so, hatless and wild-eyed, he fled to the mine. After a moment's hesitation, Tess ran after him, and in her excitement dropped the keys, which Jim Kirby found upon entering.

Instantly he recognized the key of the safe. In a moment more he had opened the safe, put the boys' gold in the sleeve of his coat, and was hurrying down the path to seek a hiding-place for his treasure.

After vainly calling to Carlton, Tess was about to return when she observed Kirby hastening along, and was dumbfounded to see half a dozen bags of gold fall to the ground.

"Could he have won all of that?"

Dashing into the house, she found her worst fears were realized—the safe was open and empty!

Both her father and Lee, the Chinaman, were out, but she could at least follow Kirby and see where he went. Retracing her steps with what speed she could, the girl was fortunate enough to see him burying the gold under a tree. Waiting until he had gone, she stole to the spot, snatched the treasure, and ran breathlessly back to the house, where she secreted it again.

None too soon, for poor Ned Carlton, whom Brairly, the Sheriff, and a posse of miners had captured—for Brairly, returning in Tess's absence, seeing the empty safe and Carlton's hat, which the crafty Kirby had placed beside it, together with Carlton's wild exit from the house, naturally made him suppose the young miner to be the thief.

To avoid a hanging, Tess very truthfully declared that she had put the gold in another place, but privately informed the gambler, Kirby, that the country would no longer be healthy for him.

As for Carlton, this experience had taught him a lesson, and his pledge that he had done with cards was never broken.

THE HEART OF TESSA.—Phil Wentworth, a young and wealthy artist, is spending the Summer in the country, for the purpose of devoting himself to his art. On being called back to the city, he finds himself in love with Tessa, an artless little country girl, who returns his affection. While confessing their love for one another, and planning their future happiness, they are surprised by Tessa's father and mother who, after receiving a brief explanation on the part of Phil, realize that their little girl is grown up, and give their consent to the marriage.

We next find them in their new home in the city, having just arrived. Tessa, with childlike interest, runs around gayly admiring the luxury and splendor of her new apartments, so different from the simple little home she had known. On one of these tours of inspection she discovers the portrait of a beautiful girl, one of her husband's former sweethearts, whom she afterwards meets at a ball and recognizes as the girl of the picture, and notices that she (Madeline) and her husband are both deeply affected by the meeting.

After this meeting Madeline determines to win back the affection of her former sweetheart, whom she seeks out at his studio, where she is successful. Tessa, on arriving at the studio, unseen by either her husband or Madeline, finds the latter in the arms of her husband. Heartbroken, she decides to sacrifice her happiness for that of her husband, writes him a note biding him farewell, and returns to her home, where father and mother with loving care strive to heal her aching heart.

Upon finding that she is gone, Phil decides to go after her, when his eyes fall on the portrait of Madeline, and with vivid recollection of her visit of the afternoon before him, his weaker nature asserts itself and he decides to stay.

A few weeks later we find him painting Madeline's portrait in his studio, but his heart is not in his work. Conscience is calling to him in a loud voice, and Tessa's face is constantly before him. Suddenly, and without warning, he throws pallette and brushes to the floor, and takes rapid strides to the door; Madeline in alarm asks him for an explanation, but he pushes her aside and dashes out of the room.

Then losing no time, he returns to the country seeking his child-wife and her forgiveness. Upon arriving at the house, he finds Tessa at the winodw gazing out with an expression of loneliness and sorrow on her face. Gently he reaches for her and sinks to his knees beside her; with a start she turns to him and—with the "Heart of Tessa" it is impossible not to forgive, and in a few moments all is wiped out, and happiness once more reigns supreme in the rural home.

LOVE YOUR NEIGHBOR AS YOURSELF, BUT LEAVE HIS WIFE ALONE.—The new neighbors meet at the country residence of Mr. and Mrs. Klein, a fine old mansion surrounded by beautiful scenery. Mr. and Mrs. Parker are city folks who have decided to try country life for a Summer. Mr. Klein is an elderly gentleman with a beautiful young wife. After the introduction by Jasper Young (a country swain) the two couples separate, Mr. Parker pairing off with Mrs. Klein. Jasper seems to notice the fondness of the two, and by his mimic action shows it.

The next scene introduces the new servant in the employ of Mr. and Mrs. Parker, namely, Nellie Fielding, who is Jasper's sweetheart. Nellie is pretty, but countrified, gawky and awkward. Mrs. Parker has a lot of trouble showing Nellie how to behave properly and much fun is introduced into the "lessons in manners" from Mrs. Parker to Nellie. Jasper is always hanging around, and he also at a distance imitates Mrs. Parker as best he can, his rendering of the walk, bows, gestures being clever and funny.

The return call of the new neighbors shows the plot advancing, and soon Mr. Parker and Mrs. Klein stroll away from Mr. Klein and Mrs. Parker, the attitude of the latter two being very reserved and quite a contrast to the other pair. Nellie is seen milking a cow as Jasper draws near and after some love-making they walk away together, watching Mr. Parker and Mrs. Klein ahead of them and clumsily trying to imitate them.

An unexpected (?) meeting in a country lane reveals Mrs. Klein greatly interested in some flowers she has gathered. Mr. Parker is seen approaching, and he seems more than ever devoted to his neighbor's pretty wife. Jasper is noticed fishing in the creek nearby and as he catches a fish he sees the loving neighbors. Their actions make him neglect his rod and after fully taking in the scene he dashes off to get Nellie to join him and share the fun. In this scene Jasper is dressed in his best "Sunday-go-to-meeting" clothes, and the style and cut of his costume, without being unduly exaggerated, is true to rustic life as exemplified by a country dude.

On the porch of his mansion the old man Klein is much interested in viewing the new scenes. We see him lifting his field glasses and we see him pass in review some exquisite bits of scenery. He has a good laugh as his glass takes in Jasper and Nellie in a funny bit of rural courtship. He sees another pair that seems to trouble him somewhat, but soon he changes and enjoys more fine scenic effects. His doubts, however, seem to grow and he looks again for the pair he had a glimpse of just before. He locates them, and to his horror he identifies his own wife and Mr. Parker, his new neighbor, making ardent love to each other. They kiss and embrace as he is looking. He dashes down the field glass and rushes off to confront the guilty pair.

The last scene shows Mr. Klein breaking in on the lovemaking of the new neighbor and Mr. Klein's own wife. Fine dramatic acting is shown here. After upbraiding, struggling and coaxing the old man, being an old man, forgives his penitent young wife. They march off, leaving Parker standing alone, also evidently come to a realization of his folly.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE SOMNAMBULIST.—The director of a museum for old and new works of art, retires from his position, after nearly a lifetime of faithful service. He naturally does not like to leave his beloved exhibits, but he has one consolation, that his son-in-law is appointed as his successor, and to whom he is of great assistance. He therefore does not have to leave his beloved museum altogether. Shortly after the old director has retired, several valuable exhibits are missed, among them a very valuable jewelled ornament. The new director consults his father-in-law, and the old gentleman advises him to employ at once the services of one of the best detectives to take up the case. This is done, and the detective arrives at the museum. Curiously enough, he discovers that the old ex-director is in possession of a burglar's jimmy. Without telling the new director of this discovery, he compares the jimmy with the marks on the cases from which the valuables were stolen, and, to his great surprise, he finds that it fits exactly. He now searches the rooms of the ex-director during his absence, and finds hidden up the chimney the stolen articles. Thinking that the man is possibly a fanatic collector, the detective informs the director of his discovery. This news is a terrible blow to the latter's young wife, who is terribly shocked that her own father is proven to be the culprit. In order to make sure of the motives of the old gentleman in stealing the articles, the detective, together with the new director and his wife, remain in the museum one night to watch. After a short while, they suddenly hear footsteps, and walking along in their direction they see the old director. By the uncertain walk of her father the young wife at once realizes that there is something wrong with him, and coming near, she discovers that the old man is walking in his sleep. This she loses no time in telling to her husband and the detective, and after carefully awakening the old man, who is astonished at the situation, everything is satisfactorily explained.

The Cowboy's Devotion

Here is another out-of-the-ordinary Western story, a narrative with the vitality, the strong life of the Western plains in every inch of film. A little Western girl goes East to complete her education and returns to the ranch, bringing with her an effeminate young chap whom she has promised to marry. In an earlier day she was the playfellow-sweetheart of the foreman and now he is broken-hearted as he drives to the station to meet her, after having taken her photograph from the case of his watch. The trio are pursued by a small band of Indians who have left the reservation, and when he sees that they cannot all win through to safety the foreman drops from the carriage and creates a diversion which enables them to escape. He is rescued by his fellows when the flames are actually curling about his waist, and the girl comes to realize that it is a real man that she loves after all.

Approximate Length 955 Feet

RELEASED MONDAY, MAY 16th.

The Regeneration of Father

Father forbids the young man the house, but love ever laughed at locksmiths, and the ardent swain disguises himself as a girl and gains employment in the house in which he is forbidden. More than that, he so impresses father that the old gentleman agrees to the marriage of his daughter that he may wed the pretty servant. Once the agreement is signed the truth becomes known, and after all father is rather well pleased with his clever son-in-law.

"Have You a Little Imp in Your Theatre"

"Always Censored—Never Censured"

Mr. M. J. Farnbaker, Paducah, Ky., suggested the above line to be used in reference to "Imp" films. It's good, isn't it? Mr. Farnbaker is one of the many who declare "Imp" films are the very, very best in the world. George G. Killen, Ft. Wayne, Ind., is another. He says the "Imp" film "In Africa" packed his house to the doors and then some. Joseph Hewitt, Sparta, Ill., declares the "Imp" film called "Mother Love" is the world's best moving picture product. He asked 316 people what was the greatest thing in the world, and 67 answered "Miss Lawrence's acting." And so it goes! "Imp" films and their marvelous success have never had a parallel in the picture business. If you don't get "Imp" films, it's your own fault for not ding-donging at your exchange until you get what you demand.

TWO MORE IMPS D'ART FOR INDEPENDENTS ONLY!

"A Doctor's Perfidy"

(Released Monday, May 16th. Length, 985 feet).

This will be a sensation! It depicts a doctor, his patient who is his rival in love, and the girl they both love. The doctor is cast in the role of villain, the girl as a hospital nurse. The theme is strong enough for Nazimova herself and is magnificently dealt with. This picture is going to line your pockets with big money. Order it every day till you get it!

"Fruit and Flowers"

(Released Thursday, May 19th. Length, 970 feet.)

A veritable creme de la creme of [illegible] scream! If you carried a basket of flowers to your beloved skirt, and found that they had turned into cabbages instead, what on earth would you do? Read the answer in "Fruit and Flowers," a rare Imp comedy which will make your person laugh, quiver and quake with laughter. Offer your exclusive [illegible] are forced to!

An advertiser who does'nt CLAIM numerous letters of praise from exhibitors, BUT PRINTS THEM.

"I Want Every Thanhouser Released!"

Miss Dolly Spurr, Treasurer, Royal Theater, Marion, Ind. We have run all of your releases to date and have been "tickled to death" with the whole bunch. Your last three are right up to the notch as far as costuming and everything else is concerned. Your development is A-1, and is, in fact, better than lots of stuff that's been out years, instead of months; and as manager of the "Royal" I want every Thanhouser that is released. I am featuring "Thanhousers" and "Imps" and am giving just as much attention to one as the other, because they are both first class. I'll push your films to the limit here in Marion.

"Drew Better Than Any!"

Wm. L. Beasley, Pres., Casino Amusement Co., Dayton, Ky.—We have shown your "St. Elmo" and it drew befter than any picture we have ever run, outside of "Nero."

"Looks as if You Had Been in Business a Few Years!"

O. K. Haas, Prop., Theaters Nos. One and Two, Charlotte, N. C.—I wish to compliment you on one of your recent releases, "Daddy's Double." It does not look as if you had been in the business a few weeks, but a few years.

"They're O. K.!"

M. W. Johnson, Assumption, Ill.—Thanhouser Films are O. K.

"An Audience of 500 Simply Roared!"

J. Allen, Allen Amusement Co., Brantford, Ont.—We wish to commend you on your brilliant, high-class comedy, "Daddy's Double." It compares favorably with anything produced by any of the oldest manufacturers. It was shown in the Gem Theater here, and an audience of 500 simply roared.

"They've Won Favor Among My Patrons!"

Philip Collins, Mgr., Star Theater, Utica, N. Y.—Your films have won favor among my patrons. They are certainly good.

"Make More of Them!"

The Exhibitors' Golden Time.

In the ebb and flow of a business the profits of that business are not always divided according to strict economics. As we have pointed out over and over again, the moving picture field is divided into the usual three classes of any modern business, namely the producers, that is, the manufacturers; distributers, that is, the renters; consumers, that is, the exhibitors. The public, ordinarily speaking, is regarded as the consumers. But they are not. They are the final source of distribution of the goods. It is the shop keeper, otherwise the exhibitor, who, according to the strict economics of modern commercial philosophy, is the consumer. He is the final distributer. The public has no voice in the economic conditions which govern the production and distribution of the goods. This looks rather contradictory, but it is not. The public just takes what is given to it and occasionally revolts, but takes a long time in doing so. The public is a long suffering entity in this business and, like the mills of the gods, grinds slowly.

In this article we have nothing to do with what the public thinks of the moving picture. Our immediate business at this moment is with the exhibitor, a man whom we love, respect, revere, because he is the backbone of the business, and being the backbone of the business is entitled to all the credit of that position. This last Winter, besides the credit of the position he has had the profit. In having the profit he has had a very good time. In the last Winter's business of the moving picture industry in the United States, it is the exhibitor who has come out on top. Everybody knows and everybody says so, and by everybody we mean the manufacturers, the renters and the public. Up to a certain point this is as it should be. Certainly the exhibitor runs a great risk, he has to stand the racket of the business, he is the man next to the public, our last court of appeal in the matter, and therefore he is entitled to the just and legitimate profits of his position.

But the exhibitor has been making too much money. In fact he has been making all the money. The manufacturers have been working at close percentages, the renter has made nothing, the exhibitor has made all there is to make. Economically this is obviously wrong. There should be a fair and just distribution of the profits. Broadly speaking, at the present time the profits have been shared between the manufacturer and exhibitor and perhaps not in the most equitable proportions. Now, the renter, who, as we have pointed out before in this paper, is an indispensable factor in the situation, is getting disgruntled. He is between the devil and the deep sea. He does the spade work between the manufacturer and exhibitor, and, comparatively speaking, gets less profit than either. There is a feeling throughout the moving picture field that the renter is very badly served, is very badly off and is very badly treated. Within the last three months we have heard over and over again that the renter is not making any money. But he is determined to do so. And there is no reason why he should not because fundamentally the middle man is a necessary factor in any business. The exhibitor has got the upper hand for the time being and is buying his goods too cheaply. He is dominating the situation and dictating terms to the renter or distributer. The manufacturer does not know, does not care, does not understand. But the manufacturers are not omnipotent. It has become convincingly clear to us these last few months that the down trodden renter is about to exert himself and prove to be a factor and greater factor than ever in the moving picture situation. And we think he should be, because as we have said above, he does the spade work. He will not be dictated to by the exhibitor, but will meet the exhibitor on fairly equitable grounds.

Summing up the moral of this article it is this, that too large a proportion of the profits of the moving picture business has gone, this last Winter, into the hands of the exhibitor. He is having a very good time, but on strict grounds of business equity we desire to warn every exhibiting reader of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD that there is a definite intention to adjust the inequitable division of manufacturer, renter and exhibitor. [illegible] up with a simple illustration. There is a well known theater in New York City which pays $140 per week for its service, yet, its total receipts for the week are $3,500—a money making proposition. Both manufacturers and renters will agree that that is entirely disproportionate. In other words, that the exhibitor should pay more, and must pay more and has got to pay more, for his service.

The end of it all is that the public must pay more. And in paying more they will put the business on its proper basis and demand their money's worth. We look forward to the time when the five-cent moving picture theater will be a thing of the past and nothing under ten cents or twenty-five cents will be charged, and then the business will, at last, be put upon its proper plane.

Cause and Effect.

Munsey's Magazine each month contains a retrospective analysis of the doings of the New York stage, during the previous few weeks, so that the leisured reader is enabled to obtain what is not offered him in the criticisms of new plays published in the daily newspapers. He learns from Munsey why this or that piece has failed to attract; why this or that piece is a success, which actor or actress has made good, and the general trend of theatrical politics in the United States. This article is always well written, well weighed, and informative.

The author dots his i's and crosses his t's. He is very frank in his criticisms. He does not hesitate to give the real reason why so many plays fail on the New York talking stage and the intelligent reader is enabled to gather from what he says why it is that the past theatrical season in New York, like its immediate predecessor, was a disastrous failure. Broadway was strewn this last Winter with the wrecks of unsuccessful ventures.

Unsuccessful because of several patent facts according to our author. The plays were not badly constructed and badly acted, but were bad in theme. It is a regrettable fact that the modern theatrical manager or speculator seems to think that the American public wants pruriency, nastiness, obscenity and indecency in the stories of its plays. The public does not. This last Winter the public severely stayed away from these nauseating productions, some of which were openly discussed and condemned in the Munsey article, the author of which incidentally mentions the fact that one of the theaters which had served up vile salaciousness (in plainer terms, filth) was glad to turn to the moving picture to prevent the house going dark during the Summer. Here, then, we have a clear case of cause and effect—the cause why the ordinary theater is failing so badly and why the moving picture theater is taking its place. The public is tiring of "angel" directed salacity. The great majority of people are clean-minded and like their entertainments to be of that character. Salacious plays pander only to the few and not to the many, that is the paying public, whereas the moving picture, speaking generally, is clean and attractive and can be safely witnessed by women and children as well as men, which is not universally the case with the plays at the Broadway and other theaters. The only thing for the theatrical manager to do, in order to restore the popularity of the theater, is to give the public what it wants. Then we shall hear fewer laments over the fact that the moving picture is supplanting the ordinary play. It will never suppplant the ordinary play where the latter is presented in its proper aspects—that is, in the form of a clean, wholesome story well mounted and played. Every indifferent talking play is an advertisement for the moving picture. It is a kind of advertisement that we do not specially welcome because the moving picture is flourishing on its merits. It would not flourish any the less if all talking plays were clean and wholesome. It is no real rival of the talking play; it is rather the complement, appealing perhaps to a slightly different class—that is, the poorer class. Nevertheless, it is attracting the patronage of the better classes whose minds revolt against the salaciousness condemned in the Munsey article.

The Sales Company.

In our penultimate issue we said that after the Chicago meeting of the Alliance, we would express our opinion of the scheme of the General Sales Company, which was to be presented to the Independent section of the moving picture trade on Friday and Saturday last. In this article we redeem our promise. Two features characterized the gathering of the clans at Chicago. One was the meeting of the Alliance, or alleged Alliance. The Alliance started out to do a great deal and has done practically nothing. It is and always has been somewhat passive and the sooner it is reformed the better for the credit and good sense of the few men who are allowing their names to be identified with it. Varying the notable line in Sir W. S. Gilbert's comedy: "It does nothing in particular, and does it very badly!" We hope it will be more useful in future.

More serious, however, than the meeting of this ill-starred body was the scheme for making or attempting to make the Sales Company an actuality. That scheme appears likely to be successful. So shrewd an observer of the present moving picture situation as James L. Hoff has called the Sales Company a "little trust." We may not like trusts, but we admire them. When Mr. Morgan tried to grab the shipping business of the United States and Great Britain we admired him for his boldness. Mr. Rockefeller commands admiration because he has been successful in a fine, broad scheme of grabbing. Equally so, Mr. Armour of Chicago—in fact all these kings of commerce command our admiration and respect if not our love, because they evince the truly imperial acquisitive instinct.

The Sales Company first appealed to us in the same kind of manner that the Murdock enterprise appealed to us, and that the Film Import enterprise appealed to us.

It looked to us as if the element of personal aggrandizement was likely to be too prominent. In other words that it was not being conducted for the benefit of the Independent side of the business as a whole, but rather for the profit and glory of one or two firms whose names have been freely mentioned and whom now it is not necessary to mention.

But a study of the Conditions of Sale, printed elsewhere, shows the Sales Company to be conceived on a very broad platform indeed. Practically all the manufacturers and importers on the Independent side have agreed to those conditions, signing up for varying terms. The business is to be managed from a central office—each company contributing so much per capita towards the expenses. The administrative position has been materially strengthened by the inclusion on the executive staff of such men as Herbert Miles, William Steiner and others whose names should be a guarantee for the proper conduct of the Sales Company.

All this week we have been approached by representative men who were present at the Chicago meeting, asking us to use our influence, not to kill the Sales Company, because the Sales Company as such is an ordinary commercial proposition, but to prevent the formation of a combination which might be more tyrannical, more unjust, more selfish, than any trust that at present exists in the United States. We are on the side of freedom of trade. We believe in the principle of the individual manufacturer or importer selling his goods according to the ordinary rules of commerce, namely on their qualities and on his own terms. Any intelligent reader of this paper knows that for months past we have preached the sound economic doctrine of an open market

So far as we can discover there exist no grounds for these apprehensions. If they once existed they have been removed by a broad handling of the situation on the part of the Board of Directors of the Sales Company. It is to be a representative board and their decisions are to be unanimous. Moreover, it is recognized in the company that the quality of the Independent picture must be kept to high-water mark. So it may be assumed that one of the weaknesses of the Independent side which has hitherto been obvious, namely the comparatively poor quality of the pictures, will no longer exist.

Of course, the Sales Company is in the experimental or tentative stage. It is an attempt and the third or fourth attempt to regulate this section of the industry, and a very important section it is, in the interests of all concerned. The manufacturers are to find a safe and remunerative market, the renters are to have a good supply of pictures, and the public who patronize the thousands of Independent theaters in the country is to have an opportunity of seeing pictures which compare in quality with any others otherwise produced. Such a program as this, as we pointed out two or three weeks ago, commands support and in so far as it goes, the Sales Company may be assured of the sympathetic encouragement of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

There is one feature of the situation that must not be lost sight of, and that is that many of the signatories to the Sales Company's agreement are inclined to be doubtful of the result of this experiment. They, in fact, are giving the scheme a trial. If it succeeds, why they will continue their adhesion. If it does not succeed they will go independent.

So far as we can form an opinion on the evidence before us, the Sales Company starts out with every hope of success. We think it ought to be given a fair trial, we think that the signatories to the conditions, now that they have gone so far as to hand in their adhesion to the program of the Sales Company should do all in their power to make it a success. By making good pictures and co-operating with those who have charge of their interests.

There is one special respect in which we hope that the Sales Company will be successful and will accomplish that which it has set out to do, namely to regulate the Independent side of the business. It is the third or fourth attempt of the kind and apparently the most businesslike and consequently one which is likely to obviate the necessity of so much disagreement, diversity of views and conflict of interest as has characterized the Independent moving picture field in the past. Frankly, we are sick and tired of so much of this political squabbling, cross-purposes and the like. If the Sales Company can put an end to all this useless talk, useless clamor and useless disunion it shall, in a very special manner indeed, earn the thanks and support of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, because, as we have said over and over again, we stand for the good of the business as a whole, we stand for the improvement in quality of the picture, we stand for the education and encouragement of the exhibitor all over the country, and, therefore, we want to write week by week about the picture and not about its politics in order that we may do our share in promoting the prosperity of the moving picture business of the United States.

Picture Personalities.

CHESTER FREEMAN.

We have long threatened to give our readers a picture of Chester Freeman, the erstwhile controlling spirit of the Film Import and Trading Company. Here it is. Freeman and his company were possibilities, nay, were probabilities. Why those probabilities were never realized is matter for considerable dispute.

The most heartily anathematized person in the moving picture field at this moment is the subject of this portrait. It is that of a man who loomed large for a time in moving picturedom; a man who seemed to have it all his own way. Why he did not get it all his own way is a secret known only to himself. Possibly students of these things, like Professor Lombroso, or Professor Nordau, or other men who make heredity and the study of their fellowmen the work of their lives, might be able to say why; we won't, although we think we could.

Anyhow, here is Chester Freeman, the bright, smiling genius, or ex-genius, of the Film Import and Trading Company. We have a sympathetic liking for Freeman, because he is a clever man, an able man, and an acquisitive man. We think that in years to come when he gets over his present disease, a mild form of caput augmenti, he may settle down and become a useful and money-making member of the moving picture business.

MYSELF AT THE ACTORS' FAIR.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

Mr. Taft, having performed the duties assigned to him by the committee of the Actors' Fair, which has been so conspicuously successful a feature of New York life this last week, it devolved upon the writer of these lines also to officiate at the Fair in a capacity possibly not so important as that of the President, but, nevertheless, of considerable significance. In other words The Moving Picture World and moving picturedom were invited through me, myself, my very own self, to show that no ill-feeling exists towards a class whom we of moving picturedom are said to be putting out of business. So to the Actors' Fair I went, I did, and the memory of it all will never fade from my mind.

I went, I saw, I conquered—I repeat, I conquered. Conquered a desire to elope with some of the most exquisite specimens of the eternal feminine I have ever been privileged to behold. Bless their dear hearts! How beautiful they looked; and what delightful brigands and robbers they are in the sacred cause of charity!

It was Dreamland—the Dreamland, in a way, of Coney Island compressed and adapted to the exigencies of the Thirty-fourth street armory. To quote Byron, at night, "And bright the lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men." A procession amongst this paradise of houris meant that you had your hand in and out of your pocket at every step you took, taking chances for this, that and the other thing. Who the devil, gentlemen, could resist the bewitching appeals of these bewitching beggars? I went to the Fair with a heart; I came away minus that heart. For I left it behind me in scores of little bits.

The moving picture played a part in the entertainment. I was indebted to my friend, Bernard Cook, of Pathes', for the information that the Globe Annex was to form a feature of the Actors' Fair. The Globe was under the management of Montgomery and Stone of the Globe Theater, and Mr. Cook was the operator using a Pathe machine for the projection work. So, after a time, when I could elude the depredations of the bevy of stage beauties who were robbing me of my heart and my money, I found my way to the Globe Theater, being taken in charge of by Cook and introduced to all sorts of nice people at his theater. I was very glad to see that the little theater, at which I witnessed a filmed prize fight, was popular, taking in lots of money and attracting lots of people.

I hope that before the Fair closes this week Mr. Cook will have carried out a little scheme which he divulged to me: that of getting a series of films from the Edison, Vitagraph and Biograph Companies in which well known actors and actresses figured. For example, there are the Pilar-Morin series; the picture in which Elita Proctor Otis appeared, and, of course, there are the Biograph series. There are also pictures made by the Essanay and Selig Companies in which star actors and actresses appear.

Perhaps I ought to say that amongst the fair beauties at the Actors' Fair were Pilar-Morin and her gifted pupil, Pauline Maurice, who ran a Japanese stall and made people fish for cigars and nick-nacks. So you see, moving pictures and moving picture personalities were well represented at one of the most charming functions at which I have ever been present—this same Actors' Fair. Of course we were all actors and actresses there. Even I, as I told you a few weeks ago, am a bit of an actor, as witness that remarkable Powers' picture of me, which is one of the classics in the making of moving pictures to-day. I acted a part at the Actors' Fair. This was to endeavor as far as possible to impress people whom I met with the fact that the moving picture has now to be taken into serious consideration as an amusement factor. If the Fair is repeated next year, I should say that the Globe Annex will be increasingly successful, because by that time people will have realized that the moving picture stage is attracting talent quite as proficient as that of the ordinary stage. The silent drama comes to us as a real relief from vocalized acting. Take, for example, the same beautiful room at the Actors' Fair, with its myriads of lights; the sheen and the radiancy; the life and color; the restless crowds of beautiful women struggling, scheming plotting, fighting, beseeching the money out of your pockets—a pandemonium of dreamy delights! What a relief to be able to get away from it and dive into a temple of the silent drama for five minutes and contemplate a noiseless play on the screen. Come to think of it, there is much virtue in silence. Speech, we are told, is silver, and silence is golden. Therefore the silent drama may, in a sense, be regarded as the more precious of the two kinds of acting.

Not that I derogate the power of the human voice. No, no. Especially if that human voice belongs to a beautiful woman. But there are times when even a beautiful voice is all the better for a rest. There are times when the human mind prefers contemplation to conversation. Here, again, your silent drama comes in to supply the much needed mental variety. Just fancy now, if there were no silences in life! Just fancy if there was no time at all when the wife of your bosom, or your sweetheart, or the other fellow's sweetheart, or, at any rate, the She, the She that is in all our lives—just fancy now if She was NEVER quiet, but always talking. Life would be intolerable; life would be intolerable without some silences.

So in our pleasures you perceive, ladies and gentlemen, that the silent drama plays its own part; fulfills a long-felt want; and is fulfilling that want so well that it is becoming more popular every day. And as it is becoming more popular, the number of cultured people who are helping to make the pictures are also numerically increasing. The standard is being raised. The public has its favorite performers on the silent stage and, generally speaking, the new art is shaping itself into a delightful complement and auxiliary of the older art of acting. It is a kind of younger sister—a Cinderella. This silent drama, misunderstood, persecuted at first, but now coming into its own, is a veritable Cinderella, who, you may remember, turned out to be a very beautiful princess.

I shall always remember the Actors' Fair and the charming people I met there with pleasure and delight. Next year, ladies and gentlemen, if you hold another Fair, I would like to help you in the moving picture end of things.

Not since the Kalem Chicago representative stayed up all night to be in at the killing of the "elephant" on the premises of the Selig Polyscope Company, has there been such high jinks among the Western film people as happened last week. Badger fights have been popular of late among many Chicago sports and the Western manufacturers and exchange men, following this cue to celebrate the arrival of a newcomer in their midst, laid themselves out to give him an exciting time. They did! But when the neophyte pulled the cord to release the badger which was to do battle with Bill Selig's fierce bulldog, he uncovered—a very tame household pet indeed. But what an opportunity was lost, we are told, to secure a moving picture film of emotional acting and action which would have done credit even to the rooster trade-mark.

A Cincinnati newspaper last Sunday gave Marcus Loew, of the People's Vaudeville and Film Exchange Companies, of New York, a three column writeup. With the same article was published a large cut supposed to be a portrait of Mr. Loew. The writeup was the best of the two. It proclaimed Mr. Loew "the moving picture king." Continued the article made king Loew say: "I suppose that if I had been trained in the theatrical business I would have followed some of its traditions, but not being so trained I violated them all. I built up and evolved the business system on which all the moving picture theaters in the country are now conducted. Economy was my watchword in framing up our system. I dispensed, first of all, with the ornamental and useless house manager. An ugly, middle-aged woman was what I tried to secure for every house, because the pretty girls spent too much time talking to the young fellows. The music was taken care of by a combination—a lady piano player who could sing also. The operator—we had to pay him a little real money, but not much at first. Performers used to have to do fourteen or fifteen turns every day, that was all. The manufacturers of films have exhausted their ingenuity and skill. The only thing I fear is that the films will deteriorate. Our patrons represent the best elements in the community. Our trade is a family trade and we want to keep it that way."

While very interesting, the writeup is not above criticism so far as some of the opinions with which Mr. Loew is credited with having expressed are concerned. Those in touch with the manufacturing end of the moving picture business, as well as many others in a position to talk upon the subject, will hardly confess a fear such as that expressed by Mr. Loew that the films will deteriorate, nor concur in the opinion that the manufacturers have exhausted their ingenuity. Unfortunately the interview gives an indefinite scope to the opinion and it may possibly be misunderstood, however, as it stands in print, it must be assumed that Mr. Loew meant that all the picture manufacturers have exhausted their ingenuity, and if he intended to convey that impression he was mistaken.

The film manufacturers on the other side of the Atlantic are so numerous, their productions have been so great in numbers and the sharp competition that has prevailed among them makes it possible that Mr. Loew's opinion is correct in some respects, but only in some. Applied in general to foreign makers it is not correct. Why, only a few weeks ago one foreign concern issued a subject that attracted the attention of the entire civilized world. I refer to the film that showed the birth of the common house fly, how it multiplies, how it gathers and spreads the seeds of disease. The ingenuity reflected by this picture equals any that has ever been attached to any subject since the first production of moving picture films. The illustration of the habits of the disease spreading insect were so striking that the health authorities in all the large cities of this country have taken a most intense interest in the film and are urging that it be exhibited as frequently as possible, so that it may be an important factor in arousing the country to a realization of the necessity for prompt and decisive measures to exterminate the common house fly.

So far as the United States is concerned, Mr. Loew's opinion does not bear weight. The home manufacturers have by no means exhausted their ingenuity. To the contrary, they are really only beginning to exercise it. It is not long since the chief aim of these manufacturers appeared to be to grind out the subjects and get them upon the market. There was a sorrowful lack of attention to details. From an artistic standpoint there were comparatively few instances in which the term success could be applied to the products. In the other cases crudeness in arrangement of plots, the staging, acting, and in the photography, was very distinct, but during the last several months there has been such decided progress toward improvement that the managers and the public are voluntarily extending congratulations to the makers of the films. I have one case in mind. A certain manufacturer used to put out subjects that were passed upon as huge failures from any point of view that could be taken. The name of the manufacturer was a signal for a most unconditional criticism. It is not exaggeration to say the productions were the worst on the list, but recently the subjects of the same manufacturer has shown such marvelous improvement that many film critics have been heard remarking that they were getting dangerously close to some of the leaders. Unfortunately the improvement has not been general and this is due to an unaccountable policy of economy on the part of some of the manufacturers. Whether it is due to short sightedness or lack of capital has not been determined, but there are reasons for believing that the progressive movement will soon be general.

If the purpose of the interview referred to was intended to convey the impression that the ingenuity of the manufacturers has been exhausted so far as themes and effects are concerned, the opinion might be pardonable to an extent. When the vast amount of subjects that have been produced is taken into consideration one is prone to wonder if the supply of ideas has not been exhausted. But there is one thing that should be remembered: The libraries of the world contain millions of volumes, yet volumes upon volumes of new works are being published annually. With the advent of the new writers in the scenario field is it not natural to expect that they will be able to bring out ideas for the emergency?

The moving picture business and horses are alike when it becomes a case of expressing opinions regarding them and judging their merits. Select a half dozen people at random to pass an opinion upon a film subject and then make a comparison. If two out of the six agree you can bet that subject is a winner. Audiences cannot be considered as infallible in passing judgment on a picture. A subject that will arouse a New York audience to enthusiasm will frequently move a Philadelphia audience to the point of derision. A big success in the East may meet its Waterloo in the West. People in the South will frequently clamor for a subject that is considered very ordinary in the West. It may not rest upon the theme of the picture, or the manner in which it has been arranged or produced. There are scores of various points of view from which audiences pass judgment. Some manufacturers have stamped on their pictures a peculiar identity to which certain audiences have taken a liking. The subjects of these manufacturers will win these audiences regardless of what merit other productions may have. Other audiences become attached to a cause to certain players or actresses in the pictures and while the subject itself may be a poor one, or uninteresting, or the photography may not be up to the standard, or there may be some defect in the staging or carrying out of the story, the appearance of the picture favorites, who are becoming as prominent as the stage favorites, will save the day and the audiences will go home satisfied and having again seen the people in whom they are so much interested.

The interest the public has taken in the personality of many of the picture players is astonishing. The film manufacturers and the film renters are inundated by correspondence from young women who crave an autograph photo of some particular leading men, and from young men who seek the names, addresses and photographs of leading ladies whose appearance on the silent stage enchanted them. Last Sunday's North American published a full-page article on Miss Turner, one of the Vitagraph favorites. This young lady stated in the interview mentioned in the article that since she has been with the Vitagraph Company she has received about three thousand letters containing offers of marriage. Managers all over the country are begging the manufacturers to furnish them with photographs of their players so that they may be displayed in the lobbies of the theaters, and the people who are flocking to see and meet the originals may be in a measure satisfied. Verily the stage favorite must look to his or her laurels, for the picture theatre is going some.

ON THE SCREEN.

By Lux Graphicus.

King Edward's death has been the topic of the hour in all parts of the world during the past week, and here in the United States the amount of space devoted to his life and career show the wonderful hold which the personality of the man secured upon this branch of the Anglo-Saxon race. Though eminently a man of peace, it is probable that not since the time of Napoleon has the passing of a man who filled a monarchical position, excited such widespread interest. His popularity was extraordinary; his versatility was remarkable; his influences upon twentieth century matters probably greater than that of any other man living at the time of his death.

The first public function I ever attended in Britain was a great dinner at which the then Prince of Wales was present. He was patron of a learned society with which I was connected. Then, in more recent years, it was my fortune to find myself in his company on several occasions so that I am enabled to confirm from actual observation and experience many of the good things that have been said of him.

* * *

And King Edward, the readers of The Moving Picture World might like to know, had a direct connection with photography. He was probably the most often photographed man in the world, both in the studio and out of doors. I could fill pages of The World with anecdotes of him in this regard which would show the human side of his character. All this, however, must be taken for granted. Amongst other things he was patron of the Royal Photographic Society of Great Britain, the principal photographic society in the world. Queen Alexandra was also a patroness, so was the late Queen Victoria.

Twelve years ago, also to the very month, the Royal Photographic Society held a great International Photographic Exposition at the Crystal Palace, London, which is known to many Americans as one of the most beautiful glass buildings in the world. King Edward, then Prince of Wales, went down to the Crystal Palace and opened the exhibition, interesting himself in the pictures, machinery and the apparatus, and showing an intimate knowledge of the technique of stationary photography. I was one of those who were in his entourage. And again I had opportunities of observing what a Prince of Good Fellows, and a consummate man of the world, he was.

One of the last times I saw him was in the Royal Box, at the Ascot Race Meeting, in England, probably the most influential and popular racehorse meeting in the world. The King and Queen stood up in the Royal Box before the hundreds of thousands of people assembled on the race course. In the enclosures were the fine fleur of British and American society. In the course of the afternoon the King sent for the American Ambassador, Mr. Choate, and engaged in friendly conversation with him, before the assembled multitudes, so that the world might see how sympathetically inclined he was towards the United States. That was a characteristic illustration of Edward's tact—the ability of doing the right thing at the right moment, which was one of his good qualities and contributed so much to his popularity.

"Oh, well," says the reader, "this is all fine, but what has King Edward to do with moving pictures, anyway." A great deal, my friends. When in London, in the year 1896, moving pictures or animated photographs, as they were then called, were coming to the fore, the King, then Prince of Wales, sent for Mr. 'Birt Acres, one of the pioneers of the business, to give a special demonstration of the cinematoscope, as it was then called, at the Royal residence in London. This early Royal recognition of what was then one of the marvels of the time undoubtedly gave a stimulus to the moving picture business across the Atlantic.

So you see the late King had some connection with the moving picture, which continued down to the last moments of his comparatively short reign. For last year he sent for Charles Urban, of Kinemacolor fame, and had a special demonstration of moving pictures in natural colors prepared for his inspection. According to what we are told, he appreciated the exhibition. In fact, it may be said that throughout his life, King Edward always took a warm interest in scientific progress, especially if it tended towards the enlightenment and improvement of the condition of his people.

To appreciate the value of the interest taken by the late King in moving picture work in the old country you must have lived there. He did not give his support or lend his patronage to anything unless it had been proved worthy of it. That support or patronage means, as it were, a hall mark stamping the thing as good and genuine; in other words, as we say here, if a King takes a thing up personally; he O. K.'s it, and it goes. Only recently King George the Fifth, lately Prince of Wales, visited a music hall in London for the purpose of seeing a public exhibition of Kinemacolor, a fact of inestimable value to the exploiters of that process.

King Edward's death, of course, deprives Mr. Roosevelt of the pleasure of a public reception in England and so we shall not see the pictures of which I spoke a fortnight ago, a very unfortunate loss. In many other respects the King's death will retard the moving picture business, as any number of public events will be abandoned or postponed. It is astonishing what widespread effects and influences are superinduced by the death of a European sovereign. All branches of business are affected by it. There are many films of King Edward in existence which, no doubt, in time to come, will be invested with considerable historical interest. Perhaps the most popular moving pictures ever taken of him were those in which he was shown leading in his Derby Winners of the greatest race in the world. For he was a good sportsman. The English people love good sportsmen and that is one of the several reasons why Mr. Roosevelt is so popular in the little Island in the North Sea. Peace to the ashes of the Princely Patron of the moving picture! ! !

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

A Good Letter. Delphos, Ohio, writes as follows: "I had an experience similar to Iowa's shortly after putting on a new aperture plate and tension springs. As the projection lens had worked all right previously, I knew the trouble could not be there. The pictures would blur badly at times and again would be very clear. Careful investigation disclosed the fact that the tension springs did not give equal pressure on the film, one bearing harder than the other. Also the weaker pressed unevenly, i. e., at the top and bottom only and not at all in the center. I remedied this by bulging the center of the spring out until it bore evenly its whole length and with pressure equal to its mate and the trouble was eliminated. When there was a thin strip of film it would bulge and the pictures, of course, blurred, but thick stock went through all right. Hope this will help Iowa, or some other brother operator.

"Can anyone tell me what causes the new waterproof (one to three weeks old) film to be dim the first show or two (we only run one reel) and get clear and all right afterwards, without touching the lenses? I have had this experience only with the N. I. waterproof films.

"Are low voltage transformers (inductors, economy coils, economizers, compensares) savers of current bills on A. C. 60 cycle, 110 volts? Are they all right in place of rheostats? Articles such as the one headed 'A New Race of Degenerates,' by H. F. Hoffman, surely must be written by one mentally irresponsible. I cut out the picture of the Editor of the Operators' Column, which appeared in The World recently, had it framed on a handsome mount and it now hangs in my operating room, evidence of the esteem in which I hold him!"

I think the trouble found and remedied by Delphos would hardly fit Iowa's case, but it probably will fit some other one's, and is unquestionably of value. Thanks, Delphos. No, I cannot say what causes the dimness you speak of as I have encountered nothing of the sort myself in using waterproof N. I. stock. The query is respectfully referred to the Edison Company or to the waterproofing folks for reply. I strongly favor waterproofing. Mr. Hoffman now says his article was a "kidding one." Umph, the writer does not relish being "kidded" exactly in that way, nor did many others. Many thanks for the compliment of that nice frame, Brother Delphos. May I ever continue to merit your esteem.

Announcement Slides.—Wellsboro, Pa., writes: "Noticed your article in The World some time since that announcement slides could be made with gelatine paper and a typewriter. Procured gelatine like enclosed samples but writing fails to show up, even with black ribbon. What is wrong?"

There is nothing wrong, Wellsboro, provided you used the light shades of pink and yellow as I instructed and used a good, new, black ribbon. Use only the capital letters of the machine and have the type clean. Strike the keys hard. Because the writing appears dim as you see it on the gelatine don't imagine it won't show up on the screen. Bind up, with a mat, just like a slide, between two slide cover glasses. I have used these announcement slides for temporary announcements for years.

Condensers—Perforators.—New York City, N. Y., writes: "What focal length condenser lenses should I have for picture 11 feet wide at 60-foot throw? Also why do not all licensed manufacturers use the same kind of perforator if one kind is so much better than another? It seems a shame to spoil good acting and good photography by poor perforating."

Use two 7½-inch condensers. I am not strong in knowledge on the matter of perforators, except in a general way. Why it is manufacturers don't all use the same machines for perforating, or get the same results I do not know. But some manufacturers have expended large sums of money striving after excellence in this particular direction and without attaining anything even approaching perfection at that. As you say, New York, it surely is a shame, and it is to be hoped that some universal remedy will be found before long.

Concerning Lenses.—New York City, N. Y., asks the following; the inquirer after knowledge being, by the way, a son of Sunny Italy, judging by his name: "What is meant by equivalent focus—back focus? Does back focus mean distance from aperture plate to projection lens? Does it make any difference how far lamphouse is from machine, provided I can control size of spot by moving lamp back or ahead inside the lamphouse? What do you mean by 6½ and 7½ condensers? Is it their thickness or diameter, and can one tell by looking at them what focal length they are?

I am afraid New York hasn't read the column regularly or he wouldn't have to ask these questions. What a sheet of white paper is pasted on a wall opposite a window and removed at least 10 feet from the window, and a projection lens is held in front of the paper and moved to and from the wall, a point will be found where a clear, sharp picture of the window will be projected on the white paper. Hold at a point where the projected picture is sharpest, that is to say best the distance from the wall to the end of the lens nearest the wall is the "back" focus and the distance from the wall to a point midway between the two lenses which make up every projection lens is the equivalent focus. The focal length (back focus) of a single condensing lens is found the same way, by holding the flat side near the wall and measuring from it to the wall. The equivalent focus of a condensing lens, taken as a whole, is found in the same way, measuring from a point exactly half way between the two lenses to the wall. Of course it will be necessary to mount your condensing lenses in a temporary mount of some sort to measure for equivalent focus, unless you have a mount that can be removed from the lamphouse. But it is seldom or never necessary to measure the equivalent focus of a condensing lens. If both lenses are the same the equivalent focus of the condenser will be just half the back focus of one lens. As to the distance of lamphouse from machine I have found no material difference, within reasonable limits, how far it is away. I have never followed out any definite line of experiment, however. Will be glad to hear from those who have. By 6½, 7½, etc., condensers, I mean the back focus of the single lenses, measured as above. The experienced man can tell pretty closely what the focal length of a condenser is, as the different focal lengths are of different thicknesses. That is what makes the difference in focal length. The thicker the lens the more pronounced its convex, therefore the shorter its focal length. I trust I have made this clear to New York. If not, come back again and I will try to straighten it out for you. Why don't you go to Mr. Taylor's school and get these matters all explained to you and learn them right? High Voltage Resistance.—Homer, Ill., writes as follows: "Am trying to operate a machine on current from a trolley circuit of an interurban railway system. Am about nine miles from the sub-station (power house, I take it he means) and get about 530 volts when no car is operating within a mile or two. When car passes the park don't know how low the voltage goes, but an incandescent lamp just burns red. To operate a machine on this current last Summer I took eight old style, 110-volt rheostats and hooked five of them up in series and the other three in multiple. Will you please explain how this gave the desired results? Also do you know of a better way? Remember that the current is not regular, but my light is good nearly all the time, only when a car is near I have to trim my carbons much closer. Was obliged to use a No. 6 wire and ground my negative carbon to the rail of the track. Could not operate by grounding to the ground nor on a smaller wire. Why?"

Homer certainly is working under difficulties. His letter reminds me of the Ohio River steamboat with a whistle so big that every time they blew the whistle they had to stop the boat to raise steam again. Plainly the trolley wire feed isn't anywhere near large enough. But that, of course, can't be helped. You have not told me how many amperes capacity those 110-volt rheostats were so I shall have to do considerable guessing. A 25-ampere, 110-volt rheostat has about 2 2-3 ohms resistance, or 13 1-3 ohms for five in series. This would give you approximately 40 amperes on 530 volts. Just exactly what effect the hooking on of three rheostats in multiple ahead of or behind the series, I'm blessed if I know. The current that would get by the series would be split up in three and there would be 1-3 of 40 amperes, or a little more than 13 amperes going through each rheostat. The resistance of the rheostat would, of course, operate to cut down the total somewhat, but to figure out what a freak connection of that sort would do would be considerable work and I think would do no particular good. Just why you hooked in the multiple part is one too many for me! I think, however, you must have had rheostats of greater capacity than 25 amperes since you could not operate on a ground wire smaller than No. 6, which is good for 65 amperes of current. If you will tell me the rated capacity, in amperes, of those rheostats I will tell you just what you were getting. You could ground to the ground if you went deep enough to get good contact with moist earth and had your ground contact of large size or very deep, but to carry projection current the ground would, you will realize, have to be an extraordinarily good one, otherwise there would be heating and the earth adjacent to the contact would heat and dry out and then there would be no current carrying medium left, since dry ground is not a good conductor. Have I made that plain? The necessity for No. 6 wire would indicate heavy current flow, or possibly your machine was located a considerable distance from the track, in which case it would require heavy wire to make up for line drop. As you do not say whether surrent is A. C. or D. C., I cannot say whether or no I can suggest a "better method." Have put you in touch with a man who will go into details with you and fix you up if any one can.

Setting Carbons, Sprocket Holes Show.—Charlestown, W. Va., writes saying that the sprocket holes show on right-hand side of picture at times. Says machine is a new one and service is 20 to 30-day stuff. Asks why blue spot shows in center of picture and if setting carbons different would reduce the noise. Is working on A. C. 110-volt 60-cycle current, using a transformer.

With a narrow, steel straightedge see if your top and intermittent sprockets and gate idlers are all in line with the aperture. That is to say, see that none of them set to one side in relation to the aperture. Also see if the tension springs bear squarely on the tracks. Possibly one spring sets to one side and occasionally pushes the film over a trifle. Sometimes the showing of sprocket holes is the fault of the camera that took the original picture or the printing machine that made the positive. But this only occurs semi-occasionally, whereas I understand your trouble happens quite frequently. To test the alignment make a steel straightedge half an inch or so wide. An old corset steel will do if it is perfectly straight on one edge. Test it on a square or machinist's rule. If your sprockets or idlers are out of line, line them up. If your tension springs don't bear squarely on the tracks make them do so. As regards the spot in your curtain, it may be due to any one of several things. First try moving your lamphouse backwards and forwards as far as it will go. If that don't take it out see to it that the tip of your lower carbon isn't burning up in front of the crater on the upper carbon; if it is then the spot is doubtless merely the shadow caused by the tip of the lower carbon which is set too far ahead. Move it back just a trifle. If this is not the cause then try two 7½-inch condensing lenses. In your sketch the carbons are set all right but the lamp sets straight up and down. If you are actually using it that way and get good light from it you can do more than I could. Angle your lamp exactly the same as for D. C. Possibly you might reduce the noise by a different carbon set, but it would be at the expense of light. I would recommend you to get a copy of The Moving Picture World of August 7, 1909, in which is contained (page 187) illustrations of different carbon sets, both A. C. and D. C., price 10 cents.

Condenser Breakage—Friction in Head.—F. R. C., Mass., writes a long letter, the gist of which is that the Mullen coil must be wound for the cycle current it is to be used on. That with the Power's round ring condenser mount the back lens should be left very loose, ring should not be tightened up too much, plenty of ventilation in condenser casing, door of lamphouse not to be opened too soon after shutting off light and fan in operating room to be shut off whenever lamphouse door is opened (he says fan must "not" be shut off, but I take it that is an error). Also wants to know if it is possible that a Power's No. 5 will, or can, suddenly bind up and stop and cannot be started for an hour. Claims his No. 5 bound up suddenly and he had to loosen the geneva movement before he could run.

As to the Mullen coil, it is quite possible F. R. C. is correct. I am not an authority on them, except that choke coils are a bad form of resistance. They set up reactance in the circuit, which results in a large amount of current at a low power factor being taken from the system. There are other objectionable features also. As to the facts set forth by F. R. C. relating to condensers, will say that they have been published by the writer in these columns many times in the past two years. The points he makes are all correct. As to the binding of the Power's No. 5, if the star and cam be set close when cold there is some danger of excessive friction when they become warm through the combined influence of friction and the heat of the spot. If poor oil be used or the geneva movement be allowed to get dry it might, under those circumstances, stick, or at least pull very hard. I never knew of one sticking in the way F. R. C. has described. He may not know it, but the editor of this column is inspector at the Power's factory and he sets the genevas of the No. 5 just a trifle loose for the above reasons. Lack of lubrication would make the automatic governor of Type B, No. 5, pull very hard, but it would hardly stick fast. There are none of the bearings of the No. 5 made close enough that they would be likely to stick from lack of lubrication; moreover, when a shaft sticks in its bearings you usually don't turn it in an hour, or ten of them. It is stuck for good, usually; there are exceptions, of course. F. R. C. got his letter a trifle mixed this time, but I think I got at about what he had in mind.

Size of Picture.—Billings, Mont., writes asking what size of picture would be advisable in a small house, with 50-foot throw; also whether large or small picture has any effect on the flickering.

Regarding the size of picture, I would have to know just what you mean by a small house. I may say, however, that a 10 by 12 picture is usually accepted as life size, from the fact that more figures appear life size than in any other size picture projected. It is very suitable for a small house. The size of the picture makes no difference as regards the amount of flickering. This is about the only advice I can give you without knowing the exact size of house, height of ceiling, etc.

ANOTHER SPLENDID LETTER FROM MR. YOUNG, OF CHICAGO.

Chicago, Ill., May 5, 1910.

Mr. F. H. Richardson:

Dear Sir—On looking through my Moving Picture World for April 30 I was very pleasantly surprised to see my letter containing my solution of the "Wilkesbarre Problem" in print, and also your very kind words of commendation introducing it. Please accept my sincere and respectful thanks for your encouragement.

Since writing that letter I have enrolled for the course in operating at the Coyne Trade School of this city. It seems to be the only avenue open in Chicago to learn moving picture operating, though I have not as yet attended it long enough to really judge of the quality of the course it offers.

The only real trouble I have had since beginning my course was with the question that has had so much discussion in The World—volt drop, and especially the voltage at the arc. I have worked very hard at it to solve it, and found a statement in my old high school physics text book which rendered matters somewhat clearer to me. Briefly, it is an explanation of Ohm's law, applied to a part of a circuit. The explanation in the text book began with the statement that "the difference of potential in any part of a circuit, is equal to the current flowing through the circuit, multiplied by the resistance of that part of the circuit"—practically Ohm's law. Working with this as a basis, I have studied out the matter in the following wise:

The difference of potential in any given part of a circuit is equal to the product of the current flowing through the circuit, multiplied by the resistance on that part of the circuit. The parts of a circuit may be thought of as being joined in series (they actually are) with their resistances and also their differences of potential added together respectively to form the total resistance and the total difference of potential of the circuit. (In this connection I am using the word circuit somewhat loosely, to refer to that portion of the complete circuit between the line terminals.) Hence, the difference of potential in the remaining part of the circuit is equal to the total difference of potential minus the difference of potential in the given part of the circuit.

Now, to apply this to the arc in a projector. Let a-b-c-d-e-f represent the principal points in a moving picture arc circuit; a and f the line terminal, b-c the rheostat, d-e the arc. The connections between these parts of the circuit are so short, and of such heavy wire, that their resistance may be neglected. Suppose the following to be the data of an arc light: Line pressure 110 volts, resistance b-c (rheostat) 2 ohms, resistance d-e (arc) 1 1-7 ohms, current 35 amperes. Since the resistance of b-c is 2 ohms, and the current 35 amperes, the difference of potential between its terminals is 70 volts, by Ohm's law, $E = CR$. Since the resistance of the arc is 1 1-7 ohm, and the current 35 amperes, by the same law, the difference of potential between its poles must be 40 volts (the voltage across the arc). Now, since the relation of the arc to the rheostat is a series connection, their resistances and also their differences of potential may be added together to obtain the total resistance and difference of potential of the circuit a-f; the correct resistance, 3 1-7 ohms, to allow 35 amperes to flow at a pressure of 110 volts.

I do not know if the foregoing statement will be clear to you, but it seems plausible to me, and has convinced me that the introduction of the rheostat into the circuit does change the voltage at the arc, by reducing the amount of current flowing through it while its resistance remains nearly constant. I have not used the word "absorb" in referring to what happens to the 70 volts difference of potential between the terminals of the rheostat, as I do not believe it to be the correct word, but I cannot suggest a better. If the voltage were "absorbed" there would be nothing on the negative wire, which is utterly fallacious, as the current is the same in all parts of the circuit. (That is, the arc light circuit under consideration, which is only a part of the entire circuit, and may be a shunt to many other parts of the circuit.)

Also, in view of the foregoing way to look at the relation of the rheostat to the arc, it is readily seen that it makes no difference where the rheostat is connected, since the introduction of the resistance in any part of the circuit lowers the current flow of the circuit, and lowers the difference of potential of the other parts of the circuit.

Moreover, in studying this question, I struck a rather unusual paradox, in that the negative pole of the arc may be considered positive to the positive pole. The current passing from the negative pole to the source of E. M. F. is always of positive polarity to a point farther away from this pole, and at no point is its polarity reversed, not even in the source of E. M. F. or generator. Hence there is another difference of potential at the arc, from the negative pole to the generator through the line (positive) wire and the rheostat to the positive pole of the arc. This difference of potential is of course very high, working through an enormous resistance, and would be very difficult to measure without knowing the resistance of the entire circuit, including the generator, which would be indeed difficult to measure.

I was much interested some time ago in your article on the size of the picture rather than the throw, affecting its brilliancy. Curiously enough, that same thought crossed my mind the week before your article was published, and I arrived at the same conclusion as you; so I was very much pleased to have my ideas on the subject confirmed.

CHARLES YOUNG.

I thought I had "sworn off" on that voltage proposition but so able a letter as the foregoing must have space. Also I have a most excellent one from Mr. Paul Patrick, Wadesboro, N. C. It is most amusing, however, to watch you fellows scurry around and practically prove that I am right. Brother Young naively admits that the current is the same in all parts of the circuit. Well, if that is true, then the voltage must also be the same! It would require a negative wire of great size to carry the current at low voltage, assuming it to be the same as on the positive. This, however, Neighbor Young, is impossible since most certainly there has been power consumed. Taking steam as an analogy, it is entirely the pressure that is expended, but the steam is thrown into the open air. There is no return pipe nor is any needed. But in the case of electricity if the pressure is dissipated, absorbed, used or any other old thing, what becomes of the current and what is the use of a negative wire? That is what I want to know. I tell you, gentlemen, there is something there which I don't even pretend to understand. You, on the other hand, or some of you at least, do pretend to understand it, but I'm blessed if I don't think you are trotting around a ring. Most of you say "absorbed" isn't the word and "dissipated" isn't either! Then what the Samuel Hill is the word? Understand, I'm not criticising. I have absolutely no right to. Friend Young's letter is well written, it evidences deep study by a trained mind, but, after all, it comes back to the old proposition, viz.: if the rheostat and arc together do away with, use up, dissipate, absorb or cause a drop of the entire potential, how in the name of the ancient kings of Egypt do you figure that there is anything of any kind whatsoever left?

THE AMERICAN KINOGRAPH COMPANY.

A Notable New Business.

One of the greatest surprises in the moving picture field recently, and which we were the first to make public in these pages last week, was the formation of the American Kinograph Company, with premises at 124 East 25th street, New York City, recently vacated by Messrs. Gaumont. The American Kinograph Company may be said to step into the position successively vacated by the International Projecting and Producing Company, and the Film Importer and Trading Company. These concerns were just large importing houses handling the pictures of selected lists of European makers. The fate of these concerns is so recent that further reference to them is unnecessary.

The American Kinograph Company therefore makes its appearance at an opportune moment. It has the experience and the failures of its predecessors to profit by, and we know that due advantage will be taken of that fact. To begin with, in Europe the English and Continental agencies have been secured by H. V. Browne, of London, who, by personal knowledge and repute, we know to occupy a highly successful, respected and authoritative position in the English film trade. Mr. Browne is a good man of business, with large interests in various departments of the English moving picture industry. Bringing to bear the best business qualities he has succeeded in obtaining for this market control of fourteen English, French, German and native agencies—as was described in this paper last week, "the pick of the European market."

We have seen many of these pictures already, and our readers may take our assurance that in photography and dramatic qualities they are well suited for the American moving picture theater.

The General Manager of the American Kinograph Company in New York is G. A. Magie, a gentleman well qualified, both commercially and mentally, to assume that responsible position. Mr. Magie deserves a cordial welcome into this field and we hereby extend it to him, because as we have said over and over again in these pages, and also by word of mouth, the moving picture industry requires strengthening by the proper kind of personalities. That is to say, by shrewd business men with head and proper principles of doing business. It is no use relying for the stability of a new business like the moving picture industry upon the irresponsible and unprincipled amongst the community.

The moving picture has too long been the sport of the ignorant and dishonest. We want to drive those people out of the business; we want to welcome into it, or rather to get into it, men of the type of Mr. Magie, who will, in the current location, give everybody a square deal.

The American Kinograph Company will shortly be releasing their pictures. They have secured the services of Mr. Russell, formerly of the Film Import and Trading Company, who is popular in the trade. We recommend our readers on the Independent side to get into touch with this company, for we are sure that they will find they have an excellent pick of high-class European-made pictures.

SCENE FROM "THE CLIFF DWELLERS" (KALEM).

THE CLIFF DWELLERS.

This picture is a concrete illustration of the care and trouble taken by professional film manufacturers in the preparation of their releases. It will be observed that the subject is an Indian one of a legendary character. The Kalem Company have left nothing to chance in the archeology of the subject. It is too often the case nowadays that in Western pictures and also in historical pictures, inaccuracies and anachronisms occur. The Kalem Company have prevented this by preparing the costumes and scenes of the pictures from plates and drawings in the possession of the American Museum of Natural History. Their scenic artist and property man visited the Museum several times and made drawings of the clubs, cooking vessels, etc., now owned by the authorities of the Museum.

We think the care which the Kalem Company have taken to make this picture accurate as well as pictorial and dramatic, deserves a warm word of acknowledgment.

THE FIRST BORN.

A Selig Feature Film for Early Release.

During the summer of 1897, at the Alcazar Theater, San Francisco, a Chinese tragedy in two scenes was presented to the patrons of that playhouse. The theater was supplied with a stock company of the usual grade of excellence found in such organizations, except that in San Francisco, owing to the permanency of the stock system, beginning with the McCullough-Barrett Company, the players of California, especially in character roles, are better trained and the audiences more dramatically keen than in any other city of the United States, not excepting the theatrical Mecca, New York City.

In the cheapest theater of San Francisco, bizarre and colorful character bits are often capitally done; a Chinaman, a Japanese, a Hawaiian, a Samoan, a Filipino, and Mexican, are presented with a degree of skill that would call for a special write-up if acted on Broadway.

Henry Benrino, American actor of nationalities, whose "Carp Fisher" in "The Darling of the Gods" earned for him the highest praise from Prince Fushina of Japan, was a member of the Alcazar at the time of "The First Born" presentation. Perhaps the finest effort in the Chinese play was presented by this actor. George Osborn, the best actor of his time in Western types, American, Mexican or Indian, was also a member. George Foster Plat, director of modern plays for the New Theater, was another, and Miss May Buckley, one of the most charming personalities of the American stage, headed the female roster of the company.

Apart from a feeling of amused curiosity as to what the author would do with Chinamen on the stage, for it leaked out, owing to the rehearsals, that no attempt would be made to slapstick or caricature the race, San Francisco remained placid. This city seems to know the Chinese character as she seems to know and read aright the character of all races that enter her golden portals. No community in the Western Hemisphere is so cosmopolitan, no citizen is more modern and human.

"Adios mio Francisco,
The queen of a sun blest land.
Sea thrones in a realm of Beauty,
Free one! of the heart and hand."

Disgusted with the dull and vulgar atrocity offered in cheap melodrama and vaudeville, known as the Chink Chink Chinaman, San Francisco began to wonder a trifle what the modest Alcazar company would do with serious Chinamen. The opening night arrived with hardly a fair house, for the theater at this period was struggling for existence, heroically managed by Frederick Belasco, a brother of the famous dramatist.

When the curtain arose, there wasn't a critic in the house; they had more important plays to attend to. Ashton Steven, now of the "Chicago American," was reviewing a musical play at the Tivoli. Alice Rix was at the Baldwin Theater. Peter Robinson, the dean of Western critics, just wandered in during the last scene. He reserved his judgment in the Tuesday morning "Chronicle" until he could find time during the week to see the play entire. Well, he came, and the others came; they pronounced the play not only a success, but a unique effort in dramatic construction and dialogue. It ran to crowded business at the Alcazar for sixteen weeks, the longest run in the theatrical history of the Coast up to that time.

At the finish of this engagement, it was taken to New York under the joint management of David Belasco and Charles Frohman, where other companies were formed and sent on tour, while the original company was taken to London, where it received eleven curtain calls after the first act and thirteen at the end of the last.

The story of the tragedy is as follows: Man Lo Yek, a Chinese merchant, living in the Chinese quarter of San Francisco, entices from her home, husband and only child, Chan Lee, the wife of Chan Wang. To make room in his household for Chan Lee, Man Low Yek disposes of a slave girl, Lorey Tsing, whom he had brought from the province of Chi Li or northern China, to a Chinese gambling house keeper. Man Low Yek spirits Chan Lee out of the city to avoid trouble with Chan Wang or the Tee Yup Tong, of which Chan Wang, the husband, is a highbinder. As the latter does not seem to treat the matter as a case for vengeance, Man Low Yek brings Chan Lee back to the city and installs her in his dwelling over his provision and Chinese notion store.

Chan Lee pines for her son, Chan Toy, a laughing, mischievous urchin, six years old. Chan Wang lavishly cares for his only son, Chan Toy. The great love of the Chinese race is filial devotion and not the attachment of marriage. The loves of men and women are secondary to the love of the parent for the male child, especially the first born.

Chan Lee steals her boy. The frantic father searches in the Chinese quarter, holding by the wrist the Ama or nurse, whose life is forfeited if the boy is not found. Chan Wang is told that the child is with its mother in Man Low Yek's house. He rushes up the stairs of the house, where a struggle takes place in which the boy is accidentally killed. The grief crazed father carries the body of his boy to the street, where he in Chinese fashion wails over it and calls upon the spirits to restore it to life. Chan Lee, the mother, follows after. Chan Wang is prevented from killing by a member of his Tong. He calls down vengeance on Man Low Yek, which vengeance he executes in a Chinese alleyway a few days after the funeral of Chan Toy.

THE STORY OF ESTHER.

[To be released in June by George Kleine.]

The demand for high-class Biblical productions is a surprise to the men who first introduced this style of drama. There have been numerous fine productions placed before the people since the Passion Play films proved the drawing power of religious subjects. George Kleine has recently imported several remarkable features of this nature, and now announces for about the middle of June another of even greater pretensions. "The Story of Esther" is filled with incidents of romance and is rich in opportunities for the display of taste in art and strength in dramatic production.

King Ahasuerus, who is now generally understood to have been Xerxes, and who ruled over India and its provinces about B. C. 521, is recorded to have cast aside his wife and directs that it be heralded throughout his domain that he is in search of a new spouse. He issues instructions to have brought before him for his approval the most beautiful young girls of all his lands. Accordingly, the maidens are led to the palace, and we see them being sumptuously gowned and bejeweled before being brought into the presence of his Majesty. Among the number, the King is greatly impressed by the beauty and grace of a handsome young Jewish girl. This one is Esther, who was adopted by her uncle, Mordecai, and by him brought to the palace of the King. Esther's beauty surpasses that of all the others and she is crowned Queen by Ahasuerus. Mordecai is appointed to sit at the King's gateway.

Among the King's favorites, Haman is supreme. He soon becomes violently jealous of Mordecai and plans his destruction. As Mordecai is a Jew, Haman makes preparations to massacre the entire race and thereby complete his revenge on Mordecai.

About this time the King decides to make a review of his Annals and to his amazement finds no record there of the good deed of Mordecai, whereupon Haman is ordered to give royal honors to Mordecai. This only serves to increase the jealousy of Haman.

Through the gracious intercession of Esther, Mordecai soon has another and greater victory over Haman. As the time for the massacre of the Israelites approaches, Esther, who has been told all by her uncle, Mordecai, invites Haman to dine with her and the King at the palace. During the feast she discloses the fact that she is a Jewess and declares that all those who are enemies of the Jews are her enemies, and therefore enemies of the King, and are not worthy of his favor—whereupon the King, who has been informed of the full facts, orders Haman delivered up to the guards and has him hanged on the very gallows Haman has designed for Mordecai.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The pictures showing the "go" between Ad. Wolgast and Battling Nelson, which are owned and controlled by B. E. E. Clements and Sid. Hester, continue to be of great interest among exhibitors and more so to the many crowded houses where these pictures are being shown. As a special attraction in all amusement enterprises they show managers right and left that the real thing in pictures is something exciting and interesting. These pictures are popular because the scenes presented are scenes that can not be witnessed in real life without incurring great expense, as but few States in the Union to-day permit prize fights to be pulled off. Specially equipped shows are being sent out daily from Chicago by Mr. Clements carrying complete layout for a vivid exhibition of the greatest fight pictures ever put before the public eye.

Mr. Clements will soon spring his ',No. 3" surprise on the fight loving public and a real hit is looked forward to by all those interested in this class of sporting events.

It is remarkable to note the interest taken by slide makers and film manufacturers in topical events that take place during the year. The latest craze of the glass dazzlers is the coming fight between James J. Jeffries and Jack Johnson, who will meet on July 4 to determine which is oblivion, black or white. "To be or not to be, that is the question." Probably the most authentic slides of this great sporting event are those that are being manufactured by the Cosmopolitan Slide Makers. These slides tell the story in pictorial form from the signing of articles, through the training camps, and give a ringside glance into the ropes showing both these two giants, representing two types of humanity, will look ready for battle on the rosy tint of the day on which the United States will celebrate its independence. The Cosmopolitan Slide Makers are putting out some fine, highly colored pictures on this subject that are true to life and bid fair to cause some little flutter in the circle of slide manufacturers, and bring success to the originators of the idea.

Mr. B. E. Clements, who together with his partner, Sid. Hester, control the output of the Great Western Film Mfg. Co. of San Francisco, who have startled the film world by the marvelous animated pictures of the greatest fighting events in the sporting world to-day, has taken offices at Room 1201, Schiller Building, which is recognized as the theatrical center of Chicago. From these offices Mr. Clements directs the output of films for the Middle West and supervises the Eastern workings which covers the territory as into Canada. Mr. Clements is ably assisted by a competent staff, made up of real live hustling workers.

CLARENCE J. PERFITT

"The Unchanging Sea" (Biograph).—Kingsley's beautiful and strangely realistic poem, "The Three Fishers," forms the basis of this film, photographed in a fishing village on the coast of Southern California. It graphically illustrates the sentiment of the poem, showing the fishers sailing away while the women watch and weep, then the wreck and the loss of life, the memory of the only saved one a blank, the mourning of his wife, and all the attendant scenes. Ah, well, why recount them? One's heart can tell the story, yet he does come sailing back, and there is his faithful wife waiting for him, and his daughter going to her wedding. Then the years roll back and the happy family reunited once more enjoys the happiness of life. A simple story, told with rarely sympathetic dramatic earnestness, with a pathos that reaches deep down into the heart, deeply touching the emotions. The pictorial qualities are rarely picturesque and the technical qualities are beyond reproach.

"The Miner's Sweetheart" (Lubin).—The touch of human nature in this picture, the impulse of love for a woman which sends men out to work and dare is so clearly depicted and its wonderful power is so strongly portrayed that one's sympathies are aroused and probably the most callous and indifferent person in the audience will sympathize with the young man in his struggle. And then when he does strike the pay streak, even though he was hurt in the blast, they all rejoice with him. It is one of those pictures possessing a subtle power that holds one's sympathies throughout the length. The scenes at the mine are realistic and there is a strength and earnestness about it all which appeals irresistibly to all alike.

"The Debt Repaid" (Melies).—An Indian picture representing so realistically that one shudders involuntarily in watching it, the Indian warfare which raged on the frontiers all the time this country was in the process of settlement. Without assuming to discuss the abstract question of right or wrong which entered into the struggle, one must admit that it existed and that bloody fights, like the one here represented, and worse, occurred over and over again. The girl was saved in this instance, but the actual cases where this was true were too few to be considered. Perhaps a picture like this will afford some impression of what it really cost to settle this country, of the continuous warfare and the daily struggle which menaced every settler's home. Well, it is passed, but a graphic glance backward, such as this picture permits, has its uses and a production of this sort is to be commended.

"Papinta" (Selig).—A story of love and jealousy with a lively elopement and marriage and the escape of the fleeing pair through the aid of a friendly surveyor. The scene is set in Mexico and is made picturesque and dramatic. The story is simple, but lively, and one rejoices with the lovers as they escape.

"Customs of the Buddhists in India" (Pathe).—The first scene shows the magnificent Buddhist temple at Kandy, with natives at prayer, showing clearly their attitudes of supplication and devotion. The conclusion is a series of clear and comprehensive views of the sacred elephants disporting themselves in different ways. The film is instructive because it brings vividly to Western eyes the strange customs which obtain among the devotees of the Buddhist faith, and gives accurate information of some of their peculiar customs.

"A Romantic Young Lady" (Pathe).—The girl wanted some one capable of performing deeds worthy of the great Arsene Lupin, and she gets him. Max succeeds in acquiring a supper for the party upon terms difficult to conceive, yet they worked out satisfactorily in this instance. It is to be hoped, for the sake of unsuspecting waiters, that the scheme which worked so successfully this time will not become general. It might cause a commotion in the ranks of restaurant owners.

"The Egret Hunter" (Kalem).—Whatever might have been the purpose of this film, it should have the effect of influencing women to wear no more egrets on their hats. If it exerts an influence in that direction it will perform a useful service and possibly will accomplish more than its makers really intended. Anything that tends to reduce the slaughter of birds of any sort performs a public service of importance, and this film should do that. The technical work is excellent and many of the scenes are picturesque.

"One of the Finest" (Vitagraph).—A big story of a big policeman, with a big heart, a member of the New York force, who performs a kind service and is liberally rewarded therefor. It is one of those stories that appeals directly to the heart and develops and holds the interest of the audience from beginning to end. Filled with dramatic situations of which the players have taken full advantage, the film will excite interest in anyone who has a spark of humanity and sympathy left in him. It is well worth seeing. Some of the accessory characters are types with which few outside of the big cities are familiar, and these touches, intensely human in their influence, add much to the strength of the film. It is a success and deserves more than the regular one day's run.

"The Senator and the Suffragette" (Edison).—A snappy comedy by E. W. Townsend, who has used the present agitation for woman's suffrage around which to build a series of amusing incidents. The suffragettes attempt to coerce a senator, and they succeed, too, though in doing it they resort to a subterfuge which completely surprises the senator and secures his co-operation, even though he originally intended doing nothing of the sort. There are some hearty laughs concealed in this and it is sure to leave any audience in rare good humor.

"Love and Marriage in Poster Land" (Edison).—A unique and altogether delightful comedy, representing two posters stepping from the billboard and securing what they want by the power of love alone. The magic creative power of love is sufficient to insure their marital happiness, as illustrated in the picture. It is an unusually happy combination of fun, clear photography and the perfection of mystifying trick work. The picture will be sure to please, since it represents an unusually strong development of what is best in motion picture work.

"The Sheriff's Sacrifice" (Essanay).—A Western picture full of action and developing some strongly human traits of character. The one novelty is the introduction of a Kodak in the hands of a child, the negative from which clearly establishes the guilt of a certain gambler in a hold-up. When the sheriff secures the evidence he allows the man to go free, and even contributes money to put him on his feet because of a girl in the case. It is a type of sacrifice which is unquestionably open to serious objections. Yet it seems so human, and so like a man whose blood runs red, that the fault can be condoned, even though it appears to be a dangerous precedent. Altogether the film has a reasonably strong appeal on the human side, and should be popular with those whose humanity has not sunk to a low ebb.

"Call of the Forest" (Gaumont).—A dramatic picture from the Gaumont studio, rich in the suggestion of strong passion, and strengthened by the picturesque setting. As a drama it offers an interesting story, told in vivid action by capable players. As a picture it is a successful product of the skill of the operator and printer. It should interest any audience that sees it.

"Gigantic Waves" (Gaumont).—Another of the successful ocean pictures which have been brought to a high degree of perfection by this house. So well is the technical work done in this instance that one can almost imagine that the huge waves are going to roll off the screen and over the audience. The work has been done with careful attention to details and full appreciation of the requirements of the picture. It is a succesful reproduction of strongly dramatic natural scenery.

"The Cherries" (Pathe).—A light drama which will attract by its well-balanced acting and its excellent photographic quality. It is a good picture, though not as strong as many that come from this studio. Perhaps such a film is appreciated quite as much as the stronger ones, albeit in a different way. The same excellence in acting and technical work characterize this film that make others popular, and it affords a bit of entertainment.

"Medium Wanted as a Son-in-Law" (Pathe).—A bit of humor, based upon a crank father's supposed desire to secure a medium to assist in his researches. He offers his daughter to any such, whereupon the spirited girl runs away with her lover and marries him. Together they concoct a scheme to deceive the father. It all ends by the young couple getting the father's blessing in quite the conventional manner.

"Mario's Swan Song" (Vitagraph).—Death is not a subject upon which one dwells with any degree of satisfaction. And this film suffers because the author permitted the child violinist to die from the effects of the automobile accident, instead of restoring him to health to become a great musician under the patronage of his new found friend. The dramatic power of the picture is not questioned. Indeed, it makes too strong an impression; but the requirements of art did not decree the child's death. Possibly this faithfully depicts the way of the world, but there is a great deal of unalloyed satisfaction in seeing such unfortunates triumph over fate and develop into important personages. This film would be improved for a greater proportion of those who see it by changing its ending to conform to this idea. And it could be easily done; nor would it mar the remainder of the story in the least.

"Love Among the Roses" (Biograph).—"What is love?' may well be asked after seeing this picture. Yet one might be disposed to agree with the turn affairs finally took. Whether it was intended as a species of criticism of marriages of convenience, or whether it worked out that way in the telling, is a question which sets one pondering. It would seem perfectly natural for the lord and lady to wed. Such marriages of convenience have been consummated since the dawn of history. The gardener and lacemaker but followed the example of others better situated than themselves. Many have done the same thing before under similar circumstances. But here fate, or some other equally perverse influence, intervenes and both the lord and lady fall in love, but not with each other. Eventually the picture works out for the best good of all. The chief interest in this picture is in the sociological questions involved, and the long vista of speculation which opens ahead of one as the actors tell their story.

"Pete Wants a Job" (Pathe).—As a last resort against starvation Pete is forced to seek for a job. He tries numerous positions, but when he goes to leading strikes he succeeds. Within a year he becomes a leading politician and a government minister. This may be a life history. It may be merely a sly hit at politics, but whatever it is those who understand how politics is conducted will appreciate the force of the allusion. One may hope it will not furnish a suggestion for anyone else.

"Villainy Defeated" (Pathe).—Circumstantial evidence was never more clearly depicted than in this picture. Because a girl was found insensible and apparently dead with two buttons from her lover's coat in her hand the lover is arrested, though he didn't know the buttons were gone, much less that the girl had been pushed from a cliff by a jealous rival. The picture is almost startling in this phase and may well set one thinking seriously about the possibilities in situations of this kind.

"Seven Days" (Selig).—A comedy based upon the desire of families to get into the country which was frustrated by the men getting shut up for disorderly conduct. The telegrams that went back were characteristic and the situations are funny. The picture is so good that one wants to see it again.

"Kidd's Treasure" (Lubin).—A farce based upon the all but uncontrollable belief that somewhere Capt. Kidd has buried untold treasure. Children bury their treasures and make a rough map of the locality. When some fishermen find it they are crazy over the possibility of untold riches. That is the story and it is worked out by the Lubin players in a way to make the most of the opportunities offered.

"Rastus in Zululand" (Lubin).—The story of a lazy colored man's dream. In it he goes to Zululand, where he is captured by the savages and turns the tables by capturing the affections of the chief's daughter. Like others under similar circumstances, he prefers death to matrimony and escapes the execution of the sentence by waking up. It is a roaring farce, full of action and brimming over with a rough species of humor that keeps the audience laughing most of the time.

"The Shriners' Pilgrimage to New Orleans" (Selig).—Unquestionably one of the best films ever made of a public demonstration. These are difficult propositions for operators and when one succeeds as admirably as this one has done he is entitled to all the praise the public can give. Preservation of great gatherings of this character is a worthy public work. Newspapers may describe and illustrate them, but there is something in the animated picture which approaches the actual scene, and that will be remembered, even as the original is remembered by those fortunate enough to see it, or be a part of it. This is a successful film of its kind, and one every Shriner and all his friends would profit by seeing.

"The Little Vagrant" (Gaumont).—Apparently the title of this film is wrong. A vagrant is one who wanders from place to place, living without visible means of support. But here is the child of the forest selling chickweed to feed to birds. Surely he should not be called a vagrant. Then when he develops strong evidences of bravery further along in the story there is all the more reason for revising the title. Make it the little salesman, or something more nearly expressing the actual conditions. There are some dramatic scenes and the story ends pleasantly, with the child of the woods in good hands. His efforts to make a living by selling chickweed are no longer necessary.

"The Sea of Clouds" (Gaumont).—A novel experience for most people in the average audience. A photograph taken above the clouds, and showing the rolling masses of silver piled in huge heaps and rolling before the wind, shutting out the view of the world below. The picture was made in the high mountains near Grenoble, France, but the same scenes are repeated wherever high mountains abound, which enable one to get above the swirling mists. The picturesque climb is faithfully depicted, with the peeps through the misty veil showing here and there interesting views. It is a remarkable and rarely satisfying picture, representing the best development of photographic art.

"The Three Wishes" (Vitagraph).—A quaint, semi-humorous tale, based upon the old fairy story of the three wishes. The scene is laid in the Black Forest, and a party of gnomes, dissatisfied with their brew, with a good fairy, are the principal characters. They use the wishes wisely, and even though their chief brewer fails to reproduce the nectar-like fluid they find in the bottle, they still have one wish left, and sensibly use it to secure a sufficient supply of the wonderful drink. Then peace and jollity reign ever after.

"History Repeats Itself" (Edison).—A dainty little story by Carolyn Wells, which is strengthened by a touch of heart interest. Two lovers are surprised when indulging in their first kiss by the girl's mother, but they speedily prove to her that it is but a repetition of her own love romance, thus convincing her that history indeed repeats itself. It is one of those pretty little tales, not especially strong, but filled with so much actual human interest that everyone is pleased with it. The story is charmingly acted and admirably photographed.

"The Stuff that Americans Are Made Of" (Edison).—Here is one of those stirring pictures that makes one realize that heroism exists all around one. It only requires the right situation to bring it out. Here is a little boy, cautioned by his parents to care for his sister, holding two burglars captive for hours at the muzzle of an unloaded gun. It is such mettle as this that rouses one's pride, and makes him feel that life is, after all, well worth living. In two places where the writer has seen this picture it took the audience captive as well as the burglars. The acting could hardly be better. The little chap does his part as though it were merely a part of the day's work, and holding burglars at bay was quite the thing to do. The photography is satisfactory, also.

"He Stubs His Toe" (Essanay).—A novel comedy, based upon what occurs sometimes when people jump at conclusions. Because a girl saw her friend's lover limp and enter an artificial limb store she assumes that he has a cork leg and devises a plan to prove it. The unfortunate lover is furiously jabbed with a hat pin in the hands of his fiance's small brother, and the howl of pain that follows dispels any doubt regarding his physical equipment. But even though it was a scurvy trick, all is made good, and the friends get on as before. It is one of those unusual comedies that are certain to attract attention because it is so much out of the ordinary.

"A Quiet Boarding House" (Essanay).—Here is what may be termed vociferous fun. The quiet boarding house becomes the residence of the most uncanny lot of sights and sounds the poor countryman has ever seen. If any sort of noise, or means of disturbance has been left out of the list it is safe to say the producers will insert it upon request, since it is almost certain that they would not want to leave anything out that could be used in creating a ruction for the countryman. It is funny, very funny, even though it has a bit of a taste of rough-house in its making. The action is so lively that one scarcely has time to consider one thing before another appears, and along with Silas the audience is disposed to wonder what next.

"In the Dark Valley" (Kalem).—A picture that holds one almost enthralled by the horror it suggests. It purports to be a reproduction of the awful Wyoming Valley massacre, and the scenes are bad enough without the play of the imagination. But that helps to make it worse, and the audience lives over again the scenes through which the victims of the massacre passed. One shudders again and again, and even while admitting the fascination of the picture one is glad when it is finished and something else appears, even though it may be an indifferent vaudeville act. This is not a criticism of the picture. It is a tribute. When a film carries such an influence one cannot question its strength.

"Cleopatra" (Pathe).—"The dark-eyed sorceress of the Nile," as some poet has called her, Cleopatra, has been considered through the ages as the embodiment of luxurious and voluptuous beauty in women. The various scenes are magnificently set and beautifully photographed, and follow closely the printed descriptions of the queen and her court. It is needless to repeat the story. All the world knows of Cleopatra and Marc Antony, of their tragic death when the legions of Octavius Caesar were sweeping all before them. They both preferred death to humiliation, in quite the fashion of that age and time. The film adequately reproduces the scenes as they have been many times pictured by different writers, and one discovers upon looking at the film a reproduction of what his own imagination has pictured regarding that marvelous age and the personages who are delineated upon the pages of history. It is one of the most satisfactory films of this sort the Pathes have ever produced, and will be a powerful influence in strengthening previous conceptions of the marvelously beautiful queen and her rough soldier lover.

"Roosevelt in Cairo" (Urban).—A scenic picture which will be popular in America because it illustrates Ex-President Roosevelt's reception in Cairo, what he did, where he went and the crowds that followed. The photography was admirably done from desirable vantage points, and one can obtain an accurate impression of Cairo upon that great day. Even the imperturbable East sometimes turns out en masse to see a personage of importance, quite like the more excitable and enthusiastic West.

"Purged by Fire" (Urban).—A dramatic film of quality, well acted and well photographed. The pictorial qualities of the Urban films are well worth serious study, and this one is no exception. The Urban operators have acquired a knack of doing their work, which unquestionably sets a very high standard indeed, and deserves a great degree of credit for its excellence. Even the dramatic films maintain this same high standard, adding materially to the attractiveness of the pictures.

"The Stolen Fortune" (Essanay).—A lively story, well told which not only serves to show the sort of stuff in two young people, but affords opportunity for some good comedy in the appearance of a number of Max Iluskis in response to an advertisement regarding a fortune. It was hard to give up both sweetheart and fortune too, but the young man is equal to the emergency and goes about it in the right way. Then the denouement. The girl comes back of her own accord and refuses to break the engagement for any such reason. While the young man is sealing this compact in the proper way he is informed that the fortune is his, too. What better combination of fortuitous circumstances could one wish than this with which to close a picture? It leaves the audience in rare good humor.

"Chief Blackfoot's Vindication" (Kalem).—An Indian picture of merit, graphically depicting the vindication of Chief Blackfoot, and displaying what might be termed some of the better traits in Indian character, for Indians have good traits. These pictures from the Kalem studio are not only interesting studies of bits of Indian life, they perform a much belated public service in calling attention to some of the good qualities which Indians, in common with other men, possess in some degree. Much of accurate historical value is included in the representation of the manners and customs, the clothing and other personal characteristics of Indians. The public is no longer satisfied with white men who attempt to represent Indian life. The actors must be real Indians and the acting thus become exceedingly realistic. This represents the change in the ideas of the public and the methods of the producing companies. It all tends toward better pictures and indicates a higher appreciation of the standard of excellence which obtains in practically all picture production.

"The Witch of the Ruins" (Pathe).—A bit of exciting adventure centering around a picturesque old ruin, which is the abiding place of a witch. It is one of those love tales in which an erstwhile lover suddenly appears and makes love to another's wife. A little girl is carried away, but is restored by the witch, and the reunited trio go home hand in hand. The story has little novelty, yet is not without interest, since its action is enough to keep the audience wondering about the outcome. The picturesque pictorial quality of the photography is fully as interesting as the story.

"Diamond Cut Diamond" (Pathe).—Not every woman is able to dupe her husband so effectually by getting a friend to take her place. But how foolish this husband felt one may better imagine than even the alert camera can show.

"Called to Sea" (Urban).—A picture that will make a profound impression, since it illustrates at once the grandeur of the sea when it is dashed in tempests by the violent winds and the bravery of rescuers who go out to save the crew of a sinking vessel. It seems but natural that all should be lost. One could scarcely expect any life to exist after such a storm. The second rescue saves life and the picture closes with the spirit of the dead father extending his hands in blessing.

INDEPENDENT.

"Aunt Maria's Substitute" (Imp).—Here is a whirlwind of fun that will make them sit up and take notice. A portly bachelor in skirts acting as chaperone for a pretty girl to help his chum whose aunt was suddenly taken ill. Of course he works the situation for numberless hugs and kisses, even though the friend is furious. The whole thing might have gone on swimmingly indefinitely, had not the real aunt appeared on the scene and surprised the substitute smoking with his feet on the table. The way those skirts were discarded and the picture runs to its whirlwind finish is a matter which cannot be described. You must see the film to appreciate it. Suffice it to say that it is sufficiently sensational and funny to make the most exacting audience wish for more.

"They Would Roller Skate" (Lux).—A knockabout comedy, representing with considerable fidelity to facts what befalls those who undertake the elusive and altogether uncertain sport of roller skating. It is probably a bit too rough to suit many persons in an audience.

"Love and Money" (Bison).—One of those lively Western pictures for which this company is famous. It is full of action and very realistic, all scenes having been well acted. The photographic quality is likewise quite satisfactory. One of the principal points of interest in these films is the spirited action which carries one irresistibly along, holding the interest so strongly that one forgets that it is only a picture on the screen. One becomes for the time a part of the entire scene, entering into the lives of the players and unconsciously taking sides with them in their affections and dislikes.

"Jane Eyre" (Thanhouser).—An excellent dramatization of the main points of Charlotte Bronte's famous story. For two or more generations it has been one of the world's famous novels, and to-day it is one of the steady sellers in all bookstores. The character Jane is supposed to be in some degree autobiographical, which adds materially to the interest of the story. In dramatic qualities the players have succeeded in producing a satisfactory rendition. The most salient features of the book have been taken and these have been so well reproduced that one scarcely misses the rest of the story. The acting is sympathetic and earnest, while the photographic qualities are quite up to the standard set in previous films of the same type from this house. Its reproductions of novels have been more than ordinarily successful and one can't help believing that apart from the amusement thus afforded the company is performing a distinct literary service for its patrons in so graphically and forcefully reproducing these excellent novels.

"The Somnambulist" (Great Northern).—A fair representation of sleep walking. The director of a museum is displaced and while walking in his sleep returns to the collection and takes away valuable exhibits, which he secretes in his own room. But all is satisfactorily explained, and presumably the thefts stop. Pictures like this have interest, particularly for people who may never have seen a person walking in his sleep. The acting of the principal character is good, and gives a good delineation of what a person will do under such circumstances.

"A Rural Romeo" (Imp).—Perhaps after all it is true that love cannot be controlled, that it goes where it is sent regardless of the time, place or occasion. That a wealthy city girl should fall in love with a vigorous country youth is not surprising, especially when the romantic circumstances under which they met are considered. His bewilderment when he goes to her city home and sees her radiantly gowned and bejeweled is pathetic. But even that had its compensations. When he discovers the girl he knew in another room and proceeds to investigate the interior of the sunbonnet, all one's pity for him disappears and is succeeded with a certain degree of envy. Even though he seemed out of place at first the ending is pleasant enough to make both him and the audience forget.

"'Salvation' Smith" (Powers).—A thriller well worth seeing. It is a Wild West Cowboy tale with a preacher, a supposed murder, the escape of the man who thought he had killed another, and a bit of a love story as a prelude. Then comes a funny scene in which the supposed murdered cowboy comes to life and makes them all think he is a ghost. After that the crooks are all straightened and the preacher and the supposed murderer are welcomed back in cowboy fashion. It is impossible to criticise these Wild Western films, because cowboys are likely to do almost anything, and the more absurd the situations the more likely they are to be true. The action in this picture is captivating and there is a swing to the whole which carries the audience along regardless of whether it approves of the story or not, and ends by winning full appreciation. No further commendation is necessary.

"The Indian Princess" (Nestor).—No one would question the popularity of a film of this character if he sat in an audience and saw the interested faces as the picture runs its course. There are escapes and captures enough to maintain the interest throughout, ending with a rescue by cowboys as thrilling as one would care to see. The only objection is the rough way the Indians handle the girl, necessary, perhaps, and quite in accordance with their well-understood characteristics, but nevertheless somewhat revolting. The whirl and dash of cowboys and Indians in their sensational encounters, and even the capture of men are not objected to. But carrying away girls does not appeal to everyone, and if producers can suggest this instead of having it acted they will perform a distinct service in the improvement of such films. Apparently the audience is never satiated with cowboys and Indians and soldiers, and their furious riding is always thrilling. Give an audience action of this type and it will come back again and again for more.

"The Secret of the Lake" (Ambrosio).—A representation of Middle Ages customs which may be attractive, but which cannot please. It may fascinate by what it suggests, but it cannot entertain. To see two persons cast into prison, and then see the key thrown into a lake, may be a representation of a certain type of rough justice, but it is not pleasant, and can scarcely excite interest in this way. Humanity has always been weak in this particular direction, and such cruel punishment seems too severe for the relative degree of crime involved.

"Fricot Gets in a Libertine Mood" (Ambrosio).—A picture presenting another view of Fricot, depicting him in a mood not altogether satisfactory, but offering some elements of fun. Perhaps it will pass for a humorous film.

ROOSEVELT IN PARIS.

Pathe Freres release on Thursday a special film showing Roosevelt in Paris. These scenes give distinct and close views of the African traveler.

In one scene in particular the operator took his camera right up to the window of the waiting carriage and obtained a magnificent picture by motographing the ex-President through the carriage while he was talking on the embassy steps, and when he descends and enters the carriage it is just as if Mr. Roosevelt was walking into the camera. The length of the film is about 315 feet.

THE THANHOUSER "WINTER'S TALE."

The Thanhouser Shakespearean production, "The Winter's Tale," is now definitely announced for release, and scheduled for Friday, May 27. The manufacturers have spared no expense to make it a notable issue. The success of the "Thanhouser Classics," as they are called, that have gone before, has caused the New Rochelle manufacturers to inspect Shakespeare with a view to picture production, and a strong series of Shakespearean releases are in order, of which "The Winter's Tale" is the first. Miss Rosemond portrays the Queen of Sicilia, Martin Faust the king of that country, Frank Crane the King of Bohemia, Amelia Barnes the Princess of Sicilia, and Alfred Hasker the Prince of Bohemia. "The Winter's Tale" tells a story that runs as follows:

The Kings of Bohemia and Sicilia, monarchs of adjoining kingdoms, have been close friends since boyhood. But since each has assumed his regal duties they find that they are not able to see much of each other. Therefore at the opening of the story it has been several years since they have met, each has taken unto himself a royal spouse, and the king of Bohemia boasts a son of four years.

The King of Bohemia pays a visit to his boyhood friend of Sicilia, is royally received and presented to his host's Queen. She, in fulfilling her duties as a hostess, unconsciously arouses the jealousy of her royal husband. Goaded by his jealousy, the King of Sicilia orders his royal guest, whom he considers his rival, poisoned. The King of Bohemia escapes a horrible death through the confession of the courtier who has been employed to kill him. He returns safely to his own kingdom, carrying with him the courtier who saved his life.

Enraged at the escape of his victim, the King of Sicilia orders his Queen imprisoned. From her prison, the Queen sends her infant daughter to the royal father, hoping to soften his heart. But the King is not to be won over. He reartlessly orders the child taken beyond the borders of his kingdom, and there left in the wilderness to perish.

The Queen is tried at a public tribunal, and there, overcome with grief at the false accusation, she swoons, and is pronounced dead by Paulina, her lady-in-waiting. The body is left in Paulina's charge, and when later the Queen revives she is taken to Paulina's house, where she dwells in seclusion, her existence being unknown to anyone but her faithful maid.

The infant Princess of Sicilia is found by a shepherd of Bohemia, taken to his home and reared as his daughter. Her costly robes and jewels are kept by the old shepherd in the hope that in some future time they will assist in identifying her as the child of wealthy parents.

After a lapse of fifteen years, we see at the court of Bohemia the young Prince starting from the palace in a decidedly mysterious manner. When questioned by his father, the King, as to where he is going, the Prince refuses to answer. He is allowed to go, but the King, accompanied by his trusted friend, follows him.

The Prince disguises himself as a shepherd, and in this guise woos a beautiful maiden whom he supposes naught but a simple shepherdess. She is, in reality, however, the Princess of Sicilia. The King arrives at the shepherd's hut just in time to hear the Prince announce his intention of wedding the shepherdess. The King forbids the engagement and leaves the Prince in anger. His faithful courtier, however, decides to befriend the young couple, and advises them to fly for protection to the court of the King of Sicilia.

The lovers arrive in Sicilia, accompanied by the old shepherd. Here they are gladly received by the repentant King, who, too late, realizes that his jealousy was groundless. He mourns his lost Queen and his estranged friend. The shepherd, in endeavoring to prove that his adopted daughter is of gentle birth, thus permitting of her marriage to the Prince, shows the King the clothes in which he found her as a baby. The King recognizes the clothes as those his own child wore.

The King of Bohemia then arrives upon the scene and is told the glad news amid general rejoicings. As a final surprise the royal party is invited by Paulina to visit her house and there view a statue of the Queen. The statue comes to life before the eyes of the royal party, or rather the Queen, who had made up to resemble a statue, extends her hand to her grieving spouse, who is glad to receive her whom he had thought lost and now found again.

A SIDE-SPLITTING COMEDY.

Following the heavy dramatic work in the Film d'Art subject we were shown in the offices of the Sales Company an Imp film of future release which made an ideal finish to the program. It was entitled "Fruit and Flowers," and depicted the misfortunes of two fellows, close friends, but both madly in love with the same girl. Unknown to each other a wag assists them to substitute cabbage leaves, carrots, etc., in the boxes supposed to contain fruit and flowers which they each in turn present to their lady love. The fun is fast and furious as the scenes develop, and when they learn that she has been engaged to another all the time the expressions on their faces are convulsing. It is a well acted and cleverly conceived comedy—probably the best that has yet been turned out from the Imp factory.

Point Pleasant, N. J.—Arnold's Thater, devoted to pictures and songs, is the only one in this town. It has a seating capacity of 400 and has been playing to good business, under the management of F. L. Doyle, of Jersey City.

"LOVE YOUR NEIGHBOR AS YOURSELF, BUT LEAVE HIS WIFE ALONE!"

As will be seen by our advertising columns and by the synopsis of the play on another page, the first release of the Motograff Co. of Philadelphia is booked for Sunday the 14th inst. The play may be briefly described as a dramatic pastoral with a vein of light, clean comedy running brightly through it. The most careful consideration has been given to the various characters in the little play which within its limits is a real life drama just such as anyone will recall having seen or heard about even in their own circle of acquaintances. There is nothing about it strained or exaggerated beyond probability, and the whole movement of the story progresses with ease and realism from start to finish. Costumes are as beautiful as they are correct, and the scenic settings will be a revelation to jaded moving picture patrons everywhere. In line with a carefully devised policy, the first production of the Motograff Co. has a profusion of full length presentations, and the rough-and-tumble atmosphere of the old-time motion picture is conspicuously lacking. The actors and actresses were allowed to bring out their own individual characteristics according to the parts they played, and the total result is exceedingly pleasing. The photography will compare favorably with any photographic work in the Independent field. The steadiness and sharpness, with exceptionally good tinting and toning, add greatly to the charm. All in all, this is a notable reel for a first release, and a strong addition to the ranks of the independent moving picture manufacturers.

FLASHLIGHT PHOTOGRAPH OF INDEPENDENTS IN SESSION.

THE NATIONAL INDEPENDENT MOVING PICTURE ALLIANCE.

On Friday, May 6, the members of the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance met in the La Salle Hotel, Chicago, behind closed doors. The representatives of the press were informed that the principal business transacted was the reading of the minutes of the last meeting. The general impression was that the Alliance was doomed to be succeeded by the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, a self-constituted body, which held a secret session in another room.

On Saturday, while the lobby talk of insurrection was at its height, word was passed around that the majority of the Independent manufacturers had signed an agreement with the sales company and the following document was passed around among the exchange proprietors:

AGREEMENT. Entered into this ... day of ... 191... between the MOTION PICTURE DISTRIBUTING AND SALES CO., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York and having its principal place of business in the City of New York, hereinafter designated as the DEALER and ... a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of ... and having its principal place of business in the City of ..., or firm or individual hereinafter designated as the EXCHANGE.

WITNESSETH: That whereas the DEALER has entered into contracts with various manufacturers and importers, for the exclusive sale and distributing agencies of the positive motion picture films manufactured or imported by them for use in the United States of America and in the Dominion of Canada; and

12. It is agreed that upon the execution of the agreement, the EXCHANGE will furnish to the DEALER the names of its officers, if a corporation, or the names of its members, if a firm or co-partnership.

President.

This was signed and duly witnessed before a notary by almost all the exchanges represented at the meeting and an agreement to market their product through the Sales Company was signed by all the manufacturers present for periods extending from three weeks to three years.

The Alliance then met in open session with Wm. H. Swanson in the chair and officially endorsed the Sales Company, the object and aims of which were outlined in an address by its treasurer, Mr. Chas. O. Baumann. Secretary Herbert Miles also addressed the meeting and pointed out that while the Independents had the sympathy of the majority of the exhibitors, the only hope of success the Sales Company had in competition with the licensed manufacturers was on the lines of quality. He explained that the Sales Company would act as censors of quality and as a medium for supplying the exchanges with enough high class film subjects to enable them to secure at least 50 per cent. of the business of the country.

Mr. R. G. Bachmann spoke on behalf of the exchanges and said that the terms of the agreement appeared fair to them and that they would stand by the Sales Company in their efforts to further the Independent cause.

It was then suggested that the Alliance be disbanded as an active body to be continued as a social organization. A resolution was adopted that after the debts of the Alliance had been paid that the balance in the treasury be presented to the Secretary as a recognition of his services.

Names and addresses of manufacturers and importers who have agreed to market their goods through the Sales Company:

The officers of the Sales Company are: Carl Laemmle, president; P. A. Powers, vice-president; Chas. O. Baumann, treasurer; Herbert Miles, secretary. These, together with William Steiner, Wm. H. Swanson and J. J. Murdock, form the Executive Board.

Another meeting was called on Sunday and, on a motion by Mr. Fechtenberg, of New Orleans, it was decided to continue the Alliance as an active body for the mutual benefit and protection of the exchanges. The terms of office of the Executive Board having expired, it was suggested that officers should be elected who were resident in Chicago, so that meetings could be held without inconvenience to the officers or expense to the Alliance.

Mr. R. G. Bachmann was elected president; Mr. Plugh, of the Anti-Trust Film Exchange, vice-president; Mr. Eugene Cline, treasurer, and Mr. Wm. H. Swanson, secretary.

Altogether the meetings were the most harmonious and important yet held by the Independents, and the officers of the Sales Company, and especially Chas. O. Baumann, deserve great credit for their arduous work which was brought to a successful head and which we hope will redound to their credit.

Among the many who were present in or around the lobby or the meetings at the La Salle Hotel were: M. E. Williams, Morgan Film Company, Kansas City and Joplin, Mo.; J. W. Morgan, Morgan Film Company, Kansas City and Joplin, Mo.; Tom Evans, representing Nestor and Pantograph, Chicago; Mullin, of the Mullin Film Renting Company, Troy, N. Crisfield, Md.—The Lyric Theater, which is being built here by O. L. Mitchell, will open about June 1st and will be one of the best equipped theaters in this section. It will have a capacity of 700; large stage, scenery, loft, opera chairs, steam heated, and will cost about $12,000. The program will be pictures and good music, with one-night attractions. Will be ready for booking dates after June 1st. O. L. Mitchell & Son also own and manage the Majestic, showing pictures only.

In last week's advertisement of the Melies releases on the front cover page it was stated, by inadvertence, that the handsome posters of the Melies pictures are supplied free. This is an error which we desire to correct. The Melies posters are obtainable from any licensed exchange in the country.

McGrath & Ranko have opened a new theater at 172d street and Fulton avenue, and have purchased their entire outfit from J. H. Hallberg, 30 Greenwich avenue, New York, including one 1910 Model Motiograph, one "Hallberg" Economizer and two "Hallberg" Flaming Arc Lamps, giving 4,000 candle-power beautiful golden yellow light. This makes a most complete equipment. The theater is scheduled to open next Friday.

The Paramount Film Exchange, of 61 West Fourteenth street, New York City, is becoming increasingly popular on the Independent side of things. This is due to the fact that they are buying from fourteen to twenty-one reels a week of the best foreign and domestic Independent releases, so that the exhibitor can always rely upon a good service. An intelligent policy of this kind is bound to succeed in the long run. The manager of the Paramount is Mr. J. Bernstein, who was formerly proprietor of the Union Film Exchange of Harrisburg and Altoona, Pa., where he gained valuable experience that has fitted him for the new position in New York. There is a scarcity of good exchanges on the Independent side; therefore we are all the more ready to encourage the Paramount Company in their up-to-date and progressive policy of releasing all the best pictures they can obtain and giving the exhibitor the most efficient of service. We learn that Mr. J. S. Levine, formerly of the Imperial, has become a general representative of the Paramount Company.

A splendid example of scenic photography to which is added an intensely interesting story of the Hudson Bay Country made famous by Jack London and others. Utoka, the pretty daughter of the chief, is loved by the factor at the trading post as well as by a half breed. The latter tricks her father into the belief that the factor has trifled with the girl's affections and he is seized by the Indians to avenge the insult. A sensational story with the suspense continued to the very end.

LUBIN.

A number of engagements for the stock company were made last week and the services of other well-known players are now being secured. The opening of the new photo will give ample working space to the directors and permit an elaboration of the interior sets. One unusual setting was made a couple of weeks ago for a scene in "The Indian Girl's Romance," showing the interior of a Hudson Bay trading post.

There is a novelty scene in "The Brave Deserve the Fair," the Lubin release for May 26, in which an operation is performed for the extraction of blood. Instead of faking the scene, the operation was performed by the surgeon of one of the local hospitals, who brought to the studio his entire surgical equipment.

"Winter Bathing in the West Indies" has been added to "The Messenger Boy Magician," the Lubin release for May 23. It shows the beach at Hog Island, across the bay from Nassau and includes the famous "goat race," at which the excursionist may eat his fill of fruit for the quarter that covers the ticket on the tender that plies between Hog Island and the Island of New Providence.

"The Messenger Boy Magician," by the way, seems destined to enjoy huge popularity. It is a trick subject with a score of novel transformations and trick effects. Trick films are seldom seen in proportion to the general output, but they enjoy high favor, and this is regarded as singularly successful by those who have seen the reel run.

"A Veteran of the G. A. R.," the Lubin release for Decoration Day, promises to attract even more attention than "The Irish Boy." The Lubin players "spread themselves" on their makeups, and the scene in the G. A. R. Post is a study of character seldom equalled in the pictures.

MELIES.

All that has been said about the Melies releases has been well said and met the approval of those for whom it was said. Those who have used the films have but one criticism, "Great! Excellent!" and the increased demand for them will put the company on their mettle to keep up this splendid start and keep up the good work already done and which has given them a splendid lead in their particular work of producing those celebrated specialties of Western dramas, bright comedies and "Cracker Jack" pastimes.

Read and learn what is said about the "Star" films and then put them in your list as an extra attraction and a bid for business.

Chattanooga, Tenn., April 29, 1910.

Melies Manufacturing Company, New York City.

Dear Sirs—Allow us to compliment your "Seal of the Church", fine film; good photography, good backing, fine talent shown throughout.

HOWEL GRAHAM, Theater Chattanooga.

Melies Manufacturing Company, New York City.

Dear Sirs—I was truly surprised to witness the exceptional merit of your two releases, "Branding a Thief" and "Cyclone Pete's Matrimony." These have been no better picture releases either by the Licensed or Independent manufacturers. If the Melies Company continues with such subjects they will have to make more releases by increasing their output.

F. M. CARTER, Gem Theater.

SELIG.

The demand for the "Shriners' Pilgrimage at New Orleans" film was beyond expectations and good words of praise are accorded it on every hand.

The Selig encampment of Rough Riders, Indians and Wild West features has experienced some touches of high life the past month—cold weather, rain, cyclones, and, in fact, everything fashionable except an earthquake or coming in contact with Halley's comet. "Arizona Bill," an outlaw rider, was thrown in a mix-up, in which two horses, riders and camera men figured, a few days ago, and was trampled so that he was relegated to the hospital for repairs. The escape of Pearsons, the second knight of the crank and finder, was miraculous, and a sudden demise is only explained by Turner, who claims that both horses bounced when they fell on Pearsons. The plant is surprised, as Tonima was only a fair chunk of a lad when he left the Windy City and—the camp is dry.

The Selig Company will shortly release "Mazeppa," an adaptation from the book.

ESSANAY.

The Essanay releases for this week include on Wednesday, May 18, "The Danger Line," being a story of modern society life, in which J. H. Gilmour has the leading part. Mr. Gilmour is a polished and talented actor and has been for a number of recent years the leading support with Viola Allen, Maude Adams, John Mason and others.

"The Little Doctor of the Foothills" is considered by the Essanay Company the very best most consistent Western comedy yet offered by their Western producer. It comes to release this Saturday, May 21.

Last week episodes of the Essanay Company's picture of the rubber industry in South America and the United States were sent to Harry Smith, the Essanay agent of the Essanay Company. When the great rubber exhibit first started England, Mr. Smith made arrangements to obtain English films of the film made by the Essanay Company, and could now get copies or negatives of the film for their exhibitors. It is expected that this picture, which shows the manufacture of automobile tires from the first opening of the rubber trees in South America, shows how it is made into rubber goods, will have a phenomenal sale in the England film market. Two pictures will probably be released by the Essanay Company in this country in the near future, although no definite date has been set.

AN AFFAIR OF HEARTS. In this comedy we are introduced to the rapid-eye hunted businessman. For us to see a pretty woman is to love her, regardless of the disaster his attempted persistence may mean, so it is that when Miss Daisy excites the fair eyeful of us makes to become her devoted slave. She, however, resists his attendance and in no direction he writes to his dear friend Miss Remy the following. "My dear Remy, I love I wonder a lady I do not know. From notes and I find out who she is. I have not seen her. I only know her and make love by wire. What shall I do? My dear friend I crave your help. Cupid Remy." Miss Remy flies to his dear friend's assistance and the first sight they get of the fair lady is as she speeds through the park in an auto. She is alone and her engine a small complaint to follow her. Remy, of course, pursues her in. As there is but one front seat, Remy takes this where the love-struck Remy is bound to occupy the footman's seat, but what cares he so long as it will take him into the presence of his charmer? Thus follow an auto until it arrives at the lady's home where she enters hurriedly. A policeman is standing by, and they, that is Remy and man to divulge the name of the fair goddess but after packing the liberal bribe in his fist he is very sorry to say he doesn't know her. But they reason that heart to heart will help so they persist, and the next time they encounter are riding horseback. Here Miss Remy woos it on its own account as he proves quite daring also look to-do. Her lover carries her to distance them but a bicycle ticket presents and they resume his wood. Behind again paying the fee but Remy deceases on it. This encounter also proves a failure and meeting a severe in the words they. Remy of course purchase his guns the carries tower, and decide to settle the affair in a duel. This procedure is not as acceptable as they imagine for they realize it takes a certain amount of nerve to stand up as a target even though you yourself may have a human target at your disposal. Well while they parley the lady views with amusement their antics from her veranda and she decides it is now time to put a stop to their imbecility, so dispatching her maid to the field of honor (?) the jealous lovers are invited to appear at the house. They both declare their undying love for the fair unknown, they would fight for her, they would lay down their lives for her but when her sturdy, robust husband appears they find they have pressing engagements elsewhere.

OVER SILENT PATHS. The sorrow, affliction and calamity induced by the insatiable thirst for gold more than counterbalances the joy and comfort its possessing assures. There is no rose without its thorn, there is seldom gold without its curse. In the heart of the American desert we find an old miner with his only daughter he toiling day after day at his rocker cradle in quest of the precious ore, while his pretty daughter keeps his cabin and makes it as comfortable as possible in this wilderness. Having secreted quite a store of nuggets his daughter persuades him to return to civilization where they may enjoy the fruits of their labor. Both are happy in the anticipation of what seems a bright future and the girl starts to prepare their final meal at the camp. While she is away at the spring getting water a desert wanderer appears at the camp and at the sight of the old man weighing his gold is seized with cupidity. He himself and toiled long in the wilds, but with no success, so he demands that the old man divide his gains with him. This of course the miner decries and the wanderer uses force. In the struggle the old man is knocked down and striking his head expires. The murderer realizes he has caused the old miner's death and is filled with horror but assuming he is alone in the desert, takes all of the gold and hurries off. What a sight greets the girl at her return. From the very touch of joy she is plunged into most profound grief. However she buries her dear old dad, and at his grave vows to bring to justice the man who caused his death. Meanwhile the villain has in his haste lost his way and would have perished had he not been rescued by the girl as she is making her way to San Fernando. They are of course, unknown, to each other and during their ride so attachment springs up between them, particularly on the man's side. He falls deeply in love with his rescuer. When they reach town she tells her story to the sheriff who warns all to be silent as her father's slayer will surely turn up in the town. Later the wanderer proposes marriage to the girl and to further his suit tells her of his sufficient gold to make them happy, showing her the bags. At the sight of them she nearly swoons but upon regaining composure, pretends to accept. He thereupon takes her in his arms, and while so engaged she stealthily secures his revolver, breaks away from him and marches him off to the sheriff with the gun pointed at his head. The sheriff takes him in hand to meet the punishment he deserves, while she goes back to the grave of her father where at once and pays [illegible] I let it [illegible].

OVER SILENT PATHS

A Story of the American Desert.

Most of the scenes of this Biograph production were taken in the heart of the American desert and tell a highly interesting story. An old miner with his daughter, having secured a store of nuggets in this dreary waste, decides to go back to civilization. The girl goes to prepare for their departure, when a desert wanderer appears and demands a share of the old miner's gold. During the struggle the old man falls and the wanderer, taking the nuggets, gets away. The daughter returning finds her father dead. At his grave she swears to bring to justice the man who caused his death. While making her way to San Fernando, Cal., she overtakes the wanderer who has lost his way, and not knowing him to be the culprit allows him to ride with her. Later, however, while in San Fernando, she makes the discovery and by her cleverness lands him into the custody of the sheriff.

AN AFFAIR OF HEARTS

Cupid in a Sportive Mood.

In this Biograph comedy is shown the experiences of two impulsive-hearted Frenchmen, whose weakness it is to fall in love with the first pretty woman they see. One of them meets a young lady in the park, but she indignantly repulses him. He then enlists the aid of his chum, who, instead of giving aid, falls in love with her himself. They follow her and their persistence is more amusing than annoying, until they are on the point of fighting a duel for her, when she thinks it time to put an end to their imbecility and so presents her husband to them. Of course, they don't tarry very long.

interrupted by the entrance of Henri, who entirely misunderstands the situation and orders his supposedly disloyal wife to her room. Then he calls Treveine to account. Not desiring to involve his wife in the scandal he forces the poet to engage in a game of cards, with witnesses standing near, and then accuses the poet of cheating. The poet rises and denies the accusation. Henri, with inexpressible contempt, hurls the cards in Treveine's face and withdraws.

The duel is arranged and close to the hour the two are to meet Henri seeks his wife. There he learns fully the extent of Treveine's treachery and that Jene is innocent. For a moment he is swept with a keen remorse as he gazes down in his wife's loveliness. She begs him not to fight, not to risk his life, but her confession and proof of innocence make the duel doubly necessary. He murmurs a last good-bye and convinced of his wife's loyalty, confides his child, Louise, to her care.

In the duel which follows Treveine further shows his cowardice and treachery in taking advantage of his antagonist, whom he wounds in the pistol hand. According to the code Henri, who has escaped a mortal wound, may have his shot, which means surety of the death of Treveine, but this he refuses to take, preferring to send his victim into the world to suffer the stigma of shame and a guilty conscience.

It is some time later before a complete reconciliation is established between Henri and Jene. But the former, during his convalescence, has had much time to think of the loveless marriage of he and Jene, and he, too, experiences an awakening.

It is Gustave and Louise, whose pure, unselfish love, bring them together and show them their folly. The film ends with a complete reconciliation of husband and wife, who make earnest resolve each of them, to more closely merge their two lives together.

THE LITTLE DOCTOR OF THE FOOTHILLS.—It had never occurred to the sleepy village of Sturgis, in Arizona, that a doctor, an M. D., was really necessary to the welfare of the community and there was not much enthusiasm among the loafers at the Sturgis Hotel, when the proprietor read aloud the following note, addressed to him: "Dear Sir: I am going to practice medicine in your county. Please reserve a room for me. I will arrive in a few days. Cecil Burton, M. D." Sturgis suffers an awakening, however, when the stagecoach drives up, a few days later, and deposits two persons, one a lanky young chap, and a small, good looking woman. There is not much enthusiasm when the supposed doctor is ushered into the hotel office, followed by the young woman. However, when they discover that the lanky person is a book agent and that it is the winsome young woman who has come to cure for them "all the ills that flesh is heir to" the situation looks decidedly up. Cecil Burton, M. D., is introduced all around and offered the best room in the house. When she withdraws there is not a cowboy in the crowd who is not suffering with some sort of an ailment of the heart, but, alas, it is not the sort of a malady to be cured by drugs.

In Sturgis, history will tell us, Pete the Carote has had the reputation of starting things or taking the initiative. His heart, too, has been captured by the pretty little doctor and, lacking that certain finesse in his speech which has the reputation of charming ladies he decides to work on her sympathies. Miss Burton is hardly established in her room when Pete is taken violently ill with a fit and the doctor is summoned. A number of the boys witness the performance and are inspired to try the same trick themselves.

Alkali Ike goes to his boarding house where he is suddenly attacked by some excruciatingly painful gastric malady. The landlady sends Dutch Mike for the doctor, who readily cures Alkali. Dutch Mike, who has witnessed the smiles of pleasure on Alkali's face when the doctor rubbed his head, resolves also to be sick and when Miss Burton comes upon him near the stable he goes into awful convulsions. The little maid by this time sees the joke and dashes a bucket of water on her latest patient. He is cured instanter. Broncho Pete, who had brought the water but who had left the scene before Mike was soused, resolves that he, too, should be under the lady's care. As she is on her way home she meets Pete who is thrown from his horse and pretends he has broken his leg. This is too much for the little doctor, who solicitously bends over him and then gravely brings from her grip a butcher knife. The Broncho, when he sees the knife, jumps to his feet and beats it. The little doctor laughs, mounts her horse and rides back to the hotel, resolved not to answer any more calls no matter how "urgent" they may be.

You may remember the fable about the shepherd boy who cried "wolf." Ralph Bronson, a ranchman, while cleaning his revolver, accidentally shoots one of his cowpunchers. Turning the wounded man over to the others, he mounts his horse and rides for the doctor. However, she refuses to come, believing it to be another joke and Bronson rides back and with the aid of the other cowboys brings the wounded man to town. The little doctor is almost overcome when she finds that she had really been needed and that the poor cowpuncher was near to death from loss of blood and all because she refused to go to his aid.

However, she saves him and when the film closes we receive the suggestion that a love affair is well grounded between "the little doctor" and her patient.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

G. Kleine.

ROOSEVELT IN CAIRO.—The ex-President's party arrived in Cairo from Luxor at 7:30 o'clock the morning of March 23, and from that time on the quotations were kept mighty busy following His Honor, "The Strenuous," about the streets of the curious and metropolitan city of the desert.

Mr. Roosevelt was intensely interested in every phase of life around the city; and in the course of his stay, besides being entertained by the Americans in Cairo, and by the Khedive at Abdin Palace, he visited the Sphinx and pyramids, El Azhar University, a Mohammedan institution, where he saw old men and boys squatting in the tiled court as they swayed in rhythm to their chanting of the Koran, proved very attractive to the tourist.

He also visited a Moslem Mosque, Al Azhar, where the entire American company were forced to don commodious yellow shoes, as the feet of infidels are not permitted to desecrate the Mohammedan floors.

PURGED BY FIRE.—A wealthy farmer, while busy overseeing the work of his men, endeavors is interrupted by an old beggar, whom he orders to leave the premises. One of the women at work in the harvest, pitying the old man, hastens after him and gives him a loaf of bread.

The farmer follows, sees her act of kindness, takes the food from the old man, then discharges the woman.

Later in the day he drives to the market in town to purchase stock. All his cash, which he carries in a wallet, is lost from his pocket. On his return home he finds the farm in flames. All efforts to save it prove futile. The loss leaves him penniless and we next see him a year later, begging, suffering the same all treatment which he has accorded others and haunted by visions of the old man he wronged.

GAUMONT.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.—This film presents some of the principal episodes in the life of Christopher Columbus, including the discovery of America. Here we see the meeting with Queen Isabella of Spain and her promise to fit out a fleet.

The next scene gives one a splendid idea of the Spanish galleons at sea.

Months seemed to have passed and no sight of land, the sailors are very mutinous and in the end mutiny. Just at this moment land is sighted, and here we get a very fine view of the "lookout" in the "crowsnest."

The next scene gives us a fine idea of how Columbus had to fight his way with the natives, while those in the old were conquered by kindness. The next scene brings us back to Spain where he has awakened great jealousy, and is charged with cruelty by some of his crew.

Investigations are made and he is cast into prison. He sees from his cell, the great welcome Amerigo Vespucci receives, as having added a new world to the throne of Spain. He thought that he himself ought to have received this ovation, confesses him, and, broken hearted, he dies in his cell.

RACING FOR A BRIDE.—Atalanta, daughter of the King of Sevros, was renowned for her beauty and her swiftness of foot. Bothered by many suitors, she made proclamation that she would marry only that man who could outstrip her in a race, the consequence of his failure being death.

Several swains, having attempted to win the much coveted maiden had failed and lost their lives, when Hippomenes essayed to capture her for a bride.

Before the race he obtained from Aphrodite three golden apples, which at intervals in the race he dropped, and Atalanta, stooping to pick them up, fell behind. Both were happy at the result.

THE MARVELOUS WATER.—A street fakir offers for sale a liquid, which gives to its owner the power of commanding absolute obedience from all upon whom he is able to sprinkle the water.

A mischievous schoolboy manages to steal a vial of the powerful fluid. He then proceeds to compel obedience to ludicrous commands too numerous to describe.

The youth has an exceptionally fertile brain, which shows at its best in starting mischief.

THE GIRL CONSCRIPT.—The theme of this picture is somewhat original, and well worked out. We are shown the interior of a humble cottage in France. The bereaved father is himself sick and feeble, and the son maintains both father and sister. A military official comes to claim the young man for army service and, of course, turns a deaf ear to the expostulations of the father and daughter, who are being deprived of their breadwinner.

Consternation seizes the little family, until the girl is seized with a bright idea. She cannot earn a sufficient living for her father and herself, but she can take her brother's place in the ranks of the army. She persuades them to let her try the scheme, and after an affecting farewell, we see her attending at the military headquarters on the appointed day. She is passed as her brother, though one or two of the soldiers throw curious glances after her.

The scene is changed to a battlefield. The girl is sent out as a spy, and is captured and taken to one of the enemy's prisons. In due course she that the tale, backed up by the written evidence, will make a good story for the club and father wilts. After all it is some consolation to have a son-in-law more clever than he looks and a bless-you-my-children closes the story.

THE INDIAN GIRL'S ROMANCE.—The scene is laid in one of the trading posts of the Hudson Bay Company and the young factor, Malcolm Young, loves Utoka, the pretty daughter of the chief of a nearby tribe. Jules Laprese also loves the girl and the half-breed hates Malcolm as much as he loves the pretty Indian maiden. Only Utoka's watchfulness saves the young factor's life on several occasions and this loving care is relaxed only when Jules brings her a letter and photograph which he has stolen from the factor. The picture is that of a beautiful young white girl and the loving message that accompanies it leaves small room for question of the factor's lack of good faith. Utoka is prostrated by grief and Jules leads her father to believe that a more serious wrong has been wrought by the head of the trading post. With his leaves the old chief captures the factor and drags him, a prisoner, to the camp where Malcolm is put to torture before the fire is to mercilessly end his sufferings. Meanwhile Utoka, who cannot believe her lover guilty, seeks the post and discovers what has taken place. With the good Father, the missionary who keeps pace with the advance of the Hudson Bay posts, Utoka returns to the camp and saves the life of the factor. He proves that the letter was from his sister and not from some sweetheart in Montreal and the half-breed is made to suffer punishment for the affront he has put upon the tribe.

THE MESSENGER BOY MAGICIAN.—A messenger boy comes to deliver a telegram to a magician who is practicing a new act for the stage. Good-naturedly the magician shows him a number of tricks and the boy gathers that the magic lies in the wand which is used in each feat. He steals the wand when the magician is not looking and makes a hurried exit. He is pursued by the excited magician but the latter's own wand is turned against him and he is driven back. The pursuer disposed of, Slowfoot proceeds to have a lot of fun. Two lovers are spooning in the park. Slowfoot comes up and with a wave of the wand causes the man and a street sweeper cleaning the walk to exchange places just as the pair are about to kiss. The white wings does not in the least mind the caress but the lover is furious and Slowfoot is pleased. A tramp is placed under arrest and fights with his captor. A wave of the wand and the uniform is on the tramp while the pride of the force is decked out in the rags of the vagrant. A number of varied incidents of similar sort occur, but Nemesis is camping on Slowfoot's trail. The magician wants his wand and he is persistent in his search for it. Slowfoot evades him for a time, but he is caught off his guard. Jumping a wall to escape capture, he stops to light a cigarette. It is not the first time that a cigarette has proven fatal to a messenger boy. Slowly the magician creeps upon his prey. Now he is within reaching distance and still the confounded cigarette will not light. The wand is placed under Slowfoot's arm and with a spring the magician is upon it. Now the tables are turned and with a wave of the baton two policemen are conjured upon the scene who lug Slowfoot off to prison. It's a sad ending to a day of hilarious joy—but it's a great story to tell the boys on the bench while waiting for one's turn to go out with a message.

THE PALEFACE PRINCESS. In the farewell beams of evening the pioneer with his wife and child stop the prairie-schooner and strike stakes for the night. Sounds of the Indian war cry disturb the quiet calm, and seen approaching in the distance is a band of savage red men. Terror-stricken, the settler seizes his gun and stands ready to defend his family. At the first volley from the Indians' rifles he falls dead. The brave wife makes a desperate resistance to protect her child. The poor woman is quickly slain by the hostile savages, leaving the helpless babe to their mercy.

The band directs its attention to the settler's outfit, rifling and helping themselves to its contents. While this is going on one of the young bucks rushes for what he supposes a bundle of valuables, but which upon opening he finds to be the baby. Disappointed, he lifts his tomahawk to kill it. The big chief of the tribe sees and arrests the descent of the weapon, lifts the child in his arms, mounts his pony and takes it back to his tepee, gives it into the care of his squaw and tells her they will adopt it secretly as their own.

The child grows up a beautiful girl and she is named "White Fawn, the Paleface Princess." "Dashing Water," a young brave, loves the girl "a heap much" and wants her for his wife, therefore his anger and jealousy are aroused when Captain Keen, a handsome young officer of a nearby military post, meets her and falls in love with her at first sight. The young fellow's sister, who is with him when he meets the princess, objects to his attentions to the Indian girl and tries to separate them, to no purpose, however.

The brother manages to meet the girl, and he passes many pleasant hours with her teaching her to master her books and solve the spell of love. "Dashing Water," seeing them in each other's arms, demands the white man's intentions. Captain Keen tells him to mind his own business and immediately the Indian throws sand in the air as a challenge and defiance. Captain Keen's sister has seen "Dashing Water" challenge her brother and observes his threatening glances. She implores the Indian not to kill her brother and then induces him to part with his knife, which she purchases and throws away.

"White Fawn," with Captain Keen and his sister, seek the chief, and the Captain asks for the Princess' hand in marriage. The chief tells the young man the story of "White Fawn's" life, and then he gives "White Fawn" a locket containing her mother's portrait, which he tells her she wore about her neck when he found her a baby on the prairie.

The chief joins "White Fawn's" and the Captain's hands and blesses them in peculiar Indian fashion. "Dashing Water" approaches in angry mood with hand on his knife. The chief beckons him away. The Captain's sister clasps "White Fawn" in her arms and Keen grasps the hand of the chief.

THE LAND OF OZ.—The Emerald city in all its splendor, with all the familiar characters so dear to the hearts of the children—Little Dorothy, the scarecrow, the woodman, the cowardly lion, and the wizard continuing on their triumphant entry into the Mystic City, adding new characters, new situations and scintillating comedy. Dorothy, who has so won her way into the good graces of lovers of fairy folk, finds new encounters in the rebellion army of General Jinger showing myriads of Leith soldiers in glittering apparel forming one surprise after the other until the whole resolves itself into a spectacle worthy of the best artists in picture-dom. Those who have followed the two preceding pictures of this great subject cannot but appreciate "The Land of Oz," the crowning effort of the Oz series.

THE UNMAILED LETTER.—Hiram Walker has an only son in whom he places a great deal of confidence and feels that probably some day he might be the President. Accordingly he is sent away to school to be educated among the city chaps. Hiram after a time decides to pay him a visit and a trip to the city is planned; such preparation not only sets the whole house agog but almost upsets the neighborhood. Hiram at last starts; after much trouble his wife puts writing paper, etc., in the bag so he would be sure and write his arrival in the city finds location in a hotel that seemed larger than his farm—decides to keep his promise and write to mother—does so—goes to mail it, makes that fatal mistake and gets the fire alarm box—is arrested. His son receives a note telling of his trouble son engages lawyer and rescues him. Not wanting to further pursue the object of his trip he hikes for the tall and uncut, and delays the anticipated visit indefinitely. An intensely interesting comedy drama.

PATHE FRERES.

THE GIRL FROM ARIZONA.—Lucy, the handsome and impetuous daughter of a ranchman in Arizona, is much admired and there is much jealousy between Bob Skilly, one of her father's cowboys, and John Mason, a neighboring ranchman. Lucy however tells Bob she wants none of him and he goes away swearing vengeance. Lucy then mounts her broncho and accompanied by her faithful Indian maid, meets John and they plight their troth in the shade of the big redwood trees.

In the mantime Bob has killed an Indian and disgnised himself as a redskin, and the rest of the tribe suspecting John of the deed, take him captive after he has left Lucy and lead him back to their camp a prisoner.

In the meantime Lucy has discovered John's horse wandering without its master and the body of the dead Indian. While her faithful servant goes for help she follows the tracks and arrives just at the moment when the Indians have tied John to a post and are dancing a war dance preparatory to killing him.

Taking in the situation at a glance and without hesitation she shoots at two of the Indians, and while the others, caught unawares temporarily, draw back she rushes in and cutting the ropes that hold her lover, they both take to their horses pursued by the Indians, among whom is Bob, still disguised. Luckily they meet a posse of cowboys, who at the call of the trusty servant, have come to the rescue, and while some are chasing the Indians, others, accompanied by Lucy, eventually capture Skilly, the cause of the trouble, and they are about to lay hands on him when, backing from his captors, he falls over a precipice down into the ravine 800 feet beneath. The trouble being now ended, Lucy and John fall into one another's arms and no doubt live happily for many years. The scene showing the fall from the precipice is one of the most thrilling and sensational scenes ever taken by a camera and is sure to make a great hit.

WHO'LL WIN MY HEART?—An heiress, pestered by a troop of lovers, promises to give her heart to the lucky suitor who first joins her on the top of a mountain.

Some great scenes then take place, the suitors scrambling, pushing and elbowing each other as they ascend the steep sides of the mountain. Those are enhanced from the fact that the slope of a real mountain is utilized, giving in addition to a hazardous climb, beautiful views of the surrounding country.

When at last the winner reaches the girl she gives him a picture of a heart, but states she will give her hand to Max, who was really the favored one, but as usual was too bashful to come forward and ask for it.

THE GOLD SPIDER. Some gnomes are searching for a wonderful spider that weaves webs of golden coins.

Intent on their search, they are unaware that their movements are closely followed by a poor woodcutter, who also pentrates into their caves when they have caught the spider and imprisoned it there. He watches the wonderful spider making gold and other articles with wonder and in this scene the moving picture camera has excelled itself in turning out some good tricks, and finally he steals the golden spider.

He returns to his hut and the spider spins numerous gold coins, but he becomes miserly so that when a poor beggar asks for help he refuses. Immediately his golden hoard changes into a mass of crawling insects and the accusing faces of the gnomes rise in the background.

GEE, I AM LATE.—It is 11 a. m. and Jones, not being an early riser, is sleeping soundly, when he is rudely awakened by his servant thrusting under his nose a letter from his friend Colby saying that they are expecting him to lunch at 12 sharp. When Jones takes in the meaning of the note he leaps from the bed with a bound and gets into his clothes with magic rapidity. Rushing over to the window with the alarm clock grasped tightly under his arm, he luckily is just in time to see a cab passing under the window and, not having a minute to lose, he jumps from the window right on to the back seat of the carriage to the great surprise of the cabby, who thought he had dropped from heaven. Giving the driver the name of Colby's house, Jones tells him to go like mad as he must get there by 12. The man's horse, however, refuses to go at a faster gait than a gentle lope and Jones, almost beside himself, bounds from the vehicle with the alarm clock pointing to 5 minutes to 12, and putting his arm affectionately around the old nag's neck, takes it into his confidence and delivers a speech such as Bonaparte delivered to the Pyramids, which so electrifies the animal that it throws up its head and with one shake of its mane is off like a flash at a giddy pace, fording streams, dashing through thickets and going cross-country in a manner that brings the neighborhood out, gasping. But in the end, after a terrible shaking up, Jones finally gets to the Colby's and on time.

A BRAVE LITTLE GIRL.—A gamekeeper's daughter tells her father that she has seen poachers going after his rabbits. The keeper surprises the men in the act, but in the affray he is overpowered and carried, securely bound with ropes, to the gang's cottage.

Meanwhile his wife and daughter are uneasy at his long absence, and unable to bear the suspense any longer, the daughter runs out to try to find her father. She sees her father carried into the cottage and runs for aid, with the result that the police appear and the poachers are overpowered, whilst the gamekeeper, freed of his bonds, covers his little girl's face with kisses.

TEMPESTUOUS ADVENTURE.—A young lady pestered by an elderly gentleman, who is in love with her, and being unable to dismiss him, succeeds in getting rid of him by taking him to her doctor's, to whom she has already suggested that the gentleman in question was mad.

So enthusiastic is the old fellow with his love affair that it really appears that he is mad, and the doctor has him seized and confined in a cell and soused with water from all directions. His antics as he gradually comes to his senses are indeed great.

MILK INDUSTRY IN THE ALPS.—The scene is laid in the Village of Stalden, where we see the whole process by which condensed milk is made from the time the cows leave the farms to go up the mountains to pasture until the big cases are finally shipped all over Europe.

MUSIC HATH CHARMS. After the last act of the day the [illegible] is compared to its former self ever since it [illegible] and all Edisha soldiers. Jacko the Monk seems working on a [illegible] of the feelings of his master's artistic soul with the view of improving [illegible] and goose.

Dressing for dinner is no fun, but [illegible] upward until at length only the [illegible] remains with a pot of [illegible] with each kick. The cast also [illegible] and showed good [illegible] the [illegible] staff sat to a delighted state of mind [illegible] of pudding and copper.

The first victim is a German goose [illegible] wrapped in the arms of Morpheus. The [illegible] of music turns the crank and the goose [illegible] with a bound nodding his [illegible] the [illegible] to spare him from [illegible] giving him a coin as an [illegible] [illegible] to the delight of the [illegible].

Victim Number Two studiously reading [illegible] the treatise. He is startled by a [illegible] sound which continues so persistently he [illegible] window no use. Downstairs [illegible] steps on a [illegible] reaches the front door and [illegible] the [illegible] to beat it all to no purpose however until he [illegible] the musician a liberal [illegible]. With a broad grin the set of Daly makes himself scarce.

The next sufferer of the Italian's [illegible] old whoever dreaming the organ) is a fellow [illegible], who is giving a young lady, at her elegant home, a violin lesson. Just as the professor is executing a double pizzicatino from Liszt's "Nocturne" a worse execution from the sidewalk below [illegible] the ears of master and pupil. At once he is all on edge and jumps around like a dying [illegible] dancing master until he can stand the discordant sound no longer. With a wild whoop he hurtles victim [illegible] to the street, smashes his "Cremona" on the head of the organist, who pays no heed and finally the vaudist in despair gives him a dollar to desist and depart.

At last things are coming his way. He and "Jacko" with self satisfied expression go on their way rejoicing and repeating "Music Hath Charms to Soothe the Savage Breast," and I have made savages of and dollars from them all, now somebody else can soothe them. At home once more, with plenty to eat and to spare, the organ grinder and his family rejoice in their good fortune, feast themselves without stint and lovingly caress their little friend "Jacko," who shares their beauty with them.

A FUNNY STORY. Generally good natured Bill Jones calls to see his old friend, Smith. Jones, apparently glum and preoccupied accepts his old chums invitation to make himself at home with an air of indifference and gives little good to him [illegible] to have to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

A NEW EXCUSE. Old Ben Hopcock does not smoke except in his kitchen and there it is gone so well, and under the severe marvel, not of the web as dare not breathe except under certain conditions or other. How joyful is the occasion, therefore, when he gets a chance to go out for some fun with his daughter's fiance. They go out for a hunting time, a feature of which is a session at a card game. The police raid the game, however, and both Hopcock and his son-in-law to be are among those captured. Likewise, they are among those who, in court, are sentenced to six months in jail, at hard labor. Before they can recover from the shock striped suits are produced and they are full-fledged jailbirds.

Hopcock is not nearly so much worried about the penal servitude as he is about what his wife will do when she learns of it. So he acts upon a novel scheme. He keeps things from get and paper and he writes home a note saying that he suddenly departed for Africa, there to shoot lions, and that he would not return for six months. We see the letter reach its destination, and the effect is exactly imagined that desired.

Hopcock and the young man become as fast pals to the latter and lookstep in the course of their but when they are busily libeled the natural part of the job faces them now to put over that Africa story to the proposition.

But they are equal to the task. The young man dresses up as a Zulu chief, and Hopcock in tan globetrotter's outfit, brings him back in triumph.

The effect is perfect. The Zulu literally has obeyed to his sweetheart, who does not know; and after that whenever the old man wants to do anything else that his wife formerly objected to, all he has to do is to call in the chief. It's a cinch!

THE ETERNAL TRIANGLE. The romance and adventure of the world, when not founded on man's wanderlust, is nearly always based on his infatuation for woman. And since it would not be exciting enough for us mortals unless there were some element of difficulty in the knight's courtship, our veracity is usually appeased with a third party in the case, and here we have the eternal triangle, the ever present three, be either two men in the pursuit of one woman or vice versa.

Our particular story tells us of a game warden, a middle-aged man, who is guilty of the heinous crime of having a wife a good deal younger than himself and loving her dearly. And perhaps it is that the old man is even too attentive that she is so easily won by a young count, who comes to hunt on the estate. The affable old warden gives this noble the freedom of his home, and the young man promptly takes advantage of every chance to make love to his host's wife. The warden would never know of their clandestine walks in the woods were it not for a poacher, who, to escape the wrath of the warden, takes him to the spot where the count and wife are cooing. With a heart full of anguish he raises the rifle and aims at them, but his feelings overcome him, and he defers his vengeance.

His chance comes. Smilingly he informs the count one day that he has seen the tracks which mean big game, and the latter accompanies him. As soon as they get on a great rock overlooking a canyon the warden pours out his aching heart, and calls the count to defend his life.

The wife has divined what may have happened, and, following the two men, comes upon them as they are locked in mortal combat, the warden hanging over the brink, the count desperately struggling to break his grip. Just as the wife comes on the scene he succeeds, and the warden's form goes hurtling into the chasm below. She faces the survivor of the awful struggle for a moment, then seems to realize how the man she cast aside did really love her.

And slowly, deliberately, she walks to the edge of the cliff, raises her eyes to heaven, and in another second walks into space, her body shooting down the canyon to join the man who deserved her most alive.

HIS YANKEE GIRL.—Carter Gordon, a young Virginian, is in love with Alice Warren, the daughter of a Northern army officer. The young lovers have just received the consent of the girl's parents to their marriage, when the Civil War breaks out and General Warren is called back to Washington to resume his military duty. When Gordon announces that he will stand by his native State, Virginia, the General denounces him as a rebel, the engagement is broken off, and Gordon goes away to join the Confederate Army.

Three years later, Gordon's regiment is near the Warren plantation, and Gordon risks his life in several thrilling scenes to visit his sweetheart. The girl at first treats him coldly, but love triumphs, and the lovers are happy in their reunion. Union troops camp near the Warren plantation, and Union officers make the Warren mansion their headquarters. The girl conceals her lover and later helps him to escape. The Union officers go into the dining-room to dinner. Little Grace, the nine-year-old sister of Alice, enters the drawing room with a paper doll and a pair of scissors. She wants a piece of paper to make a dress for the doll, and her father cuts off an inch or two from the bottom of the paper. Little does he realize that he has just cut off the message that would have saved Gordon's life. Shortly after the officers leave, taking Gordon with them. He is tried and condemned to be hanged at sunrise.

Meanwhile little Grace cuts and cuts the paper doll and after the paper doll and cuts the scissors out of the dressing room. Alice discovers what Grace has done and she runs to the window just in time to see her lover walking to his death. She dashes away on her horse and we witness the most thrilling ride that her eyes have ever seen, a woman on horseback pursued by soldiers. She reaches the camp in time to save her lover. Taking the paper doll she

Juan, who soon recovered from the blow, has warned the other Mexicans that they have been found and they all enter the shack. Any further trouble they might cause is avoided by the timely arrival of Rita's father, whom the half breed brings to the cabin.

THE WATCHMAKER'S HAT.—Master and mistress being out, Mary and John take advantage of the occasion to entertain each other in the drawing room. In the course of their hilarious proceeding, they upset the valuable parlor clock and damage the delicate instrument. They are at their wits' end to find a means of keeping the accident secret, for it it is discovered they knew they would lose their good positions. At last they decide that the only way is to send for the watchmaker and have the clock repaired. The man comes, lays his hat on the drawing room chair and, at the request of the maid, carries the clock to madam's room for repairs.

In the meantime the master returns, having left something in the drawing room. Upon entering the room he discovers a man's hat on a chair and immediately his jealousy is aroused, and he rushes through the house calling for his wife. Finally he goes to her room, and upon trying the door finds it locked. Ah, he thinks, my suspicions are confirmed. Kneeling down and peeping through the keyhole, the enraged master sees the form of a man standing with his back to the door.

All this while the watchmaker is busily engaged in mending the clock, but hearing a slight noise he looks towards the door and in fear and astonishment sees a revolver pointed at him through the keyhole. Without hesitation or waiting to lay down the clock, the watchmaker leaps through the window in his fright. He is promptly arrested by a policeman, who has seen him escape and takes the man for a thief.

In the interval the mistress of the house has returned and, of course, cannot understand the cause of all the confusion which has taken possession of the household, nor can she comprehend the husband's insistent demands as to whom belongs the hat he has found. At this point the captured workman is led in and the mystery cleared up. The crestfallen husband is forced in all humility to beg the pardon of his sweet and good lady.

LIFE OF THE ALPINE SHOOTERS IN THE FRONTIER OUTPOSTS.—We have here presented to us a most fascinating exposition of life on the Alpine frontier. Extremely interesting is the mode of locomotion in this picturesque but arduous country, and we are furnished an appreciation of same in every phase. An exciting scene is that of the confusion caused by an accident on the frontier, but it is marvelous to watch the quickness and dexterity with which the wounded are handled in this region of ice decked cliffs and snowy plains.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A MARVELOUS CURE.—Mr. S. is a very happy man, with one exception. He is possessed of a very bald head, which he does not fancy. He is therefore exceedingly pleased when he discovers an advertisement in a newspaper of a new cure for baldness. He at once procures a bottle of this marvelous restorer, but it acts so effectively on himself and members of his household that he greatly regrets ever having used it. A very laughable subject.

CLUB OF THE CORPULENT.—Four jolly fat men, who call themselves the Club of the Corpulent, start out to enjoy themselves. Arriving at a restaurant they proceed to have a hilarious time. Heinze finally remembers that he has business to attend to, leaves his companions and goes to his office. Later his friends are seen staggering down the street, each with a stein in his hand for Heinze, who after their departure, is seen vainly trying to force one of the steins through a small opening in the door into his office. A tramp passing, takes the stein from the dangling hand, drinks the contents, and gives back the empty stein to Heinze. When the three companions again arrive on the scene with more steins, Heinze, who is under the impression that his friends have put the empty stein in his hand, quietly lets himself out of his office and pummels them soundly.

ELECTROGRAFF CO.

PROPOSING UNDER DIFFICULTIES.—Rodney Mayo and Jennie June have been lovers for a long time, and at last Rodney has screwed up his courage to make the grand proposal. The picture shows them on a country road and just when Rodney reaches the critical moment some farm folks after an escaping pig put an end to further love making. The next attempt is made in a farmer's wagon. The lovers are seen sitting on the back seat. Evidently the farmer and his wife on the front seat are in a hurry to get home, as they are constantly urging the horse to greater speed. At the critical moment for the lovers the horse gets its head and bolts, ending all chance for that time of making the desired proposition. The third attempt is made while Miss June under a tree is enjoying a rest and a novel in a hammock. Dave Swank, the farmer's boy, sees them and contrives unseen to spill Miss June out of the hammock just when Mr. Mayo was all ready to pop the question. The next attempt is made on the porch of the June home. The sweethearts are seen seated in rockers, with the father near reading his newspaper. The mother is bustling about at her domestic work. The opportunity seems just right for Rodney and as Miss June seemingly anticipates what is coming another laugable "accident" ends matters for the time. We next see the faithful pair in a boat, so much interested in themselves that they notice nothing else. Rodney looks as if he were thinking "Now or never," and when all seems favorable a splash near them discovers a happening so serious that they have to forget themselves and all is off again.

Some days later we find Mr. Mayo and Miss June in a conservatory where the old, old story is resumed and retold. He gets quite eloquent and in his boldness is prepared to make the important statement when a pesky youth tumbles out of the bushes at the wrong time and once more upsets the lovers in their romance. Halley's Comet has at last been seen with the naked eye, and like many more Mr. Mayo and Miss June stroll out in the moonlight to get a glimpse of the celestial visitor. They are greatly engrossed in several white looking things that seem to suggest the comet, and one in particular they determine to watch closely. While waiting for a better reappearance Rodney again gets his proposal speech in action, but before he can reach a conclusion the "comet" flashes before them as a pumpkin, searing Miss June so that Mr. Mayo can do nothing but take her home. At last, in the park, seated on a bench, Rodney feels the moment has arrived when he must say his say without any more postponements. He has now advanced nearer than ever before, and to make the business more effective he gets down on his knees. But alas, in this park no "spooning" is permitted and a police officer spying the pair comes toward them with such menacing gestures that Miss June pulls Rodney hurriedly to his feet and they fly for safety.

The last act of the little drama shows Mr. Mayo writing out a telegram: "Miss Jennie June, Chestergrove, Pa.: Will you marry me? Answer prepair. —Rodney." We see Miss June receiving the message and despatching her reply. Rodney receives it and after plucking up his courage to open it, reads: "Mr. R. Mayo, The Cedars, Germantown, Pa.: Yes, yes, yes; certainly I will. Yes, yes, YES! —Jennie." Rodney is so jubilant he dances a jig and thus celebrates his final success.

THE WINTER'S TALE

THE GREATEST "THANHOUSER CLASSIC" OF ALL

Length, 1000 Feet No. 112 SCENES FROM "THE WINTER'S TALE" Code Word "Winter"

DON'T READ

Unless You're an Independent Exchange Man:-

This announcement is in the nature of another "advance tip"—and remember we've never tipped you wrong yet. It is made to bid you prepare to handle another "Thanhouser Classic" that will make new customers for you and hold old ones to you. That release is Shakespeare's "Winter's Tale," to be released by every "live" Independent exchange in America on Friday, May 27, and to be pushed and advertised to their customers by most of them long before that —from to-day on, in fact.

Be in this class. It will pay you. Show the exhibitor that his interests interest you—that his success is almost as vital to you as it is to him. Telling him now about this great release, and that you will have it for him, will work effectively toward this end. Remember that "The Winter's Tale" has been advertised very heavily by us already. Most exhibitors have heard about it; many are looking for it.

We have—and with justice—been impressing on the exhibitor the fact that he needs this release. We have been telling him that it is wonderful stuff, produced at just three times the cost of an ordinary film and costing the exchange and exhibitor not one penny extra—which is the truth. So it's natural that he will want this film.

And it's natural that if you tell him you're going to have it for him, he'll appreciate your enterprise and the fact that his exchange is a pretty "live" one. Of course, if you have any doubts as to our backing up our advertising with the goods, you'd better not show too much advance enthusiasm over this film. But if you feel that, judging from past performances, we'll make good our advertised word and deliver a great picture, push this release to the best of your ability—and watch results.

LUX FILMS

To the Independent Exhibitor

I wish to talk with you about the anticipated policy of the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company.

This Company has been organized for the gain of its members and not for the general interest of the business. If it is allowed to operate its outlined policy, in sixty days time from now, there will not be an Independent exchange in this country outside the Sales Company. Think it over before you part with your freedom. The Lux Company will continue to release as in the past, and operate under its trademark which stands for liberty.

There are 18 reels of subjects to be had from manufacturers and importers who are not direct members of the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, namely, 9 reels from American manufacturers and 9 reels from high class European manufacturers. This makes up a programme equally as good as that of the Sales Company. These pictures are yours without the Sales Company's conditions.

So, get busy and continue to be master of your own affairs.

If I have not made this situation plain enough to you, I will be pleased to furnish you with further information upon request.

TWO EDISON FEATURE FILMS FOR NEXT WEEK

The Mule Driver and the Garrulous Mute

Another thrilling story of the Western plains by Rex E. Beach, in which all the picturesque and dramatic atmosphere of the trying frontier days is splendidly preserved. From the opening scene, an Apache raid on a prairie schooner, which is interrupted by a squad of U. S. cavalry, until the closing scene in the military post where "Bill" Joyce is acquitted of the murder of a peaceful Indian, the story is an unbroken chain of intensely dramatic incidents. One of Mr. Beach's best stories graphically depicted, accurate in detail and scenically magnificent. Film No. 6636. Code, Virginique. App. length, 980 feet. To be released May 31st.

A tense drama story of Parisian life provided for Mlle. Pilar Morin by E. W. Townsend. Morin with a role in which she rises to splendid dramatic heights and is ably supported by a special cast including Robert Conness, Bernadine Reisse Leist and Escamille Fernandez. A triumph of the silent dramaatic art. Film No. 6637. Code, Virginite. App. length, 995 feet. To be released June 3d.

The Japanese Invasion.

Is Japan a serious proposition to the occidental mind? What is the connection, sentimental or otherwise, between the United States and Japan? A number of years ago Commander Perry forced the then Japanese government to admit the right of the United States to recognition by the little Island Empire which has recently asserted itself so much in the comity of nations and has become, it is said, a world power in virtue of its conquests, its army, its navy and its ambitions. Japan and the Japanese, therefore, have a peculiar interest for Americans because they claim to have discovered the artistic and other possibilities of the country and have opened the door to its entrance into Western civilization. Japan, therefore, in American eyes, has an interest begotten of the fact that the remote oriental of Perry's time has become the rival in the Pacific of her discoverer.

The play and the opera of "Madame Butterfly" voiced the American aspect of things towards the Japanese. There is a sentimental interest in all this—an interest begotten of the thought that the protege of the past, has become the friend of the present, and may conceivably become the enemy of the future. Don't you remember the Kalem picture of the "Invasion of California by the Japanese"? The issue was left as a note of interrogation. The picture pointed to the possibility of an armed conflict between the United States and Japan. Still the diplomatists say that both nations are very friendly and everybody hopes they are going to keep so. Because war is a dreadful, terrible and an insupportable thing—a thing not to be seriously thought of.

The affection of the American people for the Japanese, then, springs from the fact that there is a sentimental link between the two nations. The film makers take advantage of that sentiment. Besides Kalem, the Edison recently put out a Japanese subject. Now we have the Vitagraph Company coming along and spending money, and considerable sums of money, in making one of those charming subjects in which the occident mixes with the orient in the inevitable love story, as is shown in the pictures reproduced on another page.

Japanese art, Japanese life and Japanese costumes appeal to the occidental mind for many reasons. The grace, the charm, the poetry of Japan never fail to please us of the West. Many who read this page will remember the Gilbert & Sullivan opera of "The Mikado" and the charming musical comedy of "The Geisha." In the former Japanese life and customs were satirized; in the latter one had the admixture of the orient with the occident: a young officer from the West going to Japan and falling in love with a Japanese girl, with the usual dramatic results.

Much of this sentiment seems to pervade the forthcoming release of the Vitagraph Company entitled the "Love of Chrysanthemum." This tells a love tragedy of Japan. We have no doubt the theme will be popular on the grounds stated. There is prettiness, there is poetry, there is idyllism in everything Japanese. The art, the simplicity of the country appeal to us here. Travelers who have been to Japan return with wonderful stories of the mingled beauty and simplicity of its people. An old friend of ours years ago, an eminent scientist, went to Japan, married a Japanese and was perfectly happy. Ourselves, we think one of these days when we tire of the formal and conventional West, we shall go to the East and be one of them. Meanwhile, we content ourselves by looking at the Vitagraph release of May the 28th, when the "Love of Chrysanthemum" is to be expounded on the screen. We love our America, but oh, you Japan!!!!

Mr. Hammerstein's Opportunity.

The New York theatrical season ended on Saturday last with the closing of the Actors' Fair; the operatic season came to an end a week or two ago. During the Summer that has just opened conjecture will be rife as to what next Fall and Winter will bring in the way of operatic and theatrical developments. As to the first named the position has been entirely cleared by the sale by Oscar Hammerstein of his interests in opera to the Metropolitan Opera House Company. Hitherto, as the reader is aware, New York has boasted of being able to support two opera houses. As a matter of fact it could not and did not. Hammerstein lost money at the Manhattan; the Metropolitan Opera Company could not exist if it were not subsidized by Mr. Vanderbilt and his friends. Opera on the European scale is too costly an amusement even for the plutocratic Americans to support.

Everybody is asking: "What is Oscar going to do with the Manhattan Opera House?" The Victoria, of course, goes on as hitherto. This is a very safe proposition. But those who know him are disinclined to think that Mr. Oscar Hammerstein is content either to take a back seat in the entertainment world or to retire into obscurity while his present vitality exists. It is safe to conjecture that there will be something doing next Fall in the big house on Thirty-fourth street. Some say vaudeville, some say spectacle, some say drama. All sorts of things are being said. We do not think Mr. Hammerstein knows himself.

We want to offer the versatile Oscar a suggestion. The opportunity of his life is before him. New York is clamoring for a first-class picture house on the grandiose scale, we mean the scale that T. J. West runs them on in Australia; on the scale of London, Paris, Rome, and, we believe, some of the Western American cities, where the picture is shown amidst surroundings that would not disgrace grand opera, with music of the very highest obtainable class, and with an administrative service of the best and most efficient. In other words, the picture is dignified to the same level as opera or Shakespearean tragedy. We hope Oscar Hammerstein will read this article and take the hint we are here giving him. If he does not, or won't, we hope that some other impresario will come forward and lift the picture from the five-cent plane to the dollar plane. What is the matter with the New Theater that pictures could not be shown there? Everybody knows that the New Theater is an experiment which is hardly likely to eventuate in financial success. It is quite conceivable that the picture at the New Theater, shown on the basis of dollar admissions, would attract a class of people who at present hesitate to recognize that the picture has any artistic or dramatic qualities.

Is the Sales Company a Legal Combination?

It will be remembered that a constant reproach against the Motion Picture Patents Company, especially in recent legal disputes, was that that company or trust, as it is variously termed, contravened the Sherman Act which was passed by the United States Legislature to prevent restraint of trade. But to the credit and intelligence of our Independent friends, we find that at last this absurd charge, fostered by an ignorant champion of the Independents, is no longer made. Judge Noyes, the other day in the Laemmle decision, disposed of the contention that the Patents Company was an illegal combination. As a matter of fact acting, under patent rights, it does not lay itself open to such an accusation.

The Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company had not been in existence many hours before the question of its legality was raised in our hearing by several persons interested, neither in the licensed or Independent side of the moving picture field, but still concerned with the business. So we repeat the question and we shall be glad to have the point settled by those most concerned, that is, the heads of the Sales Company.

What is the Sales Company? It is a trade combination apparently of an exclusive character. That is to say, it is handling the goods of its contributing members and only selling those goods to select exchanges. In other words, it is closing the market to competition. It is restraining trade, therefore, it seems to us, that it is contravening the provisions of the Sherman Act.

We may be wrong in this, but we are voicing a general impression. If that impression is wrong, then we should be glad to be set right in the matter. It would be a pity if, after all, the organizing work in connection with the company should fall down on the score of illegality. We hope that the legal advisers of the company have seen to this point. The question as to whether the General Sales Company is an infraction of the Sherman Act can then be settled judicially. Nevertheless, it would be as well, we think, if the company's officials took counsel's opinion on the point.

Picture Personalities.

T. J. West.

"West's Pictures" have a great vogue in Great Britain and Australia, so much so, that Mr. West has earned for himself the proud title of the "Picture King." He and his company own a chain of magnificent houses in Australia and another one in Great Britain. He is probably the largest buying exhibitor in the world, and his weekly purchases include the cream of American productions. Recently he came from Australia by way of Vancouver and scurrying across the American continent he stayed for a brief space of time in Chicago, and then darted in upon us in New York, preparatory to his sailing for England, from which he has been absent several months. Mr. West is the typical successful English man of business who, to our personal knowledge, struck into the exhibiting game in England some twelve or thirteen years ago, and then, when the moving picture came in evidence, went to New Zealand, and making a success of exhibiting there branched out into the business in Australia, returned to England, and so established the famous chain of theaters which bears his name. We suggested to Mr. West that he should extend his enterprises to the United State, because we think even Americans may learn something from the successful way in which he conducts his business.

West and his many theaters stand for the picture, and the picture alone, without vaudeville, and therefore his policy commends itself to our admiration. For one thing, the theaters he controls are far too large for vaudeville; then again, he has educated his public up to the acceptance of the picture by itself, and for itself. With this single qualification: Mr. West believes in high class music as an addition to, or a complement of, the picture. In pursuance of this policy the orchestras at his theaters are filled by musicians of the highest quality. So much so that thousands of people flock to his theaters as much for the music as for the pictures, and, of course, in the majority of cases for the combination of the two.

The West houses are not five and ten-cent houses; they are twenty-five and fifty-cent palaces. Nor are they run on the continuous principle. Six evening shows and two matinees are given each week. Nor are the pictures changed daily or even bi-weekly. They are kept in the bill for a week. Mr. West's experience is that people come again and again to see them. Moreover, as we know from Mr. West's practical experience in the projection end of matters, they are shown under the most advantageous circumstances—they are shown in such a manner so as always to elicit applause. Applause is a stronger feature of trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific audiences than it is in this country.

Mr. West buys from sixty to seventy thousand feet of film per week. Besides the staff of managers at the various houses, the employees of his company number many hundreds. This great business is centralized in London, whither Mr. West is just returning.

An Australian contemporary, discussing the West enterprise, describes it as a "gigantic network of which Mr. West stands to-day the distinguished and Napoleonic head." We have been very happy indeed to welcome Mr. West in his passage through New York and to meet in him an old friend of many years' standing, whose success is due to untiring hard work and an appreciation of what the public wants in the way of picture entertainments.

Geo. B. Graff.

Last week's World contained an appreciative notice of the first release of the Electragraff Company of Philadelphia, of which Mr. G. B. Graff is president. That release seems to have met with very general praise, which augurs well for the success of future films. Mr. Graff is one of those quiet men who comes to the front when he is least expected to do so. He has long made up his mind to make pictures, and has gone about the business in a thoroughly systematic way. So much so that Electragraff pictures are bound, in the nature of things, to be factors in the moving picture field before long. He has taken hold of the matter in a thoroughly scientific spirit—a spirit which we predicted last year in a series of articles called "The Modern Way in Moving Picture Making." We do not feel justified in giving away Mr. Graff's methods, but it will suffice to say that those methods, technically, pictorially and dramatically, are the best. The moving picture world should keep its eye on Electragraff pictures, which have entered the field of competitive quality, which we have pointed out over and over again, was bound to be the predominent feature in the making of independent moving pictures—in other words, the survival of the fittest. Anybody who enters the field of making moving pictures with this determination is bound to succeed, because he allows no obstacle to intervene between him and the production of pictures of the highest quality. This is the Electragraff programme. We shall watch the progress of this young company with great interest. Speaking generally, we welcome this feeling in the Independent field, which has too long been the sport of the mere emperic; that is to say, the man who does not rely upon exact knowledge for his work in the making of his pictures. Those bad old times seem to be passing away. It is unnecessary to say that Mr. Graff has long enjoyed widespread esteem as the proprietor of the well-known Eagle Film Exchange. He is a very popular member indeed of our little gallery of Picture Personalities.

George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, sailed for Europe last week on business pertaining to his theatrical enterprises.

C. B. Kleine has moved his supplies shop and salesroom to 19 East Twenty-first street, New York City. This central location will be more convenient to exhibitors who want their machines repaired, or a Power's and the getting supplies such as boxes and carbons.

THE THANHOUSER TRIUMPH

In the MOVING PICTURE WORLD of March the 12th, there appeared an article descriptive of the Thanhouser moving picture plant at New Rochelle. In the same number amongst our advertisements appeared an announcement of the company's first release called "The Actor's Children." Between the latter date, namely, March the 15th, and the moment when we are writing this article, May the 17th, barely two months or sixty days have elapsed, yet in that short space of time, one-sixth of a year, Edwin Thanhouser has emerged from the darkness of obscurity, from the realms of the unknown, and, by sheer force of personal merit, has won the respect of the moving picture field, and by absolutely high-class quality has secured for his pictures both dramatically and photographically a splendid reputation.

Only two months in business and daring to release a Shakespearean production in a film! When we heard of it we said to ourselves, in the current locution: "This is going some even for progressive America." It was a daring attempt. Even the attempt deserves commendation. We do not think in the whole history of moving picture making there has been another instance of such an attempt. Even so, the world is full of surprises. When we first met Edwin Thanhouser, the quiet, cultured, far-seeing impresario who made a striking success in the theatrical world, we felt that we had a man whose determination and ability were to make himself a factor in the moving picture field in the only possible way that commends itself to a man of his stamp: by force of good quality of work.

What about the Thanhouser "Winter's Tale" which was described and pictured in the last number of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD? Many of our readers have commented to us upon the beauty of those pictures which obviously show that Mr. Thanhouser had produced a very fine piece of work. Let anybody look at the photos on pages 835 and 836 of our last week's number, and they will see at a glance, that there is that indefinable "something" about them which indicates artistic and pictorial quality. There is a touch of refinement, a touch of pictorialism, the indefinable something that appeals even to the most ignorant and persuades them that the work is good.

But to the picture on the screen. We have seen the play of the "Winter's Tale" on the regular stage produced by many high-class companies. We believe that Augustin Daly once staged this piece. We know that Chatterton, Augustus Harris, Charles Dillon, all names no doubt familiar to Mr. Thanhouser, produced the piece. We believe that Mary Anderson once staged it. Anybody reading the story printed on page 835 of last week's issue will see that there is a touch of the sentimental, the idyllic, and the human in it. The final reconciliation of a long parted King and Queen sends us away with very nice impressions in our mind. The "Winter's Tale" belongs, of course, to the realm of domestic comedy and throughout it all is a strong vein of sentiment.

Dealing with kings and queens, of course, it gives an opportunity for magnificence of mounting, costumes and the like of which Mr. Thanhouser has taken full advantage.

We come now to the acting, and for this we have none but the highest praise. We have never seen better acting in any moving picture that has come before our eyes. All the parts struck us as properly cast and throughout the entire production we thought, nay, we are sure, we saw the master hand of an accomplished producer. Every movement, every gesture, every action, was suited to the text of the story. From the point of view of film production we regard the Thanhouser "Winter's Tale" as a masterpiece. And, think of it now, the man who made and produced this picture was absolutely unknown in the moving picture field three months ago. The record then assuredly belongs to Edwin Thanhouser, whom we cordially congratulate on his triumph and whom, to be perfectly frank, we expect to outdo even his present best as his opportunities and outlook broaden. He is a distinct acquisition to the science of moving picture making and he should have and we hope will have a career of uninterrupted success.

We have omitted till the latter part of this article reference to the photographic quality of this picture. We have seldom looked upon a moving picture film which gave us greater pleasure in respect of its photography, having regard to the fact that the man responsible for the photograph, we mean, of course, Mr. Thanhouser, was not known in connection with the subject three months ago. He has had the wit and the ability to people his factory with photographers of remarkable ability who can accurately expose a negative, accurately develop it, and make from that negative a positive which in respect of freedom from defects, excellence of color deposit, and gradation, leaves nothing to be desired.

This is very high praise, but it is thoroughly well deserved. When we make a special feature of singling the work of film manufacturers out for commendation, be sure that commendation is deserved. It is thoroughly well deserved in the present instance. Mr. Thanhouser's record will be hard to beat. He has been very swift to make it, he is well equipped in the most important end of film making, that is the producing end, while his photographic help is manifestly of an expert kind. There is, therefore, no reason why he should not go from triumph to triumph, and we cordially hope he will.

MAKING MOVING PICTURES POPULAR.

BY BERNARD C. COOK.

"'Feesh, feesh!'" a shrill little voice pipes in your ear and a little basket on the end of a stick is poked under your nose. In the little booth are two of the most charming Japanese girls you ever saw, with the prettiest smiles and the most sparkling eyes in the whole Fair. And those sparkling eyes and entrancing smiles and those piping little voices will stick with you for a long time. Do you know who the little Japanese girlies are? Why, Madame Pilar-Morin, the wonderful French pantomimist, and Mlle. Pauline Maurice, her clever little pupil." That is what a reporter wrote in Fair Topics, published by the Morning Telegraph, for the Actors' Fund Fair, held last week at the 71st Regiment Armory.

Every one of your readers knows Mme. Pilar-Morin, the wonderfully clever actress, seen in Edison's "Japanese Peachboy," and the widely known film, "Comedy and Tragedy," and lately in the beautiful production, "The Cigarette Maker of Seville."

A wonderful actress is Mme. Pilar-Morin. I had the pleasure of seeing her on the stage in a little play, entitled "The Actors." In this play Mme. Morin very cleverly takes the parts of seven different persons. One may understand her even if she does not use words. The art of "silent drama" so much praised in moving pictures is seen there. Imagine the situation and emotion of an actress who, just before she has to appear, hears that her only little girl, so much cherished, has been run over and killed and then finds it all to be a mistake of the bearer of the message! Her child is alive and comes to see her! One can follow Mme. Pilar-Morin during the whole act, every word spoken is motioned, every action is understood by her audience. With her pantomime she makes you feel worried at first, about herself and the fate of the child, and then at last you feel glad, glad the baby is alive, glad for her, and then the performance has to start and she, the mother and actress can appear to her audience with a real smile, happy at heart. Everybody bursts out in loud applause.

On another evening I saw her in a Japanese monologue, the story of a little Japanese girl, married to an American, for the first time seeing herself in a mirror. First her jealousy, thinking her own reflection to be another woman; then learning the truth, her vanity, a woman's vanity, admiring herself, her pretty face and hands. To see Madame Pilar-Morin act this, to see her poses and actions, was really a delight. I never enjoyed a performance more than this.

Morin is not only an actress, she is also a great admirer of moving pictures, and in a long interview she told me how sorry she was that pictures are not shown better than they are in the majority of New York's moving picture palaces. Why not time a picture and play the right music to it. Why, she said, it seems as if the managers are in favor of giving quantity shows, instead of quality. She is right, we should have more quality to the shows than quantity. Time the pictures to give the proper action and play the right music for them. Knowing Madame's ideas, I arranged to give a show of her films, timed properly and with the right music. Through the courtesy of Mr. Willis of the Kleine Optical Company, I secured the three Edison releases in which Mme. Pilar-Morin appears. We had a perfect performance, with a very enthusiastic audience of professionals and visitors to the Fair, and scored another victory for the moving picture field. Mme. Pilar-Morin told me that this was the first time she had seen a picture put on so successfully and that she was really moved by the way the show was given. She also praised the Pathe professional machine for its steadiness and clearness of projection. The audience praised the work and begged us to repeat the performance on another occasion.

I repeat Mme. Pilar-Morin's words: "Let the managers, operators and musicians put on such a show. Cut out a film and use more time on the other pictures. Let everybody co-operate to produce shows like this and I am sure the moving picture will be more popular, not only with the middle class, but also with the high class people so seldom frequenting these shows."

Readers, I hope this will be a tip for you.

FROM THE CRADLE TO THE GRAVE.

By H. F. Hoffman.

Mark Twain, at the conclusion of his story of "The Prince and the Pauper," qualifies the tale by remarking: "This may never have happened, but it could have happened." For the purpose of this purely speculative article I am obliged to borrow that remark from its illustrious author and stand behind whatever refuge it offers to one who is inclined to day dreams or building castles in the air.

More and more each day the world at large is beginning to see great future possibilities for the moving picture. Special writers for the magazines and daily papers are taking more serious notice of what they were prone to treat as a vulgar fad. Scientific men are turning their eyes and thoughts to the inevitable destiny of cinematography as the most powerful means of recording the wonders of microscopic life. Manufacturers are beginning to recognize its value as an advertising medium. Municipalities see in the animated photograph an opportunity to demonstrate to the world at large the commercial advantages of their particular city. Before long every church will own its own projecting apparatus and it is only a question of time when the motion picture will constitute the principal part of the geography lesson in the public schools.

We know all this, we picture men. All these future possibilities were apparent to us long ago; in fact, we grew rather weary of trying to induce a haughty world to realize what they are just beginning to grasp, so we will leave that now for the special writers to fight out among themselves as to just how great a factor the moving picture is going to be in the future.

However, before we turn the subject over to the lay writers, there is one side of the question I wish to touch upon because I have never seen it mentioned, and that is the sentimental side of moving pictures. It contains a certain beauty upon which I have allowed my mind to dwell for some time past, for by the sentimental side I mean the record of a human life, from the cradle to the grave.

How much more interesting the complete record of a human life would be over the life of a plant, or a bug! Such a picture at first thought would seem like an endless task and hardly worth the trouble, yet only the other day in reading of the death of King Edward VII., I came across the photographic record of his life, in still photo, from the cradle to the grave. Life is short; many men still remember him when he came here as a youth, being then Prince of Wales, and yet he is so soon laid at rest, an old and worn out man. The photographic record he leaves behind will serve, in a measure, for posterity to look upon, but these still photos will never show the twinkle of his eye; his smile and grace of manner are forever laid away with him, in the tomb.

The older we become the more we live in the past. Most of us would give our all to live life over; to bask once more in the youth that came and went before we realized what a priceless treasure it was. "Oh wad some power the giftie gie us, to see oursel's as ithers see us," prayed Robert Burns, never dreaming that some day the moving picture would answer that prayer. So also does it answer the prayer of Ponce de Leon, in a sense, for it can bring youth back to us, even if it can never bring us back to youth. Therein lies an unworked vein in the great mine of moving picture possibilities. It brings us to the threshold of the great future in store for the moving picture, for in following this idea are we not knocking on the door of the home? We are about to substitute a reel of film for the old family album, and once it takes its place in the home, the moving picture will never die. The end is not yet.

Let us suppose that some young parent of the present day were to take interest enough in his baby to pay for fifty feet of film, showing the infant in its mother's arms with the proud young father standing by. That fifty feet would not cost much more than some photographers are getting for a dozen good single prints. Well and good; the first fifty feet are titled and put away in the safety deposit vault. After a couple of years another fifty feet showing the baby walking is taken and put away with the first. Then at the age of five about seventy-five feet might show the little girl jumping rope. Perhaps by this time there is a new baby; if so, the new comer will add to the interest of the growing reel, as each new child should be included and the parents as well, for this reel is to be a family record, kept safely from fire and water, and only to be brought out on special occasions.

At ten years the growing miss would be showing signs of budding character, and from this point the transition from girlhood into womanhood would be of much interest with a certain amount of sweetness and pathos. At the age of ten we see the bouncing schoolgirl; our next picture shows her as the sweet girl graduate, with hair still in braids, standing innocent eyed on the threshold of the broad world, saying good-bye forever to childhood days. And next we have her as a debutante. No more braided tresses, but a coiffure sublime and wardrobe divine. Then comes a little scene of courtship and in the next fifty or seventy-five feet we see Jack boldly approach her father and mother and ask them in pantomime for the hand of our grown-up baby.

The wedding takes place, not in a church, but in a large moving picture studio that has been built for the especial accommodation of wedding parties (A. D., 1930). As each of the chidren is married a print from the original negative is given them and each continues with his or her branch of the family moving picture album. In due time our original baby has become a mother, and in due time she becomes a grandmother, but all this time she has been filmed with her children and grandchildren, so we have a pretty good record of her growing old. When the golden wedding comes around they have a new way of celebrating, for they simply bring the reels from the safe deposit vault, and there, with all the grandchildren sitting around, grandma lives her whole life over again. She lectures the kiddies and tells them what a good little girl she was, and she has the pictures there to prove it, but the children only look and wonder at the funny clothes folks wore when grandma was a girl. The day must come when each and all must pass across to the silent shore. So grandma did, from a life well spent and a love well earned, but she's living still, and always will; the picture tells her story—from the cradle to the grave.

As Mark Twain said, "This may never have happened, but it could happen." And what is more, I learn that it will happen very soon. If rumor is correct, a large corporation has been very recenty formed to deal exclusively in the portrait end of moving picture work. Their first bid will be to the prominent families of New York's Four Hundred, and once it is taken up by prominent families it will soon become the fashionable thing to preserve the family record in moving pictures. The successful picture man will cleverly weave a thread of interest or plot through his series of family records. The more cleverly he does this the greater will be his success. He will not wait for babies to begin with, but will start with any and all periods of life. It will be easier and not so costly as producing plays, and therefore perhaps more profitable, but the main thing is that it will finally bring the moving picture into the home, and there it will endure for all time.

CHICAGO.

Highbrowed Boston may lay claim to being the brainy part of Uncle Sam's anatomy. New York may be likened to the mouth, swallowing the fruit of other nations. Philadelphia and Pittsburg, with their vast coal and iron industries, typify the sinews of strength; but Chicago is the heart, pulsating with life, from which radiate the arteries and veins supplying vim and vigor to the system. Chicago, the city of tall buildings and big enterprises. Hustling, smoky, progressive Chicago, the typical American city.

And in the course of its development it is but natural that in Chicago we should find in the moving picture field instances of the rapid rise and growth of big enterprises characteristic of that city. Chicago has the biggest film producing plant. Chicago has the biggest individual film exchanges. Chicago is the home of the "biggest and best film renter in the world!" Chicago has the biggest theaters devoted to the exclusive exhibition of moving pictures.

Breathing the atmosphere of strenuous life (albeit charged with smoke and din), we endeavored in five days to get a line on the moving picture business in the metropolis of the West. In giving our impressions, priority of mention or neglect to mention any concern must not be taken as a slight, but due to the exigencies of space.

Among the Exhibitors.

A very large portion of our time was taken up in visiting the moving picture theaters, for it was a delight to find in this mainstay of the business not only magnificent amusement palaces devoted exclusively to the moving picture and doing a profitable business, but we met and conversed with many exhibitors who were men of high ideals, progressive, substantial men, in whose conduct the future of the business is assured. We have already in these pages given mention to the Orpheum, one of the chain of theaters owned by Jones, Linick & Schaefer—all well conducted and all prosperous. But in unexpected locations in the residential district we ran across many other houses equally worthy of mention. For example, on North avenue is the "Janet," a building of enameled brick construction—not only in front but on all sides. Here we witnessed an excellent exhibition of independent pictures on the mirror screen, and, by the way, Mr. Hyman, the owner of this pretty theater, confessed to us that things looked pretty blue for him until the mirror screen turned the tide in his favor. And there was a tide of humanity in double line blocking the street in front on the occasion of our visit. A few hundred feet away we noticed another crowd waiting for admission to the Ideal, a theater on the third floor. Imagine a New York crowd of amusement seekers standing in line for fifteen or thirty minutes and then climbing three flights of stairs to see—a moving picture show! But they do it at the Ideal, and the how and why was very obvious when we gained admission. The owner-manager, Mr. Gilmore, could give us little time for other than a hand shake until the close of the show. He was all over the house, seeing to the comfort of his patients, and in and out of the booth, helping the operator, who, we might add, needed very little assistance, as he had been with the show since it started and he certainly put on a very fine picture. Wild applause here greeted the Gaumont scenic "Gigantic Waves," and especially one of Kalem's Indian stories which closed the show and sent the young folks home with happy faces.

An hour's ride in another direction brought us to the Garfield, where we found another crowd lined up in front of the box office. Here also the mirror screen was one of the sources of attraction, or, at least, the means of making an attractive show more captivating. It seems that during the week in Chicago that no less than five mirror screens were being installed in as many theaters, which shows that the Chicago theater manager spares no expense to give the public the best pictures possible. Another evening we dropped into a show in the downtown shopping district, a long and narrow building, where the throw was fully 120 feet. Someone recently inquired of the editor of the operator's column whether a steady picture could be projected with a throw of 90 feet. A visit to the "Senate" would be his answer. We were so impressed with the rock steadiness of the picture on the screen that we waited until the show was over to visit the operating boot. Here we met a most intelligent young man, Louis Riner, (a living rebuttal to the degenerate aspersion) who, when asked how he managed to project so steady a picture, pointed to rubber guide rollers of his own invention with which he had equipped both machines. We say both machines, for all the operating booths that we visited seemed to be equipped in duplicate, so that one machine could always be in thorough repair. This operator, like others whom we talked to, seemed to take pride in saying that the inactive machine was regularly cleaned and overhauled—a point we recommend to operators nearer home—and this care of the machine was no doubt largely responsible for the steady picture. But the operator promised to send us a set of the rubber rollers for trial and we may have something to say of them again.

The first mirror screen in the down-town district has been installed in the Lyric Theater, at State and Van Buren streets. This house is one of a number controlled by the Jones-Linick-Schaefer circuit, who, in putting in the mirror screen, have shown themselves alive to the needs of a modern moving picture theater. The house itself is of attractive design, with a floor inclined all the way down to the stage, and seats about 300. The picture on the screen is of about the right size, and the operators run steady and do not grind. The music and drum effects are good, and suit the pictures well.

At the Palace Theater, at Fifty-ninth and States streets, we found a very nice, unpretentious little house showing good pictures and showing them well. Mr. C. Lawson Hall, the manager, believes in advertising his show, and has had small handbills prepared announcing the subjects he has for Sunday. The efficacy of his advertising is shown by the crowd who wait outside at every show. Mr. Hall presents an unusually good show, as there is no competition near to force him to use new films; the films we saw there were an Essanay one day old and a Biograph less than a week old. The operator ran steadily and did not hurry, though most of the time there was a large crowd waiting outside.

At the Victor, at Forty-third street and Ellis avenue, we found another mirror screen. This house is exceedingly long; and the picture is comparatively very small, but the projection is so good that it may be seen just as well from the rear of the house as from the front. There is one feature in the arrangement of the house which might well be copied by some other houses. There are two aisles at the sides of the house. As the distance between the ends of these aisles is so great, people who might wish to cross the center section of seats would be greatly inconvenienced if they had to go to the end of the aisle or to cross between two rows of occupied seats. This difficulty has been solved very nicely at the Victor by the removal of a row of seats in the center section, making a cross aisle near the center of the house. The projection here is excellent, and the pictures were run smoothly and steady; even on the last show, in marked contrast to a house across the street, in which a film which was also shown at the Victor was projected very poorly and unsteadily. The music at the Victor was also good. The Edison film, the "Cigarette Maker of Seville," was shown here accompanied by the Carmen music while it was on the screen.

With few exceptions, the Chicago houses have adopted rational methods of interior illumination, i. e., plenty of light deflected towards the aisles and seats, but shaded from the screen and the eyes of the spectators. So much for the Chicago shows.

The Home of the Motiograph.

A pleasant afternoon was spent with Mr. A. C. Roebuck in the inspection of the plant of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, of which he is now in sole control. Here we saw a mechanical equipment perfected in arrangement and complete in detail. One can scarcely wonder at the marvelous perfection of the Motiograph machine when the methods of its construction are laid bare. But Mr. Roebuck is a true Chicaguan and he does not rest on his laurels. The factory was busy on new parts and new improvements that will add still more to the talking points of the Motiograph machine and they are now many. Of these improvements more anon.

George Kleine's Multifarious Duties.

While on the subject of machines, we must mention George Kleine's Edengraph, which for precision and variety of motion is in a class by itself. Mr. Kleine is justly proud of the Edengraph and tells us that the demand has hitherto exceeded the supply, but that the factory work is now so far advanced that they can be assembled in larger quantities. We ventured to remark that a machine of such watch-like construction could hardly be expected to stand the racket. Mr. Kleine's reply was characteristic, in that he voiced no comment, but he pulled up his stenographer to produce the correspondence of Mr. [illegible] and handed us a letter from a veteran exhibitor who had purchased one of the first Edengraph machines. The letter was to the effect that Mr. [illegible] had about completed another theater and was deferring his date of opening for the arrival of an Edengraph machine. None other would satisfy him. Enough said.

A visit to Mr. Kleine's establishment is stimulating to a degree. With offices in five principal cities and in Canada the details of his vast interests are so systematized that we can tell at a glance of his weekly report sheets how his business stands. With his widely separated units of operation and his many connections we should say that there is no man in closer touch with the pulse of the moving picture business to-day in the whole world than George Kleine. A wise general, Mr. Kleine is singularly discreet in his selection of lieutenants and department heads. More than passing mention is due to his able second in command, Mr. R. Nehls, and his publicity manager, Mr. Leroy Goble. But the usual run of men we meet in this or any other line of business and with whom we could desire closer acquaintance. We happened in at a time when Mr. Goble was showing that remarkable film, "The Story of Esther," to the Chicago police censor and several assistants. The representative of the Chicago police force, by-the-way, was a highly intelligent person and a competent critic of moving pictures, judging from his comment on this and other films as we sat side by side.

Geo. K. Spoor's Enterprises.

Just outside "the Loop," as the elevated railroad system is termed, which encircles the business heart of Chicago, are the executive offices of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company and the George K. Spoor Film Exchange. The spacious, lofty and well appointed quarters of this exchange are so different from the usual thing that it looks more like the office of a bank, insurance company, or other large corporation. Here Mr. Kennedy, the efficient manager, entertained us with tales of the successes of Essanay films and Mr. Spoor, just back from a visit to his Western studio, regaled us with stories of the doings of his partner, Mr. Anderson, among the Indians and cowboys. An invitation was extended to visit the Essanay plant in the outskirts of the city—not big as yet, but with plenty of room to grow and plans for new buildings under way. Here, under the able management of Mr. Hamilton, the famous Essanay comedies are produced and the films developed and printed for all over the world. For the foreign demand for Essanay films was growing so steadily and rapidly that it necessitated night work until the new buildings were completed. But comedy is not alone featured in this studio. On the occasion of our visit a drama was being produced and an elaborate ballroom scene was being photographed in which the noted actress Miss Martha Spier, was being featured. Those who see this Essanay drama when it is released will do so with a sense of satisfaction, which, being analyzed, may be attributed to the competent Essanay stock company and also to the solid and handsome parlor suites and furnishings which were being used in the various scenes. In everything that will add to the quality of the pictures Mr. Hamilton makes free use of Mr. Spoor's policy and instructions to go the limit. The remarkable growth of this business during the two and a half years of its existence may be laid to hard work and the happy faculty of doing the right thing at the right time and in the right way. In other words, Mr. Spoor has applied his experience as an amusement purveyor with his knowledge of human nature to the science of the making of moving pictures.

The film manufacturing industry is indeed well represented in Chicago. Pathe's new representative, Mr. K. W.

Linn, is extremely popular with the trade, and when we called he was as proud as a boy with his first pants over the success he was having with the first Pathe-American film "The Girl from Arizona." John Hardin's frame of mind over the success he was having with the Edison productions is conducive to his rapidly acquiring that degree of convexity which is the prerogative of licensed interests. Lubin is well represented in the person of Mr. Fulton, who feels that his efforts, as well as Lubin quality, is responsible for a large increase of sales. Mr. Fulton is fitting up a unique exhibition room which he intends will be an object lesson to exhibitors in wall decoration and lighting. In the Schiller Building is the Western office of the Vitagraph Company, presided over by John Rock, a chip of the old block. Rapidly developing the paternal bump of acquisitiveness, he loses no opportunity of making sales of the Vitagraph and Melies films. As a matter of fact, he kept his nose so close to the grindstone that his degree of convexity had no chance to develop, so he moved his home some fifty miles out into the country, where, he tells us, that he rises with the sun in the morning.

The Selig Polyscope Company.

We reserve for final mention of Chicago's greatness in the moving picture manufacturing field the plant of the Selig Polyscope Company—for verily it is the last word in moving picturedom. About a year ago one of us visited the Selig plant and in the World of August 21, 1909, painted a word picture of its then magnitude and super excellence. Since then an equal amount of land has been acquired and the walls of another building are being raised which will more than double the former capacity. In our former article we mentioned the Selig lake, the collection of animals and the heterogeneous mass of properties, from a cannon to a flowerpot and from a lighthouse to my lady's boudoir. The lake is still there, the animals have increased, around the enclosure roam camels, wild asses, bears, deer, sheep and other live props which appear in Selig dramas. And the collection of scenic properties is bewildering.

General Manager Tom Nash was our escort and explained the inactivity around the grounds by the fact that one company had left that morning for some point along the Chicago River to make a certain scene. Another company was operating in Los Angeles and still another in the South. But inside the main buildings there was enough activity. Stage carpenters were hammering and scene painters busy on the settings for some future play. Manager Nash kindly piloted us through the ruby gloom of the labyrinths where films are perforated and printed by the mile. The scores of machines clicking unceasingly and the silent attendants moving about in the dim red glow created an eerie feeling which was quickly dispelled as we passed into the examining and joining room where scores of pretty and happy looking girls were deftly inspecting and piecing together the positive prints. In truth, Mr. Nash is a very modest man and he was almost apologetic as he pointed out features that he thought would interest a stranger. But he is entitled to puff out his manly chest and crow if he wants to over the great industry that has grown up under his eyes and hands during the past few years and which before the close of the year will be more than doubled in size and quadrupled in efficiency.

Back to "the loop" again with Mr. Selig, to his well-appointed offices at 45 Randolph street. Here we are introduced to Mr. Gordon, trumpeter in chief for the Selig cohorts and shake hands with Gus and John, brothers of the famous "Bill." On the walls we notice a handsome bromide enlargement of a California Mission and inquire its interest. What is our surprise to learn that it is a photograph of the front of a Selig studio which is now being erected on the outskirts of Los Angeles. A substantial stone and cement building after the style of the early San Franciscan monasteries. This is to be the permanent home of one of the Selig companies and we hope to show our readers full views of it as soon as it is completed.

Mr. Exhibitor, if we were to tell you all that we saw and heard in our tour among the manufacturers you would make haste to build bigger and better theaters to house the crowds that will want to see the big things that are in preparation.

The Exchanges.

From the manufacturer to the distributer is a natural step, and in Chicago it is an easy one, for they are all, with the single exception already mentioned, congregated within that "loop." And they are a more sociable set of fellows than we have in the East. They have a knack of all getting hungry at the same time and they all seem to prefer the viands in a certain restaurant which is propitious to the entente cordiale which seems to prevail. No doubt the after-dinner cigar and chat is responsible for the smoothing out of many wrinkles in their business that would otherwise lead to ruptures.

In a building on Dearborn street, across the hall from a bank, is the Theater Film Service. It is as well arranged and as well conducted as its neighbor, but truly a rare location for an exchange. Presided over by Mr. Fred C. Aiken, it is due to him to say that the high standing of this exchange and its great popularity is due to his close personal attention and the application of clean business principles. Every department is so systematized that an enormous amount of business is transacted without the usual delays and mistakes. Incoming films are carefully inspected and a washing machine takes care of all the waterproofed films. Mr. Aiken says that he is closely watching the increased serviceability of waterproofed films and if results warrant he will have all his films waterproofed.

Not far away is the Standard Film Exchange, also occupying a well lighted floor. Joseph Hopp, like Mr. Aiken, attends strictly to his own business. He has no time to find fault with the shortcomings of any of his competitors and if any complaints in regard to his own service reach him he does not rest until the matter is adjusted, consequently he serves around 125 customers. Hopp is also a believer in system and wears the broad smile that goes with convexity and a profitable business.

On Clark street we find the American Film Service and the Anti-Trust Film Service occupying contiguous floors in the same building. We suggest that a revolving door be placed between so that no customer be allowed to escape to the street with his money, but be shot from one exchange to the other. Mr. Van Ronkel, of the American, is a very busy man, but he managed to tell us how he was getting the business and his busy office certainly looked it.

Crossing the hall we had an interesting chat with Mr. Plugh, of the Anti-Trust Film Exchange. Mr. Plugh uttered some very pointed remarks at the banquet of the Alliance and these he enlarged upon. He is doing a very good business, but says, what is true, that there are too many film exchanges. The fact that Mr. Plugh has the esteem of his competitiors on both the Independent and licensed sides proves that he is running his office on good business principles.

But the busiest exchange of all, judging from the number of people in evidence, was the Laemmle Film Service. With characteristic enterprise, Mr. Laemmle has secured a film made on the other side showing King Edward but a short time before his fatal illness and this was being shown on our visit. When Laemmle moved to 196 Lake street he was called foolish for taking so large a place, but his business has already outgrown it, which shows the sagacity of the little wizard of the Independent ranks.

Eugene Cline, a most liberal buyer of Independent films, holds a big list of customers by close personal attention to their wants.

Space will not permit reference to all the Chicago exchanges, but Calumet, H. & H., Swanson, Globe, Chicago Film Exchange, etc., all seem to be doing their fair share of business.

J. P. C.

Owing to infringements of United States copyright, Mr. Gregg A. Frelinger, of Lafayette, Ind., is instituting injunction proceedings in the Federal Court against several publishers. Mr. Frelinger's book of descriptive music for moving picture theaters, advertised on another page of the World, was the pioneer in this field, and the publisher is taking the above steps to protect his copyright.

Albert E. Smith, of the Vitagraph Company, who left some time ago for a week's stay in Europe is still there. Possibly he is waiting for the funeral of King Edward and will bring back with him a negative of the procession and obsequies and be the first to issue it to the American market.

Temple, Tex.—The Majestic Theater (the oldest house in Temple, Tex.) after running vaudeville eighteen months has changed to pictures and songs, and are now running three reels of the latest Association pictures and one spotlight and one illustrated song. Business is a great deal better than while running vaudeville. This is another case that proves that the public want good pictures and not cheap vaudeville.

Vogel & Heck, of Waco, Tex., have opened an airdome in Temple, Tex., their show consisting of two vaudeville acts and two reels of pictures. They report business as being good.

The Imperial Theater, which opened in Temple, Tex., April 11, with stock, have closed after two weeks of very poor business.

W. F. L.

The good old Summer time is fast drawing near and the crop of Summer resort and seaside moving picture operators is fast increasing. The Si Pumpkin and the Bill Pickle who hibernated beside the friendly old-fashioned stove in the village post-office and grocery all Winter is upon his feet again and he is preparing to show his fellow townsmen that he can give them all the "pictors" they want, and the right kind, too, although he did not spend his Winter in the cities getting posted. Many of the city people are preparing for a campaign during the Summer at their favorite resorts, but in the distance we see the hibernator, with sardonic grimace, and hear him declare, "Let 'em come. I was born and raised here, and know what our people want." And so, when the city man feels that his season of competition is over and he will soon be able to place himself and family in some attractive resort for the Summer and cover the bill with the net receipts of his picture show, he finds himself face to face with home competition. There is one consolation. "Home, sweet home," is not unlimited in its application. Wherever you strike a small town near the seaside, on the mountain, or in the woods you are bound to strike a peculiar vein of self-importance and praise which almost invariably reflects jealousy; and when one of the townsmen embarks in the field of entertainment who will hear so many, ever so many, say, "Wal, where does he come in to open a showhouse? Why, I carried water to the elephants long before he was born and in the city of Phil'delphi' a helped one of the best 'lectricians of that time put 'nunciators in houses. He never did that. What does he know about a pictur' machine? He never turned anything but the lever of a cider press." And so, when the city man comes along he is greeted with cheers and received with open arms. But there is a come-back to this. Every sixth man constituting the welcoming delegation wears a big star on the left lapel of his coat—a star large enough to eclipse the now famous Halley comet, and every one of them counts upon being appointed special officer for the show the city man is about to exploit, or else secure the appointment of some relative as oprator of the machine, singer, or pounder of the piano. Of course, the newcomer cannot appoint more than ten per cent. of the population to positions in his nickelodeon, and when this becomes apparent he finds that the trunk full of tickets he brought with him from the city will far more than carry him through the season. I know of a case where a city man laid out a most elaborate plan to take his family to a nice, quiet place for the Summer and get out of it with a nice margin of profit at the end of the season over and above all expenses. When he got his location and was ready for the "grand opening" his working staff was as follows: Outside manager (barker), Old Pop Ginger; ticket seller, Miss Sallie Ginger; ticket taker, Young Joe Ginger; operator, Uncle Turner Ginger; chief usher, Walker Ginger; pianiste, Miss Ophelia Ginger; vocalist, Master Howling Ginger. He had all the members of the most prominent and influential family of the town cooped in the show with the exception of the wife and mother, Mrs. Cookem Ginger, but she also was under contract as general advertising agent. She went about the town telling what a grand show her family was giving down in the old feed mill. It looked like a sure winner until a feud started and the hopeful exhibitor found he had too much Ginger in his show. He tried to recuperate by dispensing with one of the pieces of Ginger, and when he did the whole bunch quit him. When he filled his house with the talent the Gingers opened war on him with a campaign cry of breaking a season's contract.

The moral of this case is that the city man must take his talent with him, even if the troupe must "double up in brass." Home talent is a treacherous article to deal with. A friend of mine got through a season at a prominent resort very successfully by following out this idea. He acted as his own manager and barker. His wife played the piano and sang. His daughter sold tickets and occasionally sang to relieve the mother. His son was the usher, and, when the house seemed settled, went on the stage and alternatly did an acrobatic and song and dance turn. The members of the family were billed under different names so as to cover the relationship and make it appear that each was a separate under contract to the manager. The scheme worked well, but how many nickelodeon managers have a flock of that kind?

There is one thing that all must give the Motion Picture Patents Company credit for. That is its efforts to stop misrenting. If its work in this direction could be made more effective the exhibitor of the city would have a better opportunity to give his family a breathing spell in the country during the Summer months. With subrenting in vogue the outlook is discouraging. Here is the situation: A man in a good sized town rents a number of reels by the week from a city exchange. After using them in his own place he subrents them to amateurs at Summer resorts so that each of the latter places get a change of three reels a day for from six to nine dollars a week. He rents, let, say, eighteen reels a week and pays from eighteen to thirty-five dollars a week for them. The result is that he gets his own shows free and clear of film chargs and makes a substantial profit besides, and not only that, a bona fide exhibitor who is prepared to spend money and give good shows is brought face to face with ruinous competition. I think this is a matter to which both the licensed and independent exchanges should give their most serious and effectual attention without delay. The exhibitor who is trying to be an exhibitor all the year should receive protection.

I read with interest the Moving Picture World's recent editorial, replying in the affirmative to the question, "Will it last?" as applied to the popularity of moving pictures. I am impelled to add to the editorial a declaration made in the New York World of Sunday, 15th inst., by Louis V. De Foe, in his review of the metropolitan theatrical field for the season of 1909-10. He wrote: "The growing popularity of the cheap moving picture shows . . . has depopulated the low-priced seats in galleries and balconies of the regular playhouses."

Well, even small offerings are thankfully received. We assume that by "cheap moving picture shows" Mr. De Foe does not mean that the shows are cheap as to quality, but refers to the admission prices being cheaper than those charged by the regular playhouses. To take the other view would render void Mr. De Foe's declaration as to their growing popularity and discredit his assertion as to the depopulation. The writer I have quoted is one of the best qualified critics of the present day and when he so frankly admits the effect of the picture shows upon the regular houses one may well repeat, "It will last."

All the picture houses now in existence will not last, not by any means. The managers who remain content to "depopulate the balconies and galleries of the regular playhouses" will not last, but must gradually give way to the more energetical and enterprising managers who are trying to get into the picture houses the people who occupy the higher priced seats in the regular houses, and this they are gradually accomplishing. These people already acknowledge that moving pictures form an important factor in the amusement field and are patronizing them, but the effect will not be felt to a great extent in the lower parts of the regular houses until the places of exhibition are more nearly like the houses they have been patronizing. It is not likely that the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City will be turned into a picture house either next Fall or Winter, nor years hence; but if I had predicted a year ago that during the season of 1910 the famous old Academy of Music of that city, the scene of so many triumphs by so many grand opera, tragic and dramatic stars, would be transformed into a moving picture house, how many people would have believed me? There must be some merit in and future for the pictures when several of the most astute men in the theatrical business will take such a large place for them. I have heard that the rental to be paid for the Academy is in the neighborhood of $200 per annum, and I believe I was reliably informed. "Will it last?" Can a duck swim?

OPERATOR'S COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Tension Springs and Travel Ghost.—Bluffton, Ind., writes: "Very much pleased with your answers to my last questions. Here are some more: (1) Edison machine. If I speed up the picture on the screen begins to creep up and get out of frame. The faster I go the faster the film climbs. On some films if the pressure is removed from the crank the picture on the screen will drop down six inches or more. I think my tension springs are a little weak. (2) What causes the streaks of white that can be seen on clear pictures and extra light places? The streaks are brighter than the rest of the curtain and are stationary. Thanks for your help in telling me about the Taylor school. Have sent for the course. I am sure you will excuse my bothering you when you know that I am only four feet ten inches in height!"

(1) The frame-up carriage being too loose on its sliding ways would act as you have described, but would not jump back up when pressure was removed from handle. We must therefore look elsewhere. I think you will find that your tension springs being too weak, they bulge downward (I use the word "bulge" from lack of a better one) under the pull of the film. When pressure is removed from crank they come back to normal position. On some films they will carry the film back with them, but with others they do not. Install a new set of tension springs. (2) I think it must be a travel ghost you have. A travel ghost is streaks of light shooting upward or downward from any white object in the picture or from letters in a title. It is caused by the shutter being out of time a trifle, the direction of the streaks indicating which way it is "out." Move your shutter just a little and try it. A little experimenting will get it just right. I may, of course, be mistaken about it being a travel ghost, but think I am not. If the streaks show shooting up or down from title letters that is what it is. You are not "bothering" me, "Bluffton." I am paid by the paper to answer your questions and you are welcome to use the column as much as you may wish. Evidently low ceilings won't bother you much. Should you visit New York, drop in at the World office. Mr. Chalmers will cheerfully have the top of the door sawed out higher to admit you.

Green Ghost.—Elizabethtown, Pa., writes: "(1) What causes a light, green ghost on left side of picture? Have tried cleaning condensers, moving lamphouse back and forth, setting carbons different ways, but all to no purpose. Throw 38 feet, size of picture 7 x 9. (2) Should condensing lenses be placed close enough together to touch one another?"

Well, brother, I'm afraid you've got me. A "green" ghost is a new one! (1) A ghost on one side of picture would indicate lamp too far to one side, but I take it this is not the trouble, else surely you would have remedied it long since. Examine your curtain closely and see that there is nothing about it to cause such an effect. Throw the white light on it with machine standing still and running (no film in). See if your machine head sets square with the condenser lens. See if your two condenser lenses set square with each other. See if the lenses of your projection lens are all tight in their holders. See if the light strikes the opening in operating room wall. The color of that ghost has me guessing and if you don't find its cause from some of the above let me hear from you again. (2) Quite close together but not touching.

Size of Edison Lenses.—For the benefit of my readers I will give the sizes of picture the various Edison lenses are supposed to throw. Just why things should be thus mixed up is not quite apparent. Of the motion picture lenses Nos. 1 and 4, Nos. 2 and 5, and Nos. 3 and 6 throw the same sizes; in other words, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 project the same sizes as Nos. 4, 5 and 6, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 being higher quality lenses than 4, 5 and 6.

Nos. 1 and 4 project a picture three (3) feet wide to each ten (10) feet of throw. Nos. 2 and 5 lenses project a picture three (3) feet wide to every thirteen (13) feet of throw. Nos. 3 and 6 lenses project a picture three (3) feet wide to every nineteen (19 feet of throw. Stereo lenss Nos. 1A and 1AA project the same size as motion picture lenses Nos. 1 and 4. Stereo lens No. 2A projects the same size as M. P. lenses Nos. 2 and 5. Stereo lens No. 3A projects the same size as M. P. lenses Nos. 3 and 6. In all cases measurements of picture refer to its width only.

Shaft Level—Lenses.—New York City, N. Y., asks: "(1) I get a 12 x 14-foot picture at 55 feet. What size lens have I and what focal length condensing lenses should I have? (2) How can I measure to see if intermittent shaft of Powers No. 5 is level? (3) Can a flag be projected on the screen as if it were waving by means of some mechanical device or must one have a film?"

(1) Multiply throw in feet by exact width of aperture and divide the result by width of picture in feet. Result will be equivalent focus of lens. In your case it is about a four-inch lens and you should have two 7½-inch condensing lenses. (2) The cam shaft of Powers No. 5 is always level, provided the bushings are not worn unevenly. Measure from center of cam shaft at one end to center of star (intermittent) shaft. Then measure the same at other end and if the shafts are the same distance apart at both ends the intermittent (star) shaft is level. (4) No. A film is necessary.

Current Strength.—Nashville, Tenn, asks: "(1) What is best capacity for arc on direct current for long throw on moving picture work? (2) Assuming that from a light standpoint 60 amperes at 50 volts is satisfactory, would there be danger of the film catching fire due to the intense heat of such an arc, remembering that D. C. would develop greater heat than A. C.? (3) Is it possible to say how many seconds it would require to set film on fire from heat of a 60-ampere, 50-volt arc?"

(1) It takes no more current to project a given size picture 100 feet than it does fifty. As I have previously explained, it is the size of the picture that determines the necessary light strength to produce a given brilliancy and not the distance the picture is projected. (2) There is no use "assuming" that a 60-ampere D. C. arc would be satisfactory, for it would not. I have known of sixty amperes being used, but I have seen no appreciable advantage in increased current strength after passing the fifty ampere mark. You cannot handle the arc to advantage with current exceeding fifty amperes—or at least that has been my experience. There would be no danger so long as the film is kept moving. I would not care to risk less than forty feet per minute on that kind of light, however. (3) One-half second would probably be sufficient. It would depend to some extent on how small a spot you had. The smaller the greater amount of heat, of course.

Aperture Probably Loose.—Minn. (name of town suppressed) writes: "Since the Operator's Column helped me out so nicely before I am coming back for more. My film don't 'stay put' in the aperture. Sometimes it is too far to one side and sometimes too far to the other, and again it will be perfectly square in the aperture. It usually switches when a patch goes through. Have tried moving the plate over both ways, but it don't seem to help. The intermittent sprocket has no play sidewise at all. The gate guide rollers seem to allow no play, nor does the film cup or buckle at all, as the picture is always sharp and clear. Machine is Edison Underwriter's Model, Type B. Am running 30 to 60-day stuff, mostly in good condition. Don't believe the trouble is in the film."

Gee, old man, you're handing me a bundle this time. You say you have moved the aperture plate over, so I assume it is not loose. Nevertheless you look in past the right-hand side of the plate and you will see two screws away back in the inside of things which hold the casting on which the aperture plate is fastened. Be sure these screws are tight. Aside from this, as you say there is no side motion in the sprocket or elsewhere, you have got me up a tall stump. Have sent your letter to the Edison people who no doubt will communicate with you concerning the matter. You folks do chase me into the tall timber once in a while! No, there is no adjustment for tightening tension springs. Just take your screwdriver and bow them out. That's the way it is done and the only way it can be done.

Quite a Bunch of Them.—Cody, Wyoming, asks the following: "(1) With a house 30 x 75 feet, seating 240 people, population of town 3,000, no other form of amusement, would a ten-cent moving picture house pay and would it be advisable to run every night or only two or three nights a week? (2) Does a dissolving stereopticon add much to the show—is it worth the extra expense? (3) With room 30 x 75, 14-foot ceilings, what size screen and picture is advisable? (4) Distance from front of lens to screen would be 60 to 65 feet. What would be the best lens to use? (5) Would you use piano music only and illustrated songs (no vaudeville)? (6) Would the use of sound effects be advisable? (7) Would it be advisable to use a mirror screen? (8) Is the ————, with dissolving stereo, a first-class machine? Is it the equal of any other? (8) Our light circuit is alternating, 60-cycle, 3-phase, 220 and 110-volt, fairly steady, and meter service costs 15 cents per M. K. W. What electrical equipment would you advise?"

(1) Replying to your first query with any degree of intelligence would be an utter impossibility unless I knew local conditions—knew your people. Carefully estimate your weekly expense bill—not mutual cost of plant but cost of operation after installation. This will include the payroll, rent, film service, express charges, etc. Estimate this carefully and then see what percentage of the total population of your city must attend once every week to cover the actual expense of operation. Suppose your total expense is $100 per week. It would require 1,000 paid admissions to meet the expense bill each week. Surely you ought to get that many and enough more to make it pay, provided you give a reasonably good show. (2) Yes, to both queries. (3) Ten by twelve is about as large as you can throw without the heads of the audience interfering too much in the light. That is an excellent size, however, and large enough for that size house. (5) What size, I suppose you mean. About 5-inch equivalent focus. Have the company who sells you your outfit send a lens to project a 10 x 12 picture, informing them of the exact distance from lens to screen. The Gundlach-Manhattan lenses are excellent. (5) I presume you mean to ask if I would advise the use of piano music only and no vaudeville. Yes, I think I would not attempt anything but piano at first at least. Later if all goes well you might add a snare drum. I would run pictures only, with one illustrated and possibly one spot light song each show. (6) Sound effects are advisable provided they are used rightly, but unless care and intelligence are exercised in their use the results will not be of the best. Experiment carefully and make haste slowly in this matter, adding an effect only after ascertaining positively that you can make it "go." (7) They are very expensive and your town is a small one. I think I would proceed with caution. (8) The machine you name is excellent in some ways but it is hardly the one I would recommend. I cannot make recommendations in matters of this kind in this column, for obvious reasons. (9) You should have a low voltage transformer, called an Inductor by the Powers Company, an Economizer by Hallberg, a Compensarc by the Fort Wayne Electric Company and other names by other makers. It must be specially wound to take care of your two dissolver lamps.

Size of Picture.—Owego, N. Y., asks: "What is proper size picture for a 90-foot throw?"

The throw has absolutely nothing whatever to do with the size of picture. That matter is controlled wholly by size and shape of your house and the height of its ceiling. With a given amperage you can project exactly as good a picture at one hundred feet as at fifty. It is the size of the picture, not the distance it is projected, which governs the curtain brilliancy from a given amperage; and, as I said, the size must be governed by the size, shape and height of ceiling of each individual house.

Travel Ghost.—Louisville, Ky., writes as follows: "We have much trouble with one of our machines. There is never a bright picture from it although our other machine, a Powers No. 5, has perfect light. The reading matter of films run on the first-named machine is always blurred and there seem to be white streaks extending up from the letters. Formerly these streaks extended down, but since the operator tried to remedy the trouble their position has been changed. The right side of the picture is always darker and more blurred than the other, though the same film shows up all O K in the Powers machine. Also we have trouble breaking condensing lenses and when the film tears between upper feed and intermittent sprockets it winds up on top feed sprocket, and when it tears between intermittent and take-up sprockets it winds up on take-up feed sprocket without any noticeable change in the pull of the machine."

You have what is called a "travel ghost" caused by your shutter being just a little out of time. When your operator tried to remedy the trouble he moved the shutter a little too far and just reversed matters. I have referred your letter to the manufacturers of your machine, who tell me they will send you a new head at once, you to return yours to the factory for repairs. As to your condenser trouble, I should have to have very much more complete data to offer intelligent advice. As regards the film winding up on sprockets I can offer you no help, I think. It is the fault of the machine itself and the fault is inherent, being due to improperly placed idlers.

A LETTER WHICH MAKES US ALL FEEL GOOD.

Charlestown, W. Va., May 12, 1910.

Mr. F. H. Richardson, Editor Operators' Column:

Dear Sir—Looking over the Moving Picture World is my delight. Every evening after my house closes I take up a copy and no matter how old it may be it reads good at all times. (Thanks, brother!) But after the paper as a whole, the next best thing is the Operator's Column (again, thanks!), which is the greatest help imaginable to the operator as well as to the manager. I have been in the business about five years but had no idea that so many things could go wrong on an operating room until I began reading the Column. I have learned more from your answers than I ever thought I could learn. I do not claim to be an operator in the true meaning of the term, but I can do a little crank turning and know what to do, how to do it and to do it at the right time if the machine goes wrong. Much of this I learned from your answers in the World. Everyone knows there is a limit to what can possibly go wrong with a machine, no matter what make it may be, and by keeping the World on file each week a score or more can no doubt have in the Column an answer to every trouble the operator is heir to. My idea of this business is that a man to succeed must know exactly what he is trying to do—not think he knows, but know. The successful manager must have the one word "Results" always before him and be able to see nothing else. I never allow my operator to exceed normal speed under any circumstance. My show lasts one hour, always. I have vaudeville because the reels just to fill in instead of running advertising slides as some do. But I feature the films, not the vaudeville. I always arrange the program to close with a good comedy film. Send 'em away laughing is the best drawing card a house can have. I note that someone in the World recently said that Western pictures are bad for the little ones. That is, I think, not true. Something occurred in my house recently that was, I believe, unique. I ran a Western subject and the applause was something great all during the picture, but when the end came the audience was simply wild. As actors respond with an encore, I had my operator re-wind and run the same subject again to the same audience and they were well pleased and satisfied. And now I would like to ask one thing before I close: Why do all civil war pictures have the Northern army come out ahead? Any civil war subject that comes this way is certain of a crowded house, and then to have the poor South lose out every time "gets the goat" of the audience. Everyone knows the South won some battles in those years of hard fighting, and a picture with the Southern army coming out ahead would simply set 'em wild down here. You might say the Northern audience wouldn't stand for it, but I think they are not that ungenerous. We have to stand for it all the time. But for that matter, it need not be used at all in the North. Send it down here and we'll wear it out. This letter may read funny, but it is written by one who takes pride in his business and is not ashamed of his calling.

E. G. HENSON, Manager "The Rex."

(Seats 500, caters to better class only.)

Your letter reads all right, Neighbor Henson, and we thank you for your good words, both as to the World and the "Column." The writer is a Northern man and his father fought in the civil war. Also his father's brother was killed by guerillas. Someone had to get licked and I'm glad it was you fellers instead of we fellers, and I've a suspicion that you're glad of it too now. But, for all that, I would gladly see a film such as you have suggested. The war is over and the Southern men certainly put up a magnificent scrap. I can understand just how the Southerner would feel when viewing a film in which the Southern army won out. The audience would simply crack the plaster, nor would their applause indicate any remnant of hard feeling. I think that if the Southern exchanges made a concerted demand for such a film it could be had. Many civil war films could, I am sure, be changed so that the South would win merely by changing small portions of the film. Those films could be sent to Southern exchanges only. Surely even the Northern audience would be too broad-minded to object to an occasional film of this kind.

VETERAN PHOTOGRAPHER PASSES AWAY.

We regret to announce the death of Dr. John Nicol, a personal friend of the editors of this paper. By his death photography in this country loses its oldest practitioner and the photographic press its most respected and revered leader. Dr. Nicol began his photographic career as far back as 1841. He would have completed seventy years in photography had he lived until May 9. He was a chemist by profession, and was more interested in the theory of photography than the practical side. Later, he became interested in photographic journalism, and founded the Photo Beacon, in 1889, and for the past fourteen years was editor of the American Amateur Photographer, lately merged into American Photography, of which he was an associate editor at the time of his death. Though suffering from an incurable disease during the last few years of his life, he retained his genial and lovable disposition to the end, and his memory, covering photography from its infancy, never failed him.

MOSES AND AARON.

Now, Aaron and Moses fell a-talking of the times;
And Aaron says to Moses: "Oh! let us make some rhymes
About the Independent bunch, which everybody knows is In need of our assistance, Mo!"
"Right you are,' says Moses.

So says Aaron to Moses: "My heart is full of love
For my fellow Independents, and I want to give a shove
To their progress and their betterment, and make a bed of roses
For every mother's son of 'em!"
"So do I," says Moses.

And says Moses to Aaron: "Oh! me, and you, and Carl,
The uplift of our fellow men, though enemies may snarl,
Is all that we are working for: Thanhousers, Horselys; Oeses;
Aren't they our brothers?" "Yes."
"I love 'em all," says Moses.

And says Aaron to Moses: "Our little companee
Is the purest and the surest kind of sweet philanthrofee.
I do not want their money, as everyone supposes;
I do not want their business!"
"No more do I," says Moses.

And says Moses to Aaron: "My 100 bucks a week
Are just to keep me in cigars, to stick into my cheek,
As manager! Whatever does the other guy suppose is My job, old man?" "A soft one!"
"So it is," says Moses.

And says Aaron to Moses: "We ain't no little trust,
Kessell, and me, and you, and Carl; ourselves we'd go and bust
Before we'd do a thing like that; not one of us but poses
As angels—wings and harps and all!"
"And an organ, too," says Moses.

And says Moses to Aaron: "Steiner and Pat and Miles—
Them three, us four: our seven seraphic smiles!
Ain't we the limit in honesty? All our noses
Keep out of other folks' affairs.
We're as good as good," says Moses.

And says Aaron to Moses: "Charley, me boy, it's nix
On what the other fellow says. We're here to clinch and fix
The pretty, pretty, little deal, our philanthropy discloses.
We seven; ourselves; and the rest go hang!"
"Or back to the farm," says Moses.

AUSTRALIAN NOTES.

By the steamer that takes this letter to you leaves Mr. T J. West, to get wise to all the latest things that are going on in the moving picture business, and by the last steamer Mr. and Mrs. C. Spencer for the same purpose.

Mr. Spencer has hit it strong in a monetary point of view since the big Burns-Johnson scrap, and is now erecting a new theater in Sydney at a cost of some $200,000, and is making substantial additions to his pile all the time. Mr. T. J. West is the founder of the largest motion picture business in the world to-day, and his shows have no superiors and few equals. The strong point in all of Mr. West's entertainments is his music, and at his Sydney shows he spends more for music than all the expenses of some of the other shows' total for all expenses for the week.

Mr. West desires me to state that he would be very pleased to meet all the manufacturers of both films and machines, as well as anyone who thinks he has anything good in the lines referred to. Mr. West employs over 500 hands in the various places owned and leased by him in various parts of the world, and he has a strong predilection for things American and also Americans. A swell banquet was given him at Paris House the other day to show him how high he is held in the esteem of his employees as well as by the general public.

There are four contracts for new theaters let at the present time and the opening date for all is early in November. Spencer's new theater will be named the Lyric, but I have not yet learned what the names of the others will be.

COLONIAL THEATER, SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA.

There are now over fifty moving picture theaters in full swing in Sydney and suburbs and there are four more just on the point of completion and will be opened inside of another week.

West's two theaters, Spencer's the Colonial (continuous performance, as well as the Victoria Hall Picturescope Company, the Globe pictures at the New Queen's Hall, the New Alhambra, just entirely rebuilt, and all the others are simply packed nightly, business good and money plenty. Absolutely the best Easter from a monetary point of view ever seen in Sydney.

Enclosed please find souvenir program of the opening of Messrs. Pathe Freres' new branch in this city, which has made quite a stir in the film renters' business, and I do not hesitate to say that there is to-day a big wad of money to be made here by any firm that thoroughly understands the film renting business and is willing to do business on a fair profit, as the renters here have been simply getting five times the price that is charged in the United States, and films cost much less here than in the United States, so that makes a lot of difference in doing business. It is just the same with the phonograph business; you pay much less for an Edison record here than they are sold for in the States. The same applies to machines and also to films, and the Americans make no kick, but stand it like a lamb.

We reproduce herewith a photograph of The Colonial, Sydney, which is known as Australia's first continuous moving picture show. This house, which is modeled after the prevailing American style, is owned and managed by J. D. Williams, an American, from Spokane, Wash. Mr. Williams has recently spent $8,000 in alterations and decorations, but he is in right with the antipodeans, as he is filling his house and making money.

DR. WM. H. H. LANE.

A VITAGRAPH FEATURE FILM.

"Old Glory." Long may she wave! This will be a Vitagraph feature film, an allegorical, patriotic picture of the birth of the flag, introducing all the great men from the Declaration of Independence to the present time and giving all the most important events in the history of America. This issue will arouse the enthusiasm and stir up the patriotism of the nation and make the rest of the world take off their hats to the Stars and Stripes as they triumphantly wave under the outstretched wings of the eagle,

A YOUNG THEATER MANAGER.

A. A. KAUFMAN.

We present herewith the portrait of Albert A. Kaufman, manager of the Comedy Theater, who is reported to be the youngest man in his particular line. On account of the competition of adjacent licensed houses, the Comedy uses Independent service, which is supplied by William Steiner's film exchange. Three reels constitute the show, and with 5 cents admission on week days and 10 cents on Saturday and Sunday, the Comedy does a standing room business and Mr. Kaufman is well satisfied with his receipts. One excellent feature of Mr. Kaufman's management is that patrons of this theater are not allowed to find their way to seats behind the chairs and as this space slopes with the floor, even those standing can get a full view of the screen. This is the second of the prominent theaters on Moving Picture Row to install the Independent service and Mr. Kaufman seems to be well pleased with the treatment that he receives from Bill Steiner and his staff.

Ample standing room is allowed while a show is in progress.

"THE TWO PORTRAITS."

Another Pathe Art Film.

When "Cleopatra" was released it was generally considered that Pathe Freres had given the exhibitor one of the best films of the year, and a film that it would be hard to beat. Now, however, they announce for Friday, June 3, an art film, "The Two Portraits," which is just as big a feature as "Cleopatra," although of an entirely different character.

The subject matter of "The Two Portraits" is one of the most beautiful imaginable—a child's love for the memory of her dead mother. Renee Pre, one of the world's cleverest child actresses, works very hard in her difficult part and exercises her ability with good, strong effect. The other parts are, as usual with Pathe art films, well acted

The photography and staging are perfect and with a story that will appeal to every class and creed it looks as if in this film Pathe Freres have another big success.

PATHE MACHINES ON UNITED STATES WARSHIPS

Some few months ago Pathe Professional Models were installed on the United States battleships "Nebraska" and "Kansas." The other day the first of the navy's all-big-gun fighters, the United States battleship "Michigan," the American Dreadnaught, entered New York Harbor. She was only there for a few days, but before she left Pathe Freres had received an order for and installed one of their Pathe Professional Models, together with sufficient supplies to enable the machine to be of use on a long cruise.

Pathe Freres also installed during the same week one of their Professional Models at the Palace Theater, Market street, Philadelphia. This theater, which was formerly known as Lubin's Palace Theater, is probably one of the handsomest largest and best theaters built for moving pictures.

TIMES SQUARE THEATER PUTS IN "HALLBERG" MACHINES.

Mr. H. Saxe has given the complete order for his moving picture machine and electrical equipment to J. H. Hallberg, of 30 Greenwich avenue, New York City. This order is one of the most important, because it is for moving picture machinery intended to operate continuously in the first theater on Broadway to produce moving pictures exclusively. The order includes one D. C. "Hallberg" Economizer for double lamp equipment, two Motiograph moving picture machines and one double dissolver, together with other necessary ventilating and lighting equipment. This theater is scheduled to open within the next two or three weeks, and promises to be the most modern and the only theater devoted exclusively to moving pictures on the "Great White Way."

SCENES FROM "THE LOVE OF CHRYSANTHEMUM."

One of a series of Vitagraph Japanese plays on which that company are lavishing more than usual taste in the correct costuming and realistic scenic effects. A troupe of real Japanese actors were engaged for these productions.

MY IMPRESSIONS OF "KINEMACOLOR."

By Theodore Brown.

A few evenings since I paid a visit to the Palace Theater for the express purpose of viewing the latest results of kinemacolor. I went with the expectation of seeing great improvements on the display given a little over a year ago, and was not disappointed. The diversity of subjects shown on the present occasion gave one an opportunity of judging the process under varied conditions. The flower subjects created the most pleasing effect in my mind. I thought whilst gazing at these wonderful productions, it is well that these displays have not been called pictures; they are not pictures, but realities, in so far as they provide all that the originals in Nature provide—namely, the stimulus peculiar to colour, form, and binocular solidity.

Ordinary living-pictures are lacking in point of sensible depth, and also in colour; whilst they have rightly been termed pictures insomuch that they possess only one plane —the surface of the lantern-screen upon which they are projected. On the other hand kinemacolor projections are something far more important than mere pictures. I prefer to regard them as realities. True, the light by which they are projected is reflected from one surface (plane), the lantern-sheet. This fact, however, is cunningly rendered subordinate by an artifice subtle in its operations of working, but nevertheless entirely successful, making an observer realise all the sensations he may experience when looking at the original objects in Nature. The casual observer need not understand the causes thereof in order to experience the satisfaction forthcoming; rather he is left free to enjoy the pleasurable intoxication they imbue. Delusive Nature has indeed at last been captured. By a clever mechanical trick in the preparation of the films, the floral subjects appeared to come and go as spirits out of thin air; but their dissolution came only after they had shown themselves as solid coloured realities.

Of the animated scenes presented, I consider "Harvesting" the most delightful. Some phases of this remarkable production, if they could be taken singly and with their colour, might not be out of place, from an artistic standpoint, on the walls of Burlington House. But I must not forget that kinemacolor scenes claim to be placed in a category of their own. They are not pictures, but solid realities, the faithful re-creations of Nature. I have been told that the function of pictorial art is not to create realities, but merely to suggest them. It is fortunate that it is so; otherwise the function would remain unfulfilled. The function of kinemacolor appears to be the re-creation of Nature as she is seen by the human eye, not from one point of view only, or at one moment of time, but from all points of view, and at all moments during the evolution of motion. Hence the mark aimed at in this science seems to stand higher than any other, and kinemacolor does not fail to hit it.

It is difficult to understand how so simple a process succeeds so admirably in reproducing any and all the tints of solar refraction, and showing withal their constant variations. The fact is, many of the tints one perceives are accidentals of preceding hues, throwing up their complementary colours, and thus contributing to a perfect whole.—Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly.

MOVING PICTURE IS AN UPLIFTER; HOW IT REACHES THE MULTITUDES.

"Canned drama" is here to stay. Silently and surely the seductive germ of visible romance, with its attributes of suspense, daring, sacrifice, love and hate, doubly absorbing, has stolen into the blood of the initiated, and the result has been a sweeping temperamental epidemic that bids fair to be incurable.

To see with one's very eyes the actual moving existence of a thrilling tale; to watch the play of emotion on the faces of its characters; to follow them through the very scenes where the action takes place, until, unconsciously, the scenes themselves become familiar and the plot vital—who that has ever been inoculated with the biograph germ will turn with the same interest again to the story magazine? When one remembers that the variety is as great to pick from in the one as in the other, and the price of one is half or less than that of the other, who will be so stolid and lifeless as to waver between the motion picture and the short story?

The scope of possibilities in the nickelodeon and the available sweep of its power are almost infinite. Within the reach of the great multitude, having in the extreme those two elusive secrets of the successful story writer, brevity and ease of narration and vividness of action, which alone form a guarantee of absorbing interest, with the whole world of literature, drama and real life to choose from, its educational, its moral and its merely amusing powers are limitless.

To the glory of the nickelodeon let it be said right here that, although public sentiment was at first strongly suspicious of the probable influence of the moving picture and was inclined to associate it with the unsavory subjects of the penny arcade, up to the present time its powers have seldom been abused, but have, on the other hand, been often intelligently and profitably used. There is no greater opportunity open to-day for broadening and raising the standard of popular intelligence, of bringing to the heart of the masses, draped in color, action and interest, the meat of literature, drama, science and current events than the nickelodeon. Nothing, indeed, could be a more advantageous addition to school and college methods, were it not for the expense, than the motion picture, for it exemplifies, next to actual experiment and the intimate illustration of travel, the highest point in the process of demonstration.

Here at last is the golden opportunity for the soaring ambition of some restless Lord or Lady Bountiful who haunts the slums for something new to endow, presides over sanitary reforms and moral uplifts and palpitates to enlighten the masses. How eminently more practical and reasonable, instead of building new reading rooms for toil-worn bodies and brains, adorning seething tenements with the irony of a porcelain bath, or teaching lifeless orals and weary bodies the easy demonstration of dependency by continual gratis donations—to build a few plain motion picture theaters on the borderland of the wolf's domain and give two or three free day performances a week with titles and postscripts of the subjects given verbally for the unschooled, to holders of tickets distributed through the pleasure-famine districts.

Judging from the phenomenal receipts of the existing promoters, the expressive smiles of the stock holders and the increasing universal popularity of the motion picture business, this three days a week form of philanthropy would be productive of less financial sacrifice and more profit and appreciation to the square inch than any other variety yet demonstrated. With romance and adventure, the two poles of magnetic human interest, to attract and hold the unlettered strugglers, no better field lies open to insert, "entirely without the person's knowledge," a few grains of profitable and instructive matter within their interest and comprehension. This done, the process of "gradually increasing the dose" is an easy one.

An experiment similar to this was made in the early days of the motion picture in New York by a broad-minded, public-spirited Jew, who first varied the regular order of the usual melodramatic program by putting on Shakespeare's plays for the benefit of school and college students. To his surprise the change became immensely and universally popular and he established it as a regular one day a week program.

Shorn of intricacy of language, transposed into simply worked synopses at frequent intervals, abridged by rapid action, but retaining all their dramatic interest, "Hamlet," "Macbeth," "Merchant of Venice," "Richard III.," "Othello," etc., became absorbing epitomes of human interest within the comprehension and appreciation of all who saw. Emotion and temperament are the sole requirements to hold the interest of the poorest and most ignorant to the simplified dramas of Shakespeare or to hundreds of others like "Ben Hur," "Quo Vadis," "The Passion Play," "L'Aiglon," and, coming down to modern times, legions more like the "Man of the Hour" that carry with them a strong moral tonic. From an [illegible] standpoint the field is even wider and no less interesting—mining scenes, dramatic views of the big industries, travel scenes, international sports, races and celebrations—there is practically no end to the number or their value as factors in the practical education of the masses, and no more simple or available application of this opportunity lies open to-day than the two or three day a week plan for a new Carnegie or Smith establishment in the east ends of our crowded cities. Who will be the first to see and grasp this new field of mutually profitable speculation?—New Haven (Conn.) "Palladium."

WOES OF THE MOVING PICTURE MAN.

The fields and woods about historic Fort Lee, just across the Hudson, are the scene nowadays of a continuous performance of extremely animated open-air theatricals. On almost any fine day one may enjoy historic pageants, sham battles, tragedies, comedies, and the bill is changed daily. A few motorists are attracted to this region and they, with the native population, form the only audience.

The manager of all these one-night, or, rather, one-day stands is the moving picture man. Here one may see the premier performance of scores of dramas which later will be repeated in thousands of darkened halls all over the country. The delights of a first night at the theater are nothing, however, to those of a real, living, moving picture show.

To watch the staging and rehearsals of one of these open-air dramas is to go behind the scenes with a vengeance. A wide assortment of properties is kept on hand in a near-by barn. The stage is shifted from place to place to take advantage of the natural setting. The actors and actresses dress and make up in tents which are pitched near the stage selected for the day's performance.

The native population has become accustomed to bands of Indians yelling and dashing about the roads and by-paths, to troops landing on the river bank, to dancing villagers, and every variety of battle, murder, and sudden death at their very doors. It sometimes happens, however, that a stranger chances upon the shows, to his unbounded astonishment, and complications follow.

The moving picture impresario has not alone all the troubles of his craft to encounter, but he must guard against interference as well. The performances rarely go off smoothly despite every precaution.

Within a few days an animated scene from the French Revolution was enacted, for instance, beside the River road. A guillotine had been erected and a howling mob assembled about it. The "execution" was going forward in the most lifelike manner. The long film was speeding smoothly through the camera. The dramatic moment arrived. The condemned man, with the priest beside him, ascended the scaffold. The chorus waved their arms, swaying to and fro.

Just at this most inopportune moment an automobile swept around the curve of the road, and several ladies it carried suddenly found themselves face to face with this exceedingly realistic picture. They broke into wild, piercing screams. The automobile stopped. The excitement was too much for the chorus. It stopped its performance then and there, and turned, even to the condemned man and the priest, to look at the automobile. The motorists saw their mistake in a moment and sped away. But the film was ruined.

Another day the entire company met at the picturesque stone church which crowns the Palisades for an old-fashioned wedding ceremony. Someone connected with the church had agreed to allow the procession to form in the church and leave it, in full costume, to the rattle of the moving picture machine.

After many rehearsals the final performance was commenced. Everything was moving finely. The bride in all the loveliness of her property bridal veil and paper orange blossoms was walking with becoming timidity down the steps.

Suddenly, without an instant's warning, several excited figures rushed into the picture. A wild scene of confusion followed. The groomsmen tried to eject the strangers. An unseeming struggle ensued. All this was recorded with pitiless exactness by the moving picture machine. Another film was ruined past hope.

When the confused crowd of bride and groom, bridesmaids and groomsmen, in eighteenth century costume was separated from the strangers, it was found that they were trustees of the church who had their own ideas of moving picture shows. Arguments were useless. They pointed out that the stage clergyman, for all his white wig and sanctimonious expression, was of no sect permitted in their church.

Many remarkable films are made from time to time by these chance interruptions which, needless to say, the public is not allowed to enjoy.—New York Times.

"The Cowpuncher's Ward" (Essanay).—A story of the West pulsating with the life and animation which are characteristic of that region. The way the cowboys take the part of the unfortunate little girl is worthy of their great hearts, and the beautiful woman into which she develops may well appreciate their kindness. Later, when Bud Folsom confesses to a crime he didn't commit to save her from the gallows, the audience thrills with the intensity of its suppressed feelings. But the most dramatic scene of all comes when the white mistress of the cowboy halfbreed, who actually committed the crime, denounces him in court at the peril of her own life. Then when Bud is set free and he and Ellen embrace, there is no question of the result. There is a bigness to this film which is impressivle, but can scarcely be described. It seems to embody the wide sweep of the landscape and to depict the freedom of the great country in which the scenes are laid. It is a successful picture and one that will appeal with more than ordinary strength to a large number of people.

"The Wrong Road" (Pathe).—The young widow, fascinated by a facile lover, goes away with him and leaves her child with her father. But the usual result follows and she comes back to the old home starving and is received again into the fold. The old story of unwise life placed in different settings.

"The Little Truant" (Pathe).—A graphic illustration of the fate which often overtakes truants. There are some boyish pranks about which one may reasonably express doubt, but the ringleader is given his just deserts, a sound thrashing, the deserved fate of all such as he.

"The Special Agent" (Vitagraph).—A love story so vigorously told and so interesting that it makes the breath come quick during the most thrilling scenes. The scenery, too, is more than ordinarily attractive. Wild mountains, an almost impenetrable forest and other unusual features combine to make pictorial features quite out of the ordinary. The love story of the special agent and the girl who is an unwilling member of the band at the illicit still, is well played. Then comes the penetration of the agent's disguise and his sentence to be shot, from which he is saved by the timely and thrilling onslaught of the mounted police. The picture ends peacefully with the young people going into the world together looking forward to a happy future.

"Christopher Columbus" (Gaumont).—An instructive and interesting historical film, representing important scenes in the life of the Portuguese navigator who gave a new hemisphere to the world and died in poverty. To say whether a film of this type is accurate is impossibe, since much of the information which has come down to modern times is at best fragmentary and conflicting. The important points are well understood, however, and in the scenes presented in this film those features of Columbus' life which are well known are graphically set forth. It is a sumptuous film, well acted, adequately staged and clearly photographed. The combination is responsible for a picture which conveys reasonably accurate facts and does it in an interesting and convincing way.

"The Surgeon's Visit" (Pathe).—A story of the pranks of some soldiers who feign illness so the surgeon will send them to the hospital, from which they manage to escape easily. But their skylarking ends in an arrest and imprisonment in the barracks guardhouse. As a reproduction of boyish nonsense the picture is very diverting.

"Berlin' (Pathe).—An excellent picture of the beauties of Berlin. In it all the show places of the German capital, its public buildings, its streets, its parks and other attractions are adequately illustrated. Description of a film of this character is impossible. It does its work in enabling thousands who live at a distance to see the marvels of one of the most beautiful cities in the world. Such views are always interesting, and apart from that they possess an educational value not easy to estimate. While there are no thrills connected with such a film, it is, nevertheless, watched with undivided attention by almost any audience.

"The Closed Dood" (Vitagraph).—An emotional drama of a type which haunts one after it has left the screen and more exciting pictures have succeeded. Whether a mother who has ruthlessly deserted her family and has pursued her own selfish pleasures for years shall be received again is a question which can be answered only in individual instances. Here when the mother returned the husband turned her away, but the daughter followed her and took her in. Perhaps, after all, the solution of these world-old problems rests just there. One forgives and receives the wanderer back; the other would interpose the closed door, and both may be right in their individual conclusions.

"Between Love and Duty" (Kalem).—A strong melodrama graphically depicting the struggle of a sheriff between favoring a woman whom he loves and whose husband he is hunting as an outlaw, and his sworn duty. Ultimately love triumphs and he permits the murderer to escape. The closing scene, a man's silent despair, is a dramatic bit of acting and is a fitting close to a good picture. This triangle of a hopeless love, stern duty and divine pity is the most trying that can beset any man, and one can sympathize with the unfortunate officer when he succumbs. Some of the scenery is novel, particularly the swamp, which is unfamiliar to Northern eyes.

"Carminella" (Edison).—A pathetic East Side story by E. W. Townsend, representing an Indian flower girl who aspires to the love of a millionaire youth, whom she met under romantic circumstances. It is a pathetic scene, indeed, when she makes the discovery and goes sadly back to her flowers and her restricted life. The story has dramatic scenes and is set among the familiar East Side and is strong and virile in its story and its suggestions.

"Accidents Will Happen" (Edison).—Familiar scenes on a street car, with the types which usually occupy those common vehicles of transportation. The picture is a laugh getter and will help out any program because of its familiar comedy features.

"The Two Brothers" (Biograph).—An excellent dramatic film, based upon the dissimilarity existing between two brothers. There is a pretty love story in connection with the main psychological proposition which adds to the interest and increases the power of the film. Even though one brother becomes an outlaw, the irresistible power of love leads him captive, as it does others, influencing him to leave his evil ways and become a useful citizen. Perhaps the most suggestive inference is that depicted in the final scene, where the artless little maiden subdues the wild man and brings about a complete revolution in his character.

"The Cowboy's Devotion" (Lubin).—A real man is unquestionably the king of a woman's heart, and even though the girl in this drama, redolent with the rich, full life of the West, promises to marry an effeminate individual, she discovers her mistake when her playfellow cowboy risks his life to save hers and the flames from the Indians' fire are actually curling about him when he is rescued. There is a dash and spirit in this picture which is far more satisfying than much of the love that becomes sickly at times by its constant repetition. It is a life, full and free, developing great characteristics of soul and creating conditions as inspiring as they are interesting.

"There, Little Girl, Don't Cry" (Selig).—An adequate illustration of one of James Whitcomb Riley's poems, which has, perhaps, touched the heart as few poems in the English language have done. The broken doll, the broken slate, lastly the broken heart, though this can be, and is in this instance, healed. There is a touching pathos and a suggestion of helpfulness of others that appeals to one and seems to urge one to be sympathetic and helpful in the tangles and difficulties and troubles that recur again and again in every-day life. This film will make a strong impression upon a larger proportion of those who see it.

"Chicken" (Selig).—He stole the chicken, and ate his share of it, and as a result chickens pursued him in his dreams and everything he touched seemed possessed of feathers and wing. It is a comic that is attractive because of its novelty.

"Over Silent Paths" (Biograph).—A strongly dramatic picture, representing what sometimes follows a quest for gold. Here is murder, for one thing, with the situation complicated by the murderer falling in love with the daughter of the man he killed, and she, in her turn, doing her duty and avenging her father's death by turning her lover over to the officers. One could not want a more dramatic, or more thrilling picture. From the heights of joy to the depths of grief is but the transition of an instant. The girl has that trying experience. Then the lover receives his portion. One follows the film, fascinated by the complications of the story and wondering what to expect next. The acting is sympathetic, so much so that one involuntarily wants to offer sympathy when the young woman finds her father murdered. And again a feeling of exultation springs up when one sees the girl forcing the murderer to go to the sheriff's office to be arrested. The setting is of the sort that adds to the attractiveness of a picture.

"Rejuvenation of Father" (Lubin).—A humorous picture which contains the usual run of surprises in a Lubin film. Jack was too much for the father of Laura, and manages to beat her objecting father in a way he won't forget. After a series of humorous complications the father consents, rather than to have his discomfiture known at the club. And after traveling over a somewhat bumpy road for a time true love comes out into the open and gets along swimmingly.

"The Girl from Arizona" (Pathe).—A thrilling story of Arizona life, with considerable love, a good many Indians, some cowboys and a man about to be burned at the stake when he is rescued. The most thrilling scene, and one of the most thrilling ever put into a motion picture, is the illustration of a fall down a steep cliff. It is so natural that one holds one's breath, quite as one would to see an actual fall of that sort. The entire picture is alive with human interest, and the audience is ready to applaud the girl whose bravery saves her lover from death by alarming the cowboys who go to his rescue. The pictorial features are of the same high quality that are characteristic of the Pathes' mechanical department. It is unnecessary to say more, except that Pathe's American company of producers have scored a headliner in their first picture.

"The Heart of the Heathen Chinee" (Selig).—A dramatic film, possessing many of the distinguishing qualities of the Selig films, excellence of acting, accuracy of staging and clearness of photography. The story bears a conviction of plausibility which is heightened by the excellent attention to details and the careful and accurate settings that are done in the Selig way.

"The Princess and the Peasant" (Edison).—Love goes where it is sent, and no stern and royal father could prevent his daughter falling in love with a handsome peasant lad of the mountains. It is a romantic story, the attempt to separate the couple after they were married by a priest of the mountains in his hermit grotto. In a series of picturesque scenes the story of the bride's imprisonment in a castle on an island is told and the escape quickly follows. The story of the heart is interesting, while the setting is picturesque indeed. One follows the adventures of the lovers with almost breathless interest, and rejoices with them when they kneel on the shore after leaving the noisome prison and escaping from the buffeting waves. The picture should be popular, since it tells a thrilling heart story with more than ordinary dramatic strength and ability and is further enhanced by its picturesque scenery.

"Racing for a Bride" (Gaumont).—A Greek story, possessing some interest, due more to the action of the characters than the story itself. Some Greek myths have a vital interest to all persons because they represent elemental human passions, but in this instance a maiden merely runs a race with a number of swains, victory to be consummated with a wedding, defeat with an execution. It contains some interest, but will never rank with others of this type of film produced by this house.

"The Marvelous Water" (Gaumont).—A comedy of the magic order, representing a boy endowed with the power to make others do as he wills. Some of the stunts are sufficiently unusual to make an audience laugh.

"Music Hath Charms" (Vitagraph).—A humorous skit representing an organ grinder torturing unfortunates with the wheeze of a wornout instrument until they pay him liberally to move on. The result is a good collection of dollars, followed by a feast for himself and family. The fun lies more in the associations suggested than in anything else, and the action of the tortured individuals is generally remarkably ludicrous.

"A Funny Story" (Vitagraph).—A film which possesses a subtle humor that is amusing. It tells of the way a man made everybody laugh as he passed from place to place, merely because he laughed himself, and the picture showing all these different people laughing has the same effect upon the audience. It is one of the funniest films the house has ever issued and its fun lies in its unsuspected psychological suggestions. Like a yawn a laugh is contagious, and even when pictured they often exert the same influence.

"The Danger Line" (Essanay).—A dramatic picture based upon the supposed neglect of a husband who is, in reality, only thoughtless. There are some dramatic scenes, when the husband discovers his wife's supposed treachery, the card game, the duel and finally the reconciliation. Perhaps in this picture may be found a concrete illustration of the reason for many marriages which seem unhappy. Thought[illegible] engrossing business cares, real or fancied slights, all have their separate parts and often, as is clearly depicted here, none have any real basis in fact. Often one's imagination becomes inflamed and many things are seen from the wrong viewpoint, resulting in estrangement, as in this instance, when a little honest expression of the difficulty would end all misunderstandings. While this film is interesting as a strongly dramatic story, sympathetically acted and admirably photographed, it teaches an important lesson and offers a suggestion for the settlement of many marital differences well worth the consideration of those matrimonially enough to have trouble.

"Who'll Win My Heart?" (Pathe).—A film representing an unpleasant surprise for the suitor who laboriously climbed a mountain only to be presented with a red heart by the girl he sought to win. A bashful fellow looked and [illegible] feared to ask, got the real heart, and the girl with it. The principal charm of this picture is the climb up the mountain side. The steep sides of a rugged mountain were utilized, and many glimpses of beautiful views are seen as the suitors elbow and push themselves up the mountain. The picture introduces a novelty in this respect, and because it does so is all the more attractive.

"The Gold Spider" (Pathe).—A fairy story, representing a spider that spins webs of gold coins. A poor woodcutter obtains possession of it, and untold wealth is his until he becomes miserly; then his hoard turns to great masses of crawling insects. The principal interest will center around the funny little gnomes, and the many tricks of the camera which create curious illusions.

"The Girl Conscript" (Urban).—Here is a thriller that will attract a good deal of interest. A girl enters the army as a conscript in her brother's place and, performing acts of distinguished bravery, such little things, for example, as stealing the plan of campaign, and being wounded, she is sent home with a medal to her father and brother. Improbable and dramatic as it all is, one enjoys it because it represents a victory, and everybody likes victors. The battle scene is grewsome enough, and other picturesque features are carefully worked out. The story is novel, and probably its novelty will make it even more attractive.

"Modern Railway Construction" (Urban).—An educational film of value, presenting in a highly interesting manner the principal operations in railway building. The camp scene, the construction train, the methods of handling ties and rails, laying the track, depositing gravel alongside the track, and other actual construction scenes are faithfully produced. It is a film of much interest and value and makes an excellent addition to the long list of educational films now obtainable.

INDEPENDENT.

"Lost for Many Years" (Bison).—A melodramatic picture connecting the nobility of England with the cowboys of the plains. It has some strong situations. Perhaps the best of them is where the mother puts together the torn letter and discovers that her son is still alive. The attempt to hold up the stage coach is exciting. Stage coaches have been held up through long years, but the clever management of a torn letter adds to the film's interest. There is plenty of intrigue and action in this picture and it should be popular with audiences everywhere.

"The Best Man Wins" (Thanhouser).—Sometimes one has concrete evidence that the performance of a charitable deed is not lost, even from a selfish standpoint. Perhaps this man did not realize when he befriended a poor woman and her child that he was really deciding the question of his future marriage. But he did, and this film tells the story in an interesting way, emphasizing the fact that the man who is kind not infrequently receives his reward here. The acting of the child is characteristic, and when she denounces the doctor, who refused aid to her dying mother, she does it very vigorously. It is a good story well told.

"A Mother's Grief" (Lux).—A melodramatic picture, strong in its acting and in its suggestion. The scene in which the poor woman becomes demented over an apparently lifeless child is heartrending in its intensity. But, like all good melodramatic stories, it ends well, with the poor mother restored to reason and herself and her boy supplied with food and plenty of warm clothing. A striking feature is the contrast shown in the picture, poverty and riches. Perhaps it will arouse the sympathy of some who have been thoughtless regarding the unfortunate rather than intentionally unkind.

"The Turn of the Dice" (Imp).—A dramatic picture representing a possible scene in a country where men's primitive instincts frequently come to the surface and blot out all semblance of humanity. The swing the dice for the first shot in a pistol duel is a new idea of fighting to many, but it represents what might be done probably what has been done many times, and when the sheriff loses a dramatic scene fellows, happily interrupted before murder is committed by the appearance of the woman in the case. The cruel trapper husband dies from the effects of a wound made by his own knife and the widow and her sheriff love are commended to each other by the dying husband. It is a thrilling film throughout and will hold the attention of any audience from beginning to end.

"Her Two Suitors" (Lux).—Because he got locked in a cabinet Pa Jenkins learns things about one of his daughter's suitors that would not look well in print. And as a result the rival triumphs, winning the girl he wants. Not a heavy film, but full of humorous situations and ending nicely.

"The Marvelous Cure" (Great Northern).—A comedy acted with all the snap and animation characteristic of the Great Northern players. The wonderful effects of this cure are told in a way that won't be forgotten in a hurry.

"The Club of the Corpulent" (Great Northern).—A bit of dramatic fun from this house quite in keeping with previous humorous efforts. There is a dash and go to the Great Northern films which help materially in holding interest, and what is still better, the work done by the players improves steadily.

"Foolshead Learns to Somersault" (Itala).—A funny skit from this house in which the humorous Foolshead gives some amusing conditions of learning to somersault. One wonders how this same Foolshead goes through such a mass of bumping without injury. He is always in trouble of some sort and never gets out without more or less tumbling.

"That Gentleman Has Won a Million" (Itala).—A comedy which cannot fail to put your audience in good humor. There is plenty of action and some amusing situations, a combination certain to please.

"The Card Party" (Powers).—An extremely lively film, showing what may happen when a man dreams dreams. This is a rough-house film, with stabbings, wrestlings, chases on foot and on automobile and other lively and interesting stunts. But fortunately the gentleman wakes up and discovers there is no difficulty. It was only a dream. It keeps the audience, as well as the man, guessing while it lasts.

"The Minister's New Suit" (Powers).—The mixup caused by a misplaced minister's suit is humorously told by the capable company. Percy, poor fellow, was sadly disappointed when he discovered that he wasn't married, but the girl and her lover didn't seem to be troubled by the fact that the minister was a fakir. At any rate, it is all straightened out eventually, and so far as can be judged everybody is happy. Dick and Myrtle are anyway, and maybe the expletive, "Oh, fudge!" indulged by Percy is sufficient relief to his outraged feelings.

"A Doctor's Perfidy" (Imp).—Based on the well-understood proposition that a doctor can take no advantage of a patient, no matter what personal reasons may move him to commit some perfidious act. Jealousy causes this young physician to administer poison to a patient. Fortunately, the act is seen and no harm comes to the patient, who is the nurse's long lost sweetheart. It is a love story, and aside from this one feature is commonplace. But that is different, and makes it an interesting film.

"The Feud" (Bison).—A feud with some thrilling features, but ending happily after a few altercations in which no one is injured seriously. Perhaps this should be accepted as the novelty, since feuds are generally sufficiently productive of deaths to fill a small cemetery. All the fights are here, but the senseless murders are happily absent. Probably a great many patrons of motion picture theaters will commend the producers for their restraint in this respect.

"His Yankee Girl" (Powers).—A love story told around an episode in Virginia during the Civil War. Through a complication of circumstances an officer is condemned to be shot as a spy, but the discovery that a child has used a missing paper in making a doll causes his sweetheart to ride to save him. And that ride! Well, few women would want to undertake it for any reason. It is one of the most thrilling ever put on a film, and there is a burst of applause when it ends and the rope is taken from the condemned man's neck. The whole picture is good and, like other stories built up around real or imaginary wartime episodes, it possesses an unusual degree of interest, and should be popular with those who like a live, thrilling story adequately translated into motion pictures.

"The Heart of Tessa" (Capitol).—The first film from this house the writer has seen. It is a simple love story, a country maiden and a city artist, with estrangement because of a former attachment, but all made right by the young artist going back to the country home and asking Tessa to marry him. There is more of a heart interest in this picture than is usual in such subjects. The acting seems unusually natural and apparently the various players have a clear comprehension of their parts. Unquestionably this film will be welcomed as satisfactory and many will want to see it again. Coming as a first release from a new concern it ought to go far in their coming position among the producers of this country.

"The Fighting Parson" (Nestor).—One of those stories which unquestionably thrills and does though in a way it is both improbable and perhaps impossible. To see a rough, thoroughly thrashed is a pleasurable sensation and in this instance it is so well done that every minute in the ring he goes to shame and distress to the fighting parson preacher. It is possible to cure a coward by exhibiting brute strength, and in this instance it was thoroughly done. Moreover, the acting, the staging and the photography are all alike good. One may say without hesitation that this picture will be popular wherever it is shown, and, like a good story, those who see it will want to see it again.

"The Devil on Two Sticks" (Ambrosio).—A lively play from this house which develops a number of interesting situations as it proceeds.

"Who Killed Her?" (Ambrosio).—A question which more than one officer of the law has asked, without receiving an answer, and more than one will ask in the future without an answer. As long as humanity lasts mysterious cases will occur, where, by the exercise of reason and little inferential forces men and women will be driven to their deaths leaving no explanation behind them. Apparently the producer has endeavored to convey something of this in the picture here shown, and he has succeeded admirably, since it sets one thinking on the things which control destiny and perhaps are the real determining factors in the struggle for life going on in the breast of every animate creature.

"Blue Jackets' Manoeuvers" (Ambrosio).—Just what its name indicates, and it affords an excellent opportunity for thousands who live inland to see what blue jackets do and how they perform. It is only a short film, but it is a good one, well photographed and in every way satisfactory.

ECLAIR FILMS.

We have long promised ourselves a morning with the Eclair films as hitherto, in our opinion, the pictures of this house have not received the notice they deserve either at our hands or the hands of the renters and exhibitors. Our comments testify week by week merit in the Eclair film as it passes into the ordinary daily releases of the Independent theater, but we have reserved for ourselves the opportunity of one of these days studying the Eclair production en masse. So we did one morning this week, when we had a number of imminent releases put on the screen for our own special edification. Eclair films are French and they are thoroughly typical of the best French school of moving picture making. They deal with themes which avoid the undesirable from the American point of view. You don't have murder, adultery, seduction, and similar instances which American audiences neither like nor understand. Eclair films are idyllic, pastoral, sentimental and poetical. They charm by the beauty of the story, which, while being thoroughly French, one might say characteristically so, yet appeals to other nationalities in virtue of the versatility of theme. For instance, the release of May the 30th is a beautiful picture of life in the Alpine frontier, showing the sporting aspect of this life in well chosen incidents of perfect photography. Then, the June 6 release shows us the fanciful adventures of a sculptor in the production of a really marvelous animal by plastic means. This is an entertaining laugh from start to finish. Then, again, we have on May the 30th a piece of pure comedy called "The Watchmaker's Hat," and on June the 6th, "A Martyr of Love," a pathetic subject appealing to the deeper emotions. Here, then, is variety enough, and variety of a kind, to which no possible exception can be taken on the score of the subject. Then, again, how beautifully artistic are these Eclair films. This is inevitable, but well deserved phrase. Our French cousins are born actors and actresses. Their every movement is graceful; they cannot do anything inartistic. All their pictures are delightfully artistic throughout; that is to say, the very outdoor scenes that are chosen are pictures in themseves. The costumes and the mounting are also artistic, and, as for the acting in them, it has all the charm, grace and versatility that are associated with French work on the stage. A last word is due to the photography of these pictures, which, again, show all the delightful artistry of the French school of work.

It is not necessary to use the phrase "film d'art" in connection with the Eclair films, for each and every one of them is artistic in itself and is justly entitled to be regarded as a masterpiece, looked at from any standpoint whatsoever.

We desire, therefore, to give a special word of encouragement to these French pictures, and to bring them to the notice of our exhibiting readers, who, we know, are very much guided by our recommendations. True, they are not American in subject, but surely this absurd Chauvinism had better be relegated to obscurity. We are not in sympathy with the craze of American pictures for American audiences. At least not absolutely so, for clearly, if this principle be carried out to the foot of the letter, some of the best work in the world will be excluded and the American public will be at a loss. By all means let us have good American subjects, but let us have the best that are made in other parts of the world. Europe and Great Britain at the present moment are practically dominated by American pictures, both licensed and Independent. Surely, then, it is only reasonable that the doctrine of reciprocity should be applied, and that the best productions of the European factories should be shown in this country. On these grounds, therefore, as well as the grounds of sheer beauty and excellence of quality, we desire to give the Eclair picture every possible encouragement on the American market.

CHICAGO NOTES.

There had been much talk in Chicago concerning the Custer Massacre pictures taken on the Indian Reservation by the Montana Motion Picture Company. It is said that these pictures portray a most vivid picture realization of these first-born Americans in their native surroundings.

Mr. W. K. Hanafourde, who in the past has been well known in the circles of the big fight promoters, has recently purchased the exclusive rights on pictures of the Johnson training series. These pictures display excellent photography throughout and vividly portray this human thunder-shot preparing for the coming battle, which has already startled the entire world, and by the way matters are developing there promises to be a little more than the usual Fourth of July celebration on that date this year.

It was learned the other day that another famous old cowpuncher had entered the motion picture field. Mr. Richard Green, who is known to practically everyone throughout the amusement world as "Dick," and a mighty good fellow, has been associated with the Selig Polyscope Company's Western studio during the Winter months. Mr. Green put in several years at Riverview Exposition in various positions along the line of well-paying concessions.

We are pleased to see the name of Frank Beil among the producers of Selig. Mr. Beil has been the orginator and producer of many successful theatrical ventures, one of which was the "Seven Temptations of St. Anthony," at Riverview Exposition, last season. Mr. Beil's latest production at the Selig studio was "The Angelus."

YOU CAN'T LOSE VITAGRAPH.

Strange to say, on the very day and almost at the very hour that we were thinking of a new use for the moving picture, viz., the teaching of physical culture, we received a communication from the Vitagraph press agent which forestalled our idea. The Vitagraph Company will soon issue a film showing the erstwhile idol of young America, "Jim" Corbett, the ex-champion heavyweight, in a moving picture of skill, physical culture and ring prowess. Our idea goes still farther, however. What better method of teaching physical culture in seminaries, colleges, etc., than a moving picture film of such an exponent of the science as, say, Bernarr Macfadden? We believe that such a series of films would have a great vogue.

REMOVAL NOTICE.

Owing to the expansion of his business, A. G. Whyte was compelled to move to larger and more commodious offices, which are now located at 27 Lexington avenue. Everything now is in first-class order, and he cordially invites the trade to call on him at his new address.

MANUFACTURERS BALK AT SALES COMPANY.

Charles O. Baumann, the sponsor for the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, needs no introduction to the majority of our readers. He has worked like a Trojan to organize his pet scheme for the conservation of independent interests. Whether he will be able to carry it through remains to be seen, but he certainly deserves credit as the promoter.

Just as we go to press we are in receipt of a telegram from David Horsley, Bayonne, N. J., announcing that Nestor films will not be marketed through the Sales Company, but shipped direct as usual. He calls on all independent exchanges to uphold freedom of trade.

Mr. Prieur, agent for Lux films, is also sounding the "Marseillaise," and other importers are wavering between love and duty.

The Electrograff Company, of Philadelphia, will market their own product when ready, and other American manufacturers, so that it looks as if there will be a split in the independent ranks, with the odds pretty evenly divided.

DYNAMO BUILDING FOR AMATEURS.

Such is the title of a very thorough treatise by A. J. Weed that reaches our table through the courtesy of the publishers, The Norman W. Henly Publishing Company, New York City. It fully explains the construction and winding of an experimental 50-watt dynamo and is illustrated by 64 engravings showing the actual work in progress. A valuable addition to electrical text-books and one that would no doubt interest many of our readers. Orders for the book may be sent to The Moving Picture World. Price, in cloth, $1; paper covers, 50 cents.

NEW INDEPENDENT MANUFACTURER.

A new company has been launched in Denver to manufacture special features for the independent market. They already have seven negatives depicting sensational South American and Mexican scenes, and will soon begin releasing. For further particulars write J. W. Maynard, Orient Hotel, Denver, Colorado.

ESSANAY NOTES

"The Wedding Presents" and "Where Is Mulcahy" is the Essanay release for May 25. Lee Beggar tells of a easy way to get rid of a lot of the presents. He gives a tramp to break into the house at night for which he agrees to pay the latter $25 if he will get rid of the jazz. A real burglar is on the job and is pretty much surprised when out leaps the swag into his hands and with it twenty-five sinceritos. The tramp, arriving later, is arrested by the real burglar, and when his identity is made known he refuses to leave the house without recompense. To cap it all, the burglar sends back for Beggar's "C. O. D." This is too much for our hero and he collapses, muttering "Never Again." "Where Is Mulcahy" will possibly be found the funniest of the two films. Mulcahy, chasing two bad boys, is stuck in a hole in a fence, where he stays for two or three hours, much to extricate himself. The boys get their pals and torment the poor cop, finally running away with his trousers. Mulcahy returns to the station in a hatful, and the climax comes when a troubled lady brings in the trousers, looking for the owner.

"Brother, Sister and Co-respondent" is an exceedingly fine Western drama and will be released May 28. The story is intensely dramatic and photographically perfect.

G. M. Anderson has just submitted to the Essanay Company a negative of the subject, "Away Out West," a Western drama, and an episode in the days of '49. It is without a doubt the most wonderful Western picture Anderson has ever made. It contains a number of scenic wonders which are truly marvelous from a photographic standpoint. It will be released early in June.

The early part of the week before last the Essanay Company began making another full reel comedy picture. The story has a Summer setting and the first day of the work was exceptionally fine. The next day was stormy and on the following day several inches of snow covered the ground. The freeze which followed has practically killed all the foliage of the trees and it is thought that at least six weeks will have to elapse before the picture, with its Summer setting, can be finished.

The Essanay Company are issuing a handsome catalogue of films for the German trade. A booklet of descriptions in Russian is also being prepared. It is reported the Essanay Company are making great records in their sales of film in European markets.

Special posters for "The Danger Line" and "The Little Doctor of the Foothills" have been ordered by the Essanay Company. They are exceptionally attractive and of a higher quality even than the present Essanay posters. They will be offered for sale at regular prices, or the same as charged for previous Essanay posters.

The two feature films described in the Essanay Company's bulletin of releases for the first two weeks in June are "Away Out West," a Western drama, and "A Honeymoon for Three," another full reel comedy.

"Away Out West" is advertised as the best Western drama which has as yet been offered by their Western producer. It is a story of mining life in the gold districts of the West, is novel in plot, and contains a number of photographic effects seldom seen in moving pictures. The story concerns two prospectors who set out on a prospecting trip from a little Nevada town to the goldfields, two or three days' journey across the desert. While en route they come up to a miner's cabin and find the old miner on his deathbed. One of them ministers to his last wants, for which kindness the old miner gives him a chart of a mine which he claims is very rich. In the middle of the desert, while they are encamped for the night, one of the prospectors steals the chart from his partner's pocket, packs up and steals away, leaving the other to die of thirst in the desert. He finds the mine but is stricken with a guilty conscience when he sees in a vision his partner lying unconscious in the desert sand. Hurrying out, he mounts his horse and rides back to the spot where the two had encamped for the night. He finds as pal just as he saw him pictured in the vision, places him in the saddle and the two ride off to the mine. When the deserted prospector has sufficiently regained his strength he is taken into the mine and the treasure is revealed to him. The treacherous pal pleads forgiveness, even offering his comrade the whole mine, but the latter stretches out his hand, offers his forgiveness and refuses to accept the offer.

"A Honeymoon for Three" is the Essanay Company's feature comedy and is described as the most humorous film of their series of full reel comedies. It tells of a young motor enthusiast, who, with his fiancee, plans a motor car honeymoon. We see them at the close of the wedding ceremony preparing for the long trip. While the car is standing waiting, a poor woman with an infant, who has been turned out of her rooms, staggers by and watching her opportunity places the infant in the tonneau of the car, covers him up and a moment later, when the newlyweds hurry down the steps of the mansion, she staggers away. The discovery of the baby is made later on a country road and though they try in numerous ways to get rid of it each attempt is a failure. What follows is extremely funny, in that they can give nobody an explanation of how they came by the baby. The picture ends happily in Jack and his wife locating the mother of the infant, whom they bring out to the Wisconsin home of Jack's father, and to whom they return the infant. The humor of the film is helped out with some very funny notes and subtitles.

The other pictures described in the Guide are: "Levi's Dilemma," a Ghetto comedy, "Henry's Package," released June 1; "Burly Bill," another famous Essanay baby story, released June 8, and "The Ranchman's Feud," a Western drama, released June 11.

Just completed at the Essanay's Chicago studio is another full reel comedy entitled "A Modern Cinderella." It is said to be one of the most beautiful scenic productions ever made by this company. It is probable the title of the film may be changed, but if so notice will be given later.

"A Victim of Hate," booked for release by the Essanay Company for June 22, is a dramatic subject of unusual strength, beautifully staged and splendidly acted. It is the first big subject in which Miss Spier, the Essanay Company's new leading lady, will appear.

LUBIN NOTES.

"A Veteran of the G. A. R.," the Lubin release made Decoration day, has won unqualified approval from those who have seen it run in the factory projection room. The makeups used by the players in the scene at a meeting of the G. A. R. post are remarkable as character studies. Some twenty actors are used in this scene—the post in a small country town with its handful of grizzled veterans and they were given a free hand in the matter of makeup, subject to the approval of the director. The result was a competition in makeup, some of the players trying a score of effects before they were content. The making of the picture was delayed more than a week to permit time for experiments, but the result is well worth the delay.

A comedy along the well established Lubin lines with a Western background is something of a novelty, and "Percy, the Cowboy," which will be released June 2, is a remarkably funny film. The advent of the Easterner on the ranch with a ribbon decorated revolver and a perfectly lovely

MILLES NOTES

As long as the public will support picture plays and other good ones. The Precious Diamond, which is to Milles release for May 28, is the story of a girl, one of the great causes of Armenia, who gives the women and children what she can for the cemeteries of the living dead, and see Lilla Lee with all others in the room and the last scene is disclosed. Conventional story, but Yes, but was, after the way it is acted and photographed. The pictures were made on the spot, and the real horrors of the Sculptured and the hunger killed. Many of the scenes were "real as life."

Wait for the next release, "The Padre's Secret," on June 2. You remember "The Seal of the Confessional." This is another great story of old Mexico, with its picturesque natives, splendid priests and intense atmosphere of love and hate.

A "stirring" feature soon—"Lost in C. Q. D." or "Saved by Wireless."

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

The Vitagraph Company is always thinly clad up to the minute, everything they do merits something people are interested of the picture and gives it something to think about. Just look at the pictures and you will take off your hat and see the wife today thinking. Mon Mye! this is great, something special, everyone should see this. It ought to be shown in our colleges and schools, both male and female, and business men's leagues. Of course it won't be and it is up to the exhibitors to show it to their audiences and get the profits, especially the hollow-chested, stoop-shouldered, weak-kneed and overweight man who goes to sleep at a picture solemn on how to take care of the human body, get it at shape and keep it so.

James J. Corbett, "Gentleman Jim," practices the science in an ingeniously arranged play with the introduction of a friendly boxing exhibition with another champion boxer and they certainly do show a thing or two about keeping one's self in good physical condition. Just watch the foot work and side steps. Pointing facts in it. Wasn't look at those tickly bobs about and make side cross counters, hooks, hooks, defense, attack and knockouts. It's all of physical culture. There isn't a muscle or joint that isn't exercised.

Here is where the boys will get pointers of what they can do to keep well and healthy. Gentlemen Jim" means a fine young lady at a reception and engages to put her through a course of training and physical culture as practiced by a professional athlete and it is easy we see him giving her lessons by the punching, shadow boxing. The benefit is marked in increased muscle and strength.

This picture will create interest everywhere. It will deadness the foolish ideas of boxing and give everybody some notion of the necessary preparation for sport, athletic contests and boxing matches such as the Jeffries-Johnson encounter which is being expected at the present time and in which Mr. Corbett is a most grand master of the art of self-defense and the preserving of a sound mind in a sound body.

Scene from "Out of the Past," a picture that made a hit.

The bathing season is open. You would think so if you had seen the number of actors thrown into the "Vitagraph Lake" last week when "The Dove on Men Club" was being put into moving pictures. The girls were equal to the occasion and they showed their determination to down the men every time they showed their heads above the water. Then the boys got into the spirit of the spirit and said, "Come on in, the water's fine," and those who didn't want to come in had to go whether they wanted to or not and they weren't particular either. It was a great day for "Ducks."

The Vitagraph Company is way ahead—of course it is, what we mean to say, it is way ahead in its work and the increased releases have not phased them in the least. So well is their corps organized that they have kept several weeks ahead of the supply and demand. There are some pictures now under way which are on a more magnificent scale than any ever done in moving pictures.

The immediate issues for the near future are: "The Wings of Love," May 21; "Convict No. 700," May 24; "Auntie at the Boat Race," May 27, and "The Love of Chrysanthemum," May 28.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

RAMONA. There are few American novels better known than the story of "Ramona" by Helen Jackson. Intensely thrilling without sensationalism, it most graphically illustrates the white man's injustice to the Indian. It is a romance with a deep motive, told with such sympathetic tenderness that the reader longs to visit the scenes wherein lived the simple, patient Ramona and the noble-hearted Alessandro, as described by Mrs. Jackson. Realizing what a gratification, both recreative and instructive, the depicting of this favorite novel, with absolute authenticity, would be to the patron of motion pictures, the Biograph Company made the journey to Camulos, Ventura County, California, where were found the identical locations and buildings wherein Mrs. Jackson placed her characters. The house wherein Ramona lived with its vine-clad verandas, the inner court, which is a veritable fortalice, the little chapel amid the trees, the huge cross, and the bells from old Spain are all apparently just as Mrs. Jackson saw them, and while the very air breathes romance there is a pious solemnity about the place that is awe-inspiring. The production adheres closely to the novel, showing the experiences of Ramona, the little orphan of the great Spanish household of Moreno, and Alessandro, the Indian. It opens with his arrival at the Camulos ranch with his sheep shearers, showing his first meeting with Ramona. There is at once a feeling of interest noticeable between them which opens into love. This Senora Moreno, her foster mother, endeavors to crush, with poor success, until she forces a separation by exiling Alessandro from the ranch. He goes back to his native village to find the white men devastating the place and scattering his people. The Senora, meanwhile, has told Ramona that she herself has Indian blood, which induces her to renounce her present world and go to Alessandro. They are married and he finds still a little shelter left from the wreckage. Here they live until the whites again appear and drive them off, claiming the land. From place to place they journey, only to be driven further until finally death comes to Alessandro just as aid comes in the person of Felipe, the Senora's son, who takes Ramona back to Camulos.

A KNOT IN THE PLOT.—You never can tell from where you stand whether it will be hit or miss, and presumption is sometimes pardonable, for in the affair of Jim Doyle, the dandified cowboy of the camp, it looked as though the race was his. He was in fine form, the track was good and he was certainly in the running. Milly Howard, the belle of the camp, certainly gave all the impression that things were pretty well understood between them, as she seemed attracted by Jim's manly bearing, dandy appearance and extreme good nature, and so the boys all withdrew their suits—that is, all but one, Manuel the Mexican. He loved, and when he loved he was determined. So he sets to work to cut Dandy Jim out, and he succeeds. Jim, however, is persistent and one day escorts the fair Milly to her home from the village store. The sight of Jim and Milly strolling along together knocks to "pi" in the minds of the boys the Mexican's yarn that he and Milly are engaged, and when they see him they twit him about it. Manuel is furious and goes to see the girl, accusing her of being false to their troth, and so spurns her. Milly, at his departure, falls sobbing to the ground. Two of the boys pass at this moment and imagining her grief due to a jilt by Jim, go off to find the supposed offender. Meanwhile, Manuel has relented and hurries Milly off to the minister's, where they are married, thus ending their unrest. The gang have surprised Jim, and before he has a chance to speak, bind and gag him. Jim has a sneaking suspicion that it is to be a lynching-bee, but is ignorant of the cause. The boys hustle him along, passing the minister's house, whom they call to accompany them. Jim believes the minister's services are enlisted for his funeral, so you may imagine his surprise when they halt in front of Milly's residence, and calling her out demand the minister to marry her and Jim at once. Milly refuses to become a bigamist, the minister refuses to perform the ceremony until the Mexican consents to make her a widow, and although Jim would be most willing to marry her he realizes the conditions prevent.

EDISON MFG. CO.

'MID THE CANNON'S ROAR. Major Baker, an officer of the Regular Army during the Civil War, becomes enamored of Millicent Brown, who, while she does not reciprocate his affection, esteems him very highly. He is about to propose to her when the scene is interrupted by the arrival of Col. Theodore Allison, a handsome young Colonel of the Fifth Pennsylvania Artillery. The men are friends and exchange greetings. Major Baker withdraws, and as he is leaving the room suspects that possibly the handsome Colonel is also a suitor for the hand of Millicent.

We next see the personages in whom we have taken an interest at a ball given at the armory of the Fifth Pennsylvania Artillery. After one of the numbers there is a dispute as to who has the right to the next dance with Millicent, Major Baker or Col. Allison. Each has the same lady's name on his card for the dance in question. The matter is settled by Allison claiming a preference because of the fact that he is the young lady's fiance and speaking to Major Baker the engagement ring on Millicent's finger. Major Baker bows stiffly and withdraws. In the next dance, a Virginia Reel, which is very prettily worked, we see the emotions that are apparent in the heart of the Major and his growing hatred of the man who has come between him and the realization of his hopes.

Suddenly into the ballroom come orderlies dispatched from the Brigade General to deliver messages to the various officers on the floor. The one to Allison reads: "Your regiment ordered to the front. Report immediately." A general stir stops the dancing and all is confusion and haste. Millicent sees Major Baker crossing the floor on his way out of the armory and begs him to make up with Col. Allison, as they are both going to the front and there is no knowing what may happen. As the two men face each other with the girl between them Major Baker deliberates a moment, then shakes his head and departs. Theodore and Millicent fondly embrace and the young Colonel leaves for the front.

Two months later we see the regiment of tailor-made soldiers of the Fifth Artillery under command of Col. Allison taking charge of Fort Loring, a key position in the mountains within the fighting zone of the Civil War. By a strange coincidence Major Baker is in command of the fort to which Col. Allison is detailed. As Baker's regiment of veterans marches from the fort they jeer and laugh at the "toy soldiers" of Allison's command. After the formal military ceremonies and just before Major Baker's departure, Col. Allison offers him his hand; instead of taking which Major Baker stiffly gives a military salute and joins his company.

Time goes on and Major Baker becomes attached to a distant command at another scene of action. Orders are given for the advance of a body of Union troops through a narrow gorge in the mountains in the vicinity of Fort Loring. Col. Allison is watching the men on the march. His eye suddenly discovers in the distance a Confederate officer ride into the head of the ravine and suddenly dart back toward the ridge of the hill. Presently a large force of Confederates rushes to cover behind the rocks on either side of the rough mountain roadway. Allison issues orders to his gunners down the line. He sees the Union men walk into the trap. There is no chance to save them before they do so, but immediately they begin to retreat and the Confederate force has driven them so that they are under the shelter of the guns commanded by him. Allison gives the order for continuous firing. We see the boys working behind the earthworks and also the effect of their shells upon the advancing enemy.

For days the fight goes on. The Confederates attempt to go through but are constantly driven back by the shell fire. The fort is cut off from outside supplies by flank movements of the enemy. This fact is communicated to the General in command of the division in which Major Baker is now a prominent figure. As the dispatch bearer greets the General and the message is opened disclosing the fact that the Fifth Pennsylvania Artillery is fighting against odds without food, he turns to Major Baker and orders him to the immediate relief of the garrison.

We now go back to the fort and see the men who were jeered and scoffed at because of their dudish appearance fighting against terrible odds.—hungry, thirsty and haggard, but game. Their shell fire is more desultory than ten days previous, and the enemy, realizing the fact, takes a desperate chance and charges through the gorge. At the critical moment relief comes, and Major Baker's regiment rushes into the fort and reveals the advancing charge. As Col. Allison staggers feebly and salutes the incoming commanding officer a thrilling and pathetic scene is presented. Baker is covered with dust and powder marks. Allison who has been shot in the arm, is bravely upholding the colors which fell when the flagstaff was struck by a shell, stands before him feebly saluting with his right hand, while his left arm hangs limply by his side.

Baker presents his orders. As he does so Allison topples and is about to fall when Baker grasps him firmly about the waist. The emotions of the two men are better imagined than described. In the soul-stirring thrill of the moment Major Baker forgets his enmity. Holding Allison firmly with his left arm, he extends his right and grasps the hand he has twice refused to hold in friendship.

Several months later Major Baker's regiment is passing through the city in which Millicent lives. Col. Allison has been given a furlough on account of his injuries and goes home to recuperate with Major Baker. Millicent, while watching the returning troops is surprised at the entrance of the two men and their changed relations.

THE MUE DRIVER AND THE GARRULOUS MUTE. During an Apache raid in Flat Water Canyon, New Mexico, Bill Joyce saves the life of Lieutenant Jones, who is in charge of a squad of cavalry engaged in driving off a band of Apaches. The Indians have massacred a home seeker, John Martin, and his wife in the presence of their son "Kink," a boy of fourteen. The impression made on the child's mind is so great that during after years the sight of an Indian produces in him the desire to kill.

Twenty years later Joyce is prospecting in Arizona with a partner, Charley, when he sees a man leave camp. Meeting the man out of the first water. With that air of [illegible] Joyce engages the stranger. The same affinity was noted to the extent that he engaged him to go [illegible] and a mule for each. Accompanied by the mules Joyce returns to the camp, finding that [illegible] Lieutenant Jones and [illegible] Joyce sees the stranger is none other than [illegible] Joyce with some [illegible] Joyce [illegible] to the saddle of his partner's mule, and [illegible] him in the two prisoners of the facilities, arrives [illegible] Mexican line.

The Indian who escaped just as Joyce [illegible] reports his advantage to the nearest military post. Joyce's camp is finally reached by the cavalry. As he sees them approach he [illegible] and [illegible] Lieutenant of the Line advances to the camp fire where Joyce is cooking a meal. Joyce looks to [illegible]. The Lieutenant [illegible] Joyce with a heated knocks over the [illegible] and stands jabbering on the other side of the embers making signs to indicate that he is deaf and dumb. The Lieutenant tries all sorts of methods to get a suitable response but to no avail. Finally has men tie Joyce to his horse and lead him away to be questioned by the Commandant.

Joyce is brought before the Colonel, a veteran of the military frontier posts. To all questions Joyce gives no response; in fact, he apparently does not know he is being questioned until the Colonel swings him around and gesticulates as if to talk. Then Joyce in dumb show tells him that he is mute. The Colonel tries a trick. He commands one of the men to step forward and level his carbine at Joyce's head. Tipping the soldier the wink to disregard the order he gives the word to fire. For a moment Joyce betrays suspense but he does not show to the persons in the room the sense of hearing.

The Colonel orders Joyce to the guard house. On the way thither they pass a military commissary wagon, the driver of which is brutally abusing his mules. This so enrages Joyce that he forgets the part he is playing and turns loose on the mule driver, to the astonishment of all. The mule driver says something to Joyce which is evidently not to his liking, for the latter springs at him, knocks him down, takes the reins straightens out the mule team and produces a sensation in the post which is brought to an abrupt [illegible] by the Colonel ordering him brought back to his quarters.

This last scene of the picture brings out the fact that Joyce is the same trooper who saved the Colonel's life when he was plain Lieutenant Jones back in Flat Water Canyon, New Mexico. There is a mutual recognition explanation and handshaking. The Colonel calls the guard back to the room. As they advance to take hold of Joyce the Colonel corrects their misunderstanding. Dismissing them, he tells the Lieutenant who Joyce is. Joyce's assurance that he did not kill the Indian is sufficient for the Colonel and all ends well for our big hearted hero.

TIN WEDDING PRESENTS. Our hero and his wife have just experienced one of those humorous and harrowing experiences of a wedding anniversary party when people congratulate you on having traveled so far into the state of matrimony without having walked into the abyss of divorce and a lot of other silly rot. It is Henry and wife's wedding and the guests have left them everything from a tin kitchen stove to a [illegible] boiler. Henry wants to get rid of the stuff, his wife objects. Henry, the inebriate, makes several plans and goes out to find an [illegible].

He engages a tramp in the park and offers him $25 if he will steal [illegible] house at night and remove the objectionable furniture. The tramp agrees and Henry presents his [illegible] for the tramp's head, [illegible] to pay over the money immediately the stuff is out of the house.

In the middle of the night Henry comes [illegible] in the dining room and goes down to investigate. Sure enough, his tramp as he thinks is at work. Henry points out the benefit of [illegible] money into the surprised burglar's hand and tells him to beat it. The burglar does out with the flowers and Henry goes back to bed.

An hour later he is aroused from his pleasant dreams by the creaking of the front door. He goes down stairs and finds a supposed burglar handling on the silverware and without investigating further thrusts the intruder into a closet and calls the police.

When they arrive the tramp is dragged out and Henry discovers his mistake. He has sent a real burglar off with the silverware and has arrested his tramp and accomplice. He is forced to tip the policemen substantially before they will let the tramp go and also makes good with the tramp. This practically cleans him out but

A KNOT IN THE PLOT

There is Many a Slip——

In this Biograph comedy a lesson is shown—"Don't be too sure." The dandy of the camp vowed he'd win the heart and hand of the belle. Things looked easy for him at first, but an impetuous Mexican cuts him out. As the course of true love ne'er runs smooth, they have a little tiff and the boys all think it is the dandy who has spurned the belle, and so seek him out to compel him to marry the girl. Of course, the dandy would have been pleased to do so, but the Mexican, having relented, marries her, so this prevents the boys carrying out their design.

the real climax comes when the next morning an expressman drives up and delivers the basket of crockery with the billet note from the burglar. "I don't want dis junk, what do you take I ain't Pay de expressman."

"The charges are five dollars," remarks the expressman.

The bewildered Henry pays the last debt and turns the crockery over to his wife, muttering exasperatedly, "Never again!"

WHERE IS MULCAHY! Sergeant Mulcahy, a rotund, pompous policeman, reports to the desk sergeant in the station house one morning and receives a note from the chief, ordering him to keep a sharp lookout for a number of mischievous boys, who are annoying the citizens and householders of his part of the precinct. Mulcahy says he will get them and, starting out with his men, warns them to watch out for the boys.

Sergeant Mulcahy, an hour later, comes across an old gentleman, who is being annoyed by two boys, who have made a target of his silk hat. Mulcahy dashes off after the boys, up an alley, across lots and into private gardens, and thinks he has them captured, when they come to a high board fence. The larger boy adroitly leaps over the fence and the smaller chap crawls through a hole just as the policeman's brawny hand is thrust after him. He catches the youth by the coat tail and in an effort to get a tighter hold of his prisoner, wriggles head first through the hole, but is unable to get further. The boy with a sudden jerk breaks away and runs after the other chap. Mulcahy sees he is beaten and attempts to squirm out, when he finds that he is stuck tight and the more he wriggles the tighter he sticks. The boys see the policeman's predicament and return cautiously, grinning broadly. The fat policeman mutters a few incoherences and calls down a curse on the kids. They laugh over the situation and after tormenting the poor cop for a while move away, heedless of his entreaties for them to help him out of the hole.

Eventually Mulcahy is missed at the station. They have had to report him late for two or three hours and fear is expressed by the desk sergeant that Mulcahy may have met with some accident.

We return again to Mulcahy, who has been struggling in the hole for an hour. Suddenly he espies his two former tormentors and a large crowd of dirty young vagabonds approaching threateningly toward him. The boys gather around him and lose no time in getting even with their old enemy. The scene finally ends with two or three of the boys pulling the corpse's trousers off and making away with them.

This is too much for Mulcahy who exerts a supreme effort in making his escape. He finds an ash barrel handy, kicks the end in and crawling into it he makes his way cautiously up the alley.

Another hour has passed and Mulcahy has not reported. Finally the sergeant, in desperation, sends a squad of policemen in search for him and after a search come upon the poor corpse, making a back alley sneak for the police station.

Arrived at the station Sergeant Mulcahy makes a tearful explanation of his terrifying adventures and mourns the loss of his trousers. At this instant a lady, bearing the policeman's trousers, comes in, making inquiries for the owner. Mulcahy identifies them, and the woman, blushing violently, runs out. Mulcahy makes for an exit room amidst the laughter of his brother cops, but, of course, he is unable to appreciate the humor of the situation.

THE BROTHER, THE SISTER AND THE COW-PUNCHER.—Allan Ardmore and his sister, Edith, two young Eastern people, pay a visit to their uncle's ranch in Arizona. Young Ardmore has suffered a physical breakdown and is seeking to regain his health. Albert Weston, his uncle, believes in the doctrine of "back to nature," and sees clearly that what the boy needs is fresh air and plenty of rough, hard work. Summoning his foreman, Dan Wells, he turns the boy over to him and tells him to make a cowboy out of him.

Edith Ardmore attracts Dan's eye and he soon finds he is in love with her and is bitterly neglecting his real charge, her brother. He is eager to realize the attractions of the wife of a man of wealth and position, especially as the girl is not without money of her own. Dan soon sees that Tonia, a young Mexican girl and daughter of the place's owner, is hopelessly in love with him, and calling on each other's aid with [illegible] and [illegible] they plot to avoid Tonia.

Ardmore explains that to [illegible] he is on the path to ruin and promises to mend his ways, but it finds it almost impossible to get himself of infatuation for the Mexican girl and again sends her out.

In the meantime young Wells has given evidence of his affections toward Edith in his careful attention to her wants and by presenting her with numberless little gifts, including a small hand purse. Later he confesses his love and is accepted by Edith.

Ardmore, after numerous secret visits to the gambling house, loses all his money and Tonia turns him down, not wishing to have anything more to do with so poor a gambler. The misguided young fellow does not understand, he must not lose Tonia, and returning to the ranch house slips into his sister's room and steals her purse, reflecting that with the money he can again re-establish himself in the good graces of his señorita.

This money goes with the rest, and Ardmore taunting out Dan, tells him of his losing certain money which he must replace. Dan goes to the gambling house and wins back a portion of the money, but refuses to give any to the boy until he has broken off with Tonia. Tonia, he says, does not love him, and as proof of this, he offers to show the youth that Tonia would allow any man to make love to her, providing he had money. Young Ardmore demands proof and Dan promises to show him.

Some time later Ardmore finds Tonia and Dan together, and it is patently evident that what Dan has said is true. Suddenly a thought strikes Allan. He will tell his sister and show her Dan's apparent perfidy and in that way have revenge upon his rival—or greater. He finds Edith in her room, and from a view of her lover's infidelity Edith, of course, entirely misunderstands the situation, and turns away, fully resolved to break with such a traitor as Dan apparently is.

Dan in the meantime has heard that Tonia is trying to poison Weston to save Edith. He then realizes what young Ardmore meant. When he said he must replace certain money. Procuring the purse and dismissing the stupid Mexican girl, he leaves a number of bills in the purse and returns to the ranch house.

Stealing quietly into Edith's room he is about to replace the purse when Edith enters. She accuses him of theft and infidelity. Dan does not understand the real charge and pleads that she must be true. She tells him to go, and finds the purse and money into his face. He is about to stagger out when Allan enters and makes a clean breast of his despicable performances to Dan. Dan and Edith, while young Ardmore promises to mend his ways.

WINTER BATHING IN THE WEST INDIES.—This film was made on Hog Island, across the harbor from Nassau, and shows the beach most favored by the fashionables who frequent that Winter resort. It opens with a few feet showing the honeycomb rocks with the surf beating against the shore and then shows the famous bathing beach where the surf rolls in, unchecked, from the Gulf of Mexico. After a Gulf storm the waves are mountain high, but the picture shows the scene in its ordinary aspect with the bathers frolicking in the water. There is also shown the famous fruit lunch. The visitor may enjoy all the fruit he can eat for the shilling that also includes the trip across the harbor in the tender and the method of preparing the oranges and cocoanuts is shown in detail, the close of the picture being the departure for Nassau in the moonlight, a tinted scene of rare beauty. Under the southern skies the photography is superb and in every way the subject is a charming one, the introduction of some of the players adding life to the scene.

THE BRAVE DESERVE THE FAIR.—A young man comes to the aid of a strange woman whom he sees stagger in the street. He is just in time to save her from a bad fall as she loses consciousness and for an instant he stands helpless holding her in his arms. Then a passerby chances along and by good fortune proves to be a physician. His rapid examination shows him the gravity of the case, an automobile is summoned and the girl is hurried to her home, her address being discovered from cards in her pocketbook. The young man goes to his home, but the barbed shaft of the arrow of the god of love has sunk deep into his heart and he sits restless in his room until he reads in the evening paper of the serious illness of Miss Parks, the girl. The malady is a baffling one and physicians have decided upon an operation for the transfusion of blood as a last resort. Applicants willing to give their blood are advertised for and the young lover assumes rough dress that will better harmonize with his presence and takes his place in the little group of men who are willing to sell a pint of blood for $100. His robust physique causes him to be singled out as the patient and the physician, the same who came to his aid when Miss Parks was stricken, recognizes him and sympathizes with his feelings. A clever young surgeon performs the operation and the lover is out of the house again before the girl recovers consciousness. Her recovery is rapid once the crisis is passed and presently the two meet at the mountain resort whither Miss Parks has gone to recuperate. The trained nurse, still in attendance, recognizes him, but promises secrecy and he is left free to win the girl on his own merits. It is evident that his feeling is reciprocated, but it is not until the girl recognizes him that he gains the courage to speak. She has dropped her bracelet into the water and he bares his arm to withdraw it. The scar of the incision attracts her attention and she realizes then why she has felt drawn toward him.

THE SISAL INDUSTRY IN THE BAHAMAS.—Sisal fiber as a substitute for manila is a comparative recent industry, but it meant the commercial establishment of the British West Indies and is a most important industry in the Bahama group. The long, sword-like leaves of the sisal plant—a species of cactus—are cut close to the base and are fed into a machine which strips the watery pulp from the long, silky fiber. The fiber quickly dries and bleaches under the hot sun and the strands are woven into rope said to be fully as strong and lasting as the longer known manila. Most of the work is done by negro hands, for no white person could toil under the sub-tropical sun and long endure, and the young girls and comfortable appearing matrons make picturesque spots against the background of fleecy fiber. All of the interesting operations are shown, including the crude rope walk in which the strans are twisted into a stronger body. Although an industrial, a number of the scenes possessed marked scenic beauty and all of them possess the touch of oddity due to the presence of the negroes who are unlike the negro of the South and still retain almost unimpaired their quaint customs of their African ancestry.

PATHE FRERES.

ROMEO TURNS BANDIT.—While an up-to-date Romeo climbs the garden wall to kiss his Juliet, her father appears and takes off his daughter and dismisses her suitor. Romeo, however, dresses up like a brigand and accompanied by three friends holds up the irascible father and binds him to a tree.

Romeo then meets his lady love who joins in the plot, and a letter is sent to her father that he must pay a ransom of $1,000 for the recovery of his daughter.

In his trouble the father confides in Romeo, who undertakes to get the daughter back. This is of course an easy matter, and there is then no objection to the marriage of Romeo and the girl.

LITTLE MARY AND HER DOLLY.—Little Mary's mother, very sick, with only a young son to keep her and Mary, looks wistfully at the pears in the basket of a passing fruit seller.

Little Mary's heart is almost bursting as she sees the longing expression of her mother and knows that they have not the money to purchase any.

She takes her dolly and tries to sell it but without success and finally another little girl snatches it away, and throws the old dolly to her dog to play with. Little Mary is inconsolable, until the second little girl's mother, hearing the story, gives her money with which to buy the pears for her mother, and later the little girl brings her a fine new dolly to make up for the one she had destroyed.

MAX LEADS THEM A NOVEL CHASE.—Max at an evening party takes a necklace from one of the guests and makes good his escape.

The guests and the police set out in pursuit but Max employs some novel methods and among others mounts a boat on the water chute and finally makes good his escape in a balloon which soars far out of reach of his would-be captors.

This film is just cram full of novel situations and laughable episodes.

CAPTURING CUB BEARS.—Amid the pretty scenery of Ariege in Southern France we see the peasants capturing young bear cubs whose agile antics and endeavors to escape add greatly to the interest in the film.

MIRROR OF THE FUTURE.—A young man is out walking with his intended and they each purchase of a street peddler a mirror which possesses the power of showing the future. What they see in the mirror is disclosed on the screen in an entirely novel manner and the results are such as to make both young and old roar.

A PRINCE OF WORTH.—A young prince secretly married to a gypsy girl is forced to disclose the fact when his father desires him to marry a wealthy girl.

Cast out by his parents he is forced to earn his own living, and commencing in the streets as an acrobat he eventually becomes the star turn in a prominent vaudeville house.

His father one night sees his son's performance and pleased with his success agrees to a reconciliation with him, his wife and little child. Max Linder plays the chief part in ths film and his cleverness on the trapeze shows him in a new light.

A SAILOR'S FRIENDSHIP.—Little Pierre, the youngest of a long line of seafarers, has been brought up by his grandparents to embrace the same calling. While still a child he plights his troth to his playmate sweetheart, Janick, and then accompanied by his comrade, Jacquemin, ships on board a large vessel.

Fifteen years pass and Pierre does not return. The grandfather is growing old and feeble, when Jacquemin returns announcing that Pierre has disappeared during a fight and is thought to be dead. The grandmother grieves for her husband, who she fears will not recover for the shock, and implores Jacquemin to announce himself as Pierre.

The sailor consents and the old man and Janick rejoice, but when he falls in love with the latter he feels he can no longer deceive her and confesses to her that he is not Pierre.

The same day Pierre returns unharmed to claim his own. The truth cannot now be withheld from the old man, and Jacquemin, heartbroken, makes his preparations to return to the sea.

Pierre, however, seeing that Janick can no longer love him, forgives his old comrade, gives him Janick and he himself returns to the salior's life he loves.

IN THE GREAT NORTHWEST.—Told 'mid the swerving pine and snowclad hills in the great Northwest, one of the most intense and dramatic stories we have had the pleasure to offer. We find the beautiful daughter of the Factor at the settlement trading post plainly showing her disregard for so much formality. Pierre, a young Canadian trapper, thinks well of Julie and presses his suit and is finally accepted, but not until after Pierre in his persistent suit has incurred the enmity of Jon the trapper. The party is leaving the trading post for a long hunt; Pierre is to accompany them. Ronald, a rich young Englishman, arrives shortly after at the post with a letter from the Governor General, in which he is informed that the bearer has been appointed Game Warden of that territory and that the Factor should post notice to the effect that laws protecting game and rights of reserves be respected. This is read with many misgivings by the populace. The new courier meets Julie—a friendship is soon formed; her father looks with favor upon Ronald thinking him rich, and encourages Julie to forget Pierre—they are married—Pierre returns—the true character of Ronald asserts itself in his cowardice and Julie regrets but too late. Pierre bids them go and he seeks solace in the great woods of the North.

THE TRIMMING OF PARADISE GULCH.—The most absolutely new and original Western story ever put in picture form. We find a little mountain tavern near the foothills where the cowboys and rangers were wont to spend their spare time when they were not chasing a steer. One nice Summer day the camp was all in a turmoil; the stage had arrived and among its occupants was a young lady, demure and sweet. Several of the residents thereabout and a smooth looking chap of the city type who afterwards proves to be a vendor in cheap jewelry and is out for the harvest. Nell, the young lady in question, establishes a school in art recognizing in the cowboy clientele excellent material to further her scheme. She soon has them all paying marked homage—willing to take lessons just in order to admire their teacher. They are suddenly seized with the idea of making her presents of rings and jewelry, little dreaming that the (dark horse) man in the background selling rings was none other than her husband. Things assume an exceedingly interesting state of affairs.

THE HEART OF A HEATHEN CHINEE.—This story is unusual because it deals with the sentimental side of the Chinese character. A married couple in search of a house servant hire a Chinaman. After a time the couple quarrel. John, the Chinaman, acts as a peacemaker. A serious estrangement then occurs. Again, faithful John comes to the rescue, until he comes to be looked upon as an indispensable jewel of the household. The theme is an absorbing one and upon unique and original lines. We are of the opinion that this tale will, in point of novelty, prove a moving picture surprise, because in the treatment of the story, the directing and the acting nothing is unnatural or overdone.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE WINGS OF LOVE.—On one of the tributary canals of the Zuyder Zee, a miller has a mill and a pretty daughter who is fair to look upon and attractive to the young men of the village where she lives; especially is she attractive to the consequential Burgomaster's son, who is in her company whenever opportunity presents itself. The Burgomaster objects to his son's attentions to the miller's daughter, whom he thinks inferior socially. The miller opposes the Burgomaster's son because of his inability to work with his hands, and furthermore does not want her nor himself to be subjects of distinction, and hereby hangs the tale of the picture.

The miller's daughter becomes engaged to the Burgomaster's son and the trouble begins. The boy is kept indoors by his father, who keeps close vigil over him. The miller's daughter is locked in the upper loft of her father's mill for her disobedience. While the crafty old master is watching his son, he falls asleep, and the young chap takes advantage of the chance and starts out for the haunts of his lady love.

He reaches the place of her imprisonment and finds her on the little platform at the top of the mill. She tells him of her father's anger and her sentence and deplores her inability to come down to him, and he determines to come up to her. No sooner said than done. Grasping one of the arms of the windmill as it revolves, he flies as if on the wings of love up to her perch, takes her on his back with her arms entwined about his neck. He seizes hold of the following arm of the windmill and safely lands his precious burden on the ground. They now make their way to the village parson to be married and outwit the old folks.

While the thrilling scene of love has been going on, the Burgomaster and the miller discover that their children have gained their liberty. They each hasten to the home of the other in hope of finding his child. On their ways they meet and clash, as usual, exchanging "compliments" and swearing vengeance. They learn that the young folks have gone to the minister's house. They turn their footsteps thither, arriving there too late; the Burgomaster's son has married the miller's daughter. CONVICT NO. 796. Arrested, tried and convicted, the criminal is brought before the Judge for sentence, which is given by his honor and is heartily denounced by the prisoner, seized by the officer and turned to the penitentiary. The convict, who is number "796," proves to be a very fractious one, constantly in trouble with his fellows.

With the chain gang "796" is put to work in a quarry, and is disturbed by a convict working beside him. He becomes enraged and strikes him with the sledge hammer and fells him to the ground. Seized by the guards, the ugly prisoner is put in solitary confinement. Unnoticed he files through and removes the bars of his cell window and escapes with a set purpose of killing the judge who sentenced him.

His escape is discovered and the prison guards start in pursuit. The convict secures a disguise and makes his way to the Judge's house, where he finds the judicial representative at work in his library. Sneaking up behind him, he strikes him insensible, binds and gags him. With deliberation and hatred "796" draws a knife from his belt and is about to kill the Judge when he hears, floating in silvery notes and sweet, soft voice, the words and music of "Lead, Kindly Light Amid the Encircling Gloom." The hand of the convict is arrested and the knife drops from his hand as his ears catch the singing of the hymn by the Judge's daughter in an upper room.

He bends forward to listen and hears, "The night is dark and I am far from home, lead Thou me on." The words have reached him, and the conscious-stricken man picks up his knife, releases the Judge and breaks down in tears of remorse and repentance. The administrator of justice reaches forth his hand in pity and mercy, telling him to brace up and be a man.

At this moment the officers have traced the culprit to the home of "His Honor," and when they are admitted, rush into the room to seize their prisoner. The Judge stays their advance to grant the felon's request to meet the sweet singer of "Lead, Kindly Light." The daughter of the Judge comes upon the scene and sings once more for the wretched man, who seems to have awakened to his better self. Quietly submitting to arrest, he is led away by the prison guards. The Judge and his daughter are deeply affected. The daughter, who makes weekly missions to the prison, finds an eager and sincere auditor in "Convict 796."

AUNTIE AT THE BOAT RACE.—Everything is the coming boat race at New London between Yale and Harvard Universities. Everywhere everybody is alive with it, two to one on Harvard, ten to five on Yale. The interest and excitement is growing keener as the day approaches. Nash, the villain, has risked his all and borrows more to put up on Yale. The strength and pride of the Harvard crew is Courtney. Everything depends upon him, and without him Yale would win without a shadow of a doubt. Nash knows this and is puzzling his brain and exercising his devilish ingenuity to get him out of the way. To accomplish this he arranges with some of his pals to carry out a plot to get Courtney out of the way.

Here is where Courtney and his chum, Ben, arrange a little scheme of their own to get Courtney's sweetheart, Mabel, to the race. She had intended to go, but her chaperone, Mrs. Smith, cannot go with her, and Mabel's uncle refuses to let her attend the regatta without one. Ben agrees to masquerade as a woman and go to the race as Mabel's chaperone. The project works to a turn, and Mabel's uncle falls with a crash to the charms of the gay deceiver, to whom he dances attendance all the way to New London, where they all make themselves comfortable at the hotel.

Here is where the woman comes into the case. Mabel's room at the hotel happens to be next to the one occupied by Nash, and in which he and his fellow conspirators arrange to get Courtney out of the way. Mabel overhears the plot, gets the evidence and rushes off to tell Ben, and, if possible, prevent it. Ben reads the conspiring letter found by Mabel and hears her story, makes a dash for the street, followed by the enamored uncle and Mabel. They all jump into an auto, the chauffeur pulls the lever, and off they go to the rescue.

Courtney has been drawn into the villainous plot and is held prisoner in a wood on the outskirts of the town, particulars of which were told in the letter which Mabel found in Nash's room. While all this is going on the Harvard boys are getting anxious and worried about their stroke, Courtney. "Why doesn't he come? Has he thrown us down?" "Here he comes now! Rah! Rah!! Rah!!! Harvard! Harvard!! Harvard!!!" and the three times three. Courtney springs from the car, gets into his racing togs, takes his place in the shell just in time to get it in line for the start. Bang! They make an even "get away," and are pulling an even stroke, reach the railroad bridge and skim the water of the old Thames like flashes of sunbeams; first Yale and then Harvard begins to pull away, until she crosses the line a winner by at least ten lengths.

Back to the boathouse again. The Harvard men step from their shell. They are met by their friends, among whom is Mabel, who rushes in Courtney and throws herself in his arms. Ben, in his excitement, waves his hat in one hand and takes off his blonde wig with the other. Mabel's old uncle looks on in [illegible] and [illegible] Harvard and Courtney win. Nash, Yale and the uncle lose.

LOVE OF CHRYSANTHEMUM.—According to Japanese custom Chrysanthemum, a Japanese girl is betrothed and married to a man of wealth and influence several years her senior. She does not love her husband notwithstanding, but loves and solicitude for her.

A young American touring the country, sees Chrysanthemum and is impressed by her beauty and politeness, makes up his mind to get acquainted with her by way of pastime and adventure. He succeeds in attracting her attention and then taking advantage of the opportunity and her simplicity, makes love to her, completely winning her affections.

While visiting at her home, he barely escapes being caught by the husband, whose suspicions is aroused by her agitation and the tea service being laid for two, and which she explains was for herself and her maid.

She is happy when in the American's company, and longs for his presence, and we see her anxiously watching for his coming the next morning. But he does not come. He is at a tavern with a party of gay tourists, among whom is a bewitching creature with whom he is very smitten, and he lingers in her society while poor, trusting, loving little Chrysanthemum awaits his coming. She is disappointed, and, ordering her cago, she is carried to the tavern, where she discovers the American and the cause of his non-appearance at their trysting place.

Chrysanthemum asks him if he will come to her garden in the evening. To get rid of her, he promises. Again she is doomed to disappointment. Her husband now appears and gallantly escorts her to the porch of their home, presents her with a new fan and pays court to her, but she is indifferent; her heart is with the American, and the American's is with the attractive woman at the tavern. The Japanese girl goes to the bench where she and her lover so recently sat in sweet embrace, disturbed by her aching heart and her great love for him. She takes her place at the garden gates like a sentinel; she prays for his coming, but her lover cannot tear himself from the one he really loves.

It is morning again, and Chrysanthemum once more appears at the tavern. Just in time to see the American place an engagement ring on the finger of the other woman. Chrysanthemum asks the American why he did not come to her. He coldly ignores her questions and tells her he is engaged to another. She appeals to him not to cast her off, but he turns away and leaves the place with his intended wife and the other visitors. The poor little Chrysanthemum is crushed and heartbroken, gets into her cago and is taken to her home.

Her husband, who has watched this scene and learned of her love for the American, follows her, confronts her with her unfaithfulness, denounces her and is impelled to kill, but changes his mind, drops the knife and orders her from his house. She falls prostrate; her hand comes in contact with the knife. She grasps it, arises with a gleam of despair and determination in her eyes, hurries into the garden, where she ends her unhappy life at the spot where her ill-placed love first found its awakening.

THE PEACEMAKER.—Love and jealousy make strange bedfellows. They cannot dwell together in harmony, so it is not surprising that Minnie got dreadfully jealous when Jack went to town and accepted an invitation to supper at Stanley's Restaurant with his friend, "Doc," and his fiancee, a charming, sprightly little creature who, as a clever hostess, paid due attention to "Doc's" guest. There was nothing unusual in this, but some busybody wrote Minnie all about it, and of course did not fail to express her own opinions and surmises.

Jack's uncle, a benevolent, sympathetic old scholar, seems to be the confidant and ever-ready haven of consolation for the young folk. Minnie goes to the uncle and shows him her friend's letter and tells him what a wretch Jack is. Jack returns home and Minnie will not have anything to do with him. Jack tries to explain, but no use; he gives up in despair and goes to his uncle and tells him his trouble.

The old fellow thinks while he consoles him, and gets a happy idea. He writes "Doc" Glover of the trouble and tells him to bring his fiancee and spend the day in the country at his home. "Doc" writes a letter to the old man explaining the circumstances of Jack's supper at the restaurant in town.

A few days afterward "Doc" and his sweetheart arrive at the uncle's home and the good man tells them he will advise Jack to make love to Kitty, "Doc's" sweetheart, and at the same time advise Minnie to make love to "Doc," so they can make each other still more jealous. The plan is readily entered into by the two young abettors and at once set the plan in operation. It works admirably.

Jack is wrought up to a great pitch, and Minnie can scarcely contain herself with pique. She can stand it no longer and makes her way to her old friend, Jack's uncle, and while she is sobbing on his shoulder Jack is called in by his uncle from a side room, into which he took refuge when he [illegible] Minnie coming in. He [illegible] and [illegible] Minnie successfully [illegible] the old [illegible] Jack [illegible], and even Minnie adds her kind words [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

"I am Afraid"

Not a day passes without some exhibitor writing to me and saying:-"I am afraid to turn independent. I'm afraid you can't give me the variety of film subjects I must have to run my theatre." At least 90 per cent. of the exhibitors are heart and soul with the independent movement, but some of them are "afraid." Now, listen to me:—if variety and quality are the things you need, you can get them in better shape from the biggest and best film renter in the world than from anybody else. I am the biggest buyer of films in the world to-day. I buy not only a greater variety but a greater quantity than anybody else. I am in a better position than anybody else to give you the very program you must have. I am the logical man for you to deal with, and the quicker you recognize that unalterable fact, the quicker you'll get busy with Carl, the man who built up the greatest film business in the world on Q-U-A-L-I-T-Y-!

And, assuredly, why not? The very gods have singled him out for their especial favors. Here is an account of one day's [illegible] work at Termol's studio. discovered the injured brave lying unconscious at the bottom of the cliff.

After a perilous descent, the maiden soon discovered that she was powerless to lift him, so started back for help, but in running back to camp she met two trappers who gladly came to the Indian's aid and carried him to their cabin until the girl could find her father, Chief Red Mountain.

To allay suspicion Black Arrow led the rescuing party.

Once at the cabin, however, his entire attention was taken up in stealing whiskey, sugar and any other articles he could lay his hands upon, and was just about to get away with the trapper's rifle when the trapper entered and in no gentle manner assisted the thief to the door.

Once more Black Arrow brooded revenge.

Supplying his fellow Indians with the stolen whiskey and promising them as much more as they could carry away, he led them in an attack upon the cabin.

Fortunately Star Light had overheard their plans and finding that her father, the chief, was out hunting, the girl made all possible speed to warn the trappers and bring the other whites to their aid.

This done, Star Light sets out to find the old chief, who was highly incensed that Black Arrow should start hostilities with the white settlers, and hurried to the scene of action with a flag of truce.

After banishing the treacherous Black Arrow from his tribe, he passed around the pipe of peace, which the white settlers gladly acepted.

DON CARLOS.—The bold young Prince, Don Carlos, dashing, flighty, daring, has long braved the wrath of the elders of Philippe's court. It is therefore no wonder when he even defies the power of the august head of the Spanish religious regime of the period by repeatedly declining to accord him due respect. Complaints are made to the King, but without satisfaction.

Now, young Don Carlos is betrothed to Elizabeth of Spain, and since the King has no wife, the vengeful Grand Inquisitor, whose power in those days was great, connives to wrest her from him. Not only does he succeed in so doing, but he causes the King to fall in love with her; it is now father against son, and eventually the King wins her. But the Grand Inquisitor's dark work is not ended. He manages to excite the King's suspicions against Don Carlos, and when he thinks the monarch sufficiently bitter tries to get his signature to a death warrant for the young man. When the King refuses the villain causes a false note to be sent Carlos summoning him to the Queen's chamber; when he arrives there swordless, on a mission of love, she tries to explain, quickly begging him to go. But ere he can do so, the Grand Inquisitor enters with the King, to prove charges against the Queen. The Prince, defenseless, quickly falls under the onslaught of the soldiers, but the Queen stems the fury of the King long enough to have the body searched—the note produced. The treachery of the Grand Inquisitor is apparent, and after he is banished the King falls weeping over the corpse of his son.

THE CURSE OF GAMBLING.—James Brown, a young bank cashier, his wife and child, are living happily together until one evening a friend calls to see Brown and invites him to a club. He reluctantly accepts the invitation, telling his wife that he will be home early. Upon reaching the club Brown is invited to play a game of poker. He hesitates, saying that he does not understand the game. Finally his friend persuades him and consenting he plays, winning a large stake. The game proves to be very interesting and he does not notice the time. Suddenly, realizing how late it is, he jumps to his feet and leaves in haste. Reaching home, his wife scolds him for staying out so late. He tries to square matters by kissing her, she refusing to let him. Brown then shows her the money he has won. She becomes somewhat reconciled but makes him promise never to gamble again. Brown makes the promise, but a few nights later is again at the club. This time Dame Fortune deserts him and he loses all his money. Finally, as a last resort to get back his losses, he stakes his watch and that, too, is lost. Arriving home, again late at night, his wife, who has been waiting up for him, sees the dejected look upon his face and suspects the truth, weeping as though her heart would break. The next day Brown is at work in the bank when he receives a telegram from his friend telling him to be at the club that night as there is to be a "big game" played there. Feeling sure that good luck would come his way, he takes some money from the safe, intending to put it back if he should win. As he is putting the money into his pocket he is discovered and is about to be arrested when his wife and child, who have been sent for, appear. They plead so hard for him that he is released, but is discharged from his position. Now that the "Curse of Gambing" is upon him, he sinks, dragging his wife and child with him into dire poverty, ending in the untimely death of his wife.

PERILS OF THE PLAINS. A pioneer famiy, consisting of father, mother, son, young daughter and child are making their way across the plains in a prairie schooner. They come to a pretty spot where they decide to camp and are busy at their work when a guest rides in. He is offered food and made welcome. Each member of the family goes about his work, when the ungrateful visitor attempts to make off with their guns. The child warns them and he is held until the father gently kicks him out of camp, when they prepare to be on their way. Not satisfied with the treatment he received, the vagabond goes to an Indian camp and tells them of the pioneers. There is great excitement and they all make haste to depart. The prairie schooner is again on its way when a Western scout warns the family of the approach of the red men. They make every effort to outride their pursuers, who steadily gain on them. The scout has, meanwhile, dashed off to get the help of soldiers, who mount their steeds and go to the prisoners' assistance. It is decided best to alight from the schooner and fight the renegade and his followers. The soldiers and scout make a timely entrance, forcing the Indians away. The scout is rewarded for his aid by a kiss from the daughter, which likewise pleases and embarrasses him.

will equip the new theatre of the SAXE AMUSEMENT COMPANY at Broadway and 41st Street, as mentioned in another part of this paper.

Mr. Saxe is a gentleman of great experience in the moving picture business, and I felt flattered when he told me this:—

"Mr. Hallberg you are the only man in the business who apparently is not wild about putting in Moving Picture Machine and Economizer equipment on Broadway."

I asked him why, and Mr. Saxe said this:—

"Because you don't make as low a price as your competitors, but I have decided to put in the "HALLBERG" Economizer, two MOTIOGRAPH Machines and double dissolver and also your other specialties, because I know you have the best equipment."

J. H. HALLBERG

Mister Moving Picture Man

Let me tell you, orders of this kind are only given on merit. If any other machine or Economizer had been as good as mine I would not have gotten the order, because my price was higher; but I don't go on price—QUALITY is my FIRST THOUGHT—Price, next.

I have selected the best goods on the market for you, and can fit you out with complete electric machine and ventilating equipment, and results are positively guaranteed.

Get my prices on the "HALLBERG" Economizer, MOTIOGRAPH M. P. machines, Incandescent lighting system to save 70% on your current bill, ELECTRA Pink Label carbons, French Condensers, Announcement Slides, Ventilating Fans, and don't forget to send 35 cents for a can of "HALLBERG'S SPEC-OIL,"—prepaid mail—It saves 50% on your oil bill for machine—Try a Can.

"Commend You for Your Straightforward Advertising!"

Lawrence W. Carter, Star Theater, Duluth, Minn.—Accept my congratulations on, and allow me to heartily commend you for, the straightforward announcements you put out about your pictures, as this is one thing in which many manufacturers fall short.

"Perfectly Satisfied With the Quality!"

J. A. King, Mgr., Great Western Film Co., Winnipeg, Man.—We are perfectly satisfied with the quality of your products and are pleased indeed to see an independent manufacturer turning out films like this.

"No Trouble in Getting the Audience's Attention With a Thanhouser!"

Will Hemsteger, 1214 So. Main St., Dayton, Ohio.—I have been in the picture business thirteen years and I want to congratulate you on your splendid work. I have no trouble in getting the audience's attention when I run a Thanhouser film.

"You're Doing the Work!"

L. C. Wallace, The Majestic, Red Oak, Iowa.—You're doing the work. Keep it up. The Patents Company took my license some time ago, but with such Independent film issuing as Thanhouser they can keep it.

"Through Thanhouser Film Our Receipts Rose 30%!"

Hayden Morris, Mgr., Elite Theater, Regina, Wash.—We have been running your films for the past three weeks. From the day we first put on a Thanhouser film our receipts have risen 30 per cent. I have noticed that whenever we run your films I have more people come and congratulate me on a swell programme than when we run three films, all of other makes. "Jane Eyre" and "The Best Man Wins" were masterpieces of dramatic portrayal.

Did YOU arrange a special musical programme for "Winter's Tale?" Miss Spurr of the Royal, of Marion, did! Read!

THANHOUSER COMPANY: We are arranging a special musical programme for "The Winter's Tale." We are credited with the best two-piece orchestra in this state, and have earned our reputation by playing the pictures. We are going to make "The Winter's Tale" the biggest drawing card yet and expect to pack this house as it was never packed before.

Your late releases have improved wonderfully in development, settings and costuming. Some people have the idea that they can't repeat a film with success. There's lots of difference in repeating a good one and repeating a bad one. We repeated your "Daddy's Double" last Monday by request and found that it went better the second time than the first. It was the same way with "Jane Eyre," and I believe we could run it a third time and pack them in. My exchange can send Thanhouser repeaters by mistake any time and I'll never make a murmur! I remain as ever a "Thanhouser Fiend!"

MISS DOLLY SPURR,
Manager, The Royal Theater, Marion, Ind.

Incessant Hammering!

We said the following about it and we meant EVERY word of it:

May 8, 1910.

Messrs. Stetler & Zerr,
Empire Theater, Reading, Pa.

Gentlemen:—Your favor of the 5th inst. to hand and we thank you for the interest you display in our work and for the demand you are making on your exchange for our film. THIS INCESSANT HAMMERING AT THE EXCHANGES BY THE EXHIBITORS WILL RESULT IN EVERY EXCHANGE SUPPLYING AND EVERY EXHIBITOR GETTING WHAT BOTH OF THEM NEED—THANHOUSER FILM.

Very truly,
Thanhouser Company.

"The Thanhouser Kid!"

S. H. Clark, Bijou Theater, Corning, N. Y.—My patrons have become acquainted with your film and the little girl is known here as the Thanhouser Kid.

"They're There With the Best!"

W. S. Summers, Imperial Amusement Company, Washington, D. C. We use Thanhouser films and find them there with the best.

"Looks Like the Cream of Independent Film!"

H. C. Hatfield, Savoy Theater, Duluth, Minn.—(Letter to Eugene Cline, Chicago, Ill.) I just want to let you know that the first Thanhouser you sent me—"Jane Eyre"—is fine and beats all for excellence. It looks like the cream of Independent film. Hope you can send it to me all along.

"The Name Thanhouser Is Bringing Them In!"

Dreamland Theater, Michigan City, Ind.—Our theater has been running about ten days and in that time we have been fortunate enough to secure three of your films. They were simply fine, a case of "par excellence." We are establishing a reputation for fine pictures here and have three Licensed houses to fight. The name Thanhouser is bringing them in, and your classics are certainly winners in all respects.

"The Aristocrat of Moving Picturedom"

Imp Films are now in such a class by themselves in conception and in execution that they are accepted as the standard by which all other films are judged. Exchanges say it is common to receive requests from exhibitors, stating that they want "something as good as Imps." Scores of theatres which have lately turned Independent explain that it was on account of the high quality of Imp Films that they rallied around the Independent banner. Imp Films have not only added tremendous strength to the exchanges featuring them, but to the exhibitors who have made a specialty of them in their theatres. Imp Films are clean, wholesome, good, true and honest through and through. If your exchange is not supplying you with Imp Films regularly, you are missing the best money maker in the business! We take supreme pride in announcing two more extra high class releases, for Independents ONLY:

"THE NICHOLS ON A VACATION"

(Released Monday, June 6. Length, about 970 ft.)

Another of those richly ludicrous, ultra-refined domestic comedies for which the Imp is famous. This is one made in answer to dozens of special requests from exhibitors who say their patrons will come and see this class of picture time after time, enjoying it more each time. Demand!

"A DISCONTENTED WOMAN"

(Released Thursday, June 9. Length, about 980 ft.)

A domestic drama which will score a tremendous hit with its wonderful stagecraft, its beautifully clear black and white photography and its high class professional treatment from beginning to end. It is as strong a play as you could ever hope to see anywhere at any time. Insist!

Our May 19th release, "Fruit and Flowers" is making an astounding sensation wherever it is shown. If you have not had it, you've missed one of the screams of years!

The Renters Opportunity.

Two weeks ago the first editorial in this paper bore the caption "The Exhibitors' Golden Hour." In that article we pointed out that on grounds of strict economics, the profits of the moving picture business in the United States to-day were not being equitably divided. Manufacturers or some of them, especially on the licensed side, were making money. The exhibitor was making and had made money during the past Winter and Spring; in fact, the exhibitor was distinctly getting the better of the game.

The poor renter, however, the middleman, a necessary constituent in every business, has not been making the money. We have complaints from both licensed and Independent exchanges on this very matter. Those complaints have been before us all this year. In the nature of things where a disease exists a remedy will be sought, and exchange men on both sides of the business are getting together for the purpose of mutual protection. They are extending confidence even on the principle that misery likes company, and the outcome of this reasonable state of discontent amongst the exchanges has been to some extent visible at Pittsburg and Chicago recently.

We have no doubt the things will shake themselves out properly and clearly in due course. Not for the first time do we insist that the business must be conducted by the same set of principles that govern all other businesses, namely, you must have three definite, distinct classes: manufacturer, distributer or renter, consumer or exhibitor. To attempt to conduct this business by eliminating the second factor would be a very foolhardy thing, indeed. For this reason: that in a properly organized state of things, your middleman becomes not merely an exchange, but a buyer who is in close touch daily with the market—in closer touch than the manufacturer can possibly be. He has his hand on the exhibitors' pulse all the time, and through the exhibitor he gets to know what the public taste is. He makes it his business to do so, whereas the manufacturer is, to a great extent, removed from these opportunities.

The exchange man to-day, then, should take heart of grace. He appears to have every chance of getting a "cut in at the business," on better terms than he has recently enjoyed. He has shown his power, as other parts of this week's WORLD amply prove. It is all for the benefit, the prosperity and good government of the business that there should be a well-organized body of exchanges throughout the country handling the situation by the recognized fixed principles of commercial probity.

The Moving Picture in the Supreme Court.

It is an unfortunate thing when such a world-wide, popular and valuable twentieth century acquisition as the moving picture has proved to be, should come under the ban of the Supreme Court. It is the well-known policy of this paper to stand for, and by, everything that is for the best possible good, for the greatest possible number, in the use of the moving picture.

In the Supreme Court on May 23, Justice Erlanger refused to overrule the proper authorities, who had refused to grant a certain license, giving as his reason that he found the application had been opposed by the general superintendent and the district superintendent of the public schools, together with the police authorities, adding when reminded that similar licenses had previously been granted, that "the granting of prior licenses in school districts cannot aid the relator, inasmuch as it has been made to appear that these entertainments in such districts have tended to affect injuriously the course of education of the young, and otherwise have been shown to be a baneful influence to them."

When the educational authorities and the appointed moral censors of a community oppose anything, we readily admit that such an opposition must command attention; further, when such opposition is supported and commended by the Supreme Court of the State, justice lends her dignity to the emphasis of the opposition. We believe, therefore, it is well within our province to examine the situation, or the principles controlling the situation; find out its defects, and eradicate them.

In these columns we have always shown the great and beneficent advantages both from an educational as well as a moral stndpoint of the moving picture. It is therefore very painful for us to be compelled to read that a Supreme Court Justice says that certain moving picture exhibitions are "injurious to the education of the young and exercise a baneful influence among them." We can come to no other conclusion than that found in an old truth—i.e., that "any good misapplied may become positively harmful, any blessing misused may become a curse," even as a great fortune in the hands of one man may make him an honored citizen and a blessing to the community; whereas the same fortune in the hands of another man may lead to his own ruin and make him a nuisance to all who come in contact with him. The fault is not with the fortune, but with the receiver and user of it. So with the moving picture, which has come like a good fortune to the human family, its use or abuse depends upon whose hands it falls into.

In analyzing the situation we find the whole question of moving picture exhibition of every kind divides itself into three parts: the machine, the picture, the exhibitor. Of the machine there is no criticism; it is mechanical, perfect in its kind, of untold value, and the servant of its master. The same cannot be said of the pictures; they may consist of many kinds, their variety being as great and wide as the world itself; as long as there are people of various grades of educational, moral, immoral or unmoral nature, there will be pictures in those grades.

We have only to look at the productions in the picture postal card world to prove the truth of this assertion; the constant raids by the moral authorities against these offenders should be a sufficient warning to moving picture makers that it does not pay financially or morally to put forth that which is not pure and good. In these days of vigorous advertising, when commendations and approvals give value to an advertisement, will it not pay better to be able to advertise with such commendations, rather than the contrary; for we are sure that no well-meaning manufacturer will want to have it known that his pictures have received the strictures of the judicial, educational and moral authorities of the city or State.

The exhibitor, therefore, becomes the most important factor in the successful moral tone of the moving picture, whereas the machine is simply the mechanical servant—the picture reflects his choice—his taste—his moral and sterling value, and while he may be literally and figuratively in the dark background, his exhibition becomes a human projectoscope, throwing him in the limelight of publicity, where he cannot escape the scrutiny he deserves. It is our pleasure, then, to declare that we rejoice in the fact that the moving picture is absolutely above censure or suspicion in its purpose and intrinsic value, as also in its objective; that we believe and know that authorities of all kinds accept its value. The purpose served by the strictures which have called forth this article will be valuable if all interested in the upbuilding into an honorabe profession of the "exhibitor" will see in Justice Erlanger's ruling a revelation of a "weak spot" or a "wrong" which has crept into the uses of our much loved work. We feel confident also that the great majority of our readers are of those who number themselves among the first to remedy any evil which is shown to exist.

The Socialist Mayor of Milwaukee on Moving Pictures.

In an address in the Y. M. C. A. before the Milwaukee Ministerial Association last Monday, Mayor Seidel, in appealing to the ministers for greater efforts on behalf of the young, met the response that the "nickel theater" rendered effective work impossible. The speaker declared that "there was no need of trying to give boys and girls wholesome amusement while the 'nickel theater' catered to their baser passions." In reply the Mayor said: "The thing for you to do then is to compete with the nickel theaters. Have a moving picture exhibit right in your schools." We say good for Mayor Seidel; that is exactly our contention. As shown in another column, the situation in New York is the same as in Milwaukee, and indeed in all parts of the country. There is no doubt the moving picture is out of place in the nickel or even the dime theater; it deserves a better place and should move in a higher sphere; its value is too great to be prostituted in vulgarity and scorn. Far better—if it is to serve the poor—that admission should be free, if under competent management, than a ridiculously low price charged if those in charge are as "cheap as the show."

In previous issues of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD we have shown that greater profit would come to the manufacturer by such a charge as we advocate, and the worthy exhibitor would be benefited. We will go still further and say there is a "golden time" in view for all classes in the moving picture world when the various educational and moral authorities become the advocates of animated pictures for all kinds of beneficial illustrative instruction and pleasure.

The General Film Company.

At last the mind of the exchange proprietor is set at rest in regard to the General Film Company. From the statement issued over the signatures of the officers of that company, on another page, it is made clear that their object is not monopoly, although they are open to purchase existing exchanges. Those already acquired will be operated in harmony with the other licensed exchanges, but so many have expressed dissatisfaction with their lot that there should be a general stampede to unload. Had the exchange men shown themselves capable of managing their end of the business, the General Film Company would never have been born, and those that do and have conducted their places on legitimate business lines have nothing to fear. Now that the distributing end of matters is in process of purification, how about the exhibitor? Let him take warning! The charter of the General Film Company does not permit it to exhibit, but what is to prevent another equally powerful corporation being formed to acquire and reform moving picture theaters, or to build and operate places where the picture will be handled as it should be?

Mr. Exibitor! A word to the wise is sufficient.

The manufacturers ran riot until the Patents Company was formed. The distributers have been a disgruntled lot among themselves and made life miserable for the manufacturer and the exhibitor—hence the General Film Company. The exhibitor is not alive to the possibilities and importance of his end of the business. If he cannot rise to the occasion—HE WILL HAVE TO BE SHOWN.

The Sales Company To-Day.

Since the last number of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD was printed, history has been making itself in the field of the picture with extraordinary rapidity. In fact, to paraphrase the current colloquialism, life to us, who have charge of this publication, is simply—one surprise after the other. In the article on the Sales Company, which we printed on May the 21st, we threw out the conjecture that this company was in the tentative stage. That, in fact, it was on its trial. Here are our very words:

> There is one feature of the situation that must not be lost sight of, and that is that many of the signatories to the Sales Company's agreement are inclined to be doubtful of the result of this experiment. They, in fact, are giving the scheme a trial. If it succeeds, why they will continue their adhesion. If it does not succeed they will go independent.

Events have justified the accuracy of our forecast and the result has been the formation of a schism; a body of insurgents; a third party—whatever you will in the way of titles,—but the signatories referred to in our quoted paragraph have withdrawn from the Sales Company. We refer to the policy of its withdrawers in another article elsewhere.

Meanwhile, what of the Sales Company in its attenuated form? Well, it goes on. Those more immediately concerned in the fortunes of the company, express themselves as satisfied with the outlook. Cancellations were succeeded by increased orders. The company, as it exists to-day, can make a very excellent program. It is in the position, therefore, of competing with another body for the 50 per cent. of the moving picture business of this country, which, it is understood, is the ambition of the Independent side of the moving picture field to acquire or control. Time alone will show whether the Sales Company will be able to do this, or whether they will be content with 25 per cent. of the business, or just what they can get. Time proves all things.

Competition is the soul of trade; and the Sales Company has one more factor to contend with than it had a week ago. As we have said over and over again in regard to these Independent eruptions and outbreaks, just in so far as the Sales Company exists for the betterment or benefit of the business as a whole, it shall have the support of this paper. We have not, we are not, and we never shall be factional. Our attitude towards the Sales Company is that of giving it every possible chance of improving, extending and uplifting the moving picture business. Brains, ability, capital, opportunity, are at the command of the company, and it is, therefore, entitled to an open field and as fair a chance as any other enterprise now before the moving picture public of this country.

The Sales Company has not met with unanimous support—and why? Some answer that it assumes to be too dictatorial; some that it offered unfair advantages to manufacturers and exchanges who had no voice in its management; others that it had no solid basis on which to protect its adherents. But the fact remains that the men who constitute its executive board are alive to the necessities of the hour. They are all well grounded in experience both as manufacturers as well as exchanges, and are in close touch with the market. And in so far as they had not yet begun to operate when a counter movement was started, it is tantamount to condemnation without trial. They have not been given the opportunity of showing that their motives were sincere.

The New Independent Association.

In THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD of May the 7th we printed a little article under the caption of "The Currency of Independence," in which we discussed the changes that were and have been taking place in the Independent field. We began changes of policy, revolving of cards or readjustment of interests. Roughly, it amounted to this: that there is no unanimity amongst the Independents, and that probably in the short space of time the Independent ranks would be split. Again, one of our prophesies has turned out to be true. We are so successful in prophesying, that were it not for the strong love we feel for the newspaper end of moving picture work, we should feel inclined to compete with a certain soothsayer and stargazer, who shall be nameless.

But to be serious. Saturday, May the 21st, was a great day for the independent Independents. They gathered together at Pittsburg and formed an Independent manufacturers' association consisting of the elements not favorable to the Sales Company. So, there is another Re-imbroglio in the field. You have the resuscitated Alliance; you have the attenuated Sales Company, and now there is the Independent Manufacturers and Importers' Association. In this body are the Thanhouser Company, the Nestor Company, the Capitol Company of Washington, A. G. Whyte, Actophone Company, Electragraff Company of America, the Eclair Company, the Lux Company, the Great Northern Company and the American Kinograph Company, a very powerful and solid phalanx of clever, experienced manufacturers, importers and business men, who have at their back the solid support of numerous exchanges throughout the country.

In our study of the political chops and changes that attend the marketing and manufacture of a moving picture, we think that the associated Independent manufacturers are entitled to hold a record for rapidity of getting together. On Sunday, May the 22d, at Pittsburg, they were a heterogeneous collection of sheep. On Wednesday, May the 25th, they were a hard welded homogeneous, harmonious body. O si sic omnes, which, being freely translated, means that we wish to God all these film societies and associations would hang together for their common benefit, as the newest association seems likely to do.

But, the chief feature of the new manufacturers' association is this: that it is to work under the Columbia Phonograph Company's license, which includes, by the way, the Bianchi camera and certain rights in the Armat-Jenkins patents. The Columbia Company will support and protect the Association, which, in its turn, will license its own exchanges. This looks like a duplication of the policy under which the Motion Picture Patents Company works. So, as a matter of fact, the object of the new company is pretty much that of the older one, and that is to regulate the business and put it on a better footing for all concerned—manufacturers, importers, renters and exhibitors.

Most assuredly the new Association has been well conceived and well constructed. Its solidity makes for a valuable element of the business, and that it has the support of this paper and those associated with it goes without saying, on the simple grounds that it is evidently for the good of the business.

"Bless you, my children," is the attitude of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD towards the new body. It has been very strenuous work, indeed, for all concerned in the section of the business represented by the company we are discussing in this article, and other companies. But, order seems to be in process of being evolved out of chaos, for which we are unfeignedly thankful. At the risk of wearying the reader by repetition, we hope all these political transformations have come to an end, and that the representative elements will settle down to business, make good pictures and sell them. This is what we want to help them all to do.

The Passing of a King.

The advertising pages of last week's MOVING PICTURE WORLD show that there are to be within the next few days, or it may be hours, special releases on the American moving picture market of moving pictures illustrating the funeral of the late King Edward. There is no doubt a widespread desire on the part of the American public to see these pictures. For days, and indeed weeks past, American newspapers have been full of reproductions and photographs taken in connection with the death of the King and the proclamation of his successor. Perhaps, we, who write this, may be allowed to say that this is not only a very great surprise, but a distinctly pleasing one. It shows that there are many connecting links between all branches of the Anglo-Saxon race.

The exhibitors of the country, therefore, have a great opportunity in front of them of featuring the funeral picture that will shortly be in their hands. The funeral took place in London on Friday, May 20. Telegraphic dispatches in the American newspapers lead us to believe that some very good pictures were obtained. They were shown in British theaters within a few hours after the passage of the funeral, and, as may be supposed, created a deep impression. We have no doubt that when these pictures are released here, the American public will be equally impressed. If this is not the first time that the funeral procession of a monarch has been filmed, it is certainly the first occasion when the passing of a monarch of the unquestioned eminence of King Edward formed the subject of a moving picture. The funeral procession of the late Queen Victoria gave opportunity for the making of moving pictures. We believe, too, that the passing of King Humbert of Italy, the King of Portugal, and other minor monarchs of the last few years, were taken advantage of by film makers for the purpose of recording the funeral procession. But it is safe to say that not one of these funerals created anything like the amount of interest King Edward's funeral has done.

To begin with: There were present an absolutely unique gathering of Europeans in the corteges and then there was in the procession a distinguished private citizen of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt, occupying practically what amounted to a kingly position in a King's funeral. Altogether the terrible, sudden and tragic death of King Edward, and the fact that Mr. Roosevelt was present in England in time to appear in the procession, invest these films with an extraordinary amount of interest.

The exhibitor, then, as we have already said, has an exceedingly fine opportunity for showing the public what an extraordinary valuable agent the moving picture is for recording events of worldwide importance. The phenomena and convulsions of nature's leading natural incidents, sporting scenes,—we might even say the much written about Johnson-Jeffries fight—sink into the insignificant, when compared with the funeral of a man like King Edward. It would be redundant if we, in these pages, dealt upon the character and standing of the late King. This has been done so much and so often elsewhere that we could not possibily avoid repeating what somebody else has said, besides this paper is not a general newspaper, but concerns itself primarily with the trade interests of its readers.

But even so, we cannot refrain from pointing out to the exhibitor that the exhibition of these films gives him an opportunity of further establishing his theater in the good opinion of the public. These pictures show in graphic form great history. Great funerals are, after all, not very common. Take the last forty or fifty years in the United States, the names of Lincoln, Grant and McKinley rise in the mind as having been made the objects of great funerals. Lincoln and Grant passed away before the moving picture existed to record their obsequies. Then, if we take Europe, maybe Bismarck, Emperor William the Second, Wellington, are names that rise in the memory as having given opportunity for funerals of historic significance. Before them, there was the monumental figure of Napoleon the Second.

King Edward's funeral cetrainly ranks in historic significance with all these. Firstly, on purely personal grounds; secondly, on purely political grounds. For in recent months, there have not been wanting people, intelligent people, to say that he would be the last King of England. This may or may not be the case, but he certainly has left the scene of his work at a time of intense critical interest to the British Empire.

But, aside from these considerations, the funeral of King Edward was an occasion of gorgeous solemnity, manifesting the grief, not only of a nation, an empire, but of the entire world. The King is dead; long live the King! When we die, we are soon forgotten. King Edward will not be readily forgotten. These films will perpetuate his memory, and they will interest people all over the world at a date remote from the hour of his death, one might say uncommonly remote, for most kings seem to be forgotten within a very few days of their death, whereas the American people seem determined to learn everything that is possible to know of the passing of a man who was so popular with them.

These are a few of the many reasons that occur to us why these pictures, now on the Atlantic, will, when they reach here, have enormous interest for the American public. We therefore specially exhort our exhibiting readers to make the best of this opportunity—an opportunity that is absolutely unique and without parallel.

VITAGRAPH SCORES AGAIN.

Within an hour after the Mauretania docked on Friday morning a negative of the funeral of King Edward was delivered to the office of the Vitagraph Company by special messenger. An automobile was waiting to rush it to the factory and before midnight forty prints were on the trains speeding across the country. Five were exhibited in New York and Brooklyn theaters that same evening, viz., Gane's Theater, the Lincoln Square, Alhambra, Dewey and the Orpheum. We saw one of the prints just before going to press. It was clear in photography, the point of view excellent and the crowned heads of Europe and many notables were easily recognized. The 665 feet of film give an excellent idea of this event of worldwide interest and the Vitagraph Company deserve congratulations for the success of their enterprise.

THE MOVING PICTURE "WORLD."

By Rev. William Henry Jackson.

Especially written for the Moving Picture World

The world is a moving picture. Shakespeare said, "All the world's a stage," but that statement, true in part, was made from the narrow vision of the playwriter's eye.

The eyes of the world say: "All the world's a picture;" anywhere, everywhere, earth, sea or sky; in burning tropics, or frozen pole; in ocean depth, or conflagrated sky; everywhere, the eye rests upon the beautiful, the picturesque.

The world is Life, everywhere the living, and because living, active, animated, moving; one vast moving picture: beautiful in the living, and living in the beautiful. Is it not for this reason then that everyone loves these things?—the living and the beautiful, so, when conditions prohibit the larger view, the picture becomes the object of admiration.

To-day we have the new picture, not the cold, lifeless picture, deathlike in its stillness, but the animated, living, active, inspiring reality, full of the vigor of life and beauty, a very part of the universe itself. No wonder then if the modern moving pictures strike a popular chord; they have touched the center of humanity, they have revealed life to the living; like as the universe itself is the crowning perfection of the amalgamation of its created parts; so the moving picture is the perfection of the sublimest combination, of science, art and mathematics.

The sciences of chemistry and electricity, with light, heat and power, together with the reproductive beauty of the photographer's art, have united in producing the highest laudable results hitherto held secret in the recesses of science, art and law, giving to people everywhere the marvel of the moving picture.

Again the moving picture reaches humanity because of its universal nature, everyone sees the picture, everyone reads the picture.

The ear may comprehend but one language, the eye comprehends all languages; descendants of Hebrew, Greek, Latin and Teutonic races may sit side by side and together read in the universal language of the eye the selfsame subject. Here, too, age knows no barriers, youth's strong sight and age's dim vision may read and understand the picture; as the picture moves it speaks, its motion is its langauge and all may read.

What a mighty factor for the diffusion of a universal knowledge and, further, what power is in the hands, and what responsibility rests upon those who are controlling the "world's" moving picture world. It is ever the desire of those who seek the good of their fellowmen to offer them that which gives pleasure and secures profit; not always the profit of dollars—labor brings its own reward—but the profit of progress in that which is best in life, and which at the same time imparts pleasure.

"Progress and Poverty" became the theme of Henry George in his desire to call attention to the needs of mankind; but now progress and profit with pleasure may fitly become the motto of those in charge of this new sphere of usefulness in the moving picture world. Therefore it is almost needless to say that these principles will be those guarding the ideas of the editors of this paper.

The scope of the educational advantage of the moving picture is unlimited, it will span from the lowest depths of ignorance to the topmost heights of knowledge; meeting all conditions between these extremes.

It requires no education to look at a picture, but looking at the moving picture is educational, the continuance of the hold on reading through the eye (that universal reader of a universal language) a new university is opened with only the boundaries of the globe as its confines, and the inhabitants thereon as its students seeing, reading, studying, progressing; graduating with pleasure and profit at will, only stopping short with the limitation of a satisfied ambition. Where, however, the inspiration of an unlimited ambition is the impelling force of any human soul, the moving picture world can be made a leading factor and guide to any destiny. It is not the intention of this article to be prophetic, nevertheless, the writer does not hesitate to affirm that here we are in a field where prophecy is self-suggestive; not the vague fancy of an imaginative mind, or the expressed desire for something improbable. It is easy to "prophesy when you know," and if "knowledge is power," then that power enables us to safely predict the future of the moving picture: The multiplication of the purposes and possibilities of the moving picture guarantee its continuance in every field of living research until—until when? Only when it is superseded! Can this ever be? It may, but not until there is something which supersedes the causes that brought it into existence, i. e., light, life, science, art and law.

For the purpose of fully realizing the importance of the moving picture, it should be understood and remembered that moving pictures are yet in their infancy; viewed from the scientific, artistic, educational or pleasure giving standpoint, we are still in the A B C of a new field; the alphabet must become a language, the toy will become a worldwide utility.

The manipulation also of the moving picture will be exalted to the professional ranks; the manipulator will be a man of educational power, so great will he needs be compelled to grow, that although in the beginning he may have to sit at the feet of those causes which gave life to the moving picture, in the end he will become the master of his machine and its powers and compel them to serve him. In manipulation also the moving picture machine will become more scientific, its uses more artistic, its application more educational, its beauty more pleasure giving and, above all, its work more and more realistic.

In looking forward, as in building, it is necessary as well as wise to look to the beginning or foundation of that fabric we are erecting; for, when we know "whereon we stand," we also know "whereunto we may aspire." The proportion of the past suggests the laws whereby we can measure the proportion of the future. How readily every reader of this article will remember the unrestrained joy of the magic lantern of his childhood, as he grew to youth and young manhood he also saw the growth of the stereopticon, and a height of perfection seemed to have been reached when the chromotrope gave forth its changing form and colors; the man swallowing rats convulsed all, though its "life" was only strained mechanism.

The school, the lecture platfrom and the university; yea, also the church; all taught us much that we know by aid of the stereopticon; in our entertainments also that which was the joy of childhood and the teacher of youth became the pleasure of age. This is the foundation of our present standing, but because this foundation incorporated the laws of the universe in those initial stages, it lived. Here we may allow ourselves to learn a lesson from the mythology of Pygmalion that there is a perfection, the which when reached must give place to the Galatea of life. The perfection of the stereopticon needed only life to give it birth in a new world. Taking this review as an index to the book of the future, is it not easy to read how, if this generation begins with that which the last generation left as complete, what possibilities will daily unfold themselves?

We are living in the most marvelous age the world has known, side by side with the wireless messenger, the motor craft of sea, earth and air; to give life portraying pictures of these, and all other living forces, will be the work of the moving picture. This work will be done for the double purpose of keeping pace with the age, besides bringing within the power of all people everywhere the knowledge and beauty which everywhere else exists.

From hamlet to city, from school house to university, from log cabin to White House, and from templed grove to cathedral walls, wherever there may be humanity to be enlightened, the moving picture will be ready to instruct and please, making itself the one instrument of worldwide value to all mankind. To this end and purpose it will be the policy of those whose writings cover these pages, to keep abreast of all these possibilities, thereby keeping our readers in the van of the greatest benefits to be derived from THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

Anno Domini, Antipathy—or What? Myself at the Talking Theatre.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

For the first time since I have been a resident in this city, I, last week, had a real theatrical bath; that is to say, I went to several theaters on the "Great White Way." In fact, I had an exceedingly good time, indeed, measured by the standard, the general standard, in vogue. I went with all my eyes and ears open, prepared to enjoy myself; but, also at the same time for the purpose of studying the plays, the people who performed in them, and the people who witnessed them, from the standpoint of a moving picture man.

Understand, reader, I have not been inside a regular theater where regular plays are shown for three years. Exactly three years ago, almost to the day, I saw in England a revival of "Caste," a play which has been revived by Mr. Charles Frohman, of New York City, within the last few weeks. "Caste," I may tell the reader, belongs to a past generation. It is of the "tea-cup and saucer" school. It is untrue to life, it is false and sickly in sentiment. It amused our grandparents, just as the making of antimacasers did, or snuff taking, or duelling amongst men. It is a freak; it is a back number.

All this reads very digressionally, but it was passing through my mind as I sat in the theaters last week. I heard old jokes; I saw stilted, artificial acting, crudely constructed plays that failed to convince or interest, though they amused. The plots started from nowhere, meandered off into no land, and ultimately finished nowhere. Yet, brethren, these plays are put on by no less a renowned manager than Charles Frohman, and are played in by great stars, who make much money and reputations in their work.

Contrast this kind of theatrical vapidity, as I contrasted it in my mind, with a first-class Pathe drama, or Biograph, or Essanay comedy. What do you get? You get the very reverse, the very antithesis of the characteristics of the plays to which I am referring. You get a clear, logical plot. You get an intelligent story; you get action, and plenty of action, without any superfluity of action, first, last and all the time, every instant that that film is moving before your eyes. The brain is held at its tensest; you have no time to look about you and study your neighbors' faces or hats, admire one another's dress or stare coldly through your lorgnette at the women you do not like. None of these distractions of the ordinary theater staging are permissible in a moving picture piece. You are living in those ten, twenty, thirty or forty minutes, the life that is being lived on the screen.

I do not know whether this distinction and difference between the talking and the silent play has ever been pointed out by one who has had the experience that I have had in these matters. I think I told you, in one of those former signed articles of mine, that the first newspaper money I earned was in the capacity of dramatic critic. I have pretty well gone through the theatrical mill of dramatic criticism; stage management and production. I am not blasé. I enjoy life to the full, and yet, with all this, and in the prime of life, I find it very difficult, indeed, to sit out an ordinary vaudevile turn or act, or to visit a theater and sit out an evening of doubtful comedy or drama. Yet, on the other hand, many an odd hour do I pass in a moving picture theater, fascinated by the wonderful phenomenon shown on the screen.

Why is this? Is my case typical of many? Call me a "tired business man" if you like. I am not always tired. On the contrary, I rather pride myself on my vitality. I know lots of "tired business men and women" of the mature ages of ten, twelve, thirteen or fourteen, bright boys and girls, who seem to share my disinclination for the theater of the conventional kind. That is where people "act," as it seems to me, in such a stilted and unnatural way, that modernity can no longer tolerate it.

Of course, in all this, the ultra-critical or discerning reader may accuse me of exhibiting symptoms of the disease known as "Anno Domini." This is not so. I am not old, and never shall be old, in the conventional sense of tiring of, or being indifferent to, the best that is around me. Other old buffers of 10, 12, 13 or 14 appear to think just as I do, and I have come across giddy young things of 70 and 75 who are much of the same mind. Even Romeo and Juliet are not disinclined to do their hand squeezing in a moving picture theater, just as well and effectively as they can do it in an ordinary theater.

Is it not strange, then, the hold and the fascination which the moving picture theater is getting on all of us? I hope that the theatrical readers of this article and my confreres on the theatrical press, also my friends amongst the New York dramatic critics, will not be angry at me for "jotting" down the perfectly sincere and spontaneous reflections that passed through my mind last week when I sat and endured some of the greatest Broadway successes in years. I love my play, but oh, you moving picture!!!

From F. B. Spencer, an operator at present traveling through the Western States, we receive a section of a San Francisco newspaper containing the opinions of a number of young people on the picture shows, which we reprint on another page. Mr. Spencer, on his travels, is paying close attention to the conduct of the show in each city he visits and he likes the way they are conducted in the West. There, he says, the managers do not jeopardize their business and safety by hiring young and inexperienced operators, like the grasping showmen of the East. He mentions a sample of this kind in Detroit, the manager of one of the largest moving picture houses in that city, who said to him: "When I am short of help, or when my operator goes out to lunch, I send one of my ushers up to run the show." This is the kind of manager that will eliminate himself—and the sooner the better.

A GREAT MOTION PICTURE AND ITS LESSON.

By Louis Reeves Harrison

I secured one of a few unsold box-seats, pushed through a crowd back of the rail and sat down. A mediocre variety act was in progress on the stage, so much the better—the auditorium was lighted, and I could study the people. Every orchestra and balcony seat was occupied, and the deep standing room was packed to the limit. The audience was a quiet one, was rather above than below the average in quality, and it was largely composed of men. The men were of all classes and conditions, they were uniformly earnest-looking, most of them seemed to be business men, who had possibly left the absorbing occupation of trying to do others as they might reasonably expect to be done, in order to rest an hour or two and recuperate from brain fag. The theater was a popular one, usually well attended, but, on this occasion, early in the afternoon, the attendance was unusually large. The occasion was that of a special release, the release of a great picture play, a play greater than its announced theme.

The wrongs of the American Indian are not present wrongs; he was once an interesting type, especially in Cooper's novels, but to those who knew him as he was and those who know him as he is, the red savage is not associated with pictures of injured innocence, but what's the odds! Story writers naturally affiliate with hazy historical conditions from an ingrained dislike of conforming to facts.

No matter about the ostensible theme. How about the play?

When the vaudeville act ended, not a man left the place. The lights were turned down, a title was shown on the screen, there was intense silence, the breathless expectancy which usually precedes an important stage presentation. Advance interest was clearly indicated.

The producers were known. They were strongly entrenched in public confidence. They were known to be in earnest, striving to attain the best possible results, never pandering to the baser elements of society nor catering to perverted instincts. They were not in the habit of trifling with serious patrons of picture shows nor of jollying the noisy and unthinking element. They were known to be conscientious producers, who regarded their business seriously, who strove to maintain a high average of quality. They had not committed the error of setting the theater-going public down as being the scum of the community, and, in consequence, their bare announcement of a special feature was enough to draw a crowd, including many who ordinarily stay away from exhibitions of motion pictures. If it is within the province of honest criticism to discover what merits appreciation and encouragement, the lesson is right here, a concrete lesson, easily comprehended by those who really have the exhibitor's interest at heart.

The play way "Ramona."

Wherein was it great?

The idea of the white man's injustice to the Indian did not reach out into the sympathies of the audience at all, but it seemed as though the playwright or director, or possibly both, had consciously or unconsciously emphasized a bigger, broader and finer theme, the great force responsible for our origin, the one which has inspired poets of all ages, but recently discovered by scientists as the most effective cause in the evolution of man.

Natural selection!

The story of Ramona as told on the screen is as dear as it is old. It is that of an impassioned girl, who breaks through the exactions of a superior but rigorous and unsympathetic environment to follow the natural dictates of her heart. She loves and marries a worthless character simply because he responds to an ideal set up on the shrine of her affections, and, womanlike, when she is dominated by the most powerful of human emotions, she is bent on self sacrifice. She takes up the heavier burden and carries it with superior strength. While men sleepoll the husband, they acquire a habit still in operation regardless of race, the habit of not allowing conscience to handicap business. The husband submits like a weakling. He displays but late manful at making a manly effort to accomplish something for the sake of the sweet creature who has given him all a woman has to give. He loses his head, winds up in miserable collapse and is removed from the face of the earth in the cold blooded way that nature eliminates the unfit.

The part is effective as an offset and is admirably acted. But the woman!

Having sacrificed every material interest for the man's sake, having shared and sweetened his humble lot, having brought into the world one of God's own little creatures only to bury it in heart-breaking sorrow, she follows her weary way with unwavering courage to the bitter end, to the final excess of devotion at her husband's funeral pyre. This splendid character is the pivotal one and is portrayed with an intelligent grasp of fine detail which gives exquisite finish and charm to the play.

Here is where personality comes in.

With no audience to kindle enthusiasm and stimulate esthetic effort, it would seem as though the characters must depend wholly on academic postures, gesticulation and facial expression, but those who sit in front know better.

What is it that goes over into the hearts of thousands who attend picture plays?

What is it that reaches out and gets a grip on human hearts at business, political or social gatherings?

What else is it but the genial glow, the thrilling magnetism, of an exhuberant and interesting personality.

Here is where woman's personality comes in.

No one ever looks twice at a man's picture. As a mere thing of beauty, he is usually unmanly; as a creature of forceful character, he is usually unlovely. We look to woman for what beautifies existance, and, as interest in picture plays is stimulated by what is seen, it becomes centered on the heroine of the story. To suit the role, she must be lovable. Thoughtful appreciation of what is required by the role and good taste in things feminine count, but, when she delights the eye and stirs the irresponsible pulses of responsible men with a dazzling array of potent womanly attributes, she wins because she represents the ideal creatures of our heartaches and dreams. She goes over. Any man who does not think so should send for Doctor Osler.

Ramona, as played, is a powerful drama of natural love. It is set amid scenes of surpassing beauty, so sympathetically chosen as to lend the whole play a pure spirit of poesy; scenic and dramatic art are so harmoniously blended that the picture play is a veritable poem. The producers have advanced a step in the evolution of a new art and blazed the way for additional, greater achievement.

Mr. Frank De Leon, cashier and manager of the engagement department of the Selig Polyscope Company, died Saturday, May 21, 1910, at his home in Chicago, of consumption. He was buried on Tuesday under the auspices of the Masonic Lodge. Mr. De Leon was forty-two years of age at his death and leaves behind many friends who will feel the loss of his fellowship.

I wonder if that diamond ring story that comes from one of the Chicago nickelodeons is a press agent yarn, or really based on facts? It is claimed that a young woman who plays the piano in the place was robbed of a $250 diamond ring. If the key pounder can sport stones of that value what must the manager be wearing? I have visited about every nickelodeon in New York and I have failed to see such a jewelry display by any of the people connected with any of the places other than the proprietor, manager or treasurer. Perhaps the piano players in Chicago are higher priced.

It would seem hardly necessary to give the manager of an open-air picture place the tip to so rig up his curtain or screen that the breezes might not affect it and distort the views, but there are some managers that require the attention. I visited two places during the past week where I found the curtain almost fluttering like a banner flung to the breeze. Naturally the audience was disgusted. I sought the manager of one of the places, but he was in a nearby saloon telling a crowd of his dead-head friends what wonderful results he intends to attain in the line of moving picture entertainments during the coming Summer. The assistant manager was the doortender, who refuted any responsibility for the condition of the curtain, adding that his end of the business was to see that nobody got into the show without presenting a ticket or a pass. The ticket seller and the operator likewise pleaded not guilty. The former said his place was in the box office and the operator claimed he was being paid to operate the machine and look after the reels. The piano player said that when he doubled up in singing the illustrated songs he was doing his full share. All concurred in the statement that the manager left the place every night after the doors were opened and the people started to walk in and did not return until it was about time to make the final count in the box office. In other words, this manager looked upon the place as an automatic money maker. Such people should not be in the business. They eventually kill what might be made a very profitable place in the hands of a competent man.

I have heard many criticisms regarding the decision of a Police Justice at Coney Island that a hotel keeper who supplies moving picture exhibitions for the entertainment of his guests free of charge need not secure a license from the city for that purpose. Several hotel keepers were arrested on the Island for giving moving picture exhibitions without a lictnse and all were discharged under the decision. The criticisms have come from people in the boroughs of Manhattan, Brooklyn and the Bronx, who claim that there is discrimination. At first glance this claim may appear to be well founded, but when all the circumstances are considered the Coney Island cases differ in many respects from those that have been passed upon in other parts of the boroughs. In the latter cases the license was not the sole point at issue. The Building and Fire Departments, Board of Health and Board of Fire Underwriters were interested in them and their intervention was perfectly justifiable. It put an end to what had become an abuse. Saloonkeepers were turning small, ill-fitted back rooms into exhibition places to which the bar patrons gained admission free of charge. In a vast majority of the places there were but two means of exit, a narrow front door and a still smaller door at the rear which led to a small yard without any means of exit save the climbing of fences to neighboring property. The shows given in these places were of the cheapest, most miserable character. Anything that resembled a picture satisfied the proprietor and if the patrons complained they were asked how much they expected for nothing. Another distinction in the cases was that most of these saloon-theaters were located in what are classified by the various municipal departments as tenement houses. The decision in the Coney Island cases applied to "hotels."

I will be frank and say that, for the benefit of the moving picture business as a whole, no license should be granted to a place where admission is secured by the purchase of drinks. It is not a temperance proposition, nor do I make a claim of illegality; I speak solely in the interest of the picture business as a whole. Were these places allowed to multiply they would gradually undermine the legitimate exhibitor, take good business from the renter, and naturally make less sales for the manufacturers, and anything that works to these ends should at all times be opposed by all who have more than the sale of drinks at stake.

If the saloon-theaters were allowed to continue operations all efforts now being exerted towards uplifting the general business would be practically useless for the reason that the legitimate work would have its field for returns gradually curtailed and the producers would not feel justified in going to the expense they are now under to give the people the best that money can procure. In such places as Coney Island latitude can be allowed the exhibitors without danger to the general business. Admission is free to nearly all the places and they are not really in competition with a licensed man. The places where admission is charged are not injured because they are few in number and have a class of patronage that is peculiarly their own—people who do not wish to patronize places where drinks are sold and people who always believe that they will see more, or something better, where an admission fee is charged than at places where no charge is made. And there is still another class of people who prefer to lay their dime and escape the persistent cry of "Beer! Beer!"

* * *

Another point in favor of the Coney Island operations is that the places that depend upon the drink sales instead of box-office receipts pay good prices for their films and do not dish out a lot of junk such as the saloon-theaters in other parts of the boroughs give their patrons. You can see as good a picture show on the Island as can be found in any other part of the greater city, and it is not necessary to pay an admission fee to see it. It goes without saying that much of this is due to the selection of good operators.

The open-air theater is a boon to the film renter, who finds many of his Winter houses closing for the Summer season, and he has the glad hand for the promoter, but the open-air proposition is also a thorn in his side. The exhibitor who has a house that can be operated the year round looks upon the fresh air fellow as a squatter and if his exchange furnishes services to an open-air place that is a competitor there is the hottest kind of a war. I understand that many of the exhibitors operating under the licenses of the Motion Picture Patents Company are taking time by the forelock and have laid before that company a plan for protection of all-year houses against open-air places. These exhibitors claim that as regular licensees they are entitled to a free field during the months that they rarely run over expenses. If an open-air place is to be opened at a location that makes the temporary exhibitor a competitor it is claimed the Patents Company should refuse to license it. The question is then asked, suppose a man about to open such a place gives assurance that the site is a permanent one and a Winter house will be erected upon the close of the Summer season, would it be proper to discourage the enterprise? To this an exhibitor replies, in the case of an established licensee the fullest protection should be accorded and he should not be hampered by the licensing of a new place, whether it be for Summer or Winter. As to the representation that the open-air places will be converted into Winter houses, they are unreliable in nine cases out of ten. Almost every applicant made similar representations last year and failed to make good. The man who pays $104 a year in fees to the Patents Company is entitled to more consideration than the exhibitor who pays but $24 for permission to compete with the regular licensee during the most trying time of the year. There certainly seems to be good sense in this argument. How about the Independent exhibitor who has no one to appeal to when he sees a picture machine being placed on an empty lot near his place? Whether the newcomer runs licensed or independent films, he has no recourse, so after all the licensed man has some consolation in the thought that he has someone to appeal to when threatened. What he really needs, however, is protection when attacked and if he does not get it he naturally feels that he is no better off than the man who is not licensed.

THE SINGER AND THE SONG.

By H. F. Hoffman.

We learn each week through various publications that the public taste for good moving pictures is improving. It is quite a settled fact that those who pay their admission at the picture house are no longer pleased with the old-time chase, the slap-stick comedy, or the knock-down and drag-out melodrama. The demand is for something better and they now insist upon good acting, proper staging and a better regard for the eternal fitness of things. They want a picture play that does not insult their intelligence. They are done with crime for crime's sake, and horse-play is quickly distinguished from clean, quiet comedy. All this is as it should be, and we are glad to observe that the people's wishes are being duly catered to. But what about the singer and the song?

We still have in our midst that time honored chestnut, the "illustrated song." Nothing seems to have been done to improve this branch of the exhibition business. Probably the managers have an idea that because an audience endures some of these horrible outbursts that they like it, and therefore it should be continued without change.

Disposing of the song itself; there is something to be said on both sides of the question. The song publishers have done well to meet the demand for frequent changes. It is not possible to turn out three song hits a week. Perhaps no one realizes that any better than the publishers themselves, but still the songs are called for and instead of quality we get quantity. Unlike a film, a good song may be repeated every six weeks while its popularity lasts, and it is a pretty safe rule that an old song that is good is better than a new song that is bad.

The slide makers have done their part best of all. Most of our slides come from the hands of a few firms that are eminently capable of their task, who have really outdone the moving picture men in selecting scenes of natural beauty, and who were the first to put art into their product. In moving pictures "the play's the thing," but with songs, the song is half the thing, and the singer is the other half.

The singer being half the song, half of the singer is the voice, the other half being the way the voice is used. It is with the singer that the great fault lies in illustrated songs. Properly done the picture song is a splendid adjunct to the moving pictures, but why murder it when it can be made such a pleasing number? There are lots of illustrated singers with good voices but very few know how to use them, and what is worse, there are fewer managers who know good singing when they hear it. Only a few know just what to listen for when they try out a singer. The majority of exhibitors think that all they have to do is to find someone with a husky set of pipes and they have a real singer. If they can only get a person who can stand up and make enough noise to crack the walls, they think they have what the people want.

I dropped in at a Broadway picture theater not long ago, and there I saw the best of pictures and some acts far above the ordinary run of moving picture vaudeville. It was a house that could afford the best of everything, but there the illustrated song was as bad as the worst you ever heard. It was a female singer, the song was fairly catchy and the slides were pretty, but oh, what a voice! It haunts me even now. The voice was clear enough and she sang in time and tune, but the hardness of it and the noise of it was like unto one of those compressed air riveting guns that they use in riveting the framework of a steel building. She sang of love, but there was about as much love in her voice as there is in the roar of an elevated train. When she cut loose on her top note of love I thought my ears would split and my head began to ache.

Had it not been for the printing on the chorus slide I should never have known she was singing of love. She might as well have been singing in Chinese for all I understood her pronunciation, and then to top it off she resorted to that moth eaten gag of demanding the audience to join with her in the chorus. Ye gods, will there ever come a singer who will have the good sense to cut that out? The idea is as old as the hills, but it is still kept up as though it were first thought of only yesterday. The audience never sings, only once in a great while when a song is very, very catchy and very, very popular, and then they do so without being forced to it. As a rule they refuse to be a party to the crime.

There are two kinds of illustrated singers. The one with the good voice and no expression; the other with the poor voice but plenty of feeling. I knew a singer once, I know him yet in fact, who had no voice at all. The noise he made was a throaty falsetto. You would think that someone was choking him to death and he was calling for help; a gurgle, or a gargle, but he meant it for [illegible]. He was full of feeling and the sentiment of the song [illegible] plainly spoken words. The audience [illegible] were handled with the cautious [illegible] actor, and singing to his finish three times was repeated, he would come a full second, take a good breath and come out strong and bold, with an emphatic dramatic shake of his head, continuing it long after he pulled out on the piano with some chords and wonderful modulations that continued some moments after he had ceased singing. The effect was electrical, smiling a thrill through his audience that always called for a roar of applause. He had no voice but he certainly could handle a song.

Not far from the theater I have spoken of is another of the same kind. At this latter theater the illustrated song is a feature and the singer is drawing card. Does pay him $75 a week and he draws several times that amount of money to the theater. He hasn't a wonderful voice, but it is good and has a mellow, plaintive sweetness. You imagine he is sincerely singing to the girl he loves, as though no audience were present, and nearly every girl in front has an idea that he is singing directly to her. He works right true, and when he tells how much he loves his fair [illegible], the audience believes every word of it. They can't help it. He digs in and brings all there is in a song right out of it.

With comedy songs this singer never fails to catch the spirit of them; he is a good natured fellow and the fun is never lost. Wherever he takes a day off the patrons on their way out, want to know why he isn't there, and go away feeling that they have been bunched out of a certain part of their admission fee. It pays to have a man like that around. No matter if you pay him a hundred a week, he will bring it back to you with interest. You may get a passable singer for $25, one whom the patrons will endure patiently, but seldom will you get one at that figure who will have any power to increase the receipts.

Let the manager imagine for the moment that he himself is possessed of an excellent voice and a power of attraction by the sweetness of his song. Do you think you would put in eight hours a day, Sundays included, for a measly $25 per? Ask yourself that fair question and answer it fairly. No, indeed; you could easily command that amount singing twice on Sundays in a church choir and have the rest of the week to yourself. You are willing to pay well for a feature vaudeville act but you prefer to let the illustrated song remain a chestnut and a bore. You refuse to bolster up that weak spot in your program and turn it into a feature. As applied to films and acts you believe in the twentieth century axiom that "you can't get something for nothing," but it applies none the less to the singer and the song.

KING EDWARD'S FUNERAL.

Pathe Freres announce a special release of a film of this interesting event for the coming week. They had four operators at work, and, as it was a magnificent English Summer day, there is no question but that the film will be a good one. Their operators, in addition to taking pictures of the procession in London, were also at Windsor where the actual burial took place. The funeral party included, besides the widowed Queen Alexandra, King George of England, the Emperor William of Germany, King Haakon of Norway, King George of Greece, King Alfonso of Spain, King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, King Frederick of Denmark, King Manuel of Portugal, and Mr. Theodore Roosevelt as special ambassador for this country.

EXHIBITORS PLEASE NOTE.

Pathe Freres are giving exhibitors some good advice on the back pages of their weekly bulletins. They are making at present a feature of impressing on the exhibitor that they are trying to give him an unexaggerated idea of their films in their advertisements and circulars, and that the descriptions in their bulletins can be relied upon. This is of material aid to the exhibitor in selecting his programs and he can also always feel sure that any film specially advertised is a real feature. This is as it should be.

A LITTLE CHILD SHALL LEAD THEM.

A World correspondent sends us a copy of the Junior Section of the San Francisco "Sunday Call," of May 15. This paper offers each week prizes for the best essays from school children. The moving picture show and the pictures most preferred was one of the subjects suggested and we reproduce the thoughts of these youthful patrons of the shows, firstly, because they should have considerable bearing on the picture producers when they see how keenly these young minds can reason and how much the pictures they see must influence their lives; second, because the thoughtful exhibitor, on reading these letters, should realize the importance of a judicial selection of program for family theaters and especially for children's matinees.

THIS BOY LIKES TRAVEL SUBJECTS.

I like to see pictures that are interesting and from which we learn something.

I like to see pictures that show us foreign countries, the people and their costumes. For instance, a visit to Switzerland to see the great Alps and have a trip up them. To see the snow covered tops of the mountains and the canyons and trees and all the beautiful gifts of nature.

I would also like to see historic pictures like Washington crossing the Delaware, or the battle of Bunker Hill; to see the soldiers march up the hill and then get driven back down the hill.

I think by seeing historic and geographical pictures we could learn more by them than by books.

I would like to see pictures about the Civil War times, to see the struggle over slavery and to see the North trying to preserve the Union and the South trying to make the North and South two different countries.

EDW. F. COUTTS, 12 years.

HISTORICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL SUBJECTS PREFERRED.

I like the nickelodeon when I can learn something from the pictures to help me in my school life. I like them best when there are views of the world, such as the Yosemite Valley, Yellowstone Park, the big trees, New York Harbor; also scenes from the cotton fields of the South, where cotton is woven into goods.

I don't like them when there are pictures of robberies and fairy tales or detective stories.

I enjoy the funny pictures for a good laugh. I enjoy the historical ones, because I can learn something from them.

I would like to see Washington crossing the Delaware and the battle of Bunker Hill. I would understand them better if I saw them in this manner.

I think it is not an easy way to learn history or geography because there is no one to explain it to you as they do in public schools. I would rather read and write these subjects because you learn more. I enjoy seeing the cities of the world, such as London, Eng., the largest city in the world; Paris, the capital of France, noted for its gayety; Edinburgh, the capital of Scotland, noted for its beauty. I think the things that are most natural in moving pictures are horses and the water.

MARGARET STEWART, 11 years old.

BOY-LIKE PREFERENCES.

There are only certain pictures I like at the nickelodeons, such as those of cowboys, Indians, soldiers, wars; histories of men like George Washington, Lincoln, Grant and many more brave veterans. Love stories I never do like because I hear too much about them.

W. HORSTMEYER.

SHE LIKES ANYTHING BUT MURDERS AND VULGARITY.

Do you like to go to the nickelodeon? Most every boy and girl likes to go, and so do I.

I like to see historical pictures, like the battle of Bunker Hill or the battles of Lexington and Concord. I would like to see Washington crossing the Delaware, too. The adventures of Daniel Boone or Marcus Whitman I would like to see very much.

I enjoy seeing funny pictures almost as well as the others. But I do not care to see pictures that are vulgar or the pictures of murders that they sometimes put on.

VERNA NAUERT, age 13 years.

THIS BOY SHOULD BE AN EXHIBITOR SOME DAY.

First of all when I go to a nickelodeon I like to go to a large airy place with from four to six exits. I like to see large pictures both clear and bright. It is better when there are two machines in operation. Then there are no waits and you do not have to look at the glaring electric lights.

For films I like the Biograph and Vintograph films best. For beautiful scenic and travel pictures I like the French films. They show wonderful reproductions of the famous Alps and beautiful colored pictures of France and all parts of Europe.

I don't like films which show stealing, brutality, etc., because I think some of these aid the weak minded. Some of the cowboy, Indian and industrial pictures are fine, and help broaden the mind. I like some of the funny pictures that our American firms manufacture. I guess nearly every boy and girl likes a funny picture where a man is being chased or making himself ridiculous in a thousand and one ways.

EUGENE CASTLE, age 13 years.

THIS WISE MISS SEES IN THEM OPPORTUNITY TO LEARN.

The pictures I like best at the nickelodeon are those showing scenes of the different parts of the country.

I do not believe that school and all that surrounds it should be left at school; we can always derive some knowledge from each and every one of these pictures, showing the different parts of the old and new world.

The names of some of the places we see are sometimes familiar, but those of which we have never heard, make us curious to know more about them. Naturally, it will cause us to open our geography, and study the maps for the places named. Also one can always see the different modes of dress worn by the different nations; also the ways in which their business is carried on, the way they build their homes and even the difference in the foods, showing what each country produces.

Then the scenery, which we may never see in our own surrounding country, is featured in these pictures. The grandeur of the mountains, their peaks reaching so many thousand feet into the sky, and the great waters which are fascinating as well as terrifying, the waves crashing against some rocky coast, and the spray flying up into the sky; then we see the falls and cataracts, whirlpools and rapids, all of which we have read about, but have never had the opportunity to see.

Now we go through the cities hundreds of years old, showing ancient and famous buildings, also the ruins of great cathedrals and temples, some of which are very beautiful. Perhaps a great many of us will never leave the city after our school days are over, and may never see all these great things, nearer than in the moving picture show. So I think that we should make the best of our opportunity and study these pictures, for we will always find new knowledge, which will be interesting as well as practical.

CATHERINE C. POWER.

FUNNY PICTURES AND TRAVEL HIS CHOICE.

I have been going to moving pictures quite often since I was 7 years old. I like the funny ones best, but maybe I should like the historical pictures. I think the colored pictures are very wonderful. Last week I saw "Coming Down the Ganges River." There were many different kinds of boats. The natives wore nothing on them but scarfs. This was because they were living in the tropical zone. These pictures were colored.

I also saw the moving pictures of Roosevelt's hunting expedition in Africa. We saw the chameleons slowly climbing up the bushes, also hippopotami playing in the streams. The water was not deep enough to cover them, and we saw birds on their backs.

JOHN W. ROBERTSON.

THIS GIRL HAS MATURE IDEAS.

The other day while walking down a street I passed a nickelodeon, in front of which were huge, brilliant signs announcing that "Love's Revenge" and "Dead Men Tell No Tales" were to be played that evening.

Now, if I owned a nickelodeon I wouldn't have a thing like that in the place. They leave a bad taste in your mouth; if patronized too much ruin your taste for real literature.

First of all I think I would have a great many pictures of travel which showed, for instance, people climbing the Alps, experiences in mines and hunting in Africa with Roosevelt.

I would also have different scenes showing the local happenings and pictures of historical battlefields and heroes.

Besides these I would have each day about two or three pictures of comedy and one which illustrated some good, clean drama.

These are the kinds of pictures I would have and which I think are better suited for public taste.

HELEN E. STURTEVANT, age 14 years.

THIS BOY LIKES A TRAVEL PICTURE.

No doubt many of the Juniors have been to a nickelodeon. Some people believe that by letting their children go to the nickelodeon it will lead to the downfall of the children. I think a nickelodeon is instructive as well as amusing.

One day in Fillmore street I went into a nickelodeon and saw the pretty picture of "Benares and the Sacred Ganges." In the picture were many dark-skinned Hindus bathing in the Ganges. The Hindu belief is that if they bathe in its waters they will have a happy life in the "hereafter." Hundreds come every year to bathe in its waters.

WILL SPELLMAN, age 15.

HERBERT ADMIRES THE ROOSEVELT PICTURES.

I like historical pictures of both past and present days. The moving pictures that interested me most lately were pictures of Roosevelt's travels in Africa. I have been waiting a long time for them, and when they were put on the showbills I could hardly wait to see them. He is an American and a brave one. He has done a great deal for us and his name is honored all over the world.

Pictures of this kind teach us almost as much as traveling ourselves. Next I like the funny pictures because they make people laugh, and when people laugh they are happy. I do not like pictures of shooting and killing. I always shut my eyes until they are over. I think they put bad thoughts in children's minds and sometimes in grown people's also. Sad pictures make me feel sorrowful.

HERBERT MEYER, age 12 years.

THE SCHOOL FOR STUDY, THE THEATER FOR PLEASURE.

I think it is nice to go to nickelodeons and see either funny pictures or beautiful scenes, which are nice for both children and grown-up people.

I like best to go on Winter evenings when all is rainy and miserable outside. I do not like it quite as well on Summer evenings, because it is so nice outside.

When you are in school I think that is the time to study. I always go to nickelodeons for pleasure and not so much to learn about school.

Of course it is nice for some people to see the battles and historical pictures, but I think I prefer the funny stories and pretty scenes.

IRMA AGNEW, age 11 years.

HAZEL REASONS THAT IF GOOD PICTURES ARE BENEFICIAL, BAD ONES MUST BE HARMFUL TO THE SAME EXTENT.

I enjoy moving pictures when they show the customs, the habits and mode of living of the people in foreign countries.

We who study at school of the countries and inhabitants of the same can best realize the advantage derived from these pictures when we almost believe, in conjunction with the learning from books and the pictures we see, that we have been in touch with these countries and their people.

We, of course, think and know, after seeing these valuable pictures, that we, the children in this country, are in fine circumstances compared with the youth of other nations.

The pictures I like best of all are those which may be termed historical and geographical. I like them because they assist us very materially in committing to memory our lessons, which we study from our history and geography, at the same time giving us a clearer understanding of the subjects which we take at school. I can always enjoy and appreciate moving pictures of this character because they are both instructive and full of interest and amusement.

I know my parents would allow me to attend these nickelodeons more frequently if such pictures were assured. On the other hand, they feel as I do in relation to the objectionable pictures which portray murder, suicide and robbery, as they must be harmful to the same extent as the good pictures I mentioned are good in their way.

HAZEL ASMUSSEN, age 13 years.

SELIG HELPED THIS MISS TO GET A GOOD MARK.

When I go to the nickelodeons—which is quite often—I like to see pictures from which one learns. When we were having "Courtship of Miles Standish" at school it happened to be at the nickelodeon. Of course I went to see it. The next day when I recited on it I got a good mark, so I guess it was from going to the nickelodeon.

THE ASSOCIATED INDEPENDENT MANUFACTURERS.

Without recapitulating the various circumstances going through which the independents have passed since the Edison licensed interests first drew the line of demarcation, we wish to present clearly to our readers how that movement stands today.

Movements and counter movements among the independent manufacturers and exchanges have run in current and in contrary that the independent exhibitor has at no time been assured of a steady supply of enough film to conduct his theater, for less has he been assured of quality. While this condition has been embarrassing to the exhibitor, it has also been deterrent to the manufacturer. The Sales Company, lately formed to handle shipments of independent films, created distrust in the minds of manufacturers and importers not admitted to its councils or having executive positions. Sole agent A. G. Whyte foresaw elimination and got busy. So did the other representatives of foreign makers. Dean Horsely, the oldest independent manufacturer, came to the front and a meeting was arranged in Pittsburg at which a large number of manufacturers and exchanges signified their intention of not doing business through the Sales Company. At one of the preliminary meetings our artist caught the attitudes of some of these insurgents as they were trying to bring Mr. P. A. Powers to their way of thinking. But Pat stood pat to the combination of which he is the vice president.

A clever move on the part of the newly associated group was the acquisition of the patent rights in the Bioscio camera and others possessed by the Columbia Phonograph Company. Under these they will operate and guarantee protection to exchanges and exhibitors who use their films.

Altogether the split may be regarded as weakening the independent cause, but it will have an effect upon the business that is beneficial. And this is how it will work out. Being about equally divided as to available number of reels, neither side can at present supply the largest buying exchanges with the program they require. Therefore it will result in a competition on QUALITY. It matters not to the exhibitor or his servitor who supplies his program so long as it is the best obtainable, and they, like ourselves, say to the manufacturers: Gentlemen, quit your fighting and get down to the business of making good pictures.

ASSOCIATED INDEPENDENT FILM MANUFACTURERS.

144 East 23rd Street, New York.

May 27, 1910.

To the Trade:

Having completed our organization covering which you doubtless already have information, we give you herewith something of our platform and plans.

1. The primary object of our association is to advance the interests of the moving picture business in general and to promote and establish those conservative, clean and broad-minded business lines a community of interests between its members, their customers and the general trade.

2. It is strictly a protective organization, as only it is not permitted to buy, sell or trade in merchandise, nor engage in or conduct business of any nature whatsoever.

3. The officers receive no salary, the expenses of the association being met from assessments made upon its members.

4. They are licensees under the Blizzard and Armat-Jenkins patents and are able to afford without cost protection to all exchanges now and indirectly to the exhibitor, on all films purchased from members of this association.

5. Its members are bonafide manufacturers and importers and do not own, either directly or indirectly, any interest in an exchange.

6. We believe in an open market, fair and clean competition, open and above board prices and freedom of action.

7. We are ready at all times to take up, investigate and adjust any differences that may arise between its members and the trade.

8. It will supervise the releases of its members in such manner as to permit of a wide and varied program of a guaranteed standard and future or additional releases being suggested to conform with such standard.

Very truly yours,
THE ASSOCIATED INDEPENDENT FILM MFRS.

THE MOTION PICTURE DISTRIBUTING AND SALES COMPANY.

Entering the offices of the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company and noting the active preparation for handling the shipments of films, one cannot fail to be impressed with the businesslike methods of its promoters. They are proceeding as if they were entirely unaware that another organization was being perfected to supplant, or at least give them battle. The Sales Company quarters have been well laid out and planned. In spite of the fact that many manufacturers have broken away, the Sales Company will begin with twelve releases per week and if their customers need any more reels the Sales Company offers to supply any amount of European film at five cents per foot. From president down to the office boy enthusiasm prevails and big is the talk about what benefits the Independent exhibitors will receive. General Manager Baumann talks quality, Secretary Miles talks system, Vice-President Powers harps on the square deal which he will make it his business to see is handed out to each exchange and manufacturer. The Bison film has taken a new lease of life, judging from the advance copies of some coming releases—in quality and style far eclipsing any previous effort. "Snubby Bill" Stanner says that Yankee films will make them all sit up in a few weeks, two new manufacturers have allied with the Sales Company, so that their potency as a factor in the Independent field is greater than the ultra-Independents or insurgents surmised.

OPERATOR'S COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Machine Recommendation—Setting Shutter.—Iowa (name of town suppressed) writes as follows: "Am going to purchase a new Powers machine. Would you recommend a No. 6 or No. 5? How do you set the shutter of a Powers No. 5?"

I would recommend a No. 6 by all means. The No. 5 is an excellent machine, but the No. 6 is even better. To set a Powers No. 5 shutter proceed as follows: remove the semi-circular wing, or guard, on operating side of machine. Set your frame-up lever in central position. Loosen the shutter on its shaft. Turn flywheel in the direction it runs until intermittent sprocket has just completed its movement and cam-pin is just half way out of star slot. Now revolve shutter in direction it ordinarily runs until it is just barely on the point of beginning to open the aperture. Tighten on its spindle and the job is done. If you don't get it exactly right the first time and there is slight travel ghost (streaks up or down from any white object in picture or letters in title) move it just a little one way or the other until the travel ghost disappears.

License—What States.—Hartford, Conn., writes: "Kindly give names of States in which license is required to operate moving picture machine."

I am sorry, Hartford, but we have no data at hand. I believe there are very few States which require license, but many, if not most, of the cities do. If any of our readers have authentic data concerning this matter would be thankful to receive same.

Focal Length of Lenses.—San Francisco, Cal., writes: "I wish to thank you for reply to previous query. I want to get a 10 x 14 picture at 84 feet—A. C. current. What size lens should I have, also what focal length condensors?"

A five and a half inch equivalent focus moving picture lens is about as close as you will be able to get at it. Multiply the throw, in feet, by width of aperture, in inches, and divide the product by width of desired picture in feet. In doing this you must caliper the width of your aperture exactly. It will be about 15-16ths of an inch. The problem will therefore be $84 \times \frac{15}{16}$. But if the aperture is a sixty-fourth of an inch more or less than 15-16ths you must use the exact caliper measurement. To figure the stereo lens proceed the same way but use three inches as width of aperture. A. C. or D. C. makes no difference at all. Use two 7½-inch condensing lenses.

Measuring Film.—Toledo, O., writes: "Am constant reader of the Column and save them all. You say one can measure film by counting the turns of the crank. Could one count the turns for one minute and multiply by number of minutes just as well? Also can you give me a way of measuring the pull of the intermittent sprocket on the film?"

Yes, that would be a very close approximate measurement, only being out the amount of whatever variation in speed there might be. No, that is a job for the expert mechanical engineer only. It varies from probably sixty pounds on the slower speed machines to as much as seventy-five on those of the highest intermittent speed. The pull, you will readily understand, naturally varies with the speed of the movement.

Spanish Titles.—City of Mexico, Mexico, wants to know if there is any place in the United States where film titles in Spanish may be procured.

Yes. Any film manufacturer can make them for you, I think. Would be very pleased to have a letter from City of Mexico setting forth conditions in moving picture shows there. But for Heaven's sake write it in English! Getting it translated up here is a hard job.

Setting Shutter.—Washington, D. C., writes: "Have discovered a simple way to set the shutter on my machine, and as I believe it will be of great assistance to beginners, I send it along for publication. Start the machine with right hand and hold index finger of left hand so that it will obstruct passage of shutter. Watch screen for results and fasten to shaft when it is right."

Friend Washington's letter needs a little explaining. What he evidently means is to first loosen the shutter on its shaft, setting the screws which hold it just so that the shutter will slip under some pressure. Then start the machine and by holding the finger so that it will just strike the outer edge of the shutter, cause it to gradually slip around until it is just right, as may readily be determined by watching the screen. Undoubtedly it could be done that way, but I'm afraid the beginner won't have the success Washington thinks he will.

Shutter Out.—Des Moines, Ia., writes: "Am running a Powers No. 5 machine. When I run a dark picture containing a white object there are always white streaks beside the object. Am using a Powers No. 6 machine and always have a ghost on the screen. Using D. C., pulling 27 amperes. Distance of house, 105 feet. Have set my carbons different ways but get no improvement. Use good grade, 7½ condensing lenses."

Just exactly what to make of the above I don't know. Presumably, postal cards being scarce in Des Moines, two operators have clubbed in together and bought one and have both set forth their troubles on its overworked surface. As to the No. 5 machine, the trouble lies in the shutter, I think. You say the streaks are beside the white objects, not shooting up or down from them. If this is correct you have me treed! Better send the machine in to the Powers Company and they will remedy the matter without cost to you. First, however, try moving the shutter a little and closely watch results. I am inclined to think you have a plain, old-fashioned travel ghost, in which case your shutter has slipped a trifle and must be re-set. As to the ghost that haunts your No. 6, I will have to ask you to set the matter forth a little more clearly. Is it merely a dark spot in center of the screen? Describe fully and I will see what I can do for you. Meanwhile try moving your lamphouse backward and forward as far as it will go. Examine carefully and see if your machine and condensor are exactly square with each other. There is absolutely nothing at all about the machine itself to produce a ghost, unless it be a travel ghost. I await further information.

Measuring Lenses.—New York City, N. Y., writes: "You have instructed us how to measure lenses by pinning a paper to the wall, etc., several times, but what I want to know is how to measure or figure what lens I need to get a certain size picture at a given distance. Also how does the white paper measurement tell me what condenser lenses to use."

Your first query is answered fully in my reply to San Francisco. The "white paper measurement" tells you what condenser lens to use this way: if the equivalent focus of your projection lens is 4 inches, then, in theory, the equivalent focus of your condenser lens should also be 4 inches. But it is not practical to follow this out for several reasons. The very long focal length lenses are too costly and are very hard to get in this country. I think after all that I shall have to come back to the original proposition: get two six and a half and two seven and a half lenses and try out until you find what gives best results. After all it is results that count, and this way you can get them, that, too, without much loss.

Loses Upper Loop.—Austin, Minn., writes that his machine loses its upper loop when a thick patch goes through.

In the earlier type of the machine you have the idler rollers set away from the sprocket a considerable distance. That has been changed. Have referred your letter to the company who make the machine. They will remedy the trouble free of all charge by installing the new style roller on your machine.

A HELPFUL LETTER.

The following letter from Mr. F. K. Evans, owner of the Oneonta Theater, Oneonta, N. Y., is the kind we like to receive. The device is nothing more or less than two water rheostats in series; a thing I frankly admit I never heard of before. Unquestionably it will work, and work well, on high, fluctuating voltage where a flat rate is paid and loss through resistance cuts no figure. In fact, I should say it would be next best to a motor-generator set, which latter would cost quite a bundle of money. One thing, however, that surprises me is this: whenever I have used a water rheostat the water has become very hot and it has been necessary to renew it constantly or it would boil violently. But neighbor Evans tells us it is only necessary to add a couple of bitscrits a day to make up for evaporation. How about this, Brother Evans? The thanks of the editor as well as of our readers are due Mr. Evans. I have reproduced his own drawing, merely tracing it over with india ink. Neighbor Evans is altogether too modest as regards his ability as a writer and draughtsman.

Oneonta, N. Y., May 17, 1910.

Editor Operator's Column:

Dear Sir—I would like to have a word to say about high voltage resistance, for the benefit of Homer, Ill. Article is in issue of May 21. I had practically the same experience two years with a Summer show at a park on a trolley line. My friend from Illinois says he was nine miles from a substation, which he meant, and did not mean power house. The power house on the road of which I am speaking is thirty miles from the trolley road and is delivered to the road at a pressure of 13,000 volts A. C., and is delivered to the substations twelve miles apart which transform it to 550 volts D. C. through a rotary transformer. I will now give you my experience with resistance. I got prices on rheostats from a manufacturer and was informed they would cost $75 for 550 volts, 25 amperes capacity, so I concluded to experiment a little. I am enclosing a very poor sketch of the outfit I evolved and as I am neither a writer nor draughtsman, please excuse drawing. The two barrels should hold from 40 to 50 gallons each and should be well insulated from the ground, also should be fenced in so no one but the operator can get near them. The switch on the pole should be high enough so no one can reach it. Anything can be used for the electrodes, such as old brake shoes or any iron that can be found near a trolley line. I used a No. 8 wire and it was heavy enough but would not be if it was any great distance from line. The two upper electrodes are suspended by a cord which is run in reach of the operator, thus allowing him to regulate the current flow quickly and easily. The water will need a little salt, but not too much—about half a pound in each barrel. It is not necessary to change the water for the season. All that is needed is about two pails of water each day to make up for the water that evaporate. I ran this outfit all one Summer and it never gave me the least bit of trouble. Hoping Homer, Ill., will receive some benefit from this (and I know he will if he does as I did), I would like to hear from him after he has tried it. Thanking you for the valuable information I have received from you in the past, through the Moving Picture World, I beg to remain,

Very truly yours, F. K. EVANS.

ONE FROM THE LONE STAR STATE.

Ft. Worth, Tex., May 16, 1910.

Editor Operator's Column:

Dear Sir—Kindly grant space that I may make known my views concerning a few matters, including your article, "Operators' Faults," and Mr. F. G. Robinson's letter defending the operators. I am an operator, but don't "know it all," nor do I ever expect to; but nevertheless have succeeded in getting along very well so far for nearly four years. I am still learning something nearly every day and expect to as long as I remain in the business. I study every condition, every peculiar happening and everything connected with each day's duty and then, after I am in bed, I think it all over. Have had several pretty hard propositions to deal with, but have never failed yet. Do not, however, by any means imagine that I may not some day. But to get at the point I wish to make: The good operator, that is, the man twenty-one or more years of age who knows his business as you would have him know it, could not afford to work here, much less in Dallas, Tex., for the reason that the managers refuse to pay high-class operators to exceed $15 to $18 for from fifteen to sixteen hours per day (8 to 9 a. m. to midnight, with an hour or less for dinner and the same for supper). Rather than pay a real operator $25 per week they hire fifteen and sixteen year old boys for $9 per week. There are, of course, a few exceptions, but they are few. These baby operators put up a horrible show, of course. Picture playing hide and seek, with brown corners and the light out two or three times during the projection of each reel. If the really good man refuses to work all those hours for $15 to $18 per week he is laughed at by the managers, and called a fool. They are simply blind to their own business interests and carry a dozen in operators' salary cuts too low in business. Operators, real ones, I mean, will do exceedingly well to stick close to Dallas until conditions are better. And now I want to ask you which make of machine you like best. Personally I favor the ———— line of machines, especially their latest model. Also let me ask if there is a way of using 220 volt D. C. without a rheostat. May I offer a word or two merely as a suggestion regarding Denver, Colo., trouble with some jumping off lower sprocket? I had the same trouble with the Edison Type B machine and found that it was caused by wide patches in the film. Every time one went through the film would climb the sprockets and away would go my lower loop. I got rid of the trouble by looking over my film and cutting out all wide patches, making them narrow.

Surely Ft. Worth is painting things worse than they are. I know both cities well and like them, Dallas particularly, and I hate to see such news from there. But if what is set forth be literally true, then I think I shall have to start a "Manager's Column" and hand out a few "bouquets" to those gentlemen also. Such a policy is simply idiotic and should be stopped forthwith. It hurts not only the individual house but the business as a whole. I should be glad to hear the managers' side of the question, if they have any. Your judgment and mine are the same in the matter of machines, even to the model. Yes, there are machines made to use on D. C. I will have some literature concerning them sent you. Your suggestion concerning Denver's trouble is excellent. If the Edison Company will permit, I will say that they would, in my judgment, do exceedingly well to not restrict the size of the lower loop. It is one of those things that looks well from the manufacturer's point of view, but which don't work well in practice. I have many letters complaining of this one trouble and it is pretty nearly all traceable directly to this fault. I have hesitated about speaking of it, it not being the policy of this department to criticise any make of machine, calling it by name, but I am sure in this instance the Edison Company will forgive me. If not, then I will feel inclined to ship them something like three hundred letters asking a remedy for this very one thing.

FROM FAR OFF WASHINGTON.

Aberdeen, Wash., May 11, 1910.

Editor Operator's Column:

Dear Sir—I get the World every week and if one fails to come I get busy writing to the publishers for the missing paper. Why? Because I would not be without it. I read every article written by the editor of the Operator's Column, you bet! Really, I have to laugh at some of the questions they spring on you, but suppose I ought not to. Your answer to the letter by Mr. Robinson was all right but not strong enough. You spoke of Western operators being higher class than the Eastern men. Mr. R., have you visited the Pacific Coast? I think not, from that! Should you come here and take a look around Portland you would be astonished. There are more "crank turners" to the square mile there than any place I know of. There isn't a single really good picture in the city! That is strong. I know, but it's the truth! Yet the men there pass an examination before being admitted to the union. The strange thing to me is that men are able to pass an examination who produce such miserable work on the screen. Is it carelessness, laziness, or what is it? I don't, as an operator, think your roasts are a bit too strong. I had rather a man tell me my faults to the end that I may remedy them than to have him praise me all the time. Writing to you, friend Richardson, seems like writing to an old friend. That must be my excuse for this letter. E. J.

Your kindly feeling for the World, the Operator's Column and its editor are appreciated, let us assure you. I most sincerely hope that things are not so bad as you have set them forth, in Portland. I know that country like a book, but not since the picture game claimed me. I fired the first engine that ever entered Oregon from the East. Quite possibly the trouble in Portland is a combination of carelessness and laziness, superinduced by careless managers who stand for poor work. When I used the word "West" I really meant the Middle West. Of conditions on the coast I know little or nothing now, except by hearsay. And now I think I will cordially invite Portland to write and set forth its side of the matter, if it will. Here in the Moving Picture World office we are always glad to hear from our friends and at times are tickled to learn we have friends of whom we knew nothing at all. "Yours" apologies for saying "us." Just write, that's all. F. H. R.

A LETTER FROM MR. EDISON.

The following letter is in answer to one written by myself asking Mr. Edison to kindly set forth his views of the supposed drop in voltage across the arc and rheostat. I guess after all I shall have to give it up for a bad job. There is no higher authority in the world than the "Wizard of Orange," but, even so, I cannot see that his letter, or explanation, makes anything much clearer. No! I am not bull-headed. I simply am unable to see it the way the rest of you do and will, I suppose, have to let it go at that. If Mr. Edison's letter means anything it means that there is either no flow at all or that the flow is in both directions. I can make nothing else out of it. Some time when the editor has plenty of space I am going to set forth fully and in detail just exactly how I do look at this matter. Until then consider me as properly squelched, set down on and obliterated. F. H. R.

From the Laboratory of Thomas A. Edison.

Orange, N. J., May 16, 1910.

Mr. F. H. Richardson,
New York City:

Dear Sir—Your letter of the 8th instant received. Mr. Edison directs me to write you that your difficulty in solving the electrical problem relating to moving picture apparatus arises from a misconception of the meaning of the electrical terms. "Voltage" is ordinarily spoken of as being positive and negative; it is defined as the tension or pressure which causes electric current to flow through a conductor, analogous to the mechanical pressure which causes water to flow through a pipe. The analogy is not a true one, however, the difference being that in a water system there can be pressure as well as flow (corresponding to "current" in the case of electricity) with only one conductor (pipe) leading from the pressure source, whereas in an electric system there can be neither voltage nor current without two conductors (wires) connecting to the voltage source.

The words "positive" and "negative" are arbitrary terms taken for practical purposes and do not serve to explain electric currents. Instead of thinking of current as flowing out in the positive wire and back in the negative wire, it is less confusing to think of both line wires as being electrified, one being in the positive electric condition, the other in the negative electric condition. These two conditions have a tendency to neutralize each other, that is, they have a mutual affinity. "Voltage" is the measure of this electrical affinity. When two such electrified conductors are conneced, either by direct contact, or through any electrical appartus, such as a rheostat, arc light, motor, etc., the two electrical conditions neutralize one another at a rate directly proportional to their affinity (voltage) and inversely proportional to the resistance to electric flow offered by the conductors. Such a neutralizing process manifests itself in results known as "electrical" and the direct product is always some other form of energy, such as heat, light, mechanical force, etc.

If this explanation has been followed it should be clear that "voltage" reaches the work (arc light, rheostat, etc.) through both the positive and negative, and that the total drop in the work must necessarily be equal to the line voltage.

Yours very truly,
H. F. MILLER, Secretary.

UNEVEN FILM THICKNESS.

By F. H. Richardson.

In the past, but especially since the advent of the new N. I. stock, there has been a very decided variation in the thickness of film stock. Now this is bad from any and every point of view. I take it that the manufacturer furnishes thin stock from motives of economy. I am guessing at this, but believe I am not far from right. It is false economy, however, if this really is the explanation, for naturally the thinner the stock the more the film will jump in the machine. It is common sense that the thin stock will not so well withstand the shock of sudden starting and stopping in front of the aperture as will the heavier film. Also it is common sense that it will be more easily vibrated through contact with the sprocket spurs. Naturally, then, the films of those using thin stock are not so satisfactory as those manufacturers putting out thicker film. Naturally, also, if the films do not run satisfactorily the demand for them is not so great. More than this, with several standards of thickness the man with the thin stock can get more feet on a standard reel, thus getting more cash returns per reel, or subject, than the manufacturer who uses heavy, honest stock which will produce better results on the screen. But the heavy stock man undertakes the contract of playing even by overloading the reel and this again is very bad from many points of view. It would seem that the makers of film stock ought to adopt some standard of thickness and sell none but that to any one. It would seem that an agreement to this effect might easily be reached between film-stock manufacturers, and that it should be for the general good of the business. Perhaps I have put this rather crudely. Also I am not very well posted on the ins and outs of the matter from the film-stock makers' end of it. But I do know what is needed and badly needed, and that is a standard of thickness, rigidly adhered to. The stock used by the Pathe people seems to be about the right thing. So far as I know there is no earthly reason why stock cannot be made the same all the time. I am well aware that it usually does not do much good to tell a great corporation like the Eastman Company what they "ought to do." Usually they simply tell one to mind his own business. That is just the point, however. This is a matter which is the exhibitors' business, just as much as it is the stock makers'. It is the exhibitor who has to suffer for everything which is bad in connection with the films, and he usually suffers much more than does the manufacturer. Get busy, gentlemen, and give us a standard, uniform film thickness. The exhibitor don't want a strip of leather, neither does he hanker for a ribbon of tissue paper. A film stock just thick enough to withstand the shock of machine usage, and no more, is what is wanted, and it is wanted that way all the time.

THE "ACAD" FILM.

Acad? What is Acad? What does it mean? What does it stand for. It stands for something of the best in moving pictures. The four letters are the initials of the names of a French film making concern, an Associated Company of Dramatic Art, to translate it freely. In other words, Acad is a Film d'Art controlled by the Eclair Company of Paris, whose offices here, as our readers are aware, are at 31 East Twenty-seventh street, New York City.

We were specially invited this week to witness the first Acad release, a film of full length, based upon a novel by Balzac, entitled Eugene Grandet. This company seems to have engaged the services of the best available acting talent in Paris and to have spared no expense in the way of mounting, costumes, scenery and furniture for the picture.

Roughly, the story is that of a miser who refuses to help his brother, a banker, who is in difficulties. The miser's daughter discovers the old man's secret, and robs Peter to pay Paul. In other words, she gets possession of the treasure, hands it to her lover, who is just in time to save his banker-father from committing suicide. The dramatic nature of the story will be realized when it is understood that the girl has simply "stolen" her marriage dot or dowry. So, when her lover is arrested at her father's instigation, she confesses, and the story ends by showing the lover giving his prospective father-in-law a receipt for 300,000 fr., the girl's dowry.

Dramatic enough in all conscience, and yet quite domestic. The action takes place about the year 1830, when Louis Philippe was on the French throne. It is one of those pictures that hold the interest of an audience from the moment the film commences to move. As a first release it is a huge success, and we have no doubt that the Acad film d'art will be well applauded.

In a conversation with Mr. Offeman, the New York manager of the Eclair Film Co., we learned that the productions of this house are becoming increasingly popular. Exchanges like them and the public like them. As we said last week, Eclair films are characterized by great beauty and delicacy. They are exquisitely French, which is about the highest praise that is possible to give a picture.

Plymouth, Ind.—D. W. DeWitt, lessee and manager of the New Orpheum Theater, has decided to change from licensed to independent film and commenced Independent service early last month.

The New York Motion Picture Company will release shortly a production entitled "Wolves of the Sea." This picture came pretty near being the most expensive they have ever produced. Expensive in that it almost cost human lives. The accident occurred while Mr. Balshofer, the camera operator, on another boat, had his camera set up and focused on the pirate boat. Without warning the two boats collided, throwing Miss Graham and Mr. Sherry overboard into the Pacific Ocean. Still Mr. Balshofer continued to turn the crank and succeeded in getting a number of remarkable scenes. We are very glad to say that Miss Graham and Mr. Sherry have fully recovered from the bruises they received while being dragged aboard ship. Taking everything into consideration, they succeeded in producing an exceptional film.

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

"CONVICT NO. 796" (Vitagraph).

When representing the intensity of human passion the Vitagraph actors display an unusual understanding of human nature and the influences which in some mysterious way actuate its impulses. Here is a strongly dramatic picture because it depicts the transition of human passion and offers a concrete example of the way some small thing may change the entire future course of a life. Happily the producers have shown how a life may be influenced for good. Too often the evil influence is permitted to predominate. The murderer's hand is stayed by a girl singing a hymn. He quietly submits to be again led away to prison, and in place of being one of the ughest and most intractable convicts he is quite the reverse. Elemental human passion is such an unknown influence in all lives and the means which change the current of one's future are so subtle that it is unsafe to declare that any man is either permanently good or bad. To say that this is one of the most powerful pictures ever produced is a trite remark. We have studied its effect upon several audiences. It is not the kind of picture calculated to create applause, no more than we would think of applauding an eloquent sermon, yet it brought hearty plaudits, which came as a relief after the intense silence which prevailed while it was on the screen.

"The Little Doctor of the Foothills" (Essanay).—A humorous picture, depicting the experience of a pretty little woman doctor who goes to Arizona to practice her profession, and whose presence so works upon the cowboys that they all require her aid almost instantly. Men who never knew what sickness was are speedily afflicted with the most serious ills to which humanity is heir. Then comes a real accident, to which she refused to respond because she supposed, like the others, it was a false alarm. However, this is romantic and when the last scene disappears from the screen some malady that medicine and surgery cannot cure seems to have afflicted both. The picture is acted with all the dash and spirit which characterize the work of the Essanay players, and is certain to be popular.

"The Centenarian" (Gaumont).—One may well shrink from the burden of advancing years, and all the more so, it, as in the instance depicted, one is to be subjected to such indignities merely because one has reached his one hundredth birthday. This poor old gentleman must have wished he had passed to the great beyond before attaining to the century mark.

"The Hasher's Delirium" (Gaumont).—A humorous skit representing a waiter's dream. All sorts of beautiful things happen to him, then quite the reverse, but ultimately his snores become so annoying that they pour seltzer on him to arouse him from his slumbers.

"A Tempestuous Adventure" (Pathe).—A certain, though decidedly vigorous, cure for love. When the poor, deluded old gentleman is thoroughly soused he discovers that he didn't love the young woman after all, though he may have supposed he did.

"The Milk Industry in the Alps" (Pathe).—A picture made in the village of Stalden, illustrating the process of making condensed milk from the time the cows go to pasture until the big cases of milk are ready for shipment. Not only is the picture valuable from an educational standpoint, but it gives many glimpses of delightful mountain scenery in addition.

"The Wings of Love" (Vitagraph).—A thrilling love story set in quaint Dutch scenery. It is one of those realistic stories which grip and hold the attention from beginning to end. The novel stage setting increases the attractiveness of the picture and it is all enhanced by sympathetic acting.

"Sisters" (Edison).—A dramatic story with numerous situations that appeal to one's heart and make one wish to take a hand in the affair and help in straightening out some of the tangles. One's sympathy goes out to the young wife who compromises herself in attempting to save a younger sister and the story does not tell whether the husband is really convinced of the honesty of his wife's motives or not. But it does show that the sisters renewed their allegiance, even though their relations were strained for a time. Pictorially the film is out of the ordinary. Some of the glimpses of scenery, particularly where the artist is at work, are exceptionally attractive and there are others only less attractive. The picture will please with its heart story, some of it a picture of moving picturedom which is full of realistic acting and its exceptional pictorial qualities.

"Gee; I'm Late" (Pathe).—A very lively picture from the time Jones leaves his cot at 11 until he arrives at Cosby's at 12 the hour set for lunch. His experiences rife as a succession of laughter. If there is anything that he did not go over or through in his mad rush it was a mistake, and probably if informed of the omission he would go back and do it over, including whatever he left out before. And then he arrives at Cosby's on time, a fitting ending to a hair-raising race against time.

"A Brave Little Girl" (Pathe).—A pretty story of a little girl who sees her father carried away by a gang of poachers, secures aid and saves his life. An interesting tale of how a domestic tragedy was happily averted.

"Out of the Past" (Vitagraph).—A love story of a different sort. The old man returns to find, not the one he loved, for she married, but years after he is able to rescue her daughter from abuse and bring her up as his own. For the older ones who see the picture there is a tenderness in the reminiscences of the old man which remind them unconsciously of their own past dreams and the mists will float before their faces, even when they look. Ah, well, some sweet hope lies buried, as the poet has written, and in this instance the picture revives many of the memories which have long slumbered on the unforgotten shelves of memory.

"The Seminole Halfbreeds" (Kalem).—An Indian picture based upon an order banishing the Seminoles to the reservation. The order fails when it is discovered that the Seminoles are half-breeds. The principal interest centers in the reproduction of Indian characteristics, including dress and manner. The story contains no particular point otherwise, excepting possibly to represet with considerable graphic power, the sentiment of the Indian when the edict of banishment to a reservation has been issued. Forced from the lands they believed their homes, the Indians were as despondent as the Seminoles shown here.

"An Affair of Hearts" (Biograph).—A pretty comedy representing two impulsive Frenchmen madly in love with a lady whose name they do not know. Several humorous situations are developed from chance meetings, finally leading up to a duel. At this they both show some confusion, ending, however, when the lady invites them into her home, where they both declare, with vehement protestations, their undying love and insist that she choose between them. But when her somewhat bulky and athletic husband appears they both have pressing engagements elsewhere and hurriedly depart.

"The Indian Girl's Romance" (Lubin).—Apart from the heart interest which develops as the story proceeds, this film will be attractive because it represents an accurate reproduction of a Hudson Bay trading post, something sufficiently out of the ordinary to excite more than the ordinary degree of interest. The love story is intensified by the fact that the factor at the post is seized by the tribe, on the testimony of a halfbreed, and tortured before burning at the stake. He is rescued by the Indian girl and the halfbreed is punished by the tribe for the affront he has put upon them. The dramatic heart story and the novel surroundings, developing a setting of unusual interest, combine to make a film as attractive as it is strange.

"The Land of Oz" (Selig).—The third in the Oz stories and truly, as the producers say, their crowning effort. The Emerald City in all its splendor is presented, and all the familiar and popular characters are produced with close fidelity to the story. It is a worthy representation of a popular story. Gen. Jinger's soldiers, in glittering apparel, along with the others ultimately resolve into a spectacle worthy of the best in motion picture production. The producers deserve great credit for bringing such an accurate and altogether sumptuous film. It is hoped that some managers will see the picture's strength and run it more than one day. It would draw a week anywhere.

"A Race for a Bride" (Melies).—Here is life enough for the most exacting of motion picture lovers. A race between a horseman, a cyclist and a motorist for a bride. Moving accidents by flood and field best the men with the machines, but the man on the horse, with the parson up behind, arrives ahead, and the others get there in time to offer congratulations only. It is a dashing comedy, sure to win vigorous applause.

"A Rough Night on the Bridge" (Melies).—A party of Jack Tars, who have imbibed too freely, in their wanderings encounter a swaying bridge. And here the fun begins. There is a laugh in every swing of that bridge, and the audience speedily join with the tars in their mirth, which increases as the bridge swings worse and worse and one by one, or in groups, they are forced to take water; involuntarily, it is true, yet none the less effectually, and the picture ends with their merry faces laughing at you from the screen.

"Ramona" (Biograph).—An adequate dramatization of Helen Hunt Jackson's most romantic novel. Recent years little has been heard of the book, but thirty years ago it was one of the most popular novels of the day. It was written primarily to show the injustice of the white man to the Indian, and was very romantic. The picture follows the novel closely, going as far as to reproduce the actual scenery where the story was laid, a picturesque town in Ventura County, California. The love story loses nothing of its power in the picture, and one wants to do something to help the unfortunates whose property is destroyed, whose land is taken and who are persecuted and driven ever father into the wilderness. It is too late now for the reproduction of the novel to exert any influence in the rectification of a great wrong. But perhaps it will be worth while to show thus graphically the injustice which preceded the settlement of a considerable proportion of the United States. Sympathetically acted, with unusually romantic scenery for a background and photographed with a full appreciation of the beauties of the drama and the setting, the picture will linger long in the memory, as many another of the Biograph films has done heretofore.

"The Messenger Boy Magician" (Lubin).—A snappy comedy, introducing new features and offering novel transformation scenes, the product of difficult trick photography. Being unusual, it will be more than ordinarily attractive, and the assertion is ventured that it will prove a popular picture.

"Winter Bathing in the West Indies" (Lubin).—A picture which, shown in the Winter, would make residents of northern latitudes homesick, and lead them to wish for the more comfortable temperature and the open air pleasures here so graphically reproduced, but wholly impossible in this portion of the world. The operator selected his viewpoints with appreciation of the picturesque possibilities, and the mechanical portion of the work was carefully done.

"Romeo Turns Bandit" (Pathe).—Not a bad scheme, this. When the dismissed suitor turns bandit, and captures the daughter, demanding a ransom for her release, an amusing complication is instituted, resulting in Romeo securing the daughter's release from the greedy bandit, her restoration to her father's arms and a wedding forthwith. It is an interesting and an amusing picture, offering a novelty in the dual character of the suitor.

"Little Mary and Her Dolly" (Pathe).—A simple story, yet because it involves the grief of a child, and its subsequent healing, is certain to attract more than ordinary interest. These griefstricken faces of children, the clear representation of the little understood sorrow that burdens their hearts, make one wish it were possible to prevent such griefs forever. The joy upon this little face when a new doll replaces the old and money is supplied for her sick mother's relief, is indeed good to see.

"The Unmailed Letter" (Selig).—Did you ever have such an experience? If you have you will appreciate this film. If you never have, see this picture and accept it as a warning. In any case you will enjoy the comedy features of the film.

"The Wedding Presents" (Essanay).—Those who have suffered the experience of a wedding anniversary will appreciate this humorous skit. The huge quantity of tinware, containing, of course, a large number of utterly useless articles, is a white elephant of which Henry undertakes to dispose; but in doing so adds to his own losses and perturbation of spirit. The real funny portion occurs when the tinware, like the proverbial cat, comes back, and the disconsolate Henry pays out his last dollar for express charges. The idea upon which the story is based is original, and it is worked out with appreciation of the humor which is inseparably connected with the subject.

"Where Is Mulcahy?" (Essanay).—A very humorous story of a policeman stuck in a fence, tormented by boys. There is little else to the picture, but the absurdity of the officer's situation and the fun the boys get out of it is sufficient to keep the audience more than ordinarily amused. While the humor is rather broad, it must be admitted that it makes those who see the film laugh. Nothing else is needed to stamp the picture as successful.

"The Cliff Dwellers" (Kalem).—While an interesting story is told in this picture, creating a heart interest that helps the picture, the principal interest will center in the historical accuracy of the scenes. Aboriginal life in America is clearly portrayed. The costumes were made from pictures owned by the American Museum of Natural History, and the staging has been done with such care that the ancient and comparatively unknown cliff dwellers are vividly reproduced. For this alone the firm deserves commendation. The presentation of the picturesque and almost unknown surroundings of this interesting people is a genuine public service, and should be so recognized. The entire work has been performed with intelligence and care, and the film is destined to increase the knowledge of all who are fortunate enough to see it.

"Max Leads Them a Novel Chase" (Pathe).—An improvement on the popular chase pictures principally because of the selection of such novel methods of getting away. The pursued individual finally escapes in a ballon after trying very many other means unsuccessfully. Only in the novelty of the means utilized does this chase differ materially from many which have gone before. But novelty is an essential feature of such pictures, and when so much is crowded into one it deserves to be popular, and this one is.

"Capturing Cub Bears" (Pathe).—Representing peasants in Arlege, France, capturing cub bears. The funny antics of the little fur balls in their endeavors to escape add greatly to the interest of the film.

"His Wife's Testimony" (Urban).—A strong bit of drama, representing a villain who undertakes to win another's wife. The means employed are common enough, and, unfortunately, effective enough. The climax comes when the wife testifies for the villain in court and eventually leads him to a better life. There is a little of the high moral tone which is sometimes popular. One need not say that this is a blemish. Perhaps one may call it a sermon by suggestion. That it is effective is quite sufficient for the dramatic unity of the peace. Its propriety may be questioned, but its dramatic quality never.

"Over the Cliffs" (Gaumont).—Perhaps the writer may be alone in his opinion, but he confesses that he can see no reason for the existence of a film of this type. To see a baby hurled from a cliff is neither educational nor amusing. To be sure the sullen sailor gets his deserts and the baby is saved, but who is benefited in any way by seeing the film? It is not often that a film from this house seems to deserve criticism, but this one is so palpably useless that one cannot refrain from expressing an opinion about it. There are plenty of good manly subjects which do not require the attempted brutal murder of a helpless baby to make them interesting; moreover the action in this film and also the scenes are unconvincing.

"Floral Studies" (Gaumont).—Flower studies often fail in photography because they appear as though pasted flat against a board, but in this instance they were photographed against a dark background and have a stereoscopic quality which makes them stand out in sharp relief. Further, the studies were revolved during the exposure, giving a succession of delicate lights and shadows which add materially to the pictorial quality of the studies. The coloring has been admirably done, and no matter whether it is the pansy, with its deliicate, uplifted face, or the brilliant colors of more pretentious flowers, the effect is equally pleasing.

"All on Account of a Laundry Mark" (Edison).—A bit of lively humor which results from the fact that a wife gave some of her husband's shirts to a tramp, who gets arrested. There are all kinds of fun. Mother-in-law faints, hubby rushes frantically to the police station, but gets the wrong one; wifey hies her away expecting to find her incarcerated husband, but discovers instead the tramp and faints. After a lively mixup like this the ending must be exciting, too, and is it, indeed, so hysterical that the police officers question whether or not to send them all the the asylum.

"Fortune's Fool" (Edison).—A forlorn, discarded, love-sick youth makes a series of attempts at suicide, but through the machinations of fickle fortune none are successful. A variety of events intervene to prevent him carrying out his sinister purpose. The audience is, for this reason, permitted to rejoice with him when the girl responsible for all this disturbance appears, and "Fortunes Fool" wins out in the unequal struggle against fate.

INDEPENDENT.

"A Father's Grief" (Great Northern).—A touching heart story, sympathetically acted, adequately staged and intelligently photographed. It will appeal to the hearts of any audience and a mist will gather in front of the eyes before all the scenes are passed.

"Conquered Again" (Itala).—A rough house comedy, which, while some may object to it because of its boisterousness and the property destruction which accompanies it, is laughable and leaves an audience in the best of humor. So long as their own goods and chattels are not destroyed the picture looks funny.

"On Parole" (Powers).—The story of a convict out of jail on parole, who saves the life of a little girl in a thrilling runaway scene, then thrashes a tough who insults a Salvation Army girl and barely escapes arrest for burglary, when the little girl recognizes him and he is given a place to work by her father. The runaway scene is extremely realistic and is sufficient alone to make the picture popular.

"A Temperance Leader" (Powers).—The wife is a temperance lecturer. The husband tries to be a sport. A vicious girl causes an explosion in the family, and when the aforesaid lecturer taunts sufficient whiskey is administered to make her drunk. The rest can be better imagined than described. It is a funny picture, and keeps the audience in an uproar after the fun begins.

"The Mexican's Jealousy" (Bison).—This is not a strong picture. A fight over a girl is not an especially interesting subject for a motion picture, even when laid among the picturesque scenery of Mexico and staged with the object in view of representing life and costuming in that country. Action is important, and thrilling rescues are interesting, but a story without a point and a tale that tells nothing do not make captivating motion pictures. The producers should be commended for one thing, they carried off the man instead of the girl, and the audience is spared from seeing a girl struggling in the hands of a number of rough villains. For so much of the picture commendation cannot be too hearty.

"Cupid at the Circus" (Thanhouser).—A romantic picture, representing an unfortunate boy befriended by a little girl, and giving her his pocket knife as recompense. Years after, when he has become a successful man, the girl is engaged as stenographer by his firm. He discovers the knife, and the picture ends with a wedding not far away on the horizon. A pleasant story, enhanced by the picturesque surroundings of a circus and the exhilaration which comes of seeing a boy succeed against great odds.

"Fruits and Flowers" (Imp).—A boisterously humorous story of two clerks who fall in love with their employer's daughter. They are, of course, deeply chagrined to have their gifts of fruits and flowers turned to cabbages and turnips. They pelt each other and break up the musicale, and then get ignominiously fired the next morning. Following their amorita the next day they are allowed to see her leave them and walk away with the man to whom she is engaged. There is a whole barrel of fun in this picture.

"The Lacemaker's Dream" (Lux).—A pretty fairy story representing how a child's dream of a large quantity of beautiful lace comes true, and she sells it for a fabulous sum, enough to make her and her grandmother wealthy and above want all the rest of their lives. One must commend the ending, which leaves two deserving people happy, not mourning over the vanished vision of a dream.

"He Did Not Die" (Lux).—A story showing what a man did who believed a seer when he told him he had only a few days to live. But on the date named he finds himself much in the land of the living, minus his worldly belongings and his money.

"Juan, the Pelota Player" (Eclair).—A romantic and melodramatic story, centering around a player of this popular Spanish game. The pictorial work is satisfactorily done, and the acting is sympathetic. While the story told is nothing extraordinary, it is sufficient to maintain the interest of the audience throughout.

"The Eternal Triangle" (Imp).—The old story of two men and one woman, or two women and one man. It has been told over and over again since the beginningg of time. It will probably be told as long as time shall last. In this instance it is an old man and a young wife, with a young man who comes into the scene and makes violent love to her. It results in the death of the old man at the hands of the younger one, and then the wife, realizing what has occurred, and her part in it, deliberately walks off the cliff to her death, joining her husband in his last sleep in the chasm below. The unfortunate thing about this film is that it is much too true to life. Possibly not all such stories end in death, but they are productive of ruined lives and broken hearts, and often develop conditions which become almost intolerable as the years go on. And in a majority of instances those most interested are in nowise to blame. The eternal triangle holds them fast, and try as they will, escape is impossible.

"A Sagacious Animal" (Lux).—A comedy from the Lux workers that will attract attention by its unique situations and laughable incidents. As one gets the audience learns how sagacious an animal can be and what the effect may be.

"The Red Man's Honor" (Bison).—An Indian love story with an opposing attachment resulting from the fact that a girl rescued one brave and accepted another. The girl's descent of the cliff at the foot of which are found the encampments is thrilling and there are some thrills in the fight which starts with the whites. But the timely arrival of the chief with the flag of truce and the harmonizing of the sullen savages end all difficulties. This might well be called "revenge," since the war color is about. An Indian who escapes his slighted.

"The Curse of Gambling" (Bison).—A species of horrible example melodrama in the extreme and putting in concrete form the many stories which have been told of the effect of gambling. In short, it is the downward course of a bank cashier who becomes infatuated with poker, until his wife dies of virtual starvation and neglect in the direst poverty. Perhaps it will be interesting because it tells a story familiar in some degree to everyone who has read moral novels or listened to moral lectures. It may be said, however, that its principal interest lies in its graphic representation of a man's weakness and inability to resist temptation.

THE PLAGUE OF BULLETINS.

Dear Sir—I have read with a good deal of amusement the letter from "Exhibitor" about the annoyance of having to receive the bulletins that are put out by the different film manufacturers.

I wish to take issue with him on the reasons that he states. I am afraid that the exhibitor had more than one day's or one week's accumulation of bulletins around if the fire inspector issued such severe orders. In my opinion he was giving himself away as being a careless and untidy man. No amount of pamphlets, if properly taken care of, would cause any sane fire inspector to order them cleaned out. He probably had a lot of paper all over the floor.

Personally, I have written to all the manufacturers asking them to send me two copies of the bulletins that they put out, as I always put the stories of the pictures in the lobby of my theater, and one who has never tried it will be surprised at the number of people that stop to read about the pictures and come back the next night to see them.

I would suggest as a remedy to "An Exhibitor" that instead of throwing the bulletins on the floor he get a filing board and put them on it after he is through reading them, or throw them in a waste basket and have that emptied when it is full of paper. If he were to write to the firms and ask them to take his name off of their mailing list they most likely would do so. For my part, I want all the literature that I can get when it pertains to my business.

ALSO AN EXHIBITOR.

BISON FILMS.

This week it was our privilege to see some advance copies of Bison films which will be shortly released. Not having seen a Bison for some time we were not prepared for the remarkable advance in quality—not only in regard to the plot and acting, but the scene setting and the photographic harmony. When the films "Wolves of the Sea," "The Terrible Peril," "Custer's Race for a Wife," and "A Mexican Outlaw" are released they will mark a period in the career of the New York Motion Picture Company that will place them in an enviable position, and great praise is due to producer Fred Balshofer for the advanced state of the art which he has attained. While these films are of the mildly sensational order, great care has been taken to render them free of brutality, death, or any gruesome scenes. On the contrary, they are highly creditable and highly commendable and just the kind of picture calculated to appeal to the average exhibitor. The perfection of photographic rendering and steadiness is due, we are told, to the new equipment of the Carleton Motion Picture Laboratories in which the printing and developing is now being done. Mr. Carleton is a well-known expert in this line and under his charge we may expect still further advance in quality.

Our readers will note that the price of the book of descriptive music advertised in our columns has been reduced to fifty cents. The publisher, Mr. Freyiinger, has had such a large demand for this book as a result of his advertising in the Moving Picture World that he has been enabled to make this reduction in price.

LATEST DEVELOPMENTS IN TALKING PICTURES.

In the Moving Picture World of May 7 we reviewed the status of the singing and talking picture and pointed out that although it had received several setbacks the future was full of promise. Now it seems that many of these promises at least are being fulfilled. The method of synchronization of the music or song with the picture has been solved if we can judge from the exhibitions now being given by the American Cinephone Company at 127 East Twenty-third street of this city. We have had the pleasure of inspecting the company's new and latest model machine, made by the Victor Talking Machine Company of Camden, N. J. From a technical standpoint it appeals to us as being so simple that the ordinary operator can quickly master the details of this method of producing singing and talking pictures. The synchronism produced upon the screen is absolutely perfect, the talking machine record and the moving picture working in entire unison, the words appearing to come from the mouths of the talking figures in the picture. The illusion is complete.

The method of producing the song in unison with the picture is extremely simple. The cinephone machine itself is a combination of a quick starting talking machine with an unusually heavy double spring, so that the machine obtains its full speed, and produces its complete volume of sound almost immediately upon the release of the ordinary brake which starts the record revolving. Upon the front of the machine an illuminated dial appears. Upon this dial there is a revolving hand whose course is marked by four illuminated bull's eyes, which in the dark auditorium are absolutely distinct, as these bull's eyes show a green light which can be observed by the picture operator, even at a distance of many hundred feet. This illuminated dial is for the purpose of registering the speed at which the talking machine is running.

Photographed into the moving picture itself is a similar dial, with the hand thereon also in motion. This dial appears upon the screen in the lower left-hand corner, and as the picture is run through the dial in the picture itself, and the dial upon the face of the talking machine are both moving in the same direction, the speed being gauged by the four points of light which appear upon the face of the talking machine in green, and which appear upon the screen in white. The operator simply registers the speed of the cinematograph machine by the two revolving dials which he operates at any required speed either fast or slow, as desired. There are absolutely no electric connections or any connection whatsoever between the talking machine, the screen or th cinematograph machine. Therefore it is not necessary to install any elaborate apparatus or new sheaves wiring or other to operate this process.

The ordinary picture machine already in use, without any additions whatsoever, can be used under this system to produce singing and talking pictures. Indeed, the whole process is contained in the Cinephone itself, combined with the registering device embodied in the film. The latest model machine, perfected by the Victor Talking Machine, reflects the greatest credit upon this well-known concern. The machine itself is a very beautiful one, being complete in every detail, and is absolutely fool-proof. The records have a new automatic device for holding them firmly in place.

We understand that the American Cinephone Company will not make their own records, as this is an involved process that demands the highest type of skilled recorders, and can only be done in a plant such as the Victor Talking Machine Company possesses. The Victor Company is to furnish the records for the American Cinephone Company's machines, and this company is also building the combined talking machine and Cinephone.

The American Cinephone Company is preparing to equip a complete plant for the taking of American singing and talking subjects. At the present time the same system is being operated in England by the well-known Warwick Trading Company. The English company is producing five to eight new subjects a week, and already has in its catalogued lists of subjects some four to five hundred talking and singing subjects. Raleigh & Roberts, of Paris, and Ambrosio, of Italy, are also producing Cinephone pictures in their respective countries. The American Cinephone Company will keep on hand a supply of these films suitable for American audiences. It is proposed to sell the machines and films direct to the exchange man, who will rent the machine and subjects to moving picture theaters at a weekly rental.

The general management is in the hands of Mr. Ben Nathan, the well-known English theatrical manager, and the company starts business in a position to quickly place itself at the head of the singing and talking picture trade in this country. There is no question as to the value of this device in the moving picture theater. We have received excellent reports of its success in England and upon the Continent, and we see no reason why it should not duplicate its foreign success here.

From a technical standpoint, after carefully investigating the method of synchronizing, we believe this process is the most practical so far introduced to the trade.

A FURTHER WORD.

By F. H. Richardson.

In the April 24 issue of The World appeared an article "Why Vaudeville is Featured in Moving Picture Theaters," wherein the conclusion was reached that there are not a sufficient number of high class film subjects to retain the interest of the amusement seeking public. The article asserted that managers declare the picture alone, owing to the above lack, is insufficient to attract and hold patronage. I disagree with this, and propose to at least offer evidence to support at any contention that the conclusion arrived at in the article in question is erroneous, and that the managers who declare pictures alone not sufficient attraction simply [illegible] matter what their standing, bear false evidence.

Contrary to usual procedure I shall first present my evidence and then make my argument. I have before me a letter from Mr. Samuel Levine, manager of the Orpheum Theater, Chicago. This is a private letter, but I am sure that Mr. Levine will forgive me quoting a passage from it. It is dated February 14, and the following is a verbatim quotation: "Business for 1910 shows a very heavy increase over the corresponding period for 1909 and if it continues in the same ratio it will mean the best year the Orpheum Theater has ever seen." Be it known that the Orpheum started out as a vaudeville picture house but quickly changed to pictures alone. The admission is ten cents and the show consists of three reels of film, one illustrated song and one spotlight song. There is a vaudeville picture temple at home right next door and the vaudeville put on is really excellent, as a rule, still the nothing but pictures house, the Orpheum, does much the larger business.

Why? The answer is simple, but before I give it let me cite you the Lyman Howe shows which fill large opera houses, at fifty cents admission, on nothing but motion pictures! Why? Again, before attempting to answer that query let me cite the fact that many large, beautiful, costly and successful houses in Chicago run nothing but pictures.

Now I will give you the answer. Taking the Orpheum Theater as an example: Mr. Levine is a real manager. He knows a good picture when he sees it. He employs good operators, gives them everything needful to their work, has a strictly up-to-date, thoroughly ventilated operating room and insists on the best possible work at all times. He accompanies his pictures with appropriate music and sound effects. His operators well know that they must produce the goods and they do it. The people know when they visit the Orpheum they will see a good show, and a picture rendered with shadows, so dim it can scarcely be seen or run so fast as to be farcical. Can't, can't, CAN'T I ever impress it on the minds of exhibitors, manufacturers and exchange men that crude work on the part of the operator will utterly ruin the effect of the best picture ever produced? Won't you ever learn that one little, simple thing? No matter how fine the production, if it isn't rightly put on it is spoiled! Yet take one theater with another and you won't find an average of one in fifty in which the finer items which go to make up perfection in projection of motion pictures are paid attention to. That is an absolute fact! I have sat, right here in New York City, in one of the supposed to be high class picture houses and watched a first run film put through at galloping speed, shadows on the curtain, top, bottom or sides very nearly all the time. Is it any wonder the audience is not over enthusiastic? Yet the film subject was a very fine one and properly projected would have been magnificent.

I assert with no fear of contradiction that there is far greater need of better projection than there is of better films, though the latter would be very welcome, too. It is positively pitiful how men will invest thousands of dollars and then put the money making end of the whole showing match (the operating room, whence the show comes) in charge of a man willing to work ten hours a day, seven days in the week, for fifteen dollars. It isn't a question of how good a show can and will you put on? It's "how cheap will you work?" Then the manager wonders why pictures alone don't draw sufficient patronage. Tell him his pictures are not good and he will reply: "Why, I get first run service—the best to be had!" That you mean the pictures were not properly projected, accompanied by proper and suitable music and at least some sound effect never occurs to him. Aside from rain marks and jumping on the screen a picture is a picture to him. Such trifling things as speed, shadows etc., etc., mean to the average exhibitor less than nothing.

His class projection is the crying need of the hour and the sooner those who guide the destinies of the motion picture [illegible] those who guide the destinies of the motion picture business awake to that fact the better for all concerned.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The other evening we paid a visit to the Elite Theater at Forty-seventh street and Indiana avenue. This is a very pretty little house and well designed, with a deep sloping floor. The front is of a pleasing and attractive design, with a mosaic floor and entrance walls of marble. Here we saw the Selig special film "The Shriners," and were much pleased with its beauty as shown on the Mirror Screen of the Elite. This house was one of the very first in Chicago to install the Mirror Screen, and Mr. Nasser, the manager of the theater, is very much pleased with it, though one thing mars the effect of the picture—the lens is not the correct focal length, and about three inches of the projection on each side is thrown on the frame of the screen.

At Thirty-first street and Indiana avenue there are two houses which both put on excellent pictures. The rivalry between them is extremely keen, though their programs never cross each other, as one, the Delphi, is licensed, and the other, the Ideal, is Independent. The Ideal gets the Imp pictures first run on Monday and Thursday and puts them on very well indeed. This proves too great an attraction for the Delphi to stand by and idly watch, and on the same days this house generally shows a first run Biograph or Selig. The result of all this is that the public is the gainer, while neither house seems to be the loser, since they both have crowded houses until the close of the evening's entertainment.

Both of these houses deserve special mention. The projection at the Ideal is wonderfully good and full justice is done to the photographic beauty of the best Independent pictures, such as Ambrosio, Itala, Eclair, Imp, etc., by Mr. Raymond Cahill, the operator, who, though scarcely more than a boy, projects a picture that surpasses the average picture, of which the operator is proud. Perhaps the secret of his success is partly to be found in the lens he is using, which is a short-focus objective made by Bausch & Lomb. Mr. James Cahill, the manager, is very well pleased with the Independent films that are now being released and receives very many compliments on the work of Itala and Ambrosio, as well as the Imp. He is fortunate in having a good piano player, who follows the pictures very closely. An instance of his work was found when the Imp film "Fruit and Flowers" was running. In the drawing room scene, where the pianist in the picture strikes a few chords, then proceeds in lively fashion until he is interrupted by the "fruit" being thrown about and striking him—here Mr. Cahill's pianist stopped his playing, struck the chords in just the same way as the musician in the picture and thus heightened the effect of the picture materially.

Across the street, at the Delphi, the best licensed pictures are very well projected. The manager, Mr. Hammond, has coated his screen with aluminum paint with good results and increased the brilliancy of the picture very much. This is a very popular little house, and its attendance shows that good pictures can attract without any vaudeville. Mr. Hammond has a small three-piece orchestra, which accompanies the pictures very well and much enhances their beauty.

The Casino Theater, at Thirty-fifth and Halsted streets, is another theater which puts up a fairly good program. Mr. Lessaris, the manager of this theater, has been there two years, which is a pretty fair record. The pictures here are well put on, being run steadily and pretty well lighted. Mr. Lessaris offers vaudeville with the balance of the program, which consists of two reels of film, one about five days old and the other about a month old, and two songs. That the people like the show Mr. Lessaris puts up is attested by his remaining there two years while other shows have changed hands several times.

A few doors down, near Thirty-sixth street, is the Monogram Theater, which was built about a year ago. This theater does not put on its pictures at all well; they are constantly vibrating and dancing about in their frame, and the outline of the frame itself is constantly in motion, showing vibration in the machine. This unsteadiness was not the fault of the film, as the films shown were a Biograph and a Gaumont, both of which makers produce steady pictures. The light, too, was very poor, and one had to strain the eyes occasionally to make the outlines of the picture clear. The vaudeville here was decidedly questionable. The music did not in any way suit the pictures, as the pianist was most of the time talking to the drummer while hammering off some noisy rag-time tune, which the drummer in turn covered up pretty well with his noise. The poor pictures at this house may not all be the fault of the operator himself, as the throw is about 100 feet, and the operator would need to have a telescope eye, indeed, to make out what sort of picture he had on the screen, and the great amount of vibration would indicate that the machine is at fault. If the manager of this theatre really cared to have a good picture he would at once set out to remedy the defects as they now exist, which is by no means impossible of accomplishment.

Mr. Frank McCarthy, owner and manager of the Lyric Theater, Beloit, Wis., was a caller at Greater Kleine's and Selig's last week. Mr. McCarthy has nothing but praise for the pictures he is obtaining from the Kleine, Selig and Pathe exchanges, and pronounces his theater a great success in the Wisconsin town.

Jim Gabriel, that well known and popular "cowpuncher" of Wild West show fame, who has recently gone into the motion picture exhibiting game, is, according to all reports, making good with his New Circle Theater, in St. Louis, Mo.

* * *

Mr. B. F. Clements, of the Great Western Film Company, and who has established a name in the light picture field with his excellent pictures of the Nelson-Wolgast and Langford-Flynn contests, was confined to his bed for some days last week, owing to a severe attack of la grippe.

The Orpheum Theater, Chicago, where so many feature films have been so successfully exhibited to the accompaniment of appropriate music and sound effects, has followed the policy of the first class theaters here by placing lady ushers in the house.

* * *

The Brayton Manufacturing Company, whose reputation has been firmly established by the excellent quality of their output, are making a new set of novel announcement slides with pictures of the current topic of baseball. These slides are of the best quality and are made up of the best material in order to satisfy the most fastidious exhibitors. These people realize that good slides cannot be manufactured cheap, as detailed workmanship is necessary, and in this no expense can be spared to bring out a picture that is beyond criticism.

The La Salle Theater, which has for some time been known as the home of musical comedy in Chicago, is now playing high class vaudeville. The principal feature of the new innovation is the "White Canvas" on which are being projected the famous Imp films.

* * *

One of the newest and prettiest motion picture houses in Chicago is the New Berwin, recently erected at Berwin avenue and North Clark street. The Berwin is a well arranged house and is artistically decorated. The seating capacity is 226. This house is owned and managed by Mr. John H. Adams, who will secure his service through the Theater Film Service, of this city.

The Selig Polyscope Company has made the necessary arrangements with the Chamber of Commerce Board, at Portland, Ore., through Mr. M. Cohen, of the Amalgamated, for the exclusive rights to produce the magnificent flower display and celebration to be held there some time in June.

* * *

Mr. W. K. Hanafourde, who represents Jack Johnson in training pictures here, announces that the pictures taken recently in California of this giant's training there have been made and are successful.

The Chicago Film Exchange recently procured the Montana Motion Picture Company's great feature film, entitled "Custer's Last Fight." This picture was taken on the original battlefield and the maneuvers led by an eyewitness of the real conflict. The film is 1,800 feet in length and shows excellent photography.

James J. Corbett, "Gentleman Jim," before the camera in a little comedy pass with the Vitagraph girl, lessons in muscular development, and exhibition of sparring with Kennedy, the champion light-weight boxer. This is what the Vitagraph Company will shortly release as a special reel of 1,025 feet in which there is not a dull moment. In fact, we would have liked to see it twice as long and exhibitors who feature it will find it one of the best drawing cards ever issued.

The General Film Company.

The General Film Company, which was recently organized with an authorized capital of $2,500,000, has issued the following statement:

The General Film Company was organized to conduct a film renting business and has obtained exchange licenses from the Motion Picture Patents Company.

The company has leased the entire building at 10 Fifth avenue, corner of Eighth street, New York City.

The exchange licenses obtained from the Motion Picture Patents Company are identical in their terms with the exchange licenses under which other film renting exchanges are conducted, and the company will operate under the rules and regulations of the Motion Picture Patents Company.

The General Film Company has been negotiating with certain existing film exchanges with a view to purchasing them, and recently applied to the Motion Picture Patents Company for permission to acquire these exchanges. Favorable action by the Motion Picture Patents Company enabled the General Film Company to purchase the following exchanges:

Kleine Optical Company, Boston, Mass.
Kleine Optical Company, Chicago, Ill.
Kleine Optical Company, Denver, Col.
Kleine Optical Company, New York, N. Y.
Lubin Film Service, Philadelphia, Pa.
Howard Moving Picture Company, Boston, Mass.

Arrangements are under way for the prompt transfer of these exchanges to the General Film Company. The existing working organizations of the exchanges that have been acquired will be continued and every efficient employee will find opportunities for advancement.

The General Film Company obtained favorable action of the Motion Picture Patents Company in connection with the purchase of the exchanges mentioned above, by showing that the acquiring of these exchanges would not disturb or injure the business of existing exchanges.

The charter of the General Film Company does not permit it to engage in the business of exhibiting motion pictures or to own or operate theaters.

The business of the exchanges that have been acquired will be conducted as heretofore, and the requirements of their customers will receive the most careful attention.

The officers of the General Film Company are: J. J. Kennedy, president; George Kleine, vice-president; J. A. Berst, treasurer; William Pelzer, secretary.

LUBIN NOTES.

Although the new Lubin studio has been in use for some weeks as an annex to the Market street studio the big glass structure at Twenty-second street was not formally invested until last Monday when the full complement of scenery, costumes and properties in use at the old establishment were removed to the Enoa location. The great glass structure is about two blocks from the main line of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad and excites no little comment from the commuters in the afternoon when the Western sun makes the glass gleam like some monstrous jewel. The extensive floor space will greatly expedite the making of interior scenes and the laying out of properties for the field excursions.

A would-be authoress wrote the Lubin Scenario Department the other day to ask how to write stories, making special inquiry as to the propriety of taking magazine stories and changing the names of the characters. There are lots of writers who do precisely that without asking permission, but they seldom succeed in selling their stories.

"Officer Muldoon's Double" was a record breaker for time. The picture was planned and made within twenty-four hours of the time it was discovered that none of the short subjects was sufficiently condensed to go on the reel with "Grandfather's Gift." It is as well made as though it had required a week in the making.

A personal letter to one of the Lubin staff from a newspaper man in Canada says: "There's been a lot of Lubin pictures here lately and everybody says that they're better than ever, especially the dramas. They've helped to build up the Temple's new theaters reputation wonderfully." That's the sort of Lubins that are being released these days.

MELIES NOTES.

G. Melies' release of last Thursday, "The Paleface Princess," made a great hit wherever shown, and exchange men and exhibitors are awaking to the fact that this producer is making some of the finest of current releases.

Not only has he a capable stock company of well known players, the services of many real Indians and cowboys, the advantage of ideal Texas air and scenery, the direction of a competent producer, but he has more in the series of excellent stories he is producing. There is a plot to every one, and any of them might be elaborated into a four-act drama which could be staged in a Broadway theater.

"The Padre's Secret," which is a play of old Mexico with a wealth of scenery and the atmosphere of the Mission churches, will bring the customs of this country to your very doorstep. It tells a story of a Mexican girl's preference for an American, and the unusual method of attempted revenge employed by his native rival. You remember "The Seal of the Church?" Well, here is another great play of the same locality.

The coming releases are "Love's C. Q. D.," which is an interesting drama in which wireless telegraphy plays an important part, and "A Texas Joke," a typical Melies cowboy comedy.

In "Love's C. Q. D." one of the features is a battle between Mexican bandits and American soldiers, in which a troop of United States cavalry stationed at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., is used, with their guns ammunition and accoutrement.

ESSANAY NOTES.

The Essanay feature for this week is a Western film, entitled "Away Out West," released Saturday, June 4. Without a doubt this is one of the most interesting and most convincing subjects ever offered by the Essanay Western producer. The story concerns the prospectors, one of whom is lost in the desert, owing to the treachery of his partner. The desert scenes in this picture are as wild and desolate as the most barren parts of the Great American and Mojave deserts. Other features of the film are scenes taken within a gold mine. The acting which is monopolized by the two prospectors alone, is thoroughly convincing, while the photographic quality of the picture is exceptionally fine.

The Wednesday release of the Essanay Company this week, for June 1, is two short comedy subjects. "Lew's Inheritance" and "Henry's Package." The first is a Ghetto story, with scenes obtained in the very heart of Chicago's Jewish quarter, South Halsted street. It is the first picture in which Miss Spier, the Essanay's new leading lady, makes her appearance as Rebecca, the pawnbroker's daughter. The story is full of many hearty laughs. "Henry's Package" is a genuine Essanay comedy with the Essanay comedy hero, "Henry," again brought to the limelight. The title will be found to be paradoxical, because "Henry" it is only too evident has a package in every sense of the word.

Coming next week is another Essanay baby story, in a full reel comedy called "Barly Bill." This picture is one of the most beautiful of all the famous Essanay baby pictures. "Barly Bill" is a tragic character with the heart of a child. The moral of the story will be found to be, according to "Barly Bill": "Don't leave yer kids in the house alone. You never can tell what will happen."

The Essanay's new posters are selling like the proverbial "hot cakes," which speaks for the good quality of the posters. The sales last week were increased by several hundred. The new poster is an artistic production in several colors, and bearing a different border design than the posters formerly issued. Less of the sheet is monopolized by Indian designs, while more space is given to the illustration of the film. These posters are made especially for the Essanay Company and contain actual scenes from the pictures. They may be had from the film exchanges or from the Essanay Company direct.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

On June 7 "Davy Jones' Parrot" will make itself heard. It's a rare old bird, this Davy Jones' parrot and will get the laughs as well as the audiences. As a comedy "Davy Jones Parrot" is a "hot" and "Davy" will "Davy" has all the fun makers strapped to their belts.

We must have pathos to satisfy the emotional in our natures and nothing could so fully fill the bill as the dramatic delicacy "The Altar of Love," presenting itself on Saturday, June 11.

While thousands will be watching the arrival of Theodore Roosevelt on June 18 thousands more will be watching the arrival of "Ito, the Beggar Boy," another Japanese wonder film of exquisite beauty both in story and scenic splendor.

The grandeur of the American flag was never more evident than in the portrayal of its birth as presented by the Vitagraph Company in the feature film "Old Glory." We have read about the Stars and Stripes in history and sung the pride of the nation that proudly hailed round the grand old flag at the battle cry of freedom, and now beats it aloft the standard of ninety millions of people enlisted under its protecting colors. All the great and famous men who have had to do with freedom's cause in the 18th 19th and 20th centuries are brought before us in moving pictures and the almost living presence as they fight the battles of the past on sea and land, before powers and potentialities in councils of war and state to raise the Star Spangled Banner, an emblem of power prosperity and peace among the nations of the earth.

Mr. A. E. Smith returned from his trip to Paris on Saturday, May 21, looking quite natural and happy well satisfied with the aspect of things pertaining to the Vitagraph interests on the other side. He reports everything flourishing in the foreign departments and a universal expression of appreciation and admiration for the "Life Portrayals" of the Vitagraph Company of America.

The grand special extra Vitagraph release of current and universal interest on May 28, is another triumph of up-to-dateness and enterprise.

The funeral of King Edward VII, the most magnificently and grandly solemn pageant ever seen, eclipsing in its splendor of royalty and representation from all parts of the world any convocation of the nations known in history. A sight that made an impression so deep a lasts so still. It was felt throughout the whole British Empire and influenced the four quarters of the globe.

Some 6,000 feet of film have been taken and the most important and salient features will be presented in this unapproachable achievement of modern "go" and "get there."

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE IMPALEMENT. Mabel gives a party at which Avery is present and he is made to endure many things to make him feel ill at ease. Finally, in this way, he is the unwilling victim of the cruel pastimes and pranks of the merry throng. Avery is bruised with a mallet during a game and leaves the house in disgust. Mabel is to make the escape but she runs a race of the would-be dancer for fun, and the whole situation is changed. Hence it is with emphasis that an actress invitations to the different parties. Accompanied by his wife he attends a social gathering and here meets a young dancing girl, another favorite entertainer. He is immediately obsessed with an infatuation for the girl, and it is evident that his business are neglected. Mrs. Avery scrutinizes the situation and sees no less than an undue attention toward the dancer. He, of course, denies and recalls and vapors but into believing that his thoughts are always and only for her. Nevertheless, the time comes when she sees positive proof of his perfidy in a letter to him from the girl inviting him to attend a dinner at her home given in his honor, hoping he will not fail to grace the occasion. When he is about to leave for the dancer's home, Miss Avery picks up a bottle of poison, threatening to take her life if he goes. Regarding this threat merely a jealous woman's trick to keep him home, he not only treats it with derision, but pours the contents of the bottle into a goblet, remarking that it would be more convenient to take it that way, and off he goes. When he is gone the true aspect of the situation dawns on her. She realizes for the first time what a despicable wretch he is, and not worth the effort to save him, so she dashes the glass with its contents to the floor. However, the strain of the ordeal through which she has passed proves too much for her and she falls in a swoon to the floor. Meanwhile, Avery has reached the home of the dancer, and is greeted at the entrance. By strange coincidence, the glass handed him is identical with the one he handed his wife. He at once becomes conscience-smitten that as wife may have carried out her threat. Rushing back to his home he finds his wife in a swoon, but he thinks her dead. Dead, and he caused it! At this moment he becomes a veritable maniac. Dashing madly out of the house he re-enters the dancer's home like a fiend. The guests are thrown into a panic as he shrieks, "I killed my wife. I killed my wife!" and finds across the room, dead, struck down by the relentless avenger of injured virtue.

IN THE SEASON OF BUDS. Spring, the season of seeds is Cupid's busy season. The perfumed odors are limitless romance, the birds sing out their love songs and the landscape is clothed in floral garments to make a perfect setting for Cupid's plots and counter-plots. It is in this season that little Mabel arrived at her Uncle Zeke's farm. Henry and Steve, two farmhands, are chums, having spent the years of their adolescence together on Uncle Zeke's farm. They have never experienced any love but brotherly love, until the day they first meet Mabel, when both become deeply smitten. They hustle off to their room to spruce up to make an impression on the pretty little niece of Uncle Zeke. Henry is assumedly the favored one, and so gains the mild enmity of Steve. Their strong friendship, however, precludes their becoming enemies, and Steve bows to the inevitable. Henry purchases a neck chain and cross as a betrothal present for Mabel for as she is coy and he is bashful, she so draw him out writes with a switch in the sand L O V E, which Henry spells L I C K. Mabel pretends to be angry at his stupidity and leaves him standing at the gate puzzled as to what has caused her anger. Later, to make him jealous and so more determined, she plays the coquette by flirting with Steve. Henry takes her teasing seriously and decides to leave for some distant town. He packs his grip and before leaving writes the following to Steve: "I see she likes you best and as I love her dearly I leave here for good." Steve finds and shows this note to the folks, and so poor little Mabel is almost heartbroken at the awful result of her coquetry, for she did love the honest fellow. It is too late, however, for Henry has departed for parts unknown. He secures work at a general store in a distant village and while his thoughts go back to little Mabel she never hears from him. Later on she accepts Steve and they are married. Steve is a dutiful husband and Mabel now loves him truly. After working along for several years in this distant place, Henry is seized with a longing to revisit his old home. He does not dare home, however. Well he decides to return and as he approaches the little farm he meets Mabel and Steve, her husband, with their little child. The greeting at first is a bit strained, but recovering, Henry is cordially invited to the house. This he declines with the excuse that he must hurry back to the train. Mabel at first is grief-torn, but gazing at the good-hearted Steve fondling their baby, she feels that the right thing has happened. Steve has endeavored and is succeeding in making her happy, and so he will always.

LUBIN MFG. CO.

A VETERAN OF THE G. A. R.—The Veteran is an ardent patriot and given, as old men are, to the relation of his past exploits. He is proud of his battle record and when a park lounger jeers at the oft told tale his indignation overpowers him and he suffers from a stroke that leaves him faint and weak and tells of organic trouble. Proudly he starts off for the meeting of the G. A. R. post where he will mingle with the comrades and live again in the midst of a heated debate over some trifling executive matter. There is a recurrence of the attack and this time when the kindly comrades come to his aid they find that he does not know them; that some blood clot, pressing upon the brain, has destroyed his memory. Sorrowfully they lead him back to his home, the Post Commander giving the family warning of the shock. Even the arrival home does not bring back the sense of memory and wonderingly he looks about the familiar room and into the faces of his wife and daughter. Other troubles come quickly. The mortgage upon the little home is foreclosed and the house and its contents sold at auction. The Post in the small town is not rich, they cannot raise the mortgage, but the kindly old men do their best, each buying some of the things the old veteran loved best, his easy chair, the little things that contributed to his comfort, while the manly young sweetheart of the daughter purchases the sword and flags and the picture of Lincoln that were the veteran's most cherished possessions. These are installed in the more simple home that the two women can maintain. The veteran shows no improvement in his mental condition and for the first time he does not take part in the Memorial Day parade. Some of the comrades come from the cemetery with flowers for the living and as they file into the little home the sight of the uniforms rouses some vagrant memory. The veteran recalls the days when he carried a sword and reaches for the blade that once he waved over battlefields. As he draws the blade from its scabbard there flutters to the floor a certificate of deposit for $10,000, the proceeds of the sale of mining stock that the veteran concealed in the scabbard the evening of the stroke. With the financial worries cleared away and with reason once mored on her throne, the evening of the veteran's life promises to be a pleasant and peaceful one.

PERCY, THE COWBOY.—Percy is a ladies' man; the sort of chap the girls think real cute but who make real men excessively weary. Percy has that effect upon his prospective father-in-law, who promptly runs Percy out of the parlor when he catches him making love and commands the butler to throw him the rest of the way out of the house, a task the butler performs with a thoroughness and evident enjoyment of the job that does not conduce to Percy's comfort of mind or body. But father is soft of heart where daughter is concerned and he sends a note to Percy informing him that if he will go West for two years and make a man of himself he can marry the girl of his choice. Percy is delighted and togs himself out in glad raiment that would make even a stage cowboy shriek with delight. To a blank fitting suit he adds the sweetest bow and his sombrero is decked with a scarf that looks like a rainbow on a three-day drunk. A huge holster houses a tiny revolver better suited to the watch chain and a dainty bow of pink ribbon gives to it an artistic touch that a .44 completely lacks. Bravely he bids farewell to his admiring sweetheart and promises not to kill any more men that he absolutely has to. Out on Curly S ranch the Boss gets a letter from his Eastern friend announcing Percy's advent and the riders scent some fun, though they do not then realize how great will be their joy. The foreman drives off to the station to meet the expected guest, but is taken aback when Percy minces along the platform and gushingly greets him and some of the station loungers. They start for the ranch and Percy gets his first taste of roughing it, for the buggy has poor springs and the rocks in the road are so thick that they have to lie on top of each other. To add to his distress there is no top to the buggy and he is getting frightfully tanned. The punchers make him welcome and when Percy proudly displays his gun they go wild with delight. One of the men shoots a companion with it and the latter gets quite cross when he finds it out. Meanwhile they are making things pleasant for Percy and by way of training him for the buck jumpers they ride him on a rail, a ride that ends up on the bank of the river where Percy has to swim for it. Two years later the Eastern sweetheart is delighted to get a letter telling her that Percy is due to arrive almost as soon as the note. Father does not share her joy at the prospect of having "that thing" around again and is frank to say so. A commotion in the hall rouses them and the servants with upheld hands come backing in, the chef, the butler, the housekeeper, the chambermaid and all the others. Bringing up in the rear is an alert and reliant young fellow with springy stride and erect carriage. He chases the servants out and there is a joyous reunion. Then it occurs to Percy that he and father ought to have a little talk. Father is not in a conversational mood and he has taken refuge behind a table, but Percy makes one grab for him and Father comes in a hurry. As well as he can with the black muzzle of a six shooter half way down his throat, he utters the conventional "Bless you, my children," and when the first shock is over he is rather proud of the result of his experiment.

GRANDFATHER'S GIFT.—Two sisters each has her love affair. The elder loves a man approved by her choleric father and her announcement of her engagement is received with a pleasure marred only by the almost immediate confession of a secret marriage between the younger sister and a man whose poverty is his only demerit. But poverty is a disgrace if not a crime in the eyes of the father whose own success has led him to become intolerant of others and he refuses to forgive his headstrong daughter and declares that henceforth he has but one child. The young couple do not care about the loss of money that the situation entails but they do regret the estrangement, though they are happier in their modest little home than the elder sister in the elegant mansion her father's liberality has provided. Time passes and the favored grandchild is to have a birthday. Of course Grandpa is invited and there is the pleasant supposition that his birthday gift will be commensurate with his love for the little one. The parents send off the tactfully worded note of invitation and wait expectantly. But the grandfather cannot come and plans a surprise for the birthday gift. He purchases a pair of boots and in each tiny toe he stuffs a banknote of large denomination, chuckling as he fancies the surprise of the mother when she finds that in spite of their apparent roominess the boots do not fit. The gift he dispatches by his body servant and the selfish mother eagerly opens the package. When she finds that instead of the lavish gift she anticipated there is only a pair of cheap boots she thows them out of the window in disgust and vents her temper in a rage of tears. The boots, lying upon the sidewalk, attract the attention of a tramp who sees in them the price of a drink, but before he reaches a saloon he begs food at the back door of a humble home. The housewife gives him a generous meal and in his gratitude he gives the shoes to the baby clinging to its mother's skirts. Delighted with the gift the mother seeks to try them on the child, but there is trouble with the fit and investigation discloses the fact that there is money stuffed in the toe. The other shoe also contains a note asking that the child be brought to his grandfather. The mother—who is the younger of the two sisters—is delighted. Her father is noted for his eccentricity and it is not unlike him to test her through the medium of a supposed tramp. Delightedly she prepares the little one for the visit and with her husband sets forth for the house. To her surprise she finds that she is not welcome; the father does not understand the reason for the visit and permits no explanation. They are about to turn away when the other child enters and taking her little cousin by the hand leads her again to the old man. Now his reserve breaks down and with a son he gathers the two children into his arms and reaches forth his hand for the daughter he still loves so dearly. Her sister, too, shares in the reconciliation and the family, once more reunited, gather about the old man as the picture closes.

OFFICER MULDOON'S DOUBLE.—Officer Muldoon is tired, for there was a hurry call for the reserves the night before and he lost a lot of sleep. It is dereliction of duty but tired nature craves repose. Muldoon strips off his coat, removes belt, club and hat and stretches himself upon a bench in the park for a quiet nap. Reginald Plantagenet, "late with Charles Frohman," but still more lately leading man of the Plantagenet Players, is walking back home after the collapse of the 10-20-30 venture. He almost succeeds in getting a pie but the standkeeper is wise and wants his money first—an apparently universal proposition that has kept Reginald from eating for the past two days. Passing through the park Reginald espies the sleeping beauty on the bench and an idea strikes him. The uniform is more or less a free pass to the courtesies of the corner stands and with the aid of makeup Reginald soon transforms himself into the double of the faithful preserver of the peace. Jauntily swinging the club he starts out on a foraging trip. He would have gotten away with it had it not been that his appetite was stronger than his judgment. He eats the entire stock, despite the protests of the tender and moves on to the next stand while the bankrupted purveyor of food goes in search of a less voracious policeman. He finds the inspector and they go to look for the offender, being joined by others whose stocks have been wiped out. Meanwhile the joyful tragedian has returned to the park, the borrowed regalia is returned and Reginald seeks a more secluded spot for his own nap. Heavy feeding had made him sleepy and without bothering to remove the makeup, he falls asleep. The inspector locates Muldoon and all are agreed that he is the offender but his earnest protestations of innocence carry conviction and further search is made, Reginald is located and—well the rest can be imagined.

PATHE FRERES.

DOWN WITH THE WOMEN.—An indignation meeting is held in protest against the universal feminine cry of "Votes for women." On leaving the meeting the chief speaker interferes with a woman selling bread, a couple of female street musicians, a woman sweeping steps and several other feminine workers.

By this time the police are after him so he whips up the horse of a lady cab driver and starts away, precipitating to the ground in his haste a number of market stalls. He then leaves the cab and on foot endeavors to cross over a grade, but is saved from death by a woman. He is arrested and defended in court by a charming lady barrister, who obtains his acquittal.

ONE CAN'T BELIEVE ONE'S EYES.—The wife of a jealous Colonel is surprised by her husband talking with one of his officers, who immediately runs away, leaving her to assure her husband that he was surely the subject of hallucinations.

Mrs. Colonel finds her maid in the hall making love to a private, and sees a chance of deluding the Colonel into the belief that he was mistaken. So she instructs him to make a noise under the Colonel's window so that he will see that he is not dressed according to the regulations, she having made him take off his sword. The Colonel on looking out notices this and calls him up and is about to reprimand him when he sees the sword is now on the soldier's belt, having meantime been replaced with the help of the Colonel's wife. This happens again and the Colonel begins to think his eyesight is really leaving him and he tells his wife that his eyes are not what they were and that he was mistaken in the first place.

INES DE CASTRO.—Founded on the life of the beautiful and unhappy Ines de Castro of Portugal. The story told in this film is of poignant interest.

The period is the 14th century during the reign of Alphonso the Fourth of Portugal. The King's son, Don Pedro, at his father's wish contracts a marriage with Dona Constanza. Among the ladies in the court is Ines de Castro, whose remarkable beauty attracts the notice of Don Pedro. The two speedily fall deeply in love and then commences one of the most famous of historical intrigues. King Alphonso also learns of his son's love for Ines and swears that the Dona Constanza shall be avenged and by his orders Ines is imprisoned and his son also punished.

THE TWO PORTRAITS.—A celebrated portrait painter has just finished the picture of his pretty wife whose delicate state of health necessitates a quiet home life. In spite of his fondness for his wife he cannot hide the pleasure he finds in the company of one of her so-called friends, and one day as he starts out automobiling with this woman has wife is overcome and dies from heart clock, and her little daughter is left with nothing but her mother's memory to comfort her. Later matters after the portrait is the accepted setting of the dead wife's friend and on his return he captured the other week, at the request of the child has been removed to her room.

Shortly after the marriage, however, the painter discovers that his intended bride is a cigarette and she afterwards breaks all their engagements. Disgusted and angry at missing her a note to destroy her portrait but a sudden touch of pity and looking down he sees his daughter's face drawn to see the curtain covering the picture reveals the portrait of his dead wife. He tries to bring back the remembrance of her mother to him she had changed the picture earlier in the evening and had hidden to watch the result on her father. Her presence and the sight of the picture and the touching stroke to the painter and with latter she repentance he clasps the child in his arms and promises never again to forget her dead wife so easily.

RUSSIA, THE CAUCASUS MOUNTAINS. Snow-clad mountains part of one of the old Caucasian roads, Mount Kazbek, the Devil's Door, and various types of the native Khevzures are only some of the interesting sights brought before you in this film.

MACBETH. Macbeth, the best known tragedy that Shakespeare wrote, is probably familiar to all. This great story is founded on a woman's ambition for glory and title.

In order to do justice to the masterpiece of this great writer the best French actors were employed to take the leading parts.

The whole subject is produced with masterly skill, infinitely significant of the degree of perfection to which the cinematographer has carried his art.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

DAVY JONES' PARROT.—"Bless me mailing spikes, but he's a good 'un and talks like an orator. Just watch how he handles that lookout nipper of his. Why, he's as eloquent as a preacher!" said old Captain Jones, as he holds converse with his parrot. The bird attracts the attention of Mr. Lee, whose wife and daughter have expressed a strong desire to possess the parrot.

"My good man, what'll you take for that parrot?" asks Lee. "Five dollars," says the Captain, and the deal is closed by the payment of the money. The "Cap'n" goes on his way rejoicing, while the new proprietor of the parrot is somewhat disturbed by his somewhat compulsory purchase. Placing the parrot under his coat, Mr. Lee hastens to a near by store to buy some sort of a cage for his feathered companion.

While looking over an assortment of cages and satchels, a funny-looking floor walker comes along who attracts the parrot's attention, who shouts out, "Get onto his nibs!" very much to the embarrassment of Mr. Lee and the disgust of "his nibs." With his bird safely caged in a portable bird satchel, Mr. Lee gets on a street car; he no sooner seats himself than the parrot pipes out the command, "Ring up that fare!" The passengers are delighted, and Lee apologizes for his talkative charge. The fun grows when a fat woman crowds into the car. "Bring her in sideways. Well, you rascal!" is heard from the satchel, but attributed to the passenger by the fat lady, especially to Mr. Lee, who escapes from the car pursued by his accuser.

Arriving at his office, tired, hot and upset, he places the parrot on a chair and goes to his desk and gets down to business. While thus engaged a giddy old maid enters and wishes Lee to dispose of some stocks she hands him. "Oh, you kid!" breaks out from the satchel, and completely fusses the spinster, who seizes the stocks and indignantly leaves the office.

A sanctimonious old deacon now comes in and starts talking; so does the parrot, but more expressively than eloquently. The deacon is horrified, and will listen to no explanations. He has been insulted and will have none of it, takes his hat and escapes from the vile place.

Looking at his watch, the man of business finds it is time to keep an appointment, puts the parrot in the large safe vault, closes his desk and quickly goes out. The scrubwoman comes in to straighten up the office and hears faint cries of "Help!" She is startled and looks about for the one in distress. At last she locates the trouble in the safe. The janitor comes in and he, too, gets excited and calls up the police, who rush in and try to open the safe. As a last resort they send for a "cracksman," who comes to the rescue, blows open the safe—to find it devoid of any human sufferer.

While they are discussing the situation, the occupant of the office returns and shows the irrepressible parrot, which he takes from the satchel and throws out of the window.

The old salt who was the original owner of the bird, is standing against the railing outside the office building, filled with the net expenditure of the sale price of his parrot, full of "smiles." While in this happy mood, down flutters his old pet. The old salt thinks he "has 'em," recover himself, picks up the Polly, and under full sail makes his way back to his bark, throws himself into his hammock, and soon is lost in peaceful slumbers, while his talkative friend is triumphantly perched on the old sea dog's masthead.

VITELLIUS AND HELIOGABALUS. [illegible] possession the exit of two of the [illegible] sent and glutto[illegible] [illegible] is seen to the [illegible] Vitellius [illegible] fell in love with the vestal [illegible] was [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] known his desire to have her for the comfort of [illegible] [illegible] Vitellius [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] least. He causes a small detachment of soldiers, who break into the room where the vestal is at [illegible] her task with drawn swords [illegible] into the sacred precincts and carry off the vestal. She is taken to the Emperor's palace where no [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] She succeeds in escape from her [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] but the will of Vitellius cannot now be gainsaid.

The news of the Emperor's action has reached the mind of the citizens in the meantime, and that old dignitary, [illegible] the Alatin Hill and Wide. The people are increasingly incensed at the hate that they now know has befallen the vestal whose only offence was a beautiful face. Headed by the old man, they make their way to the palace, where they beat down the guards and not only recapture the girl, but rout Vitellius and his vile associates. The spirit of the mob is now running rampant and they pursue the royal sinner until he takes refuge in a sewer. To his hiding place they come, and we at last see the vestal witnessing with her own eyes the fate of the Emperor—he is seized bodily and thrown into the Tiber.

The penalty of gluttony is portrayed in the fate of Heliogabalus, another Roman Emperor, whose only thought in life was his gastronomic pleasure. He spent his days seated with his cronies around the festive board, and not the gravest affairs of state could distract his attention from the wine and viands. He leads this happy-go-lucky existence until the advent of a hostile foe, Vaspasian, who proclaims to the people his rights to Heliogabalus' throne. The news is brought the fat Emperor, but it does not alarm him. After a series of events, however, he meets the fate he deserves, for the foe storms his palace, while he, fat and well fed, is, as usual, seated at a well laden table. The soldiers demolish the feast so as to give him his greatest pain first, and then gorging him well, they end his miserable existence.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE EAGLE'S EGG. The beautiful Corsican girl, Marietta, has two ardent admirers, Carlo and Enrico, and it is quite difficult for her to decide which one to accept. She keeps both at a distance. The old country is exciting the two fellows to open a feud, that their friendship gradually diminishes and one day Marietta surprises them as they are about to fight with knives as weapons. She is threatened, but her clever and convincing words induce the fellows to agree to an arrangement which will serve purposes for settling the matter. High up on one of the rocks where no man's foot has ever rested, an eagle has built a nest. Marietta decides that she will be the wife of the one who first brings her an egg from the nest. Carlo and Enrico are ready to start for the task and Marietta watches them swim through the breakers. Carlo, who is the better climber, arrives at the nest first and takes the egg out of it, but on coming back he forgets all precaution in his haste, and with an false step misses his hold and falls over the steep rocks to the bottom where Enrico, who is left behind, is on his way. The latter takes the egg out of the dead man's hand and swims back for his reward. The wedding takes place and everybody is happy excepting Enrico, who cannot forget Carlo's tragic death. When the young couple are left together Enrico feels a little easier, but just as he is embracing his young wife the image of Carlo rises between them. Mad with fright and terror, Enrico rushes out of the house down to the sea, and the wife and the mother go to look for him, but they only find his body at the bottom of the rocks.

ECLAIR FILMS.

IN LOVE WITH THE CHARCOAL WOMAN.—X— is in love with his charcoal woman, and while happily enjoying himself in the company of his beloved, he is on the point of being discovered by his sweetheart and in order to escape her notice he hides in a charcoal sack. Soon afterwards a customer comes in and orders the sack sent to his residence, and accordingly the sack is removed. X— and all. X— tries to escape from the sack and by hopping manages to get into the street, but he cannot get the bag open. A frightened crowd soon follows behind the jerking, rolling heap of sackcloth and after many misadventures they succeed in stopping the sack, and give vent to their feelings by abusing X— in every possible way, until he resolves within himself that to fall in love with one's charcoal woman is a foolishness beyond belief.

THE BITER BIT.—Henry, a painter, and Ralph, a poet, are two fast friends, and both fall in love with a pretty neighbor, the charming Margaret. Margaret is fond of both the young men, but it is impossible from her actions to know which of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] for a woman to do this when she is neglecting nothing more than a mere husband, but when two fine little children are included in the case it alters the aspect of things. Mr. Smith himself is a patient suffering mortal and for a while voices no very strenuous objections to his wife's political activites. He is accustomed to finding no supper on getting home from the office and a huge stack of unwashed dishes has ceased to be an eyesore to him. A man's brain cannot work on an empty stomach and, therefore, Smith, in the course of time, begins to realize his plight, and beginning at first with little pleadings he is finally aroused to a spirit of full-fledged rebellion. When he sees that his arguments are of no avail, he determines on a bold course. One fine morning he collects all of the unwashed pots, pans, plates and other eating utensils and piling them into a wheelbarrow conveys the whole outfit around to the Club where his wife is engaged in an active discussion on some economic questions. Without any ceremony he dumps the entire burden at his wife's feet and leaves her to draw conclusions. But even this masterstroke of independence does no good in his case.

Some men have found by study and others by experience that as truly as the way to a man's heart lies through his stomach, so does the way to a woman's brain lie through her heart. Smith determines to play upon her feelings. He engages a maid, who besides having the qualifications of a thrifty domestic is also ravishingly pretty. He gives her full charge of the domain his wife deserted and awaits developments. Needless to say, in a short while the wrecked home presents a picture of system and neatness, the children are better cared for, Smith finds his meals always waiting for him and every little thing in the house is in its rightful place. For some time Mrs. Smith considers the engagement of the girl a great convenience to her personal self and she views with satisfaction the restoration of her home to its former happy condition, but ere long the woman in her comes to the fore and by degrees she becomes jealous of the maid. Slowly at first, but nevertheless surely, she begins to realize that her home is something which a woman should value even higher than civic motive; womanlike she is reluctant to concede the success of her husband's plan but her emotions are beyond her control and she finally pours out to her husband what his actions have placed in her heart and he, magnanimous, but secretly thankful, graciously restores her to the old place in their home.

THE NICHOLS ON A VACATION.—No matter how happy a married man claims to be, every other married man smiles if he boasts of personal freedom. Old man Nichols is a mere married man, that's all; but he's the whole family in himself, and this by virtue of his wife's fine disposition. When she discharges the maid poor Nichols is forced to substitute, and his life would probably be miserable to the grave, if he did not at one time make a sudden resolve to get some fun out of his existence.

Well, he gets it good and plenty. Using the old reliable excuse about being called away on business, he makes a date with a lady at a restaurant, but the dear girl, like all women, is late. He waits and waits, but it is like waiting for either head or tail of Halley's comet, and he goes to the handy 'phone. While there his wife and daughter enter for a little gastronomic pleasure, and brother Nichols does a stunt much unto the proverbial streak of greased lightning.

To complicate matters still more, his lady friend arrives after he has made his hasty exit, and very sweetly and unconsciously, not being acquainted with Nichols' family, sits down at a table to wait. Enter now, very swagger and gallant, the man who is engaged to Nichols' daughter. He does not know that both his amorita and his mother-in-law-to-be are within eyeshot, so he takes a seat near Nick's affinity. To be sure, she is a peach, and what can mere unmarried mortal do but endeavor to work himself into her good graces. Flirt? Yes, that's the word. And flirt he does, under the critical third-rail gaze of the two ladies at the other table.

NESTOR FILM NOTES.

THE LILY OF THE RANCH.—It had been an eventful day for Telka. First Billie Burton had proposed, then Ray Taggart and finally a handsome stranger, calling himself George Lawton, had appeared in a beautiful big automobile and after much pleading her father and mother had permitted Mr. Lawton to take her for a spin. Such a glorious ride as they had! It was Telka's first experience in an auto and she plainly showed how thoroughly she enjoyed every moment of it. So much so that Billie and Ray, who had been fighting over the girl, suddenly realized what fools they were making of themselves as the couple in the car went speeding past.

The next day, fearing that she might not again obtain her mother's consent, Telka met her automobile hero some distance from the house. Luckily Billie had followed her and was, therefore, able to tell the family of her whereabouts when a little later the sheriff called and showed them a telegram stating that Lawton was wanted for forgery.

Billie, Ray and the sheriff quickly mounted their horses and started in pursuit and, as the forger merely wished to keep the car going fast enough to prevent the girl from jumping out while he drank and attempted to caress her, the horsemen soon had the auto in sight.

The chauffeur, however, glancing back, caught sight of the pursuers and at once turned on speed. An exciting chase followed, in which the automobile would have left the horses behind without half trying had it not met with an accident, and just as the chauffeur had repaired the break and cranked up the sheriff and his companions were upon them.

Quickly covering Lawton with his gun and giving his horse to the boys, the sheriff climbed into the seat beside Telka and commanded the forger to take the front seat and the chauffeur to return to the ranch.

Telka had learned a lesson for, although she did not then care to accept either Billie or Ray she declared that she had had quite enough of handsome strangers to last her a lifetime.

DEFENDER

RUSSIA, THE LAND OF OPPRESSION.—It is Passover Eve and Vida, our heroine, and her family are seated at the sacred festive board. The wine is passed around and the solemnities of the occasion are being performed when suddenly a band of Russian soldiers breaks into the house. In terror the family flees into the streets, but here they are confronted by a terrible scene for the other members of their race have been treated in a like manner and are now running through the streets terrorstricken.

All of the persecuted people trembling with fear crowd into their only haven—the synagogue. Here they are devoutly praying to God for delivery from the greater catastrophy impending when Cossacks come tearing in upon them, not only desecrating the sanctity of their temple but setting fire to it.

The general has given particular orders regarding Vida and her parents with the result that both she and her father are captured and hurried off to Siberia.

Vida's lover, the general's son, having learned of their fate determines on a bold course. Disguising himself as a wandering peasant he makes his way to the far off city of torture, where his loved one is imprisoned. Here he throws off his disguise and, of course, his rank is immediately respected so that he has no difficulty in taking Vida away.

We finally see the couple landing at Ellis Island, the blessed gate of the land of the free, where they settle down in peace to forget the awful memories of Kief and Kishineff.

ATLAS

THE OUTLAW'S REDEMPTION.—We see two little children playing near a cliff when suddenly one of them falls over the precipice to the deep chasm below; the other child frightened runs off for help, and naturally asks the aid of the first man she meets. This happens to be the outlaw. Well may he suspect it as a trap to capture him, but so strong is the little one's appeal that he goes to the aid of the child. He carries the injured little one all the way back to the house and, notwithstanding his good motive, it leads to his capture; but the parents of the child, realizing what a sacrifice he made for their little girl, lose no time in making a strong effort for his release. The case is too strong for the humane jury of Westerners and he is acquitted. This action touches him deeply and after a series of incidents we at last see him with not only a new leaf turned over, but an entirely new book—married and a well respected citizen in the community.

CAUGHT AGAIN!

Moving Picture Trust Exposed in Newest Endeavor to Smash Exhibitors! Read the Letter!!!

I have just secured possession of the sensational letter reproduced below. Read it! It is a complete proof that the trust's newest game is a desperate attempt to COMPEL EXHIBITORS TO PAY A YEAR'S "ROYALTIES" IN ADVANCE, in order to keep them from turning independent! I have always said the moving picture trust is the worst managed trust in America. This letter clinches it! For instead of compelling the exhibitors to stick to the trust for a year, it will result in the most overwhelming landslide toward Independence that has ever happened in the history of the business. Read that part of the letter marked "3rd". It is fool-proof. A child can understand it. It is a dead give-away! It means that you must pay $104 "royalty" in advance. If you quit the trust exchanges the week or the month after you've paid up, the trust keeps your $104. Not satisfied with your $2 a week in weekly payments, the trust now reaches out for a year's chunk in advance. One thing more:—The letter is printed in the form of a circular with blank spaces left to be filled in by type-writer. This is trivial, except that it shows that ALL EXHIBITORS are going to get these letters, and that the letter does not apply merely to one or two isolated cases. Read that "3rd Condition" again. Take it home and play it on your pianola. Play it upside down, sidewise, before and behind. Then, when you're all through, tell me what you think of it!!!!

Associated Independent Film Manufacturers

comprising the leading American and Foreign makers, all of each and whom are licensees under the Bianchi and Armat-Jenkins Patents, hereby announce that they

The Best Program in America To-day

as follows, beginning the week of Monday, June 6th:

Monday—Nestor, Eclair
Tuesday—Thanhouser, Lux
Wednesday—Actophone, Eclair
Thursday—Nestor, Capitol
Friday—Thanhouser, Lux
Saturday—Great Northern, Carson

This program will be augmented each and every succeeding week by the addition of the product of the manufacturers who are eager to market their own goods in their own way, including Columbia, Whyte, Art Film, Electragraff, and fourteen representative foreign makers. Remember, the purpose of THIS Association is directly opposed to that of any Sales Company. THIS ASSOCIATION STANDS FOR FREEDOM in the trade, for everyone, all the time—not for any one little clique. It stands opposed to exchange-grabbing, and manufacturer-bleeding. Beware of a program that is mythical, imaginary, yet-to-be-one that consists of unknown makes, and unheard-of brands. THE ABOVE PROGRAM IS REAL—read it over. YOU KNOW THE PEOPLE ON IT—their work, their record, THEIR LOYALTY to you. Don't run into any organization's hands NOW so that they can run you out of business later. Remember you can do business as long as no one corners the producing market—don't let any one set of individuals corner that market. Turn down any Sales Company, retain your independence and your inalienable right to conduct your own business in your own way. There will be no more threats of menace and harm "if you don't come in." The bug-a-boo will be a bug-a-boo no longer. You can laugh at all "scare talk." You will do business under a new, safe and sane condition, a condition that guarantees a square deal for everybody all the time.

THE THANHOUSER LETTER-BOX

These Letters MEAN SOMETHING TO YOU. Read as Many of Them as Possible—all if you can.

"Perfectly Satisfied With the Quality!"

J. A. King, Mgr., Great Western Film Co., Winnipeg, Man.—We are perfectly satisfied with the quality of your products and are pleased indeed to see an independent manufacturer turning out films like this.

"No Trouble in Getting the Audience's Attention With a Thanhouser!"

Will Hemsteger, 1214 So. Main St., Dayton, Ohio.—I have been in the picture business thirteen years and I want to congratulate you on your splendid work. I have no trouble in getting the audience's attention when I run a Thanhouser film.

"Through Thanhouser Film Our Receipts Rose 30%!"

Hayden Morris, Mgr., Elite Theater, Regina, Wash.—We have been running your films for the past three weeks. From the day we first put on a Thanhouser film our receipts have risen 30 per cent. I have noticed that whenever we run your films I have more people come and congratulate me on a swell programme than when we run three films, all of other makes. "Jane Eyre" and "The Best Man Wins" were masterpieces of dramatic portrayal.

"You're Doing the Work!"

L. C. Wallace, The Majestic, Red Oak, Iowa.—You're doing the work. Keep it up. The Patents Company took my license some time ago, but with such Independent film issuing as Thanhouser they can keep it.

"The Thanhouser Kid!"

S. H. Clark, Bijou Theater, Corning, N. Y.—My patrons have become acquainted with your film and the little girl is known here as the Thanhouser Kid.

"Looks Like the Cream of Independent Film!"

H. C. Hatfield, Savoy Theater, Duluth, Minn.—(Letter to Eugene Cline, Chicago, Ill.) I just want to let you know that the first Thanhouser you sent me—"Jane Eyre"—is fine and beats all for excellence. It looks like the cream of Independent film. Hope you can send it to me all along.

"They're There With the Best!"

W. S. Summers, Imperial Amusement Company, Washington, D. C.—We use Thanhouser films and find them there with the best.

"The Name Thanhouser Is Bringing Them In!"

Dreamland Theater, Michigan City, Ind.—Our theater has been running about ten days and in that time we have been fortunate enough to secure three of your films. They were simply fine, a case of "par excellence." We are establishing a reputation for fine pictures here and have three Licensed houses to fight. The name Thanhouser is bringing them in, and your classics are certainly winners in all respects.

"My Exchange Can Send Thanhouser Repeaters!"

Miss Dolly Spurr, Manager, The Royal Theater, Marion, Ind.—Your late releases have improved wonderfully in development, settings and costuming. Some people have the idea that they can't repeat a film with success. There's lots of difference in repeating a good one and repeating a bad one. We repeated your "Daddy's Double" last Monday, by request, and found that it went better the second time than the first. It was the same way with "Jane Eyre," and I believe we could run it a third time and pack them in. My exchange can send Thanhouser repeaters by mistake any time and I never make a murmur! I remain, as ever, a "Thanhouser Fiend!"

"All They're Advertised to Be!"

E. D. Stanton, Manager, Vaudette Theater, Michigan City, Ind.—Thanhouser Films are certainly up to the standard and are all that they are advertised to be.

"I Saw Them—They're Great!"

John Goella & Co., Lyric Theater, Newark, N. J. (Letter to Eugene Cline, Chicago, Ill.).—Say, are you buying Thanhouser Films? I saw some of them exhibited in Columbus, and they are great. If you are buying them, you must remember me.

"Let's Kill the Imp Company!!!"

Carl Laemmle Tells the Inside Story of a Fight Now Being Waged Against the Independent Moving Pictures Company of America, Makers of the Famous "Imp Films."

—I have found that it pays to keep Moving Picture EXHIBITORS posted on everything that is going on behind closed doors among film exchanges and film manufacturers. It has won me the friendship of thousands of EXHIBITORS who have benefited by the fact that I have always given them the real facts straight from the shoulder.

—Therefore I write this advertisement. I want you to read it seriously, and then do as you think best.

—A few days ago, in Pittsburgh, several film exchanges formed an agreement for the purpose of "killing the Imp Company." The result was that they simultaneously cancelled their standing order for "Imp films."

—I cant swear what was the reason for this, but I believe it must be a personal attack on me, inspired by petty jealousy and envy. I cannot believe it is caused by anything else, for I firmly believe that Imp films are the best in the world this very minute.

—Of course the attempt to "kill the Imp Company" cannot succeed. But it shows a desire among certain exchanges to accomplish that end. It also goes to prove that certain exchanges will never buy Impy films unless you (as their customer) compel them to do so. This is why I have been advertising, week after week, telling you to demand Imp films IF YOU WANT THEM!

—The whole power to make or break any film manufacturer or any film exchange on God's green earth rests with YOU, MR. EXHIBITOR. But that power is not worth a hoorah in Hades unless you USE IT.

—If your exchange is not buying Imp films you are suffering in order that your exchange may wreak its petty spite upon me. If you are content to stand for this, well and good. But if you want Imp films, if you really agree that they are the best money makers for you, then the thing for you to do is to trade with an exchange which WILL GIVE YOU THE FILMS YOU DEMAND.

—Once you take a determined stand you can get anything you want out of your exchange. You can even force my bitterest enemies to buy Imp films and furnish you with them REGULARLY.

—Now, please cut out and save the following list. It shows just what exchanges are buying ALL IMP FILMS PRODUCED. Unless your exchange is on this list, IT IS NOT BUYING IMP FILMS. If it is not on this list, switch your business to whatever exchange IS on the list, and you can get all the Imp films released every week.

Moving Pictures Moving Up.

Persecution of good scatters it, censorship of bad purifies it. These two axioms are true and many parts of the world are living examples of the truth of the principles underlying these axioms. There are always people who from personal, selfish or sordid ideas, seem to hold a false fear that the growth of any certain good may be injurious to them or their interests; sometimes immediate financial gains seem threatened by the growth of the good they fear, and like such in olden times who, when "they saw the hope of their gain was gone" by persecuting those who brought in the good to drive out the bad, only scattered and made widespread the good they sought to kill. It is possible that in the desire shown in many places to establish the best possible good to be derived in living picture work, and make it desirable and elevating that a jealous opposition for the reasons named above may endeavor to frustrate so laudable a purpose. All right, don't let any one worry, the underlying principle always works. Persecution of good makes it grow.

True reformation consists in the elimination of evil or error; proper censorship points out that evil and common sense removes it, so the bad is purified. What a splendid thing it is that these two forces are at work, pushing onward and upward that which is right; the weak—that having no moral strength—goes to the wall; the strong—that possessing right—prevails. From these standpoints we find in looking over the moving picture world, that the moving pictures are moving up. Help the good work along.

Where Angels Fear To Tread.

Recent changes in the political economy of the moving picture field have produced many interesting facts. A month ago there were only two groups of manufacturers in the field. Now there are three. Having nothing, politically speaking, in common with each other. Verily indeed has the market been opened, and as it is the policy of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD to advocate, maintain and support an open market by all legitimate means in our power, we cannot say that we are wholly sorry for the more recent of the many changes that are taking place in the moving picture field. And those changes have made an enormous demand upon our personal time and attention.

One of the facts, or rather the consequences of this opening of the market, hardly commands our unqualified approval. "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." While we are in favor of the open market policy, we are in favor neither of cut-throat competition nor of a lowering of the standard of quality. Prices must be maintained. We will countenance no effort or movement which is antagonistic to this principle. In the general interest of the business we shall, as far as possible, antagonize any movement for cutting prices. But it is not of this subject that we want to speak in this article.

We are always glad to welcome new manufacturers in the field and to render them every personal and technical assistance in our power, because we want to see the industry progressive, as well as open, thereby encouraging and attracting new ideas, new views, new outlooks and new men of the business.

We discourage none: we encourage all. We want the help of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD to be regarded as constructive, not destructive. Our aim is to help in the building up of an industry which is, as the trite saying is, still in its infancy. These being our sentiments, it is with regret that we notice a tendency on the part of recent entrants into the Independent manufacturing end of the moving picture field to be somewhat precipitous in their releases. We lay this charge not against one or two or three, but against at least the best part of a dozen new manufacturers. This may read somewhat sweepingly, but our criticism is well supported by facts.

It is, as we have pointed out over and over again, no easy thing to make a moving picture technically, artistically, dramatically up to the standard required. Over and over again we have pointed out that the competition of quality has set in with unmistakable severity. The newer entrants into the Independent manufacturing end, while they may realize this, certainly in our opinion fail to grasp the difference in quality that exists. We regret this. We regret that little more time, care and attention have not been paid to certain first releases going the rounds of which probably better things were expected. In the moving picture field to-day reputations are made with astonishing rapidity. They are destroyed just as quickly. That is why in this article we wish to be understood as exalting those manufacturers who have recently made their appearance to be as careful as possible to insure that their pictures, especially their early releases, are of the standard of puality that no reasonable objection can be taken to them by any intelligent exchange or exhibitor and above all this, by that great public upon whom we all rely for ultimate success.

Raw Film for Independent Manufacturers.

The contest that has recently broken out in the Independent ranks with headquarters respectively on Fourteenth street and Twenty-fifth street, has not been without its picturesque incidents. There has been alarums and excursions, wars and rumors of wars, marchings and counter-marchings, and all the strategic, but innocuous evolutions of a war-like political campaign,—a kind of North and South contest. Take your choice, reader, as to which is North and South, Fourteenth street or Twenty-fifth street.

These commercial upheavals, changes and disturbances have their humorous sides, especially in relation to the many rumors, true and false, which are in circulation as to the intentions of opposing factions. If we were to print all that we have heard said of the Sales Company by the other side, and of the other side by the Sales Company, we should convert the MOVING PICTURE WORLD into a serio-comic publication which would have the appearance of being edited by Baron Munchausen, who, as the reader, of course, knows, is the greatest imaginative liar of history.

But there was one rumor that was recently extensively circulated and which we felt it our duty in the interests of the Independent side of moving picture making to take very serious notice of. It was this: that the raw film stock of Messrs. Lumiere was absolutely under the control of the Sales Company, who, by that means, hoped to command the Independent situation. This rumor was sedulously circulated by responsible men in the business, presumably for the purpose of frighting the associated Independent manufacturers into submission or flight. On reference to Messrs. Lumiere, we find that there is no foundation for the rumor. They have not handed, and are not likely to hand, over their raw stock to any one concern. Nor, we believe, will G. Gennert, or the Ansco Company.

Throughout the past year there have been several similar attempts made and Mr. Chester Freeman was the author of one of them, to obtain control of raw film. This, of course, would simply be for the purpose of corraling one side of the market. We are glad to see that these attempts have failed disastrously in every single instance. We hope they will fail disastrously in every other instance. If we were to give our real reasons for these aspirations, we should probably be twitted as being rude. So enough said.

The Independent side, as a matter of fact, is well supplied and is likely to be well supplied with raw stock. Besides Messrs. Lumiere, who import their own film, there is the Austin-Edwards film marketed by G. Gennert; then again the Agfa Company, that is, the Berlin Aniline Works of 215 Water street, New York City, have for some time past, marketed positive film, and are about to introduce negative film, thus placing a future supply at the disposal of the Independent manufacturers. Then, we hear of another brand of negative film of the non-inflammable kind which is likely to be placed on the market very soon.

Unwarranted Wholesale Condemnation.

It is with great regret that we have again to notice the severe censure of moving pictures by a Judge. The wide publicity with headlines given to these strictures by the daily papers is commanding great attention. It becomes us, therefore, as the leading organ of the moving picture world, to take notice of these various proceedings and cause it to be well known where we stand and what our views are on these important matters.

In the first place, we call public attention to our previous utterances in these columns wherein we have shown unmistakably that we cannot for one moment tolerate (to say nothing of defending) those whose vile exhibitions bring the whole moving picture business in contempt. Magistrate Frederick B. House says: "Ninety-five per cent. of the moving picture places in New York are dens of iniquity. More young women and girls are led astray in these places than in any other way. It is there you will find low, degraded young men, and when young girls go there I do not see how it can be for any good purpose."

It was bad enough in the first instance to have moving pictures themselves of such a nature as to merit condemnation, but it is shamefully worse to have moving picture places described as "dens of iniquity." We therefore desire to be first in asking for a general "house-cleaning."

True reformation and regeneration come from within, otherwise the law deals with wrongdoers from without, and while we have no power or authority in any of these matters, we pledge ourselves to use the great and widespread influence of these columns to propagate within the moving picture world a high standard of morality, with the desire and ambition of bringing to perfection the valuable uses of the living picture.

We also take this opportunity of assuring the authorities of every kind of our interest in and hearty co-operation with every effort to elevate moving picture work, hoping that by so doing there may be a speedy weeding out of that obnoxious element which brings odium upon an otherwise educational, profitable and pleasure-giving cause. If, unfortunately, there are those upon whom these efforts of reformation are lost, we do not hesitate to say that we hope the law will do its work. We fail to see any reason why the obnoxious moving picture shows should not be treated as the theater when its plays are justly censured, a practical illustration of which was recently given in this city. We are glad to call to notice that the magistrate in his criticism did not entirely condemn moving pictures. This, of course, he could not do. The small percentage of good which his remarks admitted show that the evil is attendant upon and not inherent with the moving picture. The fostering of this good is part of our policy, and we appeal to moving picture people everywhere, for their own good, to help us in this work. It is to the interest of all parties that in New York City, as in all parts of the world, that under whatever circumstances the moving picture appears it shall be well and favorably received and become popular with both authorities and the public.

Its prosperity is then assured, for everyone knows that what the people love they cherish and support. On the contrary, what grows to be despised, the overthrow. Let not, then, the temporary gain of a few dollars in the hands of unprincipled, uneducated, moral-lacking, cheap showmen, jeopardise the best interests of a valuable art.

The attainment of the highest results should be the ambition of all our associates in every field of labor, science and art in moving picture work, and all may be assured that in the good work they will find no more able champion than the MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

Since writing the above, the evening papers announce that the above named Judge has this day sent to the workhouse an eighteen-year-old ruffian who used the moving picture resorts as a place to exploit his mischievous nature, causing the magistrate to again call attention to the evil he had only the day before condemned. We can only add that we trust that convictions of this kind may have a salutory effect upon this class of people, as also upon the class of people who run the resorts they frequent. We further hope that a copy of this paper containing these our views and expressions may come into the hands of the authorities, judicial and educational; also we should like to know that every moving picture exhibitor in the country might read these lines. We feel sure that there is not a right-minded man in any way interested in moving picture work who will disagree with our views and purposes.

Picture Personalities.

MRS. ARMAND KELLERMAN.

Editorially, in next week's WORLD, we shall speak approvingly—as, indeed, who would not?—of the refining and elevating influence which women are having in the moving picture field to-day, and simultaneously with this announcement, we have the opportunity of presenting to our readers a picture personality of the opposite sex: that of Mrs. Armand Kellerman, a friend, who has lately arrived in New York from Sidney, N. S. W., Australia, for the purpose of taking an active part in moving picture work, in which she is somewhat interested in Australia.

Mrs. Kellerman is already vicariously known to fame, in virtue of the fact that she is related to the renowned Australian diving Venus, Miss Annette Kellerman, who, although of Australian birth, has made her chiefest success in the United States, a country which is always ready to welcome, acknowledge and reward talent or ability of an exceptional nature. The lady who is the subject of this notice, has only been in New York a few days, but in that short space of time has, with remarkable alertness of mind and decision of character, acquainted herself with the position of matters in the American moving picture field. It is, perhaps, regrettable that her arrival should have coincided with the outbreak of hostilities between Twenty-fifth street and Fourteenth street. In other words, the Sales Company episode. No doubt, she will learn much about the political upheaval as even we, who are growing somewhat used to this sort of thing, are doing. Mrs. Kellerman has on hand several other business enterprises, but she is aprticularly interested in the moving picture end of things, and it is probable that she will open up an Australian agency for several American and European-made [illegible] she is well qualified by business ability, training and breadth of outlook to succeed in this enterprise. We have pleasure in welcoming her into the cosmopolitan picture field as we always do bright minded men or women who enter into the field for the good of the business and for their own material advancement.

GEORGE L. BARROWS.

This very excellent portrait of the genial G. L. Barrows, will, no doubt, be welcomed by the thousands of friends he has made from Coast to Coast, from the Lakes to the Gulf, in the course of a twenty-year career in photographic and moving picture work. Originally associated with the late firm of E. & H. T. Anthony & Co., he next represented the optical house of Carl Zeiss in this country. More recently he has been identified with the Berlin Aniline Company, whose well-known Agfa products he has marketed with great zeal and ability. So much so, that he has made them popular all over the United States. The sale of these products has brought him into prominence in the moving picture world, wherein the negative and positive film stock of his company are rapidly acquiring a great reputation. Mr. Barrows is the possessor of that valuable asset to a business man, a genial personality, on which account he is both respected and liked. Then his methods are clear, straight-forward and manly, another series of valuable assets to a business man. We are glad to include him in our little gallery of picture personalities, because, as we have said over and over again, the moving picture field has plenty of room for straight-forward, honorable men of business. George L. Barrow has youth on his side. He is only thirty-three, so that a long and prosperous career is probably before him, and it may reasonably be expected that he will have it. We wish him every success.

AN EVENING IN A BROOKLYN MOVING PICTURE THEATRE.

By Rev. William Henry Jackson.

Specially written for the Moving Picture World.

Desirous of proving the nature of an ordinary moving picture theater from the standpoint of a respectable citizen who takes his family with him, the writer visited one in South Brooklyn, for which a dime admission is charged. The general appearance of the place, in a business section, was not really objectionable, comparing favorably with adjoining stores. The "show" was what is commonly called clean, and there were certain entertaining features which many enjoyed and doubtless felt they had passed a pleasant evening. Measured by the true standard of the mind and memory, upon reflection I found little profit and noted several things which would have been best left out and the time and space given to something more valuable. The repertoire consisted of seven numbers, beginning with "The Clay Baker," representing a fairly well acted play with the usual moral.

The title of the play is a poor one, as lacking any descriptive explanation, young people could not understand how it represented the struggles of an old potter in his years of endeavor to manufacture an unbreakable article. In a pottery district its points would have been appreciated, but these were lost upon a city audience—had it been possible to give even a five-minute explanation the scene would have been valuable; lacking these its best points were lost, especially to the young.

An illustrated song, "Dreamland," exceedingly sentimental, very exaggerated and poorly sung. The colored pictures were, however, excellent in coloring and showed a great advance in color picture work.

"On Time for Business" proved a good laugh maker. The young man, a late riser, in his struggles to dress and get to business on time, meeting with many impossible accidents, greatly aroused the hilarity of old as well as young, and gives an opportunity for a good laugh, as much as the ridiculous situations created as in the fun derived therefrom.

"Two Lovers and a Coquette." This is a typical French scene, clever in its execution no doubt, but baneful in its effect, especially upon the young, who, not understanding this peculiar phase of French life, ask questions which it is hard to answer—indeed, in answering they must needs be told that which it is best they should not know. The adult audience seemed indifferent; the whole represents a life so entirely un-American that it was regarded only with stolid curiosity as to the outcome. The whole thing gave no pleasure, was positively unprofitable, in that there were several vivid lessons in deception, was hard for parents to explain to children, therefore it became entirely unwholesome.

"Elastic Transformations." This is both good and clever, besides being mirthful. The magician is always a welcome addition to an evening's enjoyment. The moving picture makes possible more seeming impossibilities than were at the command of the unaided magician or conjuror of former days, the result being a round of wonders, inexplicable, instructive to those who wish to look at them intelligently and fun provoking. "Elastic Transformations" are very good.

"The Kid," an abrupt title for "the pranks of an indulged boy." There is something of a pleasing comedy in this, the pranks of an indulged boy need not be called bad—boys will be boys—and, when as a result of these "American boy" performances, a motherless, father-indulged boy brings into his home a new and evidently worthy mother, the subject is good and may be enjoyed, as indeed it seemed to be by the audience.

"A Child of the Sea," a tragic sea story, lacking its chief lesson in the need of a few words of explanation which might easily be thrown upon the screen. Throughout this story a few words of explanation in addition to the simple, brief announcements, would have given great value and made it instructive; without these it is very ambiguous to young people, especially when two interpretations may be possible to any scene, one good and one bad. Too often the natural mind sees the bad, whereas a word in season will direct to and point out the good. The sea waif grows to womanhood; is placed in great temptation and is rescued from a moral death, even as in childhood she had been rescued from a physical death. The moral is good; the development, for reasons stated above, poor. If these defects can be remedied such stories as these can be made profitable.

A reflective summary of the whole after a short period of time whereby the writer might only write after mature thought to dwell upon, shows that as a whole the entertainment is "spotted," and not even good in spots—bad in spots. Everything about the moving pictures themselves might be classed as good. The two glaring defects were the introduction of a questionable subject, and lack of timely explanation in those subjects where a few words would direct the mind to a right comprehension of the best lesson possible from the picture. Of the young people present there are at least two classes, those with parents and those without parents. A "show" cannot be called "good" or first class when parents have to act as explainers, censors or moral filters to their children; and if parents are not there and an unrestrained, unexplained scene is left to interpret itself, evil is a more natural result than good; under such conditions any film which shows a view of life after the manner of a French love scene where a series of unexplained deceptions are presented, the suggestion is harmful. If instead of "Two Lovers and a Coquette" some really intelligent subject to counterbalance the legitimate for making pictures had been introduced the Brooklyn dime exhibition would have been more commendable.

THE TALK OF THE TOWN.

That immensely fine comedy "The Peace Maker," which the Vitagraph Company released last week.

The realism of the battle scene in "'Mid the Cannon's Roar," the best war picture ever done by the Edison Company.

The joke on the conductor on a car on the East Side by members of the Biograph Company. One of the props needed in the production of "A Child of the Ghetto" was a street car in the tenement house district. The Biograph producer "borrowed" one so deftly that even the conductor was unaware of it. But he was a gallant chap and tried to shield the poor but pretty factory girl from the (Biograph) policeman. When the action was so real that the onlookers did not know that a moving picture was being taken, what must be the pleasure to be derived from this intense Biograph drama when it is seen on the screen?

The librarian of one New England Public Library, in his annual report, attributes a falling off in reading to the popularity of the moving picture houses. Another librarian noticed a marked increase in the call for certain works that have been filmed. When doctors disagree, who is to decide?

VAUDEVILLE VITIATES THE PICTURE.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

Memorial Day with me, as with many others who read this article, was a day of disappointment. It rained on Memorial Day. I am told that this is a feature of the 30th of May. The superstitious may reason, or rather delude themselves with the pious belief, that nature is in sympathy with the country in mourning for its honored dead. Anyhow it rained. If I am not mistaken, it rained last year. I know it rained two years ago. On that day I simply flattened my nose against the window pane and studied nature through sheets of H_2O, meditating on things in general and nothing in particular. This year I passed a considerable part of Memorial Day in talking picture politics. If the Sales Company has done nothing else, it has got itself talked about. I suppose this is a good advertisement. Innumerable people who a few weeks ago were ignorant of the politics of the moving picture, are talking Sales Company, are talking associated Independents, are talking "fillums." New people are coming into the business all the time, and those who are the recentest of "new chums" have a nice intellectual problem before them in unravelling the inter-relationship and standing toward each other of the three parties in moving picture politics to-day—the Patents Company, the Sales Company, the Associated Independent Manufacturers.

Do you remember the story of the actor who had a holiday? Do you know what he did with that holiday? It was only an afternoon's holiday. He went to a theater and saw his brother and sister Thespians act. Then, again, there is the equally funny story of the London bus driver. After many years of driving his ramshackle old bus, he got a day's holiday. What do you thing he did with it? He took an omnibus ride and sat beside a friendly driver. A third story of course related to the waiter-man, who also had a holiday and spent it by going and helping a brother waiter to do the "Yes, sir; comin', sir," business at a restaurant.

This prepares you for what is coming. Myself on the evening of last Memorial Day, feeling the need of an evening's change, I went to enjoy the picture entertainment, but I came away saddened and disappointed. I cried aloud in my sorrow, and in the hearing of my companion, a lady: "Where on earth are pictures to be nicely seen, properly shown, in New York City? Is there a picture house, per se?—a house running the picture by itself, for itself, in the center of things in New York City, that is, between Fourteenth street and Fifty-ninth street?"

The theater I went to not many months ago gave me pictures, songs, and lectures. It gave me, say, an hour of good pictures, probably fifteen minutes of song and lecture. Now it gives me ten or fifteen minutes of picture and about fifty minutes of rotten, contemptible, revolting vaudeville.

This is the burden of my complaint—a complaint that has been made before, and is best repeated in the interests of New York managers and proprietors and operators of moving picture theaters. You are disgusting, you are repelling a large section of the public who would be firm and consistent patrons of moving picture theaters by interjecting vaudeville of such ridiculous nature that I have heard audiences openly jeer at it. Better, I should think, give a good program of pictures with only a bi-weekly change instead of a daily change sandwitched between thick chunks of vaudeville, the stupidity, stiltedness, artificiality and antiquity of which is only equalled by parallel quantity, or rather lack of quality, characterizing the talking plays of which I wrote last week.

The fact of the matter is the picture is a novelty, and always will be a novelty, because it is based upon the concrete realization of one of the most wonderful phenomena in the natural world, namely the persistence of vision, a function of human sight. What is more wonderful in the world than light and the phenomena of light? Each day that we rise from our beds this wondrous thing is presented to our eyes. We live in and by light. Without light we could not exist, and when we go to a moving picture theater and see those exquisite productions on the screen, we know, or if we do not know we at least feel, that fundamentally it is light which has made those pictures. Even the small child if nine or ten seems to have some little foreknowledge of what will come to him in later years, namely a realization of the real meaning or explanation of the amazing phenomenon on the screen which, as it were, transfixes his childish face with its childish wonderment, on the moving picture before him.

This is the moving picture end of things. This is the truth and the philosophy of it. Is it not a disgusting shame, then, for those of us who love the picture for its own sake here in New York City, when we go to leading moving picture houses and have to endure the stupidity, the inanities, the crudities, sometimes the indecencies and the obscenities, of cheap low vaudeville? Do, for the love of heaven, Messrs. Exhibitors of New York, cut out this obnoxious part of your entertainment. Do appeal to the higher instincts of the public, trust the public, give the public of your best in the way of pictures, songs, music, lectures if necessary, but make the picture the chief item in your program. Exalt it, dignify it, respect it, reverence it. Put it in the most beautiful musical setting you can. Surround it with the best possible accessories, decorative, aesthetic, refined, and you will find as surely as the rising of to-morrow's sun that the public, the great generous public which knows a good thing when it sees it, will respond to your efforts to entertain, instruct and please it, with what it wants, and what it is asking for,—the picture at its best, for itself and by itself.

Now, do not write any letters to this paper and say that you are obliged to put in vaudeville because of "so and so and so." Don't, if you ever meet me, tell me any cock and bull story about the picture not being strong enough by itself to draw the public. It is strong enough in other parts of the world, in Australia, Britain, France, it is strong enough in other parts of the United States, as these columns testify over and over again. If it is not strong enough in New York City, it is not the fault of the city, and its people, it is because, as the records of Broadway show each year, as they are showing right now, that New York managers have not got brains or wit enough to give the public what it wants. Amen!

This past week we were pleased to receive a visit from Mr. H. R. Raver, of the Motograph Company, of Baltimore, Md. Mr. Raver showed us several of his advance releases (both negative and positive), and we are very pleased to perceive in them very high technical and artistic quality. Indeed, it is seldom that first made pictures incline towards such very high technical excellence as these Motograph releases.

Springfield, Mass.—A. L. Page and Victor Trembly have leased a large store on Exchange street and started to alter it into a moving picture house.

In one of the police courts of Greater New York during the past week a man was arraigned on a charge of brutally beating his seventeen-year-old daughter. The fact that in the assault the girl's nose was broken apparently received only passing notice of the court and reporters. An arraignment of moving picture shows received the most attention. In justification for the assault the father pleaded that his daughter was wayward; that she refused to obey him; went to parks and moving picture shows with strange young men and returned to her home at late hours. Of course, no young girl should behave in this manner; neither should a father resort to punishment by such violence; nor does it appear reasonable that moving picture shows should have been scored as they were by the Justice who presided at the hearing, if the newspapers reported him correctly. All officers and administrators of the law should receive the heartiest commendation in every movement directed to the maintenance and defence of morality in a community, particulrly where young people are involved, but it seems hardly justifiable for anyone to so sweepingly indict picture shows as the newspapers say they were at the hearing of this particular case. The comments attributed to the court by the newspapers were most severe; in fact, it hardly seems creditable that they were correctly reported. The court is alleged to have said: "I wonder how any respectable girl can go to a moving picture show. More young girls are led astray in these places than anywhere else. The shows are a blot and a stain on the community. They are frequented mostly by degraded young men and boys, and young girls do not go there for any good purpose. Ninety-five per cent. of these shows should be suppressed, for they are sinks of iniquity."

The unrestricted character of this language impels the belief that the court's remarks were not taken verbatim by the reporters and with the commonplace eagerness so frequently manifested by the daily press to get a rap at moving picture shows the sentiments of the Justice were garbled to suit one purpose. Nevertheless, the facts do not support the arraignment. It is true that many moving picture places in Greater New York are not properly conducted and should not be in existence and they are patronized by people, young and old, and of both sexes, who seek such resorts. Respectable young girls do not frequent them knowingly, and should they unwittingly get into them they do not go there again. Such places are "a blot and a stain on the community," but they by no means number ninety-five per cent. of the existing moving picture shows, not by any means. There are in the neighborhood of six hundred such shows in Greater New York. Is it fair to assume that all but about thirty of these are "sinks of iniquity"? Such a proposition is ridiculous in the extreme. Without the least trouble I can count off more than thirty places running picture shows that are operated by respectable, law-abiding citizens, who guard the sanctity of their homes and their families as jealously as any other citizen of the community and who would not allow even their names to be associated with questionable resorts, much less conduct them.

It is not fair that such people should be thrown under a cloud by unqualified charges, nor is it fair to make the general assertion that young girls do not go to picture shows for any good purpose; nor do we believe that the court to whom the remarks are credited intended to say so, or did say so.

* * *

The statement that more girls are led astray in moving picture shows than anywhere else, is also weak in face of existing circumstances, if people will take the trouble to look into them. Time and again the writer has been in such shows and witnessed the ejection of men who were trying to force their attentions upon girls and women. Can more be expected of a management, and would the ejections be made if the places were of the character charged? If the true source of the downfall of girls and young women is sought, turn to the many dancing "academies" in the city. Seek out the scores of Raines law hotels. Go to the "assemblies," "shadow dances," "annual reunions," "anniversaries," "benefits" and like affairs where the spielers congregate. Visit these places and no sensible person can doubt the responsibility they bear for girls and young women going astray. The truth is that the wayward girls who float into the limelight conceal their visits to the places named by telling their parents they have been to picture shows, and so the latter is indicated for demoralizing their morals.

To further demonstrate the injustice of this last attack upon the picture houses let me impress the point that as reported by the newspapers no distinction was made as to their management, location or reputation. Too much such sweeping charges one must assume that they are all alike. They are not. Nearly all the theaters that formerly gave straight vaudeville shows and have since supplanted them with pictures are under the same managements as before the change; the houses are conducted under the same stringent rules and the audiences, both as to respectability and numbers, are the same. What are known as picture houses embrace many grades. A large number of them are in the same grade of respectability as the transformed theaters. The capital invested in them is too great to permit the managements to incur an unenviable reputation. The comfort, entertainment and protection of their patrons are the box-office keynotes. There are other places known as nickelodeons, nickelettes, etc. While many of them are not as pretentious as the others I have mentioned, they are not the less respectable, and any person who is not disposed to seek or court evil influences or associations may patronize them with perfect freedom and every assurance of safety. Some of these last mentioned places are not of this character, as already admitted. The community would certainly be better off without them, but their existence should not be used as a club for indiscriminate assault. They have, in a measure, been responsible for many evils, but not by any means to the extent that the dance halls and Raines law hotels have. For better proof of this, seek the fallen ones in the Tenderloin and neighboring districts. Scores of them have time and again told of how they started on the downward path, and they have not blamed the picture shows, either.

I have repeatedly pleaded that the moving pictures be given a fair show, and I do it again. Do not jeopardize the legitimate business interests of law-abiding citizens who are conducting respectable places of the most popular entertainment of the day by throwing upon them a blanket of unqualified charges. Surely they have been harrassed enough in the past by municipal regulations that have taxed their purses and bound them so securely that they were, figuratively speaking, like the unfortunate offender of ancient times who paid the penalty in the stocks. All the municipal departments of the city have had a whack at the poor picture man. The Electrical, Building, Police, Fire and Health departments, with the energetic and persistent co-operation of the Board of Fire Underwriters, and a quite frequent turn by the Tenement House Department, have led the picture in a merry waltz towards perfection of details. To guard against the protection of life, limb and property no page of law books, or pamphlets of department regulations, have escaped inspection, and the picture man has toed each scratch like a little soldier. Those who found the pressure much stronger than their bank account went out of business. The tearing down of this part of a building and building up of another, tearing out of wiring and rewiring, fireproofing this and strengthening that, has almost driven the managers to asylums for the care of overburdened picture men. To-day the moving picture projecting machines are so burdened by devices required by the various regulations that they look more like an aeroplane than the delicate piece of mechanism the makers made them. With automatic shutters, flame shields, top and bottom magazines for the full reel and the rewinder, and various minor parts have entailed great expense to the picture man, not to speak of the non-inflammable film. Everything demanded by the authorities, even to the leasing and even buying of adjoining properties to afford the means of egress demanded, the managers have complied with. Everything is fireproof but the operator.

Still the battery is not available. He must yet contrive some means to make himself impregnable on the moral question. Perhaps, when time is hanging heavily on his hands, some alderman will introduce an ordinance providing that, under penalty of life imprisonment, no picture show manager shall admit anyone to his place without first requiring the person to subscribe to a register an affidavit that the patron is of good moral character and is entering the show merely to be entertained by the pictures, and not by any of the other patrons.

Referring to municipal regulations brings to mind a suit that has been entered in the Supreme Court of New York. A man claims $25,000 damages for the death of his thirteen-year-old daughter. The proprietors of the Lincoln Square Theater are the defendants. In descending an aisle while the house was darkened the girl tripped and plunged against the balcony rail, which was so frail the child was precipitated to the orchestra floor. The place was formerly a straight vaudeville house. The miserable balcony rail escaped the vigilance of the municipal departments until this child was killed. Now the officials are raising a hue and cry about the present criminal code being ineffective in cases of this nature and they urge that the lack of safeguards in many moving picture theaters be made the subject of official inquiry. Great! The horse has been stolen, but lock the door anyway. But why again make the picture man the goat? Why not look after the safeguards of other theaters? The Lincoln was a straight vaudeville house until but a short time ago. In this case it seems quite clear that if official inquiries, or the inspections that are supposed to be made, had been attended to at the proper time, the child would not have met her death. The codes are not as much in need of amendments as inspectors are of animation. Perhaps that accounts for more inspectors being found around picture machines than elsewhere.

POSTERITIS.

By F. H. Richardson.

Here in New York City a new and startling disease has sprung up. Applying a descriptive name to it seems something of a task since one will insist it should be "Color-Madoritis," another will suggest "Poster Bug," while a third will insist that just plain "Damphool" best describes the malady.

The writer, however, is inclined to think that "Posteretis" fills the bill better than anything else as a descriptive term to be applied to the new, strange affliction that is rapidly fastening its fangs on New York City moving picture theater managers.

It must be admitted that one or two neatly printed, framed posters adds to the attractiveness of the average theater front, besides giving the prospective patron an idea of what particular brand of joy awaits on the inside. It does not follow, however, that because one or two posters look well, half a dozen or more are going to thrill the passing throng with admiration or cause them to be bitten by the Buy-a-ticketus bug. Nay, nay, Pauline! Not so! On the contrary, a front plastered over with posters—posters on the walls, on the ticket office, on easels and on a line extending across the front, presents almost anything else than a pleasing, attractive appearance.

In the amusement world the great spread or banners almost invariably proclaims the sideshow—the fake. At any rate such a display immediately predisposes the average man or woman to look askance and wonder when he or she buys a ticket whether or no they will, later on, have cause to remark sotto voce to themselves, "stung!"

The writer has heretofore pointed out in these columns the fact that it is the quietly rich, dignified front that predisposes the passer-by to enter; not the garish, poster-plastered, cheap-looking, tawdry get-up, supplemented by a shrill phonograph or leather-lunged barker. If the show is really good the regular patrons will very soon discover the fact and the casual passer-by will enter more readily if the front be decorated in a quietly rich way, than if it be plastered with cheap looking posters in all the colors of the rainbow.

The writer has, here in New York City, on Fourteenth street not far from Broadway, counted sixteen posters on one front at one time. Nor was this all, since, in one instance at least, but three of the posters really had any connection with the films that made up the programme. The rest of this marvelous color display was a lie! Time, time and again have I passed fronts carrying five, six and eight posters, some on the walls, some on a line strung across the front and others on easels. How awful it looked! Whether the [illegible] was a fake or not the front said it was pretty enough! [illegible] passing [illegible] well and usually transit [illegible] the other would not have been so bad though even then it is doubtful if more than two posters can be seen to advantage on any storefront [illegible] or more than four on a front of larger size. [illegible] need for multiplication since two will usually cover the front pretty well. Be that as it may, the displaying of posters on [illegible] being almost entirely confined to a color scheme, or a color motif. Pretty nearly all of the best will adjust the harmonies of any house in terms of tone and not only will it have the individual theme but it will adjust the business as a whole.

ADVERTISING A MOTION PICTURE THEATER.

By J. C. Sweet.

The motion picture theater can be successfully advertised, or it cannot, just the same as any other business. It is possible to waste an ad, that will attract and hold the attention of your prospective patrons, and give them the impression that your entertainment is just the kind they want to attend. Then it is up to you to give a show that will create in them the desire to call again.

The size of newspaper space to be used should altogether depend on local conditions, and each manager must judge for himself what size ad will give him the best results. A four inch single column ad will give ample room for the display of the name of the theater, price of admission, location, etc., as well as a list of the films to be shown. Some managers do not change their display ad at all, giving a list of the films as news item in another part of the paper, while others change their display every time they change the film.

A short synopsis of the feature film, set up to look like a news item, with the announcement of the theater at the end, will attract the attention of many people. Talks about the quality of your entertainment will attract others, and little bits of information about the personalities of the players, the making of the pictures, etc., will create in some people the desire to see the player or incident mentioned.

Above all, do not "knock" or exaggerate, for when you "knock" a competitor you actually help to advertise his theater, and when you exaggerate the facts you destroy the feeling of confidence which you must create in your patrons to be truly successful. A patron will think more of your theater if there is more to the entertainment than was promised, while, on the other hand, if the complete program is not shown as advertised, many people are sure to feel dissatisfied.

With the posters that are now furnished by the manufacturers and exchanges it is very easy to arrange an attractive bulletin for your theater. If you can get photos of some of the prominent actors and actresses of the various companies they can be attractively grouped in your lobby. In the lobby, as well as in the theater itself, neatness counts, and a fresh, clean appearance will add much to the charm and attraction of your theater.

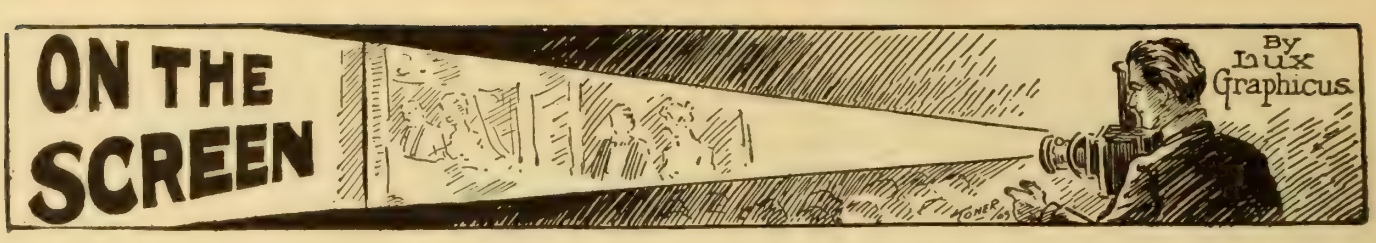
Circulars can be used to good advantage as supplements to your newspaper ads. Give one to each person leaving the theater and also distribute them carefully around your town or city. Circulars can be almost any size and any wording, some managers giving only the name and location of theater, price of admission, titles of films to be shown, etc., while others issue small newspapers of one or more pages, giving information about the theater, films, etc.

Use stereopticon slides to call attention to the coming films, contests, etc. The slides may be made to order by the slide makers, or you can make your own on specially prepared glass.

Have a souvenir day, giving away advertising pencils, a novelty mirror, fan, or any one of the numerous novelties which can be obtained. Prize contests can be used to good advantage in many ways. Several of the slide makers are making puzzle slides which can be used for a contest.

The exhibitor must decide for himself what forms of advertising he will use, but if he tells his story in plain, common-sense language, and states the actual facts, he will find that his advertising appropriation will bring good returns.

Carl Laemmle, in the best of health and spirits, arrived in town this week on his way to Europe, with his family. Carl says business never was better, and he must be well satisfied with the outlook when he can take so long a holiday. Incidentally he remarked that agencies for Imp films had been established in all European countries and the demand for them was so great that arrangements had been made for the printing of the positives in Europe.



Glenn H. Curtis was not quite near enough to me to acknowledge the salute that I offered him as he swept down the Hudson at an altitude of many hundreds of feet on Sunday morning, May the 29th. It is the first time that I have seen an aeroplane in actual operation. I stood on the banks of the river just by Grant's Tomb, which, as my readers know, gives one a splendid view right up the noble Hudson.

It was by the merest accident that I formed one of the comparatively few people who saw Curtis pass. Shortly after eleven o'clock, in the course of a morning's walk, I heard a passerby say to another, "He has just left Yonkers." In a flash I knew that the "he" meant Curtis, and that Yonkers was only a few miles up the river. So in a few minutes I secured a point of vantage whence to catch a sight of the famous man bird.

* * *

Then in a little while a tiny speck was seen to loom up the river above the hills. This speck gradually grew larger and larger, until at length an excited remark was heard: "There he is!" The man and his machine were distinctly seen silhouetted against the sky. The intrepid aviator and all the details of his machine were visible to us and the hum of the motor could be heard. So he swept through the air at sixty miles an hour and in a few minutes was lost to sight. I guess that as he passed where I stood he was some seven or eight hundred feet above the water level. Even I, with my imperfect vision, could pick out some of the details of the machine.

It is an eerie, creepy sensation, that of seeing an aviator in full flight for the first time. You feel somewhat inclined to turn away in a half-formed expectation that man and machine must inevitably fall to the earth. It is all so strange, so unreal, so wonderful. It is hard to realize that motor power can be exercised so high up in the air and the dirigibility of the machine rendered absolutely certain. However, there is the phenomenon, wonderful as it is.

* * *

While I was looking at Curtis sweeping by, I seemed to feel the duplicate of a sensation that I experienced many years ago when I saw Captain Baldwin, the renowned parachutist, make his first ascent in England. Up went the balloon, then one saw the speck of a man in a folded parachute, dropping from the car aerostat. One's heart went into one's mouth. But in a trice the parachute had expanded, and the man bird sailed gracefully down from the sky in a transverse direction and finally landed in safety.

Now, why am I referring to Curtis and his flight in a moving picture publication? Simply because none of the stationary photographs that I have seen of him are satisfactory. They show him and his machine without motion, and motion is essential, I take it, to a proper understanding of how man and machine comport themselves through the air. As I looked at the man-bird passing down the Hudson I had a mental hope that some enterprising film maker was taking moving pictures of this wonderful phenomenon. So far, however, I have not heard that such was done.

But an ordinary moving picture, that is to say, a picture made with a lens of the short equivalent focus of, let us say, three inches, could hardly do such a subject as this thorough justice. Last year in the Moving Picture World it was pointed out that the time would arrive when the telephotographic moving picture would become a necessity. In other words, that the equivalent focus of the taking lens must be considerably lengthened in order that larger pictures of distant objects can be obtained. This can only be done by the adoption of the telephotographic principle.

I could quite see that, as Curtis sailed down the Hudson, if a moving picture machine were turned upon him, having a telephotographic attachment to the ordinary lens, thus very considerably lengthening the equivalent focus of the combination, you would get not the small dot which an aviator usually represents in a picture, but a very much greatly magnified image, in which the details of the machine and the man and his actions would be visible. The moving picture is doing so much for popular education nowadays that it surely will not be long before the little hint I am giving will be adopted, if it has not already been adopted.

I may be wrong, but I believe the only pictures taken of aviators at high altitudes show them merely as silhouettes. Of course, there are many pictures of aviation machines in flight at comparatively low altitudes, but then, as the element of risk is comparatively slight in these ventures, the pictures lack supreme interest. What we want to see, of course, is the picture of a man like Curtis 1,000 feet high, with his nerves at their tensest, and the machine responding to, conflicting with, or dominating the air currents at that great height. We want to follow the man through the air on the moving picture screen. Who will show us this life size?

THE AMERICAN KINOGRAPH COMPANY'S RELEASES.

It is safe to assume that the projection room of the American Kinograph Company, of 124 East Twenty-fifth street, New York City, will become a popular rendezvous for that section of the trade which is interested in the Independent side af the moving picture field. There is a beautiful projector there, which is in the hands of Louis Kleiman, an operator who certainly knows how to show a picture in excellent style. He is intelligent, willing and obliging, and treats his machine with all the tenderness with which a man treats a favorite horse. We like an operator to love his machine, because, if he does so, and if he understands it, he is almost sure to throw a good picture. In this respect, then, the American Kinograph Company are certain to secure suffrages of the renters and exhibitors to whom it is appealing, because it is not always the case that pictures are well shown in importers' and manufacturers' projection rooms.

There are at least three Kinograph releases which are slated for early exhibiton and which we think will convince the renter and the exhibitor that this company has command of a series of pictures of exceptionally high quality. There is, first of all, the picture entitled "Lieutenant Rose, R. N.," a Clarendon subject which has created immense interest and excitement amongst all those who have seen it in the company's inspection room. This film shows how a young officer and his bride-to-be are undergoing a series of adventures at the hands of modern brigands, and are rescued by a battleship from which both a searchlight, working on the shore indicates the peril of both the sailor and his lass, and a really practicable gun, play leading parts. The scenes in this film, which is 960 feet in length, are indescribably thrilling. Fancy a band of modern pirates putting a young officer on board a small ship and then scuttling it. You see the doomed man struggling against the inrushing waters; you see him half drowned in the sinking ship before the rescuing party arrives. And then the intense realism of that gun work from the battle ship. It shoots down the piratical rascals who are pulling across the water for dear life. Of course all ends happily; but before this stage is reached there are very many thrills which, if we mistake not, will arouse the enthusiasm of every moving picture audience of this country before which the picture is shown.

Much comment has been made on the inefficacy and inefficiency of the English comedy picture when presented before an American audience. The British and Colonial "Drowsy Dick's Dream" will entirely put to rout the misconception that has hitherto existed with regard to the alleged inability of the English makers to make comedy subjects suitable for this market. Drowsy Dick, poor fellow, is a tramp who fell asleep and dreamed a beautiful dream. Dick dreamed that he rescued a Queen, and that the Queen fell in love with him and promoted him to the position of King Consort. Dick's adventures at the beautiful court and amidst the gaily attired noblemen and noblewomen of the country, would, we are convinced, make a cat laugh. And then the intense pathos of the denouement. We are shown the nuptial chamber of her Majesty with King Dick in attendance upon his royal bride. But before the moment of all moments arrives poor Dick wakes up to find that it is only a dream. We do not hesitate to say that this will be an intensely popular comedy subject amongst the American Kinograph Company's releases. And to use the popular saying, there are others.

This company is importing a very large number of high class subjects of a similar character and it is, in our opinion, superfluous to say, that when the exchanges, the renters and the exhibitors and the public see these pictures, they will have a very strong chance of making a great name for themselves.

A NEW SCHEME.

And now comes the Itala Film Company, says the Kinematograph Weekly, of London, with a new (patented) scheme which, if practical, would immensely cheapen the cost of film subjects to the exchange and, presumably, therefore, to the exhibitor. In brief, the company proposes to place four pictures on the standard film in the space now occupied by one. Each one of these tiny pictures are to be of a different subject. A reel will therefore carry four subjects. The aperture of the machine is to be covered by a plate which will close all but the space occupied by one of the pictures, viz.: one-fourth of the aperture. The pictures of subject No. 1 will occupy the upper left hand corner, so that with an aperture allowing of only their exposure, only those pictures would, of course, be projected, and they would form a subject exactly the same as we have now. The film is rewound and the aperture changed to fit subject No. 2, in the lower left hand corner, and again we have a full thousand (or the length of the film) feet of an entirely different subject. Again the aperture is changed and still again, giving 4,000 feet of pictures on the same film which now carries but one subject. That is the scheme and but for two things the writer sees no reason why it should not work perfectly well. But one of these two things will, I fear, prove an insurmountable stumbling block, viz.: the fact that the light must be concentrated on a spot one fourth the size of the present aperture. Now for a small picture not requiring strong light this might easily be done, but where one is projecting a picture, say 14 x 16, I rather fear that such concentration of light would set any film on fire instantly, though running at normal speed. Mind you, the same light strength would have to pass through the smaller aperture to project a picture of given size having equal brilliancy as now passes through the standard aperture, and when you attempt to force such light intensity through an aperture ¼ of an inch by a trifle less than ¾ inch the heat will, by comparison, be enormous. Unquestionably, given a high grade condenser, the light could be put through, but what of the danger from fire? Another interesting thing in this connection is: how small can a photograph be made and still be capable of projection with clear, sharp definition? The writer does not know. At first glance, however, he would imagine it would quadruple the magnification of every imperfection in the film, and the granularity of the emulsion would make it almost impossible to get a sharp image on the screen. I may be all wrong in this respect, however, but that is the way it looks to me. If the scheme really is practical it would effect an enormous saving, since we would have four complete subjects on one reel, thus not only saving the extra cost of three reels of film stock, but also reducing shipping charges correspondingly.

PATHE LIBERALITY.

Theaters and exchanges should be very grateful to Pathe Freres for the generous treatment handed out to them last week by this concern in connection with the films of the late King Edward's funeral. A portion of the film was sent by mail from England on the "Mauretania," and on Thursday morning, the 27th, Pathe Freres had received the film, with the exception of two important sections. Two of their employees spent three hours searching in every department of the post-office, endeavoring to locate this missing package, without success. Ultimately on Friday the package was delivered to them, it having by error of the post-office been placed among the second-class mail, although first-class postage had been paid.

Pathe Freres could have worked Friday night and expressed the film on Saturday, but a delay they considered would be prejudicial. They were unable to keep their promises as to delivery owing to this unfortunate delay, so they handed over their orders to the Vitagraph Company of America, whose film had arrived on time.

When you consider that Pathe Freres had four operators specially taking the negative for several days in London, it will be seen that they made a great sacrifice. In addition, they had gone to expense in advertising and obtaining orders for the film. It may also be stated that their film was most complete. It showed the scenes at Buckingham Palace at the time of the King's death, the proclamation as King of George V., and scenes during the lying in state at Westminster, in addition to the scenes in connection with the funeral processions in Westminster, London and Windsor.

AN EDUCATIONAL FILM.

A wonderful film, and the first of its kind is to be released by Pathe Freres on Monday, June 12. The film is entitled "Sleeping Sickness," the dread fatal disease so common in Central Africa, which, up to the present, all eminent doctors have failed in being able to remedy. In order to obtain this micro-cinematographic film, Pathe Freres a year ago placed their laboratories in Paris at the disposal of Dr. Jean Comandon, so that he might make his experiments and pursue his researches on their behalf. A number of observations through the microscope of the blood of a rat previously inoculated with sleeping sickness, form the subject of the film. The rapid multiplication of the trypanosomes and the rapid progress of the disease are clearly shown, and serve to inoculate the lay mind with a far better idea of what sleeping sickness is than the most simply worded treatise on the same subject could do.

PATHE FRERES AGAIN SCORE.

When Hammerstein opened his roof garden on the Victoria last Monday he discarded his old moving picture machine and installed a Pathe Professional Model. He some months ago installed one of these machines in his Victoria Theater, but had intended using his old machine for the evening Summer shows on the roof, but the Pathe Professional Model gave such a far superior picture in his theater, that he decided to install a second one in the roof garden, for we all know Hammerstein always wants the best. He has already secured as his headliner Mlle. Polaire, the French artiste, so famous for having the smallest waist in the world, and has billed her far and wide, but she has already, probably unknown to Hammerstein, appeared in many a less famous house in this country, for Pathe Freres have already used her in several of their pictures.

BIG AIRDOME NEAR Y. M. C. A. BUILDING.

J. H. Hallberg, 30 Greenwich avenue, New York City, has installed Motiograph No. 1 and dissolving outfit, double lamp "Hallberg" Economizer and four flaming arc lamps for the big airdome which has recently been opened up by E. G. Cahn, at Fifty-seventh street and Eighth avenue, New York. This airdome was opened last week, and Mr. Cahn had a band of 18 pieces the first night. It is next to the Y. M. C. A. Building, and Mr. Cahn expects to keep open in the afternoon, and has provided a large tent for the purpose.

The Yankee Film Company, 344 East Thirty-second street, New York, announce a special for their first reel. This is a special negative that they have procured of James J. Jeffries on his ranch, a reel of about 800 feet, portraying perfectly the unbeaten heavyweight champion of the world, going through his regular daily routine of pleasure and work on his much talked of alfalfa ranch.

First we see the big fellow and his wife welcoming a party of guests arriving in their automobile for a day's outing, followed by several scenes on his property, the beautiful pastoral settings such as are only found on the far West. The following pictures let us in on his secret of physical culture training, such as driving, milking cows, raking and pitching alfalfa hay, then tossing his fair guests on top of the hay wagon and driving off at a furious pace to the barn.

The big fellow demonstrates his power and agility to his friends by pulling off numerous athletic stunts and by the playing of practical jokes on his guests. Then we see our champion toiling as a laborer, laying irrigation pipes through his vast acreage, after which he and Mrs. Jeffries partake of as the apple of his eye catch a dozen pullets for dinner, for his own healthy appetite and that of his guests.

The closing pictures show James J. Jeffries and Mrs. Jeffries speeding their departing guests after a most enjoyable day's visit.

Exhibitors, don't fail to get this reel. If your exchange doesn't get it for you, wire us and we'll wire you where you can get it.

TONING LANTERN SLIDES.

[The following formulæ for toning lantern slides are due to Ernest Marriage, F.R.P.S., a well known English photographer and one of the best makers of lantern slides in the world. Many of the formulæ are also applicable to moving picture positive films and we recommend them to film makers for experiment.—Eds. M. P. W.]

Most of the experiments, the results of which are detailed below, were made upon slides which were brown in color. Slow lantern plates, but not chloride plates were used. It is important that the slides be thoroughly washed, and it has been my invariable practice to harden the gelatine in a bath of formaldehyde (40% commercial solution 1 part, water 8 parts), for five minutes, after which the slide is rinsed and dried before toning.

Toning by a Single Solution.—Some reducers affect the color of a slide—the Howard-Farmer reducer and ammonium persulphate—the action is probably due to sulphur toning.

Ammonium Sulphide. 1.—P. B. solution 1 dram, water to 1 oz. The simplest and nastiest toning solution; all operations should be carried on out of doors. The first alteration in color is in the direction of blue; a brown slide turns blue black, but longer soaking changes the image to brown. Very little alteration in density. Perhaps very slight increase. The colors obtainable are good, but in no case warm.

Schlippe's Salt. 2.—Though antimony in some form is presumably deposited, the action is chiefly a sulphur toning.

Sulphantimoniate of Potash.....	15 grains.
Ammonia	1 or 2 drops.
Water to	1 ounce.

The color of the toned wet slide is misleading. It appears a warm brown with increased density, but when dry the color is a bluish slate, very similar to what is produced by a weak bath of ammonia sulphide.

Ferguson's Copper Solution. 3.—The bath is made up as follows from three 10% solutions: sulphate of copper 75 parts. neutral potassium citrate 570 parts, are mixed, then 66 parts of potassium ferridcyanide are added. The opacity of the slide is not altered but the color of the deposit is changed to a distinct red, whilst browns of various tints are obtainable if the toning is stopped at earlier stages.

Iron Process for Blue. 4.—

1 ounce 1% solution ammonio-citrate of iron.
1 ounce 1% solution potassium ferridcyanide.
95 minims glacial acetic acid.

The solution is a deep blue color and can be used over and over again. After standing some time it will separate, but this does not affect its action. Before using shake the bottle. The slide tones rapidly in this bath to a full blue color; the color is rather crude. For most subjects it is best to leave a trace of the original silver image unaltered, in the case of a brown slide this plan gives a greenish tint. The subsequent application of an alkali alters the color of a slide toned in this bath, ammonia gives a blue black, whilst soda carbonate produces a brown and at the same time reduces density. To preserve the tint the slide must be varnished as soon as dry in the case of ammonia.

Ammonio-Citrates of Other Metals. 5.—Solutions of copper, cobalt and manganese can be made up in a similar form to No. 3. My results, though interesting, were of no practical value except with the first mentioned metal.

Gold. 6.—

Ammonium sulphocyanide	10 grains.
Chloride of Gold.....	1 grain.
Water to	8 ounces.

The color of a brown slide turns towards blue black with slight gain in density. By pushing the process to its limits a blue color is reached which is suitable for frost and snow effects or seascapes.

Platinum. 7.—An acidified solution of potassium chloroplatinite has no apparent effect on a slide. I tried potassium chloroplatinite 2 grains, hydrochloric acid 30 minims, water to 1 oz. The addition of a trace of chloride of copper bleached the slide. Mr. Somerville's platinum toning solution changes the slide to a warm brown. The formula is:

Potassium chloroplatinite	2 grains.
Mercury bichloride	1 grain.
Citric acid	9 grains.
Water to	1 ounce.

Bromide of potassium was omitted and hydrochloric acid 30 minims took the place of the citric acid in my experiments. The opacity of the slide is increased. If after washing a developer is applied, the color is changed to a strong purple black with considerable increase in density. See Fig. 19.

Other Toning Solutions. 8.—Chlorides of other metals may be used to tone slides. Copper, iron, mercury and nickel in dilute solutions turn the color of a brown slide towards blue. Any solution which, when sufficiently strong, will convert the metallic image to a salt, forms a toning bath giving blue tones, but a weak solution must be used, otherwise the action is too rapid and the slide is bleached. I may instance in this connection iodine, potash, ferridcyanide, and the acid bichromate of potash given below. In every case considerable reduction in density takes place, and the blue color obtainable is not pronounced. Formulæ 4 and 6 are to be preferred.

Bleaching Methods. 9.—

Potassium bichromate	5 grains.
Hydrochloric acid	10 minims.
Water to	1 ounce.

Wash the bleached side until the yellow stain is removed.

10. Potassium iodide	40 grains.
Iodine	4 grains.
Water to	1 ounce.

Wash the slide to clear the stain. The image is converted into silver iodide, yellow by reflected, brown by transmitted light and increased in opacity. A solution of iodine in methylated spirit has precisely the same effect. Light does not alter the appearance of the image, nor does an ordinary developer.

11. Copper chloride	44 grains.
Hydrochloric acid	10 minims.
Water to	1 ounce.
12. Ferric chloride (P.B.).....	15 minims.
Hydrochloric acid	15 minims.
Water to	1 ounce.
13. Bichloride of mercury.....	¼ ounce.
Hydrochloric acid	15 minims.
Water to	5 ounces.
14. Chloride of nickel.....	44 grains.
Hydrochloric acid	10 minims.
Water to	1 ounce.

The action of all these metallic chlorides (11 to 14) is very similar at the outset, the image being converted into a white deposit. The slide should then be thoroughly washed. In the case of 12 a rinse in dilute hydrochloric acid (1 part, 60 parts water) is necessary. It is also desirable with 13. The mercury bleached image is not affected by exposure, but is of increased density, and warm brown by transmitted light. The other three formulæ give deposits of chloride of silver which darkens on exposure. The color after full exposure to sunlight generally inclines towards pink, or in a strong slide to violet and purple; 14 gives a more purple tint than the other two. Baths 11, 12 and 14 reduce density; the amount of foreign metal deposited in the image being probably minute, the alteration in color is chiefly due to the controversion of silver to silver chloride, and of a developed to a printed-out image. Chlorides of cobalt, manganese, tin and zinc are inert.

Potassium Ferridcyanide. 15.—The exact strength is immaterial. I generally use a saturated solution. When the slide is thoroughly bleached, which can be judged by the appearance of the image through the glass, it is washed until the yellow stain is removed. The image is a creamy white and density is diminished, the slide is only useful n so far as the color may be altered by chemical means, exposure to light and application of developers produce no change.

Treatment of Bleached Slides, made by 15.

16. Chloride of cobalt.....	44 grains.
Hydrochloric acid	10 minims.
Water to	1 ounce.

A greenish deposit in the image. After sunning, the general effect is brown. The results are unattractive.

17. Copper bath, 11. No appreciable alteration until the slide is sunned, then good pink tones. Density reduced.

18 .Iron bath, 12. Slide rinsed with acidified water. The slide is changed directly to greenish blue, identical result to 4.

19. Iron protosulphate, a 5% solution.

Gives fine purple black color immediatelv. The image viewed by reflected light has a blue appearance similar to 4. It seems probable that iron is deposited, whilst the silver is reduced to the metallic state. The high-lights keep clear, and the process gives great increase of density. Rinse in a weak acid bath and then wash.

20. Manganese chloride	44 grains.
Hydrochloric acid	10 minims.
Water to	1 ounce.

Not much alteration in appearance by increased density. After sunning, the image is slightly tinted pink, but the general appearance is white and opaque, as with 13. Not a useful process.

21. Mercury bath, 13. A white deposit is added, on seasoning the color of the slide changes to brown.

22. Nickel bath, 14. Results were similar to copper (17) color, slightly bluer. Experiments were tried with other metals failed to produce results. Uranium in the case of zinc possibly there was gain in density, but as subsequent staining failed to produce any indication of pink in the deposit, it is most probably inert.

Bleaching by any Process, then treating with

23. Schlippe's salt, bath 2. The resulting colors are very warm yellow browns accompanied by increased density. Bleaching with mercury (13) gives the greatest strength. Potassium ferrocyanide (15) appears to be an orange tint. Iodine (10) is a satisfactory method.

24. A dull green can be obtained by partly bleaching in 15, treating 23, then, after washing, toning in 4. See Figs. 15-16.

Ammonium Sulphide. 25.—Slides toned by this process are affected by solutions of metallic chlorides, but the value of such methods is very doubtful. Ammonium sulphide following iodine 10 gives good brown tones.

CHICAGO NOTES.

"A Night On the Coast," "Monastery in the Forest," "Mountain Lake" and "The Marriage of Esther," a few near future releases of George Kleine, are all subjects replete with beautiful scenery. The uplift of the films to-day is due to such magnificent scenic productions and educational reels as these, and it seems to be the policy of the Kleine people to lay great stress on this matter in their selections, which are always the best obtainable.

E. W. Lavezzi has a method of his own of putting steel teeth on worn-out sprockets, which saves not only the price of a new sprocket but also the price of a star and arbor on some makes of machines. There seems to be no other method, at the present time, of putting teeth on the intermittent sprocket without increasing its weight. The extremely low cost of repairing sprockets by this method makes the invention a most practical one, and the everlasting durability makes Mr. Lavezzi confident of its future success.

The steel tooth bands are pressed on, then turned and milled with the rounded tooth, which makes the sprocket practically in one piece. Old, worn-out sprockets may in many cases be made better than new by this most practical method. Mr. Lavezzi has evinced his confidence in this process by his offer of ten dollars to any Chicago operator who can put his repaired sprockets out of order by doubling the speed of the machine.

The afternoon of Decoration Day we dropped into the Pastime Theater to see the Lubin picture, "A Veteran of the G. A. R." This picture was well received. The second subject, however, was one that was hardly suitable to the audience that gathered on Decoration Day to see a picture concerned with an old soldier, as was the Lubin subject. This picture was an old Pathe—old enough at least, to be returned to the manufacturer, called "A Lucky Husband," and deals with the adventures of a woman who goes to meet a lover and imagines that she sees her husband in everybody she encounters, until at last, frightened, she returns home, to find it all a dream. This picture has been denied a police permit in Washington, D. C., and certainly should not have been selected for exhibition to the mixed crowd that attended the Pastime on that day. This picture is hardly to be considered an example of Pathe's work, which is always of the highest quality, and we think that the management of the Pastime showed poor judgment in taking it out of the exchange; the more especially so, as there are very many subjects which are much more suitable for holiday exhibition than this is. One instance that we can name is from the same maker, now about five months old, which was shown at this same house some time ago, namely, the film, "A Well Earned Medal," which, though a foreign picture, is very well adapted in sentiment to the day, and offers excellent opportunity for the pianist to do good work, as she did when we saw it.

The Pastime has adopted a novel method of advertising its show in advance. In the lobby is displayed a card on which are posted the names of the first two films which have been booked for the week, with the names of the makers and the days on which they will be shown at the Pastime. This scheme has some advantages and some disadvantages as well. When the claimed and the imagination [illegible] are harmonious it will enable them to look [illegible] to keep away from the other fellow's programme, but, on the other hand, if they are inclined to [illegible] it possible for the competitor to practically duplicate the [illegible] program. [illegible] remarks apply to any two houses only, with six changes some other time, things could be [illegible] as the competitor of the man [illegible] booking could lead him to [illegible] a change [illegible] would lead to [illegible] which mean extinction of one or the other [illegible]

A Vanflex [illegible] screen has been installed on the Ashland Theater, on West [illegible] street, near Ashland avenue. This is the only [illegible] on the West Side at the present time. In placing this screen, Mr. Power has put it at the extreme rear of the stage, which has several advantages. It leaves the stage available for other uses if it is desired to so use it, and it improves the appearance of the picture to those who may be seated in the front rows by increasing their distance from the screen, as is well known, seats near the screen are not the best for seeing moving pictures. Mr. Power advertised his [illegible] rather heavily, with 500 one sheet posters and 10,000 small hand bills. It seems to have paid him, [illegible] he has a full house at every show. Also, vaudeville has been cut off of the bill, without any great loss of business, the program of the Ashland now consists of two reels of good pictures and two songs, which is quite sufficient, as they are well presented. The Ashland itself is a rather long house, with interior decoration in terra cotta and buff, and seats 900.

The only competitor the Ashland has is the Grand Theater, only half a block away, which also runs pictures only. This is a nice little house, showing three reels, [illegible] ately, they seem to get rather old films, as two of them were very rainy, though the third was in good condition. Still, they are doing good business, and had a full house most of the time.

NOTES FROM BROOKLYN.

A warning has been sounded from a Brooklyn pulpit to mothers that they keep their young children away from moving picture places, because, it was declared some of the pictures shown, particularly those depicting crimes, have a demoralizing effect on the young mind. The clergyman admitted that most of the pictures were pleasing, but said the objectionable ones did creep in and do a great amount of damage among the young.

Admittedly pictures of the sort mentioned have an evil influence on children much the same way as the dime novel and cannot fail to arouse some imaginative boy to a deed which would bring shame and disgrace upon himself and family. In the same class with the pictures mentioned are those which depict the death agonies of some unfortunate creature. There were recently exhibited before an audience composed largely of children in a Brooklyn moving picture place three separate death scenes on the same reel, with all the attendant writhing and agony on the part of the victims. At the same place and on the same evening every other picture thrown on the screen was climaxed by the death of one of the characters. It was a veritable chamber of horrors. What is there elevating in such pictures and what can they arouse but the most morbid sentiments? The effect is nauseating to an adult, therefore it must be harmful to a child from whom scenes of this kind should be hidden.

Any proprietor who descends to the use of such pictures to get an audience, no matter who they are made by, is an enemy to society. However, the method of making these unworthy exhibitions is not by warning mothers to keep their children from the moving picture places as has been done by a Brooklyn clergyman, for the children will probably go anyhow, but to strike at the root of the trouble by protesting to the Board of Censors that all the pictures they O. K. are not fit for juvenile entertainment.

L. J. R. HOLST JOINS THE LUBIN COMPANY.

We are pleased to hear that our old friend, Mr. L. J. R. Holst, formerly of the Ozark Camera Co., New York, has succeeded to the position as manager of the Experimental Department of the Lubin Company. We have followed Mr. Holst's career for the last fifteen or sixteen years. He was one of the pioneers in the manufacture of Reflex cameras. He is a man of great executive and mechanical knowledge, and in welcoming him into the moving picture end of things we are convinced that he will be a decided acquisition. We wish him every success in his new position.

OPERATOR'S COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

How to Tell A. C. from D. C.—Lowell, Mass., writes, "What answer would you give to this question: 'How can you, or would you tell alternating current from direct before connecting up your lamp?' Please dont mention polarity indicators, water test or volt meters."

If Lowell is asking this in good faith, well and good, but it must be remembered that the purpose of this column is to give aid to operators and managers, not to solve puzzles, as such. There are several ways, beside those named by Lowell, by which A. C. may be distinguished from D. C. before connecting up. You can touch one pole of the switch with one hand and the other with the other hand, thus taking a "shock." The alternation will be plainly felt. You may make a magnet by coiling one of the wires several times and inserting a small bar of iron in the coils. Hook in an incandescent lamp to start current flowing and if it be A. C. the iron will vibrate with the alternations. Also there are other ways but this is, I think, just a little out of the province of the Column, since it can, I believe, be of slight practical benefit to anyone. In any ordinary case one can step to the phone, call up the light company and find out, look at the meter, if one is there, look for a transformer (not there if it be three wire system and not sure if two wire parallel system) or one can find someone to give the necessary information in three minutes, so why bother testing at all? Moreover you can get a shock in two seconds and that will tell you.

Inside Decoration.—Mt. Clemens, Mich., asks for decorative scheme for his theater. Sends sketch and says it seats 430 people. Has 18 inch stucco moulding at top and walls are flat.

I think, Mt. Clemens, unless you were to employ a high class decorator, you would be able to procure a much more satisfactory effect by the use of papers than by use of paints. It is quite possible to work out some really beautiful effects in paper, and effects which by no manner of means look cheap. Whether you use paint or paper, however, use burlap for the dado, either of shade to correspond to walls or plain burlap to be painted after it is put on. No matter whether paint or paper is used, block out both ceiling and walls in panels. If paint is used you may secure, from any decorator, stencils suitable to properly decorate the borders of the panels. If paper is used there are many panel decorations possible. As to the color scheme, there are many, but a combination of dark red dado, russet or dove colored walls, with panels of a lighter shade and ceiling some light, complimentary color will look well as also will dark green dado, lighter green walls with very light yellow panels (greenish yellow) and ceiling same as panels will look well. The stucco moulding may be the same as the walls or panels and picked out in bronze paint. I will put you in touch with a paper house which makes a specialty of paper decorative schemes for churches, theaters and halls.

Licensed and Independent Releases.—Cleveland, Ohio, asks how many reels the licensed and independents put out weekly, also "how they are rated as to the number of exhibitors to the population of the city."

The licensed manufacturers are putting out about 30 reels per week just now, and the independents 21 reels. The claim of the licensed manufacturers is based not so much on quantity as on quality. Superiority in this latter is disputed by the independents, however, and in this matter the writer refuses to be interviewed. His wife can pull his hair sufficiently to keep it growing. No need to get the manufacturers taking a yank at it. Your query concerning rating is not clear. I don't exactly know what you mean.

Not Square with the Screen or.—Ardmore, Okla., Leroy Bickle, Mgr. Theatorium Amusement Company, writes: "Will you please tell me what is the trouble with my picture. It is out of focus about two feet on left hand side of the screen. When we focus that two feet the rest of the picture is out. Have had three different objective lenses but it is the same with them all. Also would like to know if you are the Mr. Richardson who was manager of Laemmle's Memphis exchange, from whom I used to get such encouraging letters when I took service from that house at Oklahoma City. Hoping to see my questions answered in the best paper in the world, I am, with best wishes, Leroy Bickle, Mgr. Theatorium."

I am inclined to think your machine sets to one side of the house instead of facing the screen squarely, neighbor Bickle. If not, then you will have to tell me what make of machine it is and even than I may not be able to help you, though I certainly will try. Propositions like that are sometimes very tough ones unless one is right on the ground. Yes, I am the guilty man! I remember you well, too. Glad to hear from an old friend, though we never met personally.

Lens Puzzles—Aberdeen, Wash., writes: "A new house has started here. The throw is 96 feet and he wanted a 12 foot picture. I figured that he needed an eight inch lens and he got one. It did the work all right, but we had to hold it about three inches from the machine to get it to focus at all. With my own machine I throw a 13 foot picture at 78 feet. According to figures my lens should be 6 inch, but according to measurement it is but five. My lens throws a 17 foot picture at 96 feet. His lens will focus only as above while mine will focus at any length. Will you kindly explain this for me. Will the table of lenses you were going to get out be in the book the World is printing?"

Friend Aberdeen, you ask me to explain something that I doubt if the Bausch & Lomb folks themselves could offer intelligent information on. Lenses are darned queer things. I may say, however, that the projection lens will only focus when its back lens is away from the film a distance equal to its equivalent focus, which amounts to the same thing as the first statement, exactly. As to the discrepancy in measurement and figures I cannot offer any explanation. Lenses, as I said, are queer things and one finds them doing the most unexpected, queer freaks only too often. The rules I have given from time to time are the best that can be given, but I do not recommend them as entirely reliable. As to your statement that your lens will "focus at any length," I don't think I quite understand. If you mean it will focus when placed at any distance from the film you surely are mistaken, for that would controvert all optical laws as applied to lenses. The apparent discrepancy between your lens measurement and your figures may be in part accounted for by accurately measuring your aperture with alipers and proceeding as directed in my answer to New York City, p. 882, May 28th issue. On such a small picture and so long a throw the smallest variation in aperture width must be taken into account. No, the lens table won't appear for the reason that I find it is not practical. It would call for very long focal lengths in condensing lenses and for several reasons I found their use would not be practical or even desirable. Get two 6½ and two 7½ lenses and experiment until you find which gives best results.

A Modest Request.—From a certain city comes a letter, in part as follows: "I have been appointed on the examining board of the Moving Picture Operators' Union and my time is very much taken up, especially as at the present time I am very busy repairing machines. I therefore write to ask a personal favor, viz.: Won't you please send me a list of questions, with answers thereto, pertaining to the machine, lamp and rheostat,—something that would be suitable for such an examination. I would prefer something that has not been published and will not be later on. I have written up a few, but I have not the time to spare at present, so would ask you to kindly favor me in this respect. . . ."

Now, I like to accommodate, and realizing fully that this good friend's time is very valuable, while I have nothing at all to do but lecture one hour each day, act as inspector at a large factory which turns out something like ten machines a day, write for the Moving Picture World and write for the Frank A. Munsey Company—realizing, I say, how idle I am as compared with the good brother, I shall, of course, hasten to comply with his very modest request by putting in three or four days compiling a series of questions and answers such as he desires, and will then dig down into my stamp box for about six or eight cents in stamps to send them to him. I'm surprised the brother didn't ask for more, knowing how valueless my time is. Frankly, however, a set list of questions for an examination is of very slight, or at least very doubtful value. Each applicant should be examined by asking questions which occur to one at the time, the whole tending to determine his real, practical knowledge in the following: Electricity, its terms and what they mean; figuring resistance, horse-power, etc.; knowledge of resistance, transformers, switches, wire splicing, insulation, various series and multiple rheostat connections and their exact effect in amperes, and such other things as occur to the examiner concerning electrical devices and the current; figuring lenses and measuring their focal length; what effect has "throw" on illumination, if any? What effect has size of picture on illumination? How would you set your carbons for A. C. and D. C., noting carefully how exact the applicant gets them as to side alignment and advance of lower carbon, etc. Have applicant make a splice and see how perfect it is, taking time of making into consideration. Have applicant set a shutter and explain what the real office of the shutter is. Question him concerning his knowledge of local laws pertaining to the operating room and moving picture theater. Ask him how many times the intermittent acts to each turn of the crank. Ask him what points he would look after if sent out to set up an outfit to give a show in a church and hook onto one of the church circuits. (Answer: Size of wires, size of meter, if any; capacity of transformer, if any, and size of fuses.) Ask him what he would do if he found the wires were large enough but the meter too small. Ask him what he would do if he found a transformer on the pole outside the building and it proved to be too small. Such questions as enumerated above are practical and tend to bring out the man's real, practical knowledge. Catch questions are of slight value and are not fair, anyhow. The writer will undertake to question a man and in five minutes tell you whether or no he is a competent operator or not, so far as knowledge goes, but that leaves the question of laziness, lack of interest in the business, etc., etc., still open to question, and no matter how much a man knows, if he hasn't the ambition to apply his knowledge it is of slight value to him or anyone else.

PHILADELPHIA NOTES.

If all the exchanges were conducted like the Philadelphia Projection Company they would not be kicked out from decent buildings as undesirable and dangerous tenants. We are not the only ones to say that the Philadelphia Projection Company is the safest film exchange in the country, as the fire underwriters have gradually decreased the premiums to the lowest notch. Mr. Carrick, although a smoker himself, has trained his staff to wage a strong war on smokers, and no matter who is the caller, let him be the president of the Sales Company or the most desirable exhibitor, he will not be allowed to enter the premises if he carries a cigar, a pipe, or a cigarette. The orders are so strict that even an unlighted cigar stump is not allowed in the place, and the holder of such is politely asked to leave it outside the door. No matter at what time the fire inspector may pop in, he will never see a sign of smoke and is sure to find everything in perfect order, with no reels exposed, except the ones on the rewinders. The Philadelphia Projection Company is a very busy place, and if you want to talk business, never call in the morning, as the staff is too busy delivering reels. As a rule, all the exchanges claim that Mr. Exhibitor is a general kicker, but this does not seem to be the case with the Philadelphia Projection Company as the numerous exhibitors that you are sure to meet every morning seem to be delighted with the service, have a broad smile and are always ready to crack a joke instead of finding fault with the service. We will not say that Mr. Carrick buys every independent production, but he buys largely of every production fit to be shown on a screen.

As film exchanges are not welcomed in good buildings, the Eagle Film Exchange, after a fruitless search for larger quarters, have decided to remain at the old stand. With a number of alterations they have succeeded in improving the old quarters and have better facilities for an increasing business.

The Philadelphia Film Exchange have made a very good move in taking the offices at 934 Arch street, vacated by the old Mutual Motion Picture Supply Company.

Geo. W. Bradenburgh is the only independent who does not seem to pay any attention to the present muddle. He is not on the side of the Sales Company, nor on the side of the insurgents, but forms a faction by himself and is too busy in his extensive importation and exportation of films to worry himself with the regrettable split in the independent ranks.

The Penn Motion Picture Company has been reorganized under the leadership of Harry Durst and the plant entirely renovated. Mr. Durst is full of life and he hopes soon to enter the field as a new independent manufacturer.

At the Electragraff Company they were very busy printing positives for Geo. Graff, who intends to make a Western trip to place his productions before the public.

With Chas. A. Calehuff, business is very good, and the new Edison Model B Kinetoscope is in great demand and promises to be a leader. Mr. Calehuff is not skeptical; he does not worry at all the rumors circulated by persons wishing to pull down the industry, but, on the contrary, he sees everything in bright colors and he is sure of a good future that he is adding a still larger automobile to his delivery system.

The Liberty Theater Supply Company is another well-conducted licensed exchange where they seem to have no time to listen to the foolish rumors and the woes of the dissatisfied ones. The place looks prosperous, and on account of its splendid location, on a business thoroughfare, must do a rushing business.

S. Lubin is still located at 926 Market street, but it will not be long before he moves to his new factory. Fred. W. Singhi invited me to accompany him to the new plant and I was surprised to find such an imposing block of new buildings. In general, manufacturers send out exaggerated illustrations of their factories, in which they try to show more buildings and many things that they had in their mind, but never accomplished. In the present case, Mr. Lubin has been very modest in the illustrations of his new plant and I found on the grounds the very buildings shown in the Moving Picture World of March 26. Mr. Lubin will have the largest studio in the country under one single roof. He will not have the largest factory, but surely the most up-to-date plant. This new plant is not a remodeled factory or a succession of buildings added one to another, to meet the increased requirements. No. This new plant is the work of many years of experience and the plans have been carefully studied and worked out by the different department heads, while the construction has been constantly watched by the men who will have to turn out the work. As Mr. Lubin decided that no good work can be done with poor tools and as it is the ambition of Mr. Singhi to bring the Lubin films to the highest standard, no expense has been spared on the new plant. With such facilities at their disposal, the men will have no excuse for bad work, especially when under the leadership of Mr. Singhi, who has already given us proof of his ability to make a name for the films of his company. As we gave a general description of the new Lubin factory in our issue of March 26, we will wait until everything is in place and in working order to give a more complete description of the details.

It would be a good thing if our New York exhibitors could forget that they are New Yorkers and take a few trips to see what others are doing. The New York exhibitor is like all New Yorkers—he is selfish, he believes that he is the leader, that he has nothing to learn from others. Well, if the New York exhibitor would pay a visit to Philadelphia and Chicago, he would find that the two next largest cities of the United States are far ahead of Manhattan, and that if all the shows were conducted as they are in Philadelphia and Chicago, with good music, proper sound effects, clean, neat-looking houses and the cancellation of cheap vaudeville, we would have less opposition from the press, the authorities and the clergy. We cannot blame the enemies of cinematography to always hurl a stone at the moving pictures when we see New York exhibitors, who want to lead the world, make such a disgraceful show of their lobbies by disfiguring them with numberless posters of very poor taste. The shows on Fourteenth street, New York, and even on Broadway, look more like the old cheap joints of the Bowery.

Otto Miller telegraphs us that the independent exhibitors of Philadelphia have called for a mass meeting on Sunday to denounce the tactics of the Sales Company. More particulars next weeks.

Chester.—I found no change in Chester, the same number of houses running the same shows. Otto Miller of fame is still taking an understudy service. Frank Moore is still the same contented exhibitor; no matter what may be wrong, he always greets you with a pleasant smile, and his smile must be his winning card, as no one likes to enter a show place to meet a sad face. Mr. Moore claims that the country exhibitor, who has no transient trade and has to depend exclusively on his local patrons, must pay the greatest attention to his film service, machine, light and help if he wants to keep his cash receipts on the increase. The ugly posters of Fourteenth street, New York, are not shown in Chester, as they would give a cheap appearance to the moving picture theaters and chase away the patrons.

The Greenberg Brothers have enlarged the seating capacity of their theater, and as they are satisfied with the prospects they are talking of building a new and larger place.

Wilmington.—The storm of Tuesday, May 24, so badly wrecked the electric plant of Wilmington that the majority of the moving picture theaters had no power for two days. The same houses are still in existence in Wilmington and all seem prosperous, notwithstanding the competition of the Grand Opera House—not an unfair competition.

Mr. Harris, of Pittsburg, leased the Grand Opera House and placed in charge Mr. Bradfield, the well-known manager of the Family Theater, of Philadelphia. Mr. Bradfield is an experienced exhibitor; he loves good music and good pictures; he hates cheap vaudeville and he is for a polite and clean service. Mr. Bradfield shows three reels of good licensed pictures with one illustrated song. The pictures are very good and shown properly by a conscientious and experienced operator; the pianist is a master on the piano, knowing how to give the proper music and effects, while the singer is one of the best that money can secure. The ushers, resplendent in new uniforms, are exceedingly polite. No wonder that Mr. Branfield can pack the Grand Opera House.

Baltimore.—Pearce & Scheck seem very well satisfied with the business; they report many new patrons, especially south of Baltimore.

The Blue Mouse, the home of the mirror screen, has added a new feature, a brand new pipe organ.

The accompanying cut illustrates how the Blue Mouse advertises the Imp films.

In the very near future Baltimore will boast of a new industry—the making of moving pictures. It is no dream, but a reality, as I have been invited to visit the new plant of the Motograph Company now in course of construction at Dupont Park, a suburb of the Monumental City. Harry Raver, the president of the Motograph Company, seems to have the correct idea and knows that many of the independents have failed as manufacturers for the lack of sufficient capital, of practical eexperience and for trying to make pictures at an extreme low cost. As with financial trouble a manufacturer cannot pay proper attention to the details of the productions, Mr. Raver eliminated these possible troubles by securing sufficient capital to enable him to work with a free mind. Believing that the very best talent cannot work if they have not the proper tools and facilities, Mr. Raver did not stop to look at some old falling down buildings that he could remodel for a factory, but he bought a good-sized lot, on which he is now erecting a building specially adapted for his manufacturing purposes. 808 Clinton Ave., So. Rochester, N. Y.

"A Knot in the Plot" (Biograph).—A lively picture which contains much of human nature and a good deal that causes one to wonder why it is that such a twist sometimes gets into events. This is a love story and represents how it sometimes happens that a persistent wooer will win a maiden when conditions seem to point irresistibly to someone else. There are some touches here which scarcely go well with a wedding, but under the circumstances do not seem entirely out of place. Perhaps the most amusing feature of this comedy, for it is a comedy, after all, is the astonishment upon the faces of everyone when they discover that the persistent, though apparently ill favored, lover has won and that the wedding ceremony had been performed without their cognizance. Sympathetically acted with the spirit which characterizes all the work of the Biograph players, this is an excellent film, and one that contains all the elements of life and activity which are important factors in making a picture popular.

"The Brave Deserve the Fair" (Lubin).—An interesting question is raised in this picture. It is an illustration of blood transfusion, with a love story followed by a wedding as a finale. The question that arises is this: "Would transfusion of blood under such circumstances have the effect of making a couple love each other more strongly, or would they be more irresistibly drawn toward each other under such circumstances?" The brave in this instance received his reward. He no doubt deserved the fair and the audience will join in his exultation when he gets her. The physiological phases of the question had better be left to the scientists to discuss, but there is opportunity for some extremely interesting speculation in a case of this kind.

"The Sisal Industry in the Bahamas" (Lubin).—The production of sisal as a substitute for manila is a recent industry, but it meant the upbuilding and commercial development of the West Indies. This picture graphically presents the industry from the planting of the sisal to the manufacture of the fibers in ropes. Although this is an industrial film many of the scenes possess marked scenic beauty, with many picturesque touches which add materially to its interest. The colored girls and the comfortable looking colored matrons in their picturesque costumes are uncommonly attractive touches in the landscape.

"In the Great Northwest" (Selig).—A love story laid in the great pine forests and among the snowclad hills of the Northwest. A poor little country girl is deceived and maltreated against her will almost, only to discover her mistake too late. The principal interest is in the scenery and costuming, which depict phases of life in that little known territory. It brings to those who have never been in such a country a representation of a strange land and a strange people. One does not like the story, though this argues nothing against its strength or dramatic quality.

"Friends" (Kalem).—A love story illustrated by the action of one young woman who rejects a young man's proposal when she discovers that her friend loves him, too. The interest centers in the sacrifice of the girl, who proves to be a true friend. The tenderness represented is sufficiently marked to make a favorable impression.

"'Mid the Cannon's Roar" (Edison).—Perhaps one of the best war pictures ever put on a motion picture screen. There is a natural character to the various scenes that seems to stamp them as genuine, and as one sees one after another scene appear and disappear one seems to be living through something actual rather than pictured. The love story is so well told and the acting is so sympathetic that one never loses sight of it for a moment. Yet there are battle scenes which a short time ago would have been considered marvels of motion picture production. The scene in the gorge where charge after charge is repulsed; the scene in the fort where the gunners are hurling shell into the ranks of the enemy; the sudden shift of scene, showing the effect of the shells as they strike and burst; the scene in the fort after the final stand, all these are soul-stirring, emotion-arousing scenes, and keep one wondering what is coming next. Then the reconciliation of the two men, that is indeed a fitting climax to what is one of the most interesting, consistent and altogether pleasing war pictures the writer remembers to have seen.

"A Mirror of the Future" (Pathe).—Two lovers are out walking and each buys a mirror from a peddler which has the faculty of illustrating the future. What they see is [illegible] upon the screen in a novel manner and [illegible] only that a heap of [illegible] sunshine.

"A Prince of Worth" (Pathe).—Turned away by his father because he marries a poor girl, a young prince secures the leading actor in a vaudeville entertainment. His father watches the clever performance and is so pleased that he accepts his son and his fortune. Max Linder plays the leading part and some of his trapeze work is exceptionally good.

"Auntie at the Boat Race" (Vitagraph).—Here is a thrilling story based upon a Yale-Harvard boat race. It will interest because of the views of the race representing the scenery so graphically that whoever has been there will recognize it instantly. Along with it is a love story, an attempt to make Harvard lose by kidnapping one of the crew and the discovery in time to prevent. It is all life and hustle and bustle and holds one's interest at the highest pitch throughout. Such films are interesting, not alone because they are well acted, but because they reproduce life as it actually is. And one can look at such pictures without tiring.

"The Brother, the Sister and the Cowpuncher" (Essanay).—A Western story with numerous complications to enhance its interest, chief of which is a love story that almost results in a wreck of two lives through the perfidy of the girl's brother. But the picture ends well, since it establishes right relations in all instances and brings back the only wanderer to better ways. The acting and interpretation are quite up to the standard of this company, and with a picturesque setting the picture should be popular.

"The Messenger's Dog" (Gaumont).—An interesting picture of what a dog will do to serve his master, however unworthy he may appear to be. When the bag of valuables was lost the dog, though solely wounded by a shot from his stepfather master, holds watch until his master returns looking for his lost money. It is a graphic representation of canine intelligence and faithfulness.

"Pete Has Nine Lives" (Gaumont).—A humorous series of illustrations showing how hard Pete tried to find relief from his woes in death. But try as he would the machines would not work properly, and he is left disconsolate at the thought that he cannot find relief from his woes in the joys of death.

"A Sailor's Friendship" (Pathe).—A heart story based upon the friendship of two sailors, and showing that not always do the romantic betrothals of young people hold good. This story ends differently from some of these yet everyone seems happy, and the disappointed sailor, it is [illegible] leaves the lovers to their happiness and returns to his own love, the sea. Not a story that will impress more strongly, but it is interesting while it lasts.

"Love of Chrysanthemum" (Vitagraph).—A Japanese play with picturesque Japanese setting and acted by a Japanese company. It is the heart story of a young, devoted Japanese girl, a tender little love plant, married to a wealthy man many years her senior whom she does not love at all. When an American appears and makes love to her she believes him implicitly and finds great joy in her new experience. But it is short lived and she speedily discovers that he was only fooling her. Heartbroken, she kills herself as the only means of escape from an intolerable existence. The principal attraction of the picture lies in the reproduction of Japanese life and scenes by Japanese actors and in real Japanese setting. It will arouse the sympathy of the audience quite as strongly as "Madame Butterfly" arouses the emotions, and one will not be able to forget the impression. It is one of those films taken from life which are much too real for one's peace of mind and which not infrequently arouse one's emotions more than the speaking drama does. With actors far above the ordinary, with staging as accurate as careful study can make it, and with photographic effects of unusual quality, this picture will rank as one of the best the Vitagraph Company has ever produced. Its popularity will not stop with the first few days' exhibition, as the charming characters, especially the child in the leading character, around the Japanese setting is an artistic triumph and will prove unusually attractive to a large proportion of those who see it.

"The Impalement" (Biograph).—A [illegible] humorous film, ending as it naturally must it when things come to his feet. It happens to what extent the infatuation of a man for a woman will lead him. In this instance, supposing he had caused the death of his wife that he might wed the other, but as sometimes is the case the end does not make a strong impression and all who see it. The fact that a man may be infatuated with a woman not his wife is confirmed by too many unpleasant experiences of that character, but the punishment [illegible] always seem to satisfy and [illegible] tainly. Neither does the unfortunate wife always awake to a realization of her fickle husband's worthlessness in time to save herself from endless sorrow, or some desperate act which either destroys her life, or in some other way mars her future. The lesson taught so dramatically here is salutary and will unquestionably make a difference in some lives.

"A Veteran of the G. A. R." (Lubin).—A dramatic picture based upon a shock sustained by a veteran that destroyed his memory and causes a series of complications. His home is sold, but his comrades buy a part of the articles the veteran loved, and then when the Memorial Day services are done, memory glimmers for a moment, and he draws the sword from its scabbard. A certificate for a large sum flutters to the floor. The ending is, therefore, a happy one. The picture was released on Memorial Day and was a fitting story for the occasion.

"Down with the Woman" (Pathe).—A comedy having for its object a sort of travesty of the present movement in favor of women. This broadminded individual undertakes to prove his opposition to the movement, but when trouble comes to him it is woman who gets him out of his difficulties.

"Russia, the Caucasus Mountains" (Pathe).—An interesting scenic film, representing a number of the most striking sights in the Caucasus Mountains. Photographed with a full appreciation of the majesty and grandeur of the scenery, the reproduction deserves hearty commendation from every standpoint. The touches of life here and there add much to the attractiveness of the picture as a whole.

"The Mule Driver and the Garrulous Mute" (Edison).—A frontier story, well acted, and developing the astonishing fact that a balky mule team can, under certain conditions, make a mute talk. The story has some complications and is more too clearly presented. In the end the man who allowed himself to be arrested so his friend could escape, and who plays the part of a mute to save himself from the consequences, is released under very pleasant circumstances.

"The Little German Band" (Gaumont).—A mirth provoker. It is an illustration of the effect of music upon different people. But interest is enhanced by the introduction of excellent stagecraft, some of which is evidence of good management.

"Jarnac's Treacherous Blow" (Gaumont).—A reproduction of a famous duel fought on July 10, 1547, which gave to the language a new word, coup de Jarnac. When his opponent was unguarded Jarnac struck him across the back of the knees. His life might have been saved, but he would have been a cripple, and preferring death he refused all aid. Duels are not pleasant, and this one, because of the vindictive treachery displayed, is even more repulsive than the average, but because of its historic importance is really of some interest. The acting is good, and the staging accurately reproduces court and other scenes in the time of Henry II.

"The Peacemaker" (Vitagraph).—A graphic reproduction of a tiff between two young lovers. It is nothing else, but because of its heart interest and the fact that very many actual events of this sort occur it possesses a great deal of real interest. It serves, too, to show how silly and senseless most such disagreements are, yet frequently dire consequences result from such slight difficulties and misrepresentations as this. Not excepting the vaudeville, this picture was the best item on the program at Keith's on Tuesday evening. It created a ripple of laughter all through the piece which ended in a burst of applause for the clever work of the Vitagraph players.

"Levi's Dilemma" (Essanay).—An amusing picture photographed in the very heart of the Chicago Ghetto, and therefore true to life. Poor Uncle Levi gets into all sorts of trouble, partly because he will not consent to the marriage of his clerk and his daughter. After many moving incidents, heartbreaking in their effect upon him, he consents to the wedding. The interesting part of this picture is the characteristic scenes and the acting of the principal personages. Even though the difficulties through which Levi passes are to him the depth of sorrow, to the audience they grow more and more humorous as the film runs. But it all ends happily. The old man gets his money back and the young couple are allowed a wedding.

"Henry's Package" (Essanay).—Once again the company's capable comedy hero gets into the limelight and does some marvelous stunts with a variety of packages. The first package, incidental to the imbibing of a varied assortment of drinks, is somewhat influenced by package No. 2, a vase, which from time to time becomes the receptacle for a great variety of articles, including a purse containing a large sum of money. And here was Henry's salvation. Philosophically he accepts it as an intervention of Providence in his favor, and even though the vase is smashed the money is sufficient compensation to satisfy the scolding wife, and peace spreads its mollifying wings over the Henry household.

"The Navajo's Bride" (Kalem).—An interesting Indian story, melodramatic in its love affairs and the complications which surround the young lovers. It is a valuable picture, nevertheless, because its interesting love story, because it illustrates so much of the Navajo's life and places in enduring form those phases of life and character which will be forgotten with the disappearance of the race. The love interest helps, but as a whole the picture is most valuable for its reproduction of these valuable historical features and incidents.

"One Can't Believe One's Eyes" (Pathe).—A new bit of clever acting strung together to prove to a jealous Colonel that he was mistaken in his belief that his wife was talking to an officer. The various rules work and the picture ends with the Colonel settled in his belief that his eyesight is really playing him false.

"Ines de Castro" (Pathe).—A romance of the court of Portugal during the fourteenth century. A girl of the court, whose only crime was her beautiful face, was imprisoned because the prince fell in love with her. While the story is working out the audience is looking upon scenes in one of the greatest of historical intrigues, and obtains a clear idea of what frequently occurred around the courts of early rulers. Costuming, staging and acting are alike valuable contributions to the knowledge of that period, and the excellent pictorial quality completes an exceptionally attractive film.

"Her Life for His Love" (Urban).—The dramatic story of the love of a slave girl for her master and the sacrifice of her life to save his. The charm of desert scenery, with vivid reproduction of what one infers the scenery is for a background adds much to the picture's interest, though the desert court scenes and the reproduction of the court intrigues are good assistants in creating and maintaining interest. There are some scenes which will linger long in the memory, like the court, the balcony scene, the den of bravos, the grounds of the palace, the woodlands, the wounding of the slave and her death. All these are pictures well worth seeing for themselves, entirely apart from their significance in the story. The photography is unusually clear, with perfect tonal quality, even in the most difficult scenes. Altogether it is a picture which will stand out from the common run with strong emphasis.

"Making Salt" (Urban).—An educational picture, showing the various processes required in the production of seasame salt. Of course it is understood that salt is produced in a number of ways and that the method shown here is only one. After seeing this picture one has a clear impression of this particular method of producing salt. It is a valuable addition to the growing list of educational films.

INDEPENDENT.

"A New Excuse" (Imp).—A comedy in which Hemprock puts over a new one on his wife and succeeds in allaying her suspicions by announcing a trip to Africa, when he was really sent to jail. The piece has little dramatic reality, but possesses a certain degree of humor and keeps the audience feeling good as it runs. It is lively and in some respects novel, consequently it is attractive.

"A Winter's Tale" (Thanhouser).—The review of this picture in last week's Moving Picture World was a satisfactory criticism of an excellent piece of work. The present writer can add nothing to that criticism, yet he wants to express his own appreciation of such an altogether excellent work. The pictorial characteristics of the film are made a prominent feature and are never lost sight of. Every scene was set with fidelity to the original, but always with the development of the pictorial feature as an important factor. Then the acting. It would be a captious critic indeed who could discover a flaw in it. Every actor seems to appreciate the opportunities of his part and to make the most of them. Seldom, indeed, is the final scene, where the supposed statue comes to life, so well done, and involuntarily one rejoices with the King of Bohemia in the return of his lamented queen. Few, indeed, will be the releases of the month to surpass this, and few, indeed, are the pictures that seem so complete and in every way satisfactory. Mr. Thanhouser deserves the heartiest congratulations upon his success.

"Perils of the Plains" (Bison).—A reproduction of an erstwhile familiar scene on the plains where a renegade rallies a band of Indians to wipe out a family traveling alone across the prairies. In this instance they were foiled by soldiers, but in many instances they were not. As a scene from the great book of the West this picture is interesting and may give a fresh view of the perils that beset the pioneers.

"The Eagle's Egg" (Great Northern).—A strongly dramatic story of true lovers, acted with the appreciation of the opportunities of the story which are characteristic of this company's work. The films produced by this army steadily improve, and this one is no exception to the established rule.

"Foolshead Marries Against His Will" (Itala).—Another of those comedies in which Foolshead has come to be a favorite character. If there is any difficulty in the calendar in which this unfortunate person doesn't plunge it would be interesting to discover it. In this picture he is presented as a married man, though he did not want to be. It is funny enough to suit the most exacting.

"The Knot in the Handkerchief" (Itala).—A story which is lively enough to keep any audience interested from the time the first scene appears until the last one leaves the screen. Acted with the spirit that characterizes the Itala players, and clearly photographed, it is an interesting film.

"His Revenge" (Powers).—One death by starvation and another partially starved is not a pleasant subject for contemplation, though its dramatic power is not denied. However, love proves stronger than the desire for vengeance, and the man sentenced to starve is released. It is a pleasant ending for what looked for a time like a disagreeable tragedy.

"The Amateur Hypnotist" (Powers).—A very funny film based upon the stunts men will perform when under the spell of hypnotism. To see men fighting like a cat and dog is funny, and when the amateur hypnotist steps in and captures the girl in the case the audience is in sufficiently good humor to applaud him. The picture is a novelty with some because of its rough house features.

"The Tie that Binds" (Bison).—A strongly dramatic story, based upon the perfidy of a man who makes love to another's wife and uses an accidental incident to prove his unjust assertions to her. Years after she discovers her mistake, but only at the deathbed of her son, and just before she herself passes away. It is a powerful drama, sympathetically acted, and drawn true to life, but unpleasant to look at, principally because it contains so much truth.

"The Crack Shot" (Powers).—Not what its title would indicate, but a sensational marital mixup which develops some interesting complications. From the shooting and wounding involved in the picture one might believe that crack shots were numerous; but it ends happily with the worthless husband killed in a railroad wreck and the woman left free to marry the man of her choice.

"The Watchmaker's Hat" (Eclair).—A comedy made up of a series of complications based upon a husband's discovery of a man's hat in the drawing room and his prompt accusation of his wife. There are many humorous situations which serve to deepen the mystery; but in the end everything is made straight and the husband apologizes for his hasty and altogether unwarranted action. It is one of those comedies in which the destruction of property plays an important part, but aside from that is a pleasant picture.

"Life of the Alpine Shooters in the Frontier Outposts" (Eclair).—An educational film, representing some of the phases of life on the Alpine frontier. Some of the most interesting scenes deal with conditions which exist in that region of perpetual snow and ice.

"A Reno Romance" (Imp).—An amusing travesty based upon the ease with which divorce can be secured at Reno. But here an interesting complication arises, and those who are anxious to be divorced, and are in reality divorced finally, discover that they love each other, and even with the divorce papers in hand they do what every other couple similarly situated would do. See the film and be convinced.

"Proposing Under Difficulties" (Electragraff).—A humorous picture, representing the difficulty a young man experienced in proposing. Just as he was ready each time some unexpected and untoward incident occurred to prevent. Finally he proposes by telegraph, a highly sensible thing to do under the circumstances. The writer does not remember having any previous film from this house, and is free to say commendation should be the portion of the firm for its excellent work. The film is not particularly strong, but it is lively and amusing through the unexpected happenings. Acting is sympathetic and photography is clear.

"The Lily of the Ranch" (Nestor).—The handsome stranger, an automobile and a susceptible country girl, a triangular combination that has made more stories than one cares to remember, and probably will continue making them as long as the triangle exists. The handsome stranger is

IMP TRAGEDY AVERTED.

The arrest of a moving picture crank almost witnessed the real thing in Coytesville, N. J., a few days ago. One of the Imp companies had finished its work and the actors were sitting on the porch of Ferrando's Hotel. Along came James Karney, a policeman, apparently under a little liquor, it is said. He sat down near the actors and made Will J. Chatterton the subject of his remarks. Chatterton at first chided him, then ignored him altogether. Suddenly Karney reached for his hip pocket and drawing an ugly revolver, levelled it at Chatterton. Irving B. Rubinstein, in charge of properties for the Imp, was cool enough to see the impending danger, and with one quick jump reached the policeman's arm and wrested the pistol from him. The act was so quick that those about young Rubinstein did not realize how nearly they were witnesses of a tragedy. Disarmed, Karney was easily held until the arrival of Mayor Abbot, to whom Rubinstein handed the revolver. The "prop" man is the hero of his company to-day, and there's one man there who can't praise Rubinstein's heroism too highly—his name is Chatterton.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen.—After watching the Kalem release, "Fighting the Iroquois in Canada," several of our patrons remarked on the fact that the Indians, at the time the picture is supposed to represent, were fortunate owners of breech-loading rifles. I may be wrong, but I am under the impression that guns of this type are an invention not over, about, sixty years of age. With the present talk of pictures replacing the drama mistakes of this obvious character are unpardonable.

Keep up your good work in striving for accuracy.

THE EXHIBITORS' GOLDEN TIME.

Redwood Falls, Minn., May 22, 1910.

To the Editor:

I have been a silent but very much interested reader of your valued publication for some time and I long for it to arrive each week with as much eagerness as the school boy does for vacation days or the "old swimming hole." I have read with great interest the writing of different authorities. Now and then there is one I have felt like responding to, but being a little exhibitor, away out here in the Northwest, where you have to get a State map to locate me, I decided it was not my button. But you can attach a fuse to a keg of powder, light it, and no matter how long the fuse, if it keeps alive, when it reaches the powder there is an explosion. I am the keg of powder and the Moving Picture World is the live fuse, and it has reached me. I am going to explode and I only wish I was big enough, that there was enough of me, to make a loud report so I would be heard the world over, for I doubt very much if there is one exhibitor among the thousands but what will say amen to all I have to say.

In The World issued May 21, 1910, there appears an article entitled "The Exhibitors' Golden Time," which to my mind would sum up any exhibitor if he had one spark of life left in him. I appreciate the humor it gives the exhibitor in saying he is the backbone of the business. The article says besides having the pride of this position, he has had the profits and in having the profits he has had a very good time. Now I don't know much about the business. Please keep in mind what I said before, that I am only a little exhibitor. If we have had all the profits, why is our host Mr. Rentz not as rich as Mr. [illegible] is worth his millions and why don't we have anything when he started in the [illegible] business. I never heard of anyone making such remarks about exhibitors when I fail to see where the good time comes in. Speaking from my own experience, I am located in a town little town, being a county seat with about 2,000 population, and it keeps me busy thinking of new schemes to keep the people coming. It takes more than good pictures to keep things moving in these country towns, for expenses are just the same if you have a crowd or not, so if worrying is having a good time, then we have lots of it. The exhibitor is the one that has come out on top, so everybody says and by everybody we mean the manufacturers, the renters and the public. Certainly the public imagines we are getting rich because they don't know. The manufacturers and renters make the cry to add more to their already accumulated wealth. No one hears the exhibitor say he is making money unless he has an object in doing so to decoy some wandering Willie to hand over his cash for his business and get stung. I make bold to say that I don't believe there is a motion picture show West of the Mississippi in towns of 4,000 and under but what is for sale. Why? Because we are paying too much for film service now and everything else in proportion.

Now arises the question: Do we little exhibitors in these small country towns that practically use all the output of the manufacturers by putting on every day changes amount to anything in keeping up the picture industry? If we do, then take warning, Mr. Renter, that just as soon as you raise on your film, just that quick we go out of business. For we can raise the price of admission above ten cents no more than we could swim across the Atlantic. The public would simply think it was graft and quit at once. The article in question winds up with a simple illustration (and to my mind it is simple because it doesn't give full details) about a well known theater in New York City that pays $140 per week for film service and the receipts were $3,500 per week. You don't say a word about the other expenses, house rent, music, hired help, electric bill, advertising, etc. My books for the past year's business will show an average of perhaps $15 a week clear of all expenses. If that is getting rich quick I will have to be shown where it is. In closing, I agree with the writer of the article that now is the exhibitors' golden time, only in a little different way. Now is the exhibitors' golden time to stand pat for better films in every way, especially moral and educational, each one using every exertion to make his entertainment high class, catering to the best element in his town, thereby putting motion pictures on a plane equaled by none, and pay no exorbitant film rent for it either. Mr. Editor, whether you submit this to the criticism of the many readers of your valued paper or confine it to the waste basket I don't care; a part of that which was in me has come out, I have exploded and I feel better, and I hope to read the thoughts of some of my brother exhibitors.

Yours very truly,
CHAS. HUNTSBERRY.

WHERE THE GREAT SCHEME FAILED.

The meeting at the La Salle Hotel, Chicago, was a huge farce, and although I greatly enjoyed myself at the antics of a number of sheep without a leader, I kept my impressions to myself.

At the close of the banquet I did not dispute the assertion that the new Sales Company would not live two months.

I had not been present at the different meetings, but the spirit that prevailed at the banquet posted me on what was in store for the independents—a split. True enough, we had some very fine speeches; everyone praised the new combination, but it was easy enough for a man knowing human nature to see that all the cheering words were from the lips and not from the heart. In other words, most of the speakers were already planning a revolution, while talking and toasting the new Sales Company.

The leaders of the Sales Company had a very good scheme—a scheme that should have been carefully studied and supported by every true independent. There is no doubt that the Sales Company would have been a great success if the leaders had not been too sure of themselves. Yes, overconfident that they had mastered the situation, they acted carelessly and unintentionally showed their game; at least, gave good ground to certain suspicions.

The Alliance had been killed. Well and good. The blows had been so well administered that everyone, taken by surprise, did not fully realize the danger of placing themselves entirely under the control of the new Sales Company, with no association to protect the exchanges or check the doings of the leaders. As no one had realized the danger, it would have been better for the leaders to not wake up the cat. But they were too jubilant of their supposed success and they accidentally aroused the lethargy of the members in presenting a yearly memento' service for the Alliance. We know the rest, we know how coldly such a motion was received and we know that this funeral service opened the eyes of many.

Another blunder, a very serious blunder, was the farcical bidding in of a discredited newspaper and a small newspaper man as the spiritual adviser of the Sales Company. Swanson made a fair auctioneer. It was a fine comedy, well prepared and, without offending the manufacturers, I can truly say that no moving picture ever produced had been studied and staged with more care. Nothing was missing. Bankrupts, supposed to have turned every cent to their creditors, had nearly robbed jobs of large denominations stuffed in their pockets to drop in the hat. Other men well known to not pay their bills had greenbacks for the monkey. Excuse the word "monkey," but no other word can be found to suit a farce or comedy. Cartoonist Morgan made a slight mistake he should have represented W. H. Swanson as the organ grinder and he should have placed "the pearl" on the organ to represent the monkey passing the hat.

I noticed that honest business men, men paying their bills, were not cheerful givers, while the largest amount was collected from men from whom their creditors can get nothing. There is perhaps a reason. The reason is that honest men paying their bills are not the ones to cheat Uncle Sam, while the dead beats are always willing and ready to cheat anyone, as long as they can see a dollar in it. The collection was nothing else than a cheating game, as it was asked for the purpose of padding a subscription list to obtain second class rates. Many, too many, of the persons present at this outrageous begging scene got a chill and naturally raised the question that if the new Sales Company was dishonest with Uncle Sam what would they do to the little manufacturers?

The two above named points were blunders, and blunders that quickly spread dissatisfaction.

To this add the personality of the monkey. A man who "refused $6,000 for his paper!" a man who, according to his own statements, refuses daily offers from the licensed interests to remain true to the independent cause. Yet this man sold himself to another trust, abandoned the true independents that he could not force to enlist under the new independent trust.

Many honest men, men never thrown down by the Motion Picture Patents Company, men who had worked for a year to help the independent cause, men who are known to pay their bills and who have a clean business record, felt very sore when they found themselves totally ignored and when they realized that new men, just kicked out by the Moving Picture Patents Company, were placed in charge of the new Sales Company.

Is it, then, to wonder that intelligent and honest men asked themselves, in the face of these blunders, if the new Sales Company was really a scheme to help the independents at large or favor a few selected ones? Another very grave blunder for the Sales Company was to select officers in the quarters of the Imp Company.

The muddle of to-day shows that I sized up the situation very closely at that memorablee banquet. My outspoken methods did not please the schemers. The Moving Picture World was a power to be reckoned with and as it could not be controlled by a passing of the hat, a little conspiracy was hatched to discredit this paper at the Chicago meeting by exposing its Chicago representative as an unfaithful servant.

The "News" published on April 23 an article signed with my full name as the Chicago representative of the Moving Picture World.

Last Summer, when free to contribute to any trade paper, I submitted three manuscripts to the "News." Two of them were accepted and published and, at my request, my name was omitted. The third manuscript was not accepted and not even returned. These three manuscripts, written in New York, were delivered by myself as an individual before my connection with any trade paper.

In April, 1910, when it was necessary for the "independent organ" to hurt the reputation of the Moving Picture World prior to the meeting in Chicago, and to reduce me to silence, the "News" editor dug up this old manuscript. On April 13, when I was sent the proof, I wired from Chicago to not publish anything with my name or the name of the Moving Picture World. The "News" paid no attention, but published the article as coming from J. M. Bradlet, Chicago representative of the Moving Picture World.

These few facts are the plain truth and will show the character of the man in whom the Sales Company put so much dependence.

JOHN M. BRADLET.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

A CHILD OF THE GHETTO. The land of Providence is ever ready to aid the helpless and afflicted to stay the incident of infinitesimal tragedy constantly may attract celestial ken. By hook or by crook the surest and as the story of the wise goes the best of it be done, so the slings and arrows of fortune erect to greater endeavor. At the visitation of the Angel of Death to the little home taking off the poor widowed mother of little Ruth, the poor orphan realizes she must henceforth fight life's battle alone. From her squalid room in Rivington street, New York she goes through the Ghetto seeking for work. After a time she secures a bundle of work at a shirt factory to take home and finish. She completes the lot and starts back to receive the pittance with which her labor is to be rewarded. As she enters the office the same grave son of the proprietor is imploring money of his father who positively refuses to accede. The youth is desperate and while the father is examining Ruth's work he extracts several bills from his father's wallet which lies on the desk. The loss is discovered and the boy fearing detection contrives to have Ruth blamed by slyly pressing the notes in her work bundle where they are found in the search. Officer Quinn is sent for, but before he arrives Ruth seizes upon a chance to escape realizing her inability to prove her innocence in face of the convincing evidence, and makes her way to her room but as her name and address are on the books and her face has been seen by the officer, he finds little difficulty in trailing her. She eludes him however by going down the fire escape and boarding a trolley car bound for the suburbs. All trace of her is lost by the officer in the congestion of Rivington street, and when the car makes its last stop she is well out of reach of her pursuers. On she trudges until she faints from exhaustion and is found later by a young farmer who brings her to the house and puts her in the care of his mother. Here she is treated as one of the family, and her hitherto sorrow clouded existence changes to sunshine. Here she learns to smile. As time goes a strong attachment grows between the young farmer and herself until a betrothal is imminent. At this time Officer Quinn is accorded a vacation, and with a friend goes for a day's fishing at the brook that borders the farm. Desiring some milk he goes to the house to procure it. The young farmer and Ruth are standing by the well, he on the point of proposing when Quinn appears. The farmer offers to get him some milk, and while sweetening his return the officer is struck by the seemingly familiar face of Ruth. After he returns to the water's edge he still puzzles, until at last it dawns on him who she is and he goes back with the intention of doing what he deems his duty, but the couple are now betrothed and a glance in her honest face convinces him of her innocence, and instead of arresting her, he wishes them luck. The subject is of a most interesting nature, while the scenes in the Ghetto are the most realistic ever attempted.

A VICTIM OF JEALOUSY. "All other passions have their hour of thinking and hear the voice of reason, but jealousy breaks at the first suspicion into frenzy and sweeps the soul in tempest." These lines of Pierre Beaumarchais cleverly demonstrated that in this Biograph story. It shows the extreme unreasonableness of a person obsessed with this what might be termed disease. The young husband's irrational jealousy makes him suspicious of every attention bestowed upon his wife. Even the minister, who performed their marriage ceremony, making a pastoral call arouses him. They attend a social gathering, and his ill-concealed perturbation at his young wife's affability with all present spoils her evening's pleasure and finally induces her to ask to be taken home. Arriving home, a stormy scene ensues, and there might have been a separation but for the wife's subtleness in pleasing within his range delicate reminders of her own gentleness. He is awakened from his present dementia and promises never to act so foolishly again. The next morning as he is about to leave for his office he is sincere in his protestation of faith but upon returning to his library to seem some business papers, he hears a man's voice issuing from the reception room and upon entering finds his wife's milliner who has come with her hat. He orders the man out and unjustly upbraids his wife. Not only that, he instructs his valet to watch. This of course, is fine for the valet as he sees gain in it. During the afternoon lady friends of the wife call and beg her to accompany them to the art studio to look over some paintings they think of purchasing. While at the studio her friends are called away for a few moments and ask her to wait until they return. Meanwhile, the valet has learned of the wife's visiting the studio and so informs the husband. The intelligence throws him into a frenzy, and rushing home secures a revolver and leads to avenge his fancied wrong. The wife's sister sees this and hastens to apprise her of her danger. Up to now the friends have not returned and the wife is pinned in a very embarrassing position, but the safety entrance but into an entrance room from which she escapes by another door. THE SHYNESS OF SHORTY. Shorty of Bar X ranges at Lightning Pete's place. Hot Joy, the celestial who presides over the culinary department, goes to be broke at Shorty's make up. Shorty fails to appreciate Joy's joke and literally mops the floor with the said Hot Joy, whereat Bailey causes amusement. Shorty seeing Bailey laughing suspects that he is laughing at him. Bailey is quick with his apology, which he seconds with an invitation to join her. Shorty accepts and as he is about to take a drink, sees a reward notice offering $5,000 for the capture of the Trumper gang of cattle thieves, signed by Ross Turney, the Sheriff of the County. He and Bailey have some conversation about this. Finally Shorty leaves to go to visit his boss.

While he is in the barn with her horses Ross Turney and his young bride arrive and register at Bailey's. After Shorty has ministered his team he leaves the stable to go into the adobe room. Hot Joy, who is passing with a bucket of dish water, mutters some Chinese imprecations which falls upon the ears of Shorty. Hot Joy makes a quick exit but not altogether a voluntary one, for he is tightly grasped in the powerful hands of the little teamster of the Bar X.

Bailey and the young Sheriff Turney are conversing over the exploits of the Trumper gang and Turney's confidence in being able to capture them, when they hear some shooting noises in the region of the kitchen. Shorty rushes into the room excitedly gesticulating and ordering Bailey to desist the action of Hot Joy, and telling him what he would like to do to the celestial. The Sheriff chuckles, whereat Shorty turns abruptly upon him and asks him if he is laughing at him. The Sheriff tries to pacify Shorty but to no avail for he is mad all the way through. He grips Turney in his powerful hands and something startling is apparently going to take place when Mrs. Turney comes into the room. The sound of her voice stops Shorty who bows gallantly to the Sheriff's wife and is introduced to her by the Sheriff. Bashfully Shorty backs away and shows that he wishes the floor would swallow him up.

Shorty again meets the Sheriff and his wife at the dinner table. He is seated opposite Mrs. Turney and several little courtesies of the dinner table are mutually extended. While they are dining there arrives at the outer room a party of rough looking characters none other than the famous Trumper gang. Bailey meets them and is evidently in their confidence, for he immediately appraises them of the presence of the Sheriff and his wife. He tells them to wait until all is quiet, when he will signal them from the window of the hotel bar. They sneak away, acquiescing with Bailey's instructions.

Night comes on all have retired. We see Shorty coming into the darkened barroom in a despondent frame of mind. He is evidently meditating upon the fact that he will never know a woman's love. The proximity of the bar suggests to him that he drown his nefariousness by imbibing spirituous liquor. This he proceeds to do. Half an hour later we see Shorty still busy with the bottles and in a state of decidable inebriety. While he is in this condition Bailey comes down the stairway with a lighted candle and wigwags at the large window. Shorty can't quite make it out, and from his reposing position behind the bar awaits developments.

The Trumper gang enters the room and is conducted by Bailey up the stairs. They enter the room of the Sheriff and, before he can help himself, pounce upon him. Shorty in the bar below hears the shriek of Turney's wife as she is struck down by one of the roughs. He shakes himself violently, draws his two forty fours and prepares for action. His mind is befuddled, but he manages to get a hazy idea of what is going on. As the gang enters the room with the captured Sheriff and jeers him, something which the Sheriff says starts Shorty to action. In a drunken way he covers the gang with his guns. One of them, thinking Shorty too drunk to shoot straight, takes a chance at drawing his weapon, but Shorty is there with his trigger finger and the outlaw suddenly becomes a wiser man and throws his hands skyward. Shorty backs the crowd up against the wall, at which juncture Mrs. Turney comes down the stairway with her husband's revolver. She quickly releases Turney, and at this point the startled guests of the hotel enter and come to the aid of the Sheriff.

Shorty, of course, is made the hero of the occasion, Mrs. Turney showering him with expressions of her gratitude. Turney tells him that he will get the $5,000 reward. Shorty declines it and offers it to the bride as a wedding gift. This

For De Peisters one evening started to go to the theatre, getting just two members with the maid. There is a worthy woman in the house who has children, great and little, and after entering the maid to watch the babies while they have for the theatre.

We are next shown the theatre of the Newlyweds during the. Mr. Newlywed is a thirsting man and has not telegraphed up his wife to tell her that evening of the theatre party, because he has to meet him at the station and to leave the baby. Baby, however, has just retired for the night and effect upon awakens for could she out-cradles that he can come to be home during her sweet dreams when she will meet her husband. All the baby is broke.

We return to the De Peisters. The maid receives a note from her beau, Jimmy, to come to today's Hall immediately, that a dance is in progress and he needs a partner. The maid knows if she disappoints Jimmy she may lose her the chance of "getting off" so she resolves to leave her orders for a short time until she can see Jimmy and explain to him.

She is gone but a few minutes when Burly Bill and his pal slip up to the house and with the dirt up on a pantry break the window below. Burly Bill slips into the house and finds it deserted save for the sleeping infants. The sight touches his heart and he finds he cannot commit robbery where the cherubim Angels are hovering near.

By a strange coincidence they next try the home of the Newlyweds. Bill enters and to his surprise finds another deserted infant. The baby awakens and Bill of his generous soul finds the infant's bottle and administers to its every wants. He is about to leave when a happy thought comes to him. Why not remove this little one to the others of the next house? The baby seems to regard the scheme as quite satisfactory and crows approvingly.

So Bill to the infinite disgust of his pal leaves this house untouched save for the worthless kid which he deposits tenderly into the arms of his bewildered pal. Bill explains his scheme but the crooked partner, thinking Bill has gone crazy, returns the baby to Bill and makes a hurried getaway.

The Newlyweds return and find their baby has vanished. After a fruitless search the terror-stricken couple call the police.

The De Peisters are next shown returning home and discovering the maid gone and the family circle increased by one. They call the police and inform them of the unaccountable phenomenon, suggesting the possibility of some Evil Genius having visited their home and turned the maid into a baby. But the maid enters, with fear and trembling, unable to give an explanation, which is not necessary as she is followed in by the Newlyweds, who have been informed by the police that their baby might possibly be found in the house next door.

There is a happy reunion when their baby is returned to them. Then Mrs. De Peister finds a note explaining it all. It reads:

"Don't leave yer kids in the house alone.
You never can tell what will happen.

THE RANCHMEN'S FEUD. Hiram Matthews, a Western ranchman, owns an apple orchard which borders on the property of Jesse Forsyth. The former and his wife are picking apples in the orchard from a tree, the branches of which droop over the fence of the Forsyth property. Forsyth and Matthews have never been on good terms and when the former who has brooded long over supposed ills done him by Matthews, finds this latter and his wife trespassing on his property, he orders them off at the point of a shotgun. Matthews argues that as the tree is planted upon his ground he is owner of the fruit on the branches which overlap the two properties. The other man disagrees and threatens to shoot Matthews if he dares trespass. Matthews summons the sheriff, who advises him to go to law.

Matthews' son now returns from an Eastern college and, unaware of the enmity between his father and Forsyth, meets the latter's daughter. It is a case of love at first sight but Forsyth coming on the scene of the tete-a-tete, orders his enemy's son from the premises and drags the girl into the house.

Young Jack Matthews goes home and persuades his father to call on Forsyth, and endeavors to patch up the old misunderstanding. Matthews agrees and goes to the Forsyth homestead and offers to forget old misunderstandings and to be friends, but Forsyth is obstinate and refuses to shake hands.

The next day young Jack dispatches a boy with a note for Nellie, Forsyth's daughter. The note is delivered, but the girl's father, slipping quietly upon her, suspects that the note is from Jack and as he writes must inquire its contents prior to letting gleefully give.

In the end Jack is temporarily well on the road to recovery when Nellie slips tenderly into his arms and the two old men are brought together by the girl who makes them promise that in the future there will be nothing but the best of pals and neighbors.

THE NEW BOSS OF BAR X RANCH. The new boss is a woman, but that interesting discovery is not made until Dick Shirley, waiting on the station platform and looking for a man to alight from the Overland, steps in to prevent Ricardo Pinto from insulting a woman passenger. The dainty little woman asks Dick if he can direct her to Bar X Ranch and Dick is taken aback. The letter merely stated that E. R. Dunn would arrive to take possession of the newly purchased property and no one supposed that the E stood for Emily. Dick helps her into the wagon and they start for the ranch. Out in front of the ranch house the boys are sunning themselves and wondering what the new boss is going to be like. When they see a woman in the wagon with the foreman there is a hurried sprucing up and they do their best to impress the new arrival with the elegance of their manners with the result that they overdo it and become ludicrous. The new boss fits very easily into the new life and the riders fairly worship her. She is pleasant to all but it is broad-shouldered Dick Shirley who seems to be the favored suitor and this is made more apparent when Pinto comes with a note, presumably from Dick, saying that he has been hurt. She hurries with Pinto to the scene of the accident, her agitation betraying the real state of her feelings. But the note was a ruse. Pinto, partly for revenge and partly through the evilness of his passion, has plotted with some of his companions to gain possession of Emily, and when they are a safe distance from the ranch his fellows seize the little boss and carry her off to their shack in the tangled growths of the foothills. Soon Dick and the other punchers come riding up to the ranch wondering why there is no cheery word of greeting. One of the men picks up the note the boss has dropped and in an instant they are all astir. An Indian marks the trail and while the others mount he follows the telltale tracks across the country, leading eventually to the shack where Emily, bound and powerless, has been tortured by the threats and caresses of the roughs. It is but the work of a moment to release her and a second later Pinto is caught unawares and compelled to raise his hands. One by one the others emerge from the shack to be surprised into bloodless surrender and they are bound with the ever ready lariats and taken off to the ranch to be held until the authorities can be reached. Dick shares his saddle with the little boss, and when home is reached and she slips from the horse's back into his willing arms it is to rest there contentedly until one of the other riders coming upon them unawares rapes them with his lariat.

THE WILD MAN OF BORNEO. The wild man is not wild—at least when he starts out to be. Nothing could be less suggestive of wildness than the fun-loving college boy who is induced by his chums to turn professional freak. There is a circus in town and when the boys find a masquerade suit dropped by some guest at a ball, they, closing about sunrise they conceive the idea of getting one of their number up in the wild man suit and selling him to the circus proprietor as a side show attraction. Tom Hadley is something of an athlete and shines in college theatricals, so he is appointed the wild man while WHITE DOE'S LOVERS.—It is a beautiful morning in Indian Summer, and White-Doe is out in her birch bark canoe, engaged in a fishing expedition for food. She paddles home under the overhanging trees and vines, lights the small fire in front of her tepee and cooks her primitive breakfast. The air is bracing, the birds are singing, life is free and good. Also White-Doe is happy for she had caught a gleam of admiration in the eyes of a stalwart cowboy, when she visited a ranch a few days before with her offering of plaited baskets and the famous blankets of her Navajo tribe.

She begins her work of basket weaving, dreaming the love dreams of her people and her heart singing with coquetry and the happiness of conquest, for she is also loved by a brave of her tribe—a wealthy son of a chief with a hundred horses.

Feminine vanity is the same in palace or on plain, and her love of admiration drives her to the side of the stream, where she gazes into the limpid water and ceases to wonder, in her satisfaction, that she is beloved of two strong men.

The cowboy comes seeking her and finds her at the side of the stream, where they pass a happy hour. The Indian lover also seeks her this morning, but the tepee is empty and the fire is dying out. In the soft turf he knds the print of a pale-face's boot and his heart grows heavy with hate, while the sign of the Great Spirit, set in the heavens for their guidance, seems to become clouded and grow farther away. In impatience he awaits White-Doe's coming, and when she rides up on the saddle of his rival, he draws his rifle to his shoulder. The girl springs between him and the equally eager cowboy, and, knowing that she can not avert a battle, and feeling proud that two such great warriors should sue for her favor, she suggests that they fight it out with knives, her hand in marriage being the prize to the victor.

They fight, a fierce battle of hate—now with the advantage to the white man and again to the Indian. Their struggles take them out of sight behind the tepee and White-Doe awaits in anguish to see which will return to claim her. A groan, a thud and a silence tell her that the battle is over and the Indian emerges from the shadows and places her upon his horse. He takes her away to his wigwam, and at the summit of a hill she turns and looks back. All is quiet in the valley. Nothing moves save a riderless horse who noses uneasily the dead body of his master, lying cold and still by the side of the river, while a cardinal thread of his life's blood trickles down to join the larger stream.

THE STRANDED ACTOR.—This is a sentimental little story of Mr. J. Booth Walker, a stranded thespian of the "legitimate drama," who has been touring the West with a company presenting "Othello." The company has yielded to the stress of bad business and has closed, while Mr. Walker, finding no easier way to return to Chicago, is counting the ties along the railroad. He comes to a small station, where several half intoxicated cowboys are assembled, and the idea comes to one of them that Mr. Walker be made to do a "stunt." They fire at his feet until he dances, but he is so adept at the graceful art of Terpsichore, that they soon watch him in admiration, and reward him with liberal applause. A letter is discovered by one of them, which shows that the actor is trying to return to the bedside of his sick child, and the good natured cowboys make up a purse for him, fill his pockets with cigars and his heart with cheer, load him upon a passing train and send him rejoicing to Chicago and his little family.

THE FLAG OF COMPANY "H".—It is during an Indian uprising that Company "H" accompanied by its mascot, a fine bulldog, is encamped on a hill. A party of Indians overpower the sentries and attack the camp. Company "H", although hopelessly outnumbered, bravely endeavors to repel the onslaught. The Captain seeing all is lost, orders the Sergeant to take down the flag from its post, and to secretly bury it in order to prevent its being defiled by the Indians. The Sergeant does this watched by the dog, and he has barely time to report back, before the Captain falls mortally wounded and the rest of the brave company gradually succumb, the Sergeant alone not being killed outright, he being severely wounded and half covered with his comrades' bodies.

The Indians having taken possession of the camp, proceed to search for the supply of liquor, and finding it soon become senseless from continual overdoses of the firewater. The Sergeant after a great effort, succeeds in freeing himself sufficiently to call the dog, who responds to his whistle and he then gives this almost human animal his instructions. Jumping over the prostrate bodies of the Indians the dog proceeds to the spot where the flag is buried and with his paws removes the earth covering it and taking it in his mouth dashes off. In so doing, however, he arouses some of the Indians who have now slept off their stupor and who start off in pursuit on horseback. Across mountain, valley, stream and ravine this four-footed hero dashes pursued by the blood-thirsty redskins until finally he reaches the main camp of the regiment. Suspecting a tragedy the Colonel orders the bugler to sound the alarm and as soon as the men are assembled the regiment led by the brave dog dashes for the scene of the fight. Arriving there it is short work for them to repel the Indian warriors and retake the camp.

The Sergeant is discovered and half carried, half walking is taken to the Colonel to whom he relates the events as they happened. The exertion of telling his story is too much, and he falls dead from his wounds at the Colonel's feet. With bared heads, while the faithful animal licks the face of the last of the gallant company, the Colonel spreads the flag saved from desecration over his body, and then this animal, desolate at its loss, lies down beside the dead body, determined not to be parted even in death.

This finale is one of the most wonderful scenes ever laid before the picture loving public and it will be a marvel to all, how it was possible to obtain a dog that would perform throughout this film with such wonderful intelligence.

THE EMPTY CRADLE.—The home of a Police Sergeant is desolate owing to the loss of his only child, a baby, whose cradle is a silent witness of his and his wife's grief. Weeks go by and the Sergeant, grave and changed, is on his rounds when he finds an old woman worn out with cold and fatigue, clasping a baby in her arms, and who is homeless and penniless. She is led to the station house where the warm-hearted police look after her. The cold and fatigue, however, have been too much and she falls over dead, leaving the babe bereft of its last friend. When the question of placing the child in safe keeping is brought up, the Sergeant offers to take it to his own home and later he is seen entering his home with the baby under his cape. His wife is dozing and stealthily approaching the empty cradle he slips the child in. A few minutes later a plaintive cry startles the woman out of her sleep and turning to the cradle she is astonished to find the baby. Her husband explains, and his wife, compassionate, gladly takes the little one to her heart.

LUCY CONSULTS THE ORACLE.—To lift the veil that shrouds the future, and know the mysteries of her destiny, is the desire of Lucy as she hesitates to accept her lover's proposals. As if in answer to her thoughts a peddler offers her through the window a book by means of which a speedy answer to any question affecting the future can be easily obtained.

So Lucy takes the book and alone with her maid the questions are put and answered until having satisfied herself as to what the future will bring she at last makes her decision.

DIMITRI DONSKOJ.—The Trepoff family consists of four members, father and son, both woodcutters, and mother and daughter, who are happy, although extremely poor. There comes a day, however, when father and son are seized by Tartar soldiers and carried before the Khan who calls upon them to abjure their faith. The son strikes the proffered Koran to the ground, emphatically refuses and is killed on the spot by the tyrant. Trepoff escapes and regains his home. The Tartars follow him and carry off the daughter before the despairing eyes of her parents, both too old and helpless to offer resistance. Trepoff then appeals to Dimitri Donskoj the valiant defender of the oppressed Russians, and at the head of a few followers Dimitri invades the Tartar camp, rescues the girl and restores her to her father.

AN UNEXPECTED FRIEND.—A neighbor calls on a working man and borrows one of his hard-earned dollars. Some weeks after, owing to a strike, he is himself in want with his child sick and unable to purchase the necessary medicine. He tries to obtain the return of his loan and ultimately to get rid of him she knowingly gives him a counterfeit dollar piece. Overjoyed he rushes to the drug store and tenders it in payment for the medicine. The druggist sees that it is false and has him arrested. The policeman on his way to the lockup allows him to go in and kiss his sick child. At the station house the policeman overcome by the sad sight substitutes a good piece for the bad one and the charge falls to the ground. A few months after we see the working man, restored to prosperity, and his child well again, welcoming the policeman to supper at their home.

FLOATING TO WEALTH.—Bothered by his creditors whom he is unable to pay, Mr. Moneyless retires to his wretched bed. In the night the Paris floods reach his room, and flooding it the bed floats out through the streets, and it is seen floating for many miles, an unusual and amusing spectacle. Ultimately it floats into the parlor of the house of a wealthy woman, where he awakes and saves the owner and her money. In return for this she agrees to marry him thus freeing him of all his cares.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE RUSSIAN LION.—The famous wrestler, "The Russian Lion," is giving an exhibition of his skill, at one of the sporting clubs and advertises that he will give a prize of one hundred dollars to any one who can throw him.. This advertisement comes to the notice of the "Russian Lion's" former teacher and at one time champion; he decides to attend the club exhibition and try to win the prize.

The teacher has long since given up the wrestling game and has been working at his trade, but sickness and lack of employment has put him in hard straits and he is willing to take a chance at almost anything, and the one hundred dollars is a very tempting bait, besides his little girl is very sick and he must have funds.

He calls in one of his friends and tells him about his plan to meet the "Russian Lion" on the mat that night. The friend helps him to get in shape and together they go to the club. The wife at home offers up her anxious prayers for her child and her husband's success.

The assembled audience at the club cheers the "Russian Lion" as he appears before them, and the announcer issues the challenge of the evening—a duplicate of the one advertised. The ex-champion accepts the defi and they prepare for the contest, which is a splendid exhibition of the different styles of wrestling. The poor teacher is defeated and returns to his home disheartened.

His wife consoles him and leaves the room to attend to their sick child. While she is gone, the "Russian Lion" comes in and tells his teacher he recognized him while he was wrestling with him and came to call on him in remembrance of past favors and services. He bids his old friend good-bye, but before leaving he places unseen on the table a large sum of money with a bill which he owed the teacher for one hundred and fifty dollars. There are discovered by the ex-champion after the "Russian Lion" is gone. The poor fellow shows his wife and child the money, and there is general rejoicing at this unexpected good fortune.

HOW CHAMPIONSHIPS ARE WON—AND LOST.—In the first scenes of this picture we have a chance to see Mr. James J. Corbett as an actor in his "glad rags" and society, where Mr. Corbett meets Miss Florence E. Turner. "The Vitagraph Girl," leads her into the mazy waltz, and while they are dancing she falls fainting into his arms. He leads her to a sofa, and, with the assistance of her chaperone, revives her, tells her she should take more exercise and invites her to his physical culture studio. She accepts his invitation.

The next evening, with her chaperone, she calls to see him and arranges to take some lessons under his instruction. In the gymnasium he explains to her the uses of the one hundred pound punching bag. Professor Cooper now takes her in hand for a few exercises, showing how to reduce the waist and hips, the method of removing flesh on the upper part of the body, strengthening the back, hips and thighs and abdominal muscles.

At home Miss Turner practices the methods taught her by Mr. Corbett and the Professor. This scene gives a fine idea of the advantages of physical training at home as an aid to health, strength, grace and beauty.

One month later, the fair pupil is seen at the studio taking a lesson in boxing from Mr. Corbett, the great exponent of the art of self-defense. This is where the result of Mr. Corbett's lessons to his pupil shows itself in the skill displayed by Miss Turner in their friendly little bout, in which she proves herself to be his master.

In the following scenes Mr. Corbett and his sparring partner, Tom Kennedy, in ring costume, give illustrations showing the famous "knockout" blows: The Sullivan and Corbett battle and the last rally and knockdown. Fitzsimmons and Corbett, Fitz knocking out Corbett, showing the famous solar plexus blow. Jeffries and Fitzsimmons battle, Jeff knocking Fitz down in the second round of their first meeting. This blow actually ended by fearless cowboys and dauntless riders of the Western range later. The toeing and throwing of the handkerchief, the invention of the jump by the notable red skin, an ensemble picture of unusual moral interest, were it a theme of love, hatred and revenge, making a picture welcome to patrons, simple to plot and construction that its advent will be a feature on the market.

Two sisters own a large Western ranch. Mary the eldest is in love with Bess May the County Sheriff and the foreman of the ranch is displeased with her attentions to him and his actions make it necessary to discharge him. He then becomes a cattle rustler and jack enemy of the Sheriff. A raid is made on the ranch one night and a number are wounded. The Sheriff swears vengeance and organizes a posse to rid the country of the outlaw element.

ROMEO AND JULIET IN TOWN.—Romeo Brown and Juliet Smith appreciate the old adage "True love never runs smooth." Owing to the unfriendly relations of the houses of Brown and Smith their meetings are clandestine and only spasmodic. They are wending their way down the Zigzag Avenue of Shantytown, Wyoming coming and nestling words of love, not even to be disturbed by a village dog fight or watting factions of Brown and Smith until taken respectively over the parental knee. They are for a time separated, but like the proverbial cat "They came back." The barn dance—Romeo Brown out contrives to kidnap the fair Juliet by descending from the hay loft by a rope and carrying her off to his enchanted castle consternation prevails but they beat the army of the factions to the Justice of the Peace who said as Shakespeare wrote:

"Get home, godding yet and into yer beds.
I've married these young uns yeh mutton heads."

He himself becomes a wanderer in the fields. He finds a purse but too late. The wife of the bargeman of Bergen finds and gives the boy her home and love she having no children, but four years later the stork visits the home and heaven blesses them with a baby girl. Fifteen years later the children are grown up and cherish more than a sister's and brother's love for each other. By chance one day Johan meets the boy and recognizes him has an interest in the barge to be near him saves his life when he has plunged into the water to rescue his supposed drunken father the bargeman. His identity is made known and unbounded happiness rules the boy and girl, for they realize the bright world that has just opened to them.

THE RANGE RIDERS.—Each year the unique surroundings and novel characters of this great and typical American custom is becoming more and more obsolete and in a few short years entirely extinct. Can you imagine a more exciting or sensational picture than a great cattle stampede—

EDISON KINETOSCOPES

TRANSFORMER

For Moving Picture Machines
(Alternating Current)

SIMPLE COMPACT EFFICIENT

Price, $60.00

This transformer known as The G. E. Economy Arc [illegible] for the operation of arc lamps [illegible] installation. The advantages of a transformer for this work will be appreciated by [illegible] the theatre manager and operator; by the management [illegible] reduction of light bills and in the better production of the picture due to the steadier light obtained and by the operator in the simplicity of the device, the absence of danger from sparks and the added comfort in the lamp house due to the low heating.

The saving in power insured by the use of a transformer instead of a rheostat varies from 65 to 90 per cent., depending upon the voltage from the supply mains. Many lighting companies require the use of 220 volts for moving picture work in order to avoid having a leading one side of a three-wire system. This increases the loss considerably in circuits using a resistance or reactive device for reducing the voltage.

SAVED FROM THE REDMEN.—Big Bear sneaks into the barracks in hope of getting away with some horses. Two stand saddled and it seems an easy matter to get them, but as the Indian is about to be off, Ned West fires. This startles Big Bear, who loses no time in getting away. When the soldiers inquire regarding the noise, Ned haughtily tells them of the incident and they all think it a joke. He rides off with both horses to keep his rendezvous with his sweetheart, who is the daughter of Major Gregory. The Major hears of the attempted horse thieving with anger and says he will see to it. Mrs. Gregory asks that Ned take good care of Annette, and away they go. Big Bear goes from the barracks to his tribe and they go with him to find Ned. They come upon the happy lovers who are taken unawares. Ned is knocked unconscious, while Annette whips up her horse and dashes off. The Indians go in pursuit of her. When Ned comes to, he mounts and makes haste to the barracks. Luckily the Major and his soldiers are ready to accompany Ned without loss of time. Annette, meantime, has been doing some hard riding with the Indians steadily gaining, and Big Bear eventually reaches her and takes her off at a furious pace, while the balance of the redmen turn to meet the soldiers. Ned, however, succeeds in getting by them and catches up to Big Bear and his captive. He saves himself from another blow from Big Bear by shooting him. When they reach the cottage Ned is made comfortable and happy—Annette seeing to both, while the soldiers cheer.

GIRLS.—How many girls you hear say, "Oh! I wish I were a man." It is the usual condition, always wanting something that you have not got. What is next to actually being of the masculine gender, is to don his raiment, and this suggests itself to a bevy of college girls. They select Belle as their model, and when she is fully attired, with her hair tucked up under a soft hat, she presents a figure that many a real man would envy. She runs out, followed by her friends, who laughingly watch her jump into a carriage and ride off for adventure. Belle visits a friend, who resents the familiar greeting offered, and is amazed to discover in her guest, Lee chum Belle. They go off arm in arm. Eva's sweetheart comes soon after, and the butler, with threats of concealing he is a party in the joke, tells the direction his young mistress has taken. Poor Harry, his foolish jealousy has much to feed upon for he witnesses many exchanges of caresses. When he upbraids Eva, she snaps her fingers at him and runs off to join Belle. After leaving a note with the butler goading him on, Eva and Belle drove away. Harry loses no time in following them and is subjected to a long chase. When they finally reach Belle's starting place and Harry discovers the fraud he is dumbfounded. The girls have not finished with him. Oh, no! he is dressed and thrown into the water, all as a cure for his jealousy.

THE POWERS COMPANY

HER PORTRAIT.—A young artist, in bad luck, is starving in his attic studio. John Gray, a mechanic, who is in the adjoining room, hears the artist's moans and he brings the artist food and loans him money to live on. The artist buys the mechanic to bring his sweetheart to the studio to see his pictures, and that he offers to paint the girl's portrait. The artist paints the picture, falls in love with the girl, and during Gray's absence from the room he embraces and kisses his friend's sweetheart. Gray enters and sees this. He orders the girl to leave despite her protests of her innocence. Gray denounces the artist and beats him. In the struggle the artist grasps Gray by the throat and Gray stabs the artist with a knife and runs out. The artist believes he is mortally wounded, but he wishes to save Gray, so he writes with a quill upon the floor: "I stabbed myself accidentally."

Gray, repentant-stricken, gets a doctor who assures him that the artist is not seriously hurt. The artist recovers, and leaves the painted portrait of the girl in Gray's room. In a pretty love scene the mechanic and his sweetheart are reconciled to each other.

"OH, THAT INDIAN!"—Sooker has been to a stag party, and he is "loaded to the gunnels." A wooden Indian stands in front of a cigar store. Sooker leans up against the Indian, goes to sleep and he has a dream. The Indian wakes up, takes a drink out of Sooker's bottle and the two go off for the dearest treat in Sooker's canoe. They enter a bar room, the Indian scalps the bartender in a rousing comedy scene. The two have adventures with a Wild West cowboy and after a funny fight the Indian gets his scalp. A Wild West chase in front of the store of the home, the Indian gives chase in a scene that is quite exciting. A Chinaman gives up his scalp and at last Sooker gets to his home. His wife orders out the Indian, who goes after her and gets her scalp. Poor Sooker is sick with horror, but the Indian drags him out and makes him drink gasoline at an automobile garage and then as Sooker is about to light a cigar there is a grand explosion, and

HER ROMANCE.—Helen Rogers, the daughter of a wealthy widow is engaged to be married to Truxston a wealthy swell. She falls in love with her music teacher, Dubois, who is ordered to apologize for her mother's conduct. Dubois comes in, Dubois ties Plenston up to a table cloth and goes off with the girl. They marry, and the girl is disowned by her mother.

Two years later Dubois does, leaving Helen with a little baby boy. Years pass, the girl suffers intense poverty. The little boy is selling newspapers on the street. The child is struck by an automobile in which his grandmother is riding. The grandmother takes him to his home. The landlord is just about to have the poor widow's furniture thrown out on the street. The grandmother pays the rent. Mother and daughter are reconciled.

LIMBURGER AND LOVE.—Penelope Watts, an old maid is expecting Henry Willing, who she has arranged through a matrimonial agency to marry. She has never seen Willing.

Penelope has also advertised her farm for sale. Henry Limburger, a German cheese manufacturer, comes to buy the farm. The old maid mistakes the German for the man she expects to marry. She makes love to Limburger, who is nonplussed, but also willing, and they get ready to start for the minister's. A telegram comes from the matrimonial agency stating that Willing the man they sent is a bigamist, and to have him arrested.

Penelope holds up Limburger with a shot gun and takes him to the Justice of the Peace, who has Limburger jailed before he can explain.

Later the old maid finds Limburger's letter which explains her mistake. She rushes off and has Limburger released by the Justice, who marries them.

EUGENIE GRANDET.—Eugenie Grandet has discovered where her father, a miserable old miser, keeps his treasure. Eugenie's cousin, Charles, is the bearer of a letter from his father to his uncle, Eugenie's father. The letter informs the miser that Charles' father, his only brother, is reduced to a state of utter ruin, and unless he can obtain immediate help, he contemplates suicide. Charles does not know the contents of the letter, and when he learns of his father's misfortune he is overcome with grief, and both he and his cousin Eugenie plead with the old man to render aid to their relative in distress. However, the miser is deaf to their entreaties. Eugenie's heart is touched, and going to the hiding place of her father's wealth, she takes a casket, marked Eugenie's dowry 200,000 francs. She takes this sum from the casket and in secret offers it to her cousin stating that her father has sent it to help his unfortunate brother. Charles immediately departs and reaches home in time to save his father from ruin and suicide. Later he returns to his uncle, to hear his father's thanks, but a great disappointment awaits him. The miser has missed the casket, and immediately accuses his nephew, and is about to have him sent to prison. Eugenie tearfully confesses, whereupon the cruel miser curses and denounces his daughter. When Charles realizes the unselfishness and generosity of Eugenie he offers the miser a receipt for Eugenie's dowry, and Eugenie leaves her father's house forever, to enjoy much happiness, after all her trouble and grief.

THE BITER BIT.—Henry, a painter and Ralph, a poet, are two fast friends and both fall in love with a pretty neighbor, the charming Margaret. Margaret is fond of both the young men, but it is impossible from her actions to know which of the friends she prefers, perhaps she does not even know herself. The young men are exceedingly poor and one day Ralph leaves a waistcoat to be sold at a pawnbroker's office. The pawnbroker, on examining the garment, finds a purse of gold in one of the pockets, and, supposing he has come across a find, he appropriates the money for himself. Ralph, finding he has been robbed, goes to the pawnbroker's office and demands the money. The pawnbroker refuses to give it up, and Ralph, in a rage, seizes the pawnbroker's cane and strikes him a blow on the head, killing him. Ralph, thinking he has committed murder, flies from the house. Meanwhile Margaret, who has been informed by Henry that Ralph has left for the coast, and as well as the world will see him no more, is greatly grieved at her lover's supposed desertion of her. Ralph, on his arrival there, finds that he has left for the coast, and as well as the world will see him no more, is greatly grieved at her lover's supposed desertion of her. Ralph, on his arrival there, finds that he has left for the coast, and as well as the world will see him no more, is greatly grieved at her lover's supposed desertion of her.

He is to give the money to a man who will meet him at a certain street corner, and will carry a white rose. Sears takes the letter to the police and a trap is laid for the Black Hand man.

In the meantime Tony, who has been to see the doctor, stops at a florist's and purchases a white rose for his suffering son, who is passionately fond of flowers.

Unhappily for him, he passes the place picked out by the Black Hand, the police think his rose the signal rose.

He is promptly arrested, but when he tells his story, Sears and his wife induce the police to investigate it. They find Tony has told the truth, and the lieutenant Mr. Sears presents him, by way of recompense, with a pretty cottage in the country where white roses are so plentiful that little Tony can't even begin to keep track of them.

WRITING ON THE WALL.—Turner, a man of bad character, conducts an inn in the country. His stepdaughter, Grace, is his drudge. While on an errand to the village she meets Jack, a wealthy young man. He is much attracted by her. Jack goes to the bank, and draws a large sum of money. Hank, a pal of Turner, sees him, and tries to ambush him on the road, but fails. Then he goes ahead to tell Turner.

Jack, on his trip, meets Grace, who is nearly exhausted. He takes her home, and thus seems to play directly into the hands of the villains. They steal his revolver, and would drug him, were it not for the fact that Grace writes a warning on the wall with wine. Jack, aided by Grace, escapes but the girl is wounded. Jack marries Grace.

NESTOR FILMS.

BUCKING BRONCO.—Patsy Wallock, who had been celebrating with the boys of Bar-X Ranch staggered to his cayuse, and after crawling over the back of of the saddle, shook his first angrily at his shack. Quick-Fire his squaw wife, had just sent him sprawling through the door after breaking the few dishes they possessed over his head.

As Patsy galloped sullenly down the road he overtook John Winter's niece Nan, and when the cowboy told her he wanted work, she volunteered to speak to her uncle for him.

Obedient to the every wish of "Madcap Nan" as was everyone else on the Winter Ranch, Uncle John promptly promised to give Patsy work. However, he was really not in need of help, so Bud Raton, the wily foreman, giving his employer a big wink, told Patsy he would be instantly engaged provided he could ride Calamity, their bucking bronco. So far none of the boys except Len Howard had been able to stick. Even his former owner occasionally dove his head into the ground.

Patsy at once consented. He had been drinking just enough to be thoroughly indifferent to what he rode and perhaps for that very reason although Calamity, with a curry-comb under her saddle, did everything but climb a tree, Patsy came out "a rider."

As he dismounted, the boys gathered around him cheering—he had "made good" and they instantly accepted him as one of themselves.

Billie Carson, Bob Williams and Bud Raton had occasion to repent of their enthusiasm, however, when a little later they beheld Nan's much coveted photo in the hands of the new cowboy.

Uncle John next stepped in and for once asserted his authority as guardian—one of the boys, he cared not which—she must marry.

Knowing nothing of Patsy's ride, and so feeling sure that Len was the only one who could master Calamity, Nan meekly informed her Uncle that her husband would be the man who could ride the bucking bronco. Then, thinking that this ruse would bring Len back, she sent Joe to inform him of her decision—and bring him it did—post-haste—for he had seen Patsy ride Calamity and he grew faint with dread lest he should arrive too late.

The contest was just finished—the boys, one by one, including the former owner, had attempted to ride Calamity and had one and all been thrown until Patsy's turn came. He had stuck and was just claiming his hysterical bride-to-be, when Joe returned with Len and Quick-Fire, whom they had met on the road inquiring for Patsy—unmindful of the others, Quick-Fire stalked over to her crestfallen spouse, and taking him by the ear led him majestically from the Ranch while "Madcap Nan" to the great relief of her guardian between tears and laughter clung thankfully to her happy Len.

CENTAUR CO. OF N. J.

MR. SWELL IN THE COUNTRY.—When Mr. Jonathan Swell of the city, glancing idly through the "for sale" column in his perusal of the morning paper, found that a small house in the country was to be sold, it took him just long enough to get into his hat and coat, leave orders with his house-keeper and catch the first train to look the place over.

Arriving upon the scene, learning the right direction he jaunted happily along almost as light as the country air he breathed. He soon discovered his path led him along the banks of a stream. The warmth of the Summer air; the re-awakened desires and pleasures of boyhood seized and permeated his veins. With an outburst of enthusiasm he looked carefully about, then hurriedly disrobing plunged into the stream to enjoy a good old-time swim.

Miss Evergreen of Lonesomeburg, the seller of the house, above mentioned, had living with her, two nieces, the youngest of whom was a veritable tomboy and at the moment Mr. Swell was disporting himself in the water Jennie, the tomboy, was rolling an empty barrel along the lane. At a turn toward the river she was confronted by a pair of trousers hanging from a bush. "Just what we need for a scarecrow," said she, confiscating them at once and making a bee line for home, minus the barrel.

The ensuing adventures of Mr. Swell in the barrel—a substitute for his trousers, which he later discards for a skirt belonging to Miss Evergreen—furnish an abundance of fun. In the last scene Mr Swell is seen again in his palatial city home enjoying its comforts and vowing to never again seek divertisement in the country.

BLIND LOVE.—Howard Blackmore, a young and wealthy bachelor is consumed by a devotion for his mother to the extent of closing his heart and blinding his eyes to the fact that there are other mothers in the world who require a little love and human kindness. Receiving an appeal for financial assistance from the chairman of the fund for the care of old women, he crumpled and threw the letter carelessly into the waste paper basket. Taking up a photo of his mother he is content with her and others are nothing to him. It is a strange fact that some hearts both kind and thoughtful are impervious to loves outside their own families. Young Blackmore, because of his selfish and blind love is taught a lesson that opens both his heart and eyes—and purse too. He sees three old women who "might have been" his mother.

His great love for his mother no longer impedes his broadening of mind which is now in a condition to consider and alleviate the suffering of the world's old women.

THE SLAVE'S LOVE.—Gathered round Cornelius are his slaves; among them a young girl who is a musician and in love with her matser. He is attracted by her beauty and art. The favorite has noticed this and hands the poor girl over to a wicked old recluse who drags the resisting girl through the woods to his home behind the caves. She is missed by her master who is in despair, inquiring where she is. His attendant, who also loves the girl, begs to be sent in search of her. Wandering about disguised as a minstrel, he nears the home of the recluse. On seeing the intruder the old man is about to strike him with a huge boulder, but is charmed by the umsic and falls into a sleep. Lydia has also heard the music and coming to the mouth of the cave recognizes her master's attendant. Arming himself but still playing his music he succeeds in rescuing the girl and takes her back to the castle where Cornelius received her with joy and we leave them alone to enjoy the happiness which so nearly slipped from them to be restored by the hands of her unknown lover.

WHAT HAPPENED TO A CINEMATOGRAPH PARTY.—This highly diverting film brings to light the amusing exploits of a cinematograph party and their various misadventures causing heaps of laughter and we glean that all is not smooth sailing when taking a picture. Well acted and clearly photographed, this picture cannot fail to interest an audience anywhere.

SALES COMPANY FILM D'ART.

THE LEGEND OF THE HOLY CHAPEL.—In honor of the consecration of the relics of the Holy Passion, the good King Louis decides to build a new chapel. He accordingly posts a notice in every school and college of his domain, calling to competition all the architects and structural craftsmen in the land, the most able of all to have the honor and the contract. One of the clevcrest and most ambitious students in the land is Pierre de Montereau, and we see him in his work shop, where he reads the king's notice and determines to win the prize. Then he sets to work with a vim, and it is conceded by all that victory is his.

From another part of the land there now comes one Jehan, a dark, villainous man, who has heard of Pierre, and plans to ensnare him so as to filch the plans from him. He contrives to meet the youth, and by flattery and cajolery inveigles him into an inn. Here he fills the unsuspecting student with liquor and finally induces him to go for a walk in the woods, in fact he more drags than invites him. But when they are well in the wilderness Pierre cannot resist the drowsiness that comes over him, and insists on lying down. As soon as he falls asleep Jehan tries to take from his person the plans for the chapel. Pierre quickly awakens, and there is a desperate duel after which Pierre falls lifeless. Jehan goes back to the city and at once sets to work building the chapel from the plans he has stolen. But the conscience of the sinner is a torture; in every man working with him he sees Pierre; vision after vision comes before him in which the workmen play the part of Pierre, his victim. He cannot endure it; it is maddening. Suddenly he sees the finished chapel. The king and the chancellor are there. He is receiving the honors of the successful architect. The king gives him the honor of first prayer in the new edifice. Slowly he approaches the altar, but no sooner has he touched the rail, when there is a flash of flame and—Pierre stands before him.

Jehan utters a yell, and the laborers gather round him. He cannot explain. His brain is afire, his conscience smites him. He orders that the work be abandoned, and in a frenzy ends his own existence.

ATLAS

SETTLING A BOUNDARY DISPUTE.—A young couple who have been in love since childhood attend the same college—become engaged and return home finding their families in a turmoil over the boundary line dividing the two farms. This ill feeling has smouldered in the hearts of the two men for years—but when Mr. Jones finds men at work on his property—removing the boundary line, he has tried to preserve—he immediately starts out with "blood in his eye" to hunt up Smith. He finds him and each try to talk louder than the other—resulting in a complete disruption.

At the railroad station the two old fossils waiting for their children glare at each other and when the train pulls in the lovers are dragged away from each other by the irate parents. All thoughts of horrible things are promised them if they are ever caught together again, but you may as well bid the main flood to change its course as to try and separate two panting, heart-hungry lovers.

In their dilemma the brain works quickly, they hit upon a plan to sway the old fellows from their purpose—Mary holds up her own father, having assumed the character of a highwayman, and Jack dashes in heroically to the rescue, puts the robber to flight and wins the old man by his fictitious heroism. In turn, Jack as a tramp, holds up his own father and Mary comes to the rescue—the result exceeds their most sanguine hopes—coming to the scene of the contention the young folks work the parents into a good humor—they agree to bury the hatchet and allow the youngsters a free foot to get married whenever they care to.

"IMP."

THE WAY TO WIN.—It is not always that a fellow gets a chance to know in advance when his rival in love is coming on the scene, but Tom Evans is just so fortunate. He is having an uphill time of it trying to get Grace's father to consent to their marriage when suddenly the news comes that a French Count is coming on to lay claim to the girl's hand. The situation is a hard one for Tom in view of the apparent favor in which Grace's father holds the Count, but Tom loses no time.

Learning that the Count is to arrive in an auto, he hires the country constable to hold the machine for speeding, then while the constable and the Frenchman are arguing, Tom jumps in the car and drive to a costumers. When he emerges from this place he is the exact counterpart of the Frenchman, and thus rigged he now drives to the girl's home. She plays her part well, and his antics are very Frenchy as he kisses everybody on the forehead, and finally takes Grace out for a ride. All of this time the Count has been perspiring under the arm of the constable and he finally induces that official to go with him to Grace's home. When he arrives here, and tries to establish his identity he is immediately taken as an impostor, and his protests are turned to ridicule. To cap the climax a telegram now arrives from Tom and Grace which breaks the news that they have been sure enough married.

A POLICEMAN'S SON.—It is humiliating enough to be falsely accused of crime under ordinary circumstances, especially such as befalls the young Romeo in our story. He is desperately in love with a pretty miss, but her father, a miserly old skinflint, strongly objects to their marriage.

A desire for revenge in small matters sometimes leads people far beyond their depth. The old man in his desire to part the couple once and for all cooks up a vicious plot. He manages to secure the young man's cap, and placing it under his safe raises an alarm as if he had been robbed. The first policeman he meets on the street is the young man's father and when they both return to the house the policeman, of course, searches for a clue and finds the cap. The old man cunningly shows surprise but demands that the father arrest his son. Believing his son innocent, he refuses and the miser goes out for another policeman, who against his own will goes for the young man as a matter of duty.

In laying out the scheme, however, the old man was not unseen, for when he removed the valuables from the safe his own daughter saw where he secreted them. When her lover is brought to the house by the policeman, everything seems to point to his guilt, when suddenly she remembers the action of her father which she had witnessed. Stepping to a chair in the room she lifts the padding and reveals to the astounded gaze of all gathered the money supposedly lost.

It looks dark for her father, but those whom he plotted against remember that to err is human, so they divinely forgive, and all ends happily.

To Exhibitors, from the Laemmle Film Service

Notice is herewith given that if your exchange, for any reason whatsoever, refuses or fails to furnish you with the latest "IMP FILMS" (released since May 27), the LAEMMLE FILM SERVICE will be only too glad to take you on as a customer and give you what you want. The instant you have trouble getting "IMP FILMS" or any other brand of Independent pictures, cut out the dilly-dallying and COME TO ME.

Several exchanges have entered into an agreement to "kill the Imp company," and have simultaneously cancelled their standing orders for "Imp films." And you, if your exchange is in on the deal, are the GOAT! Don't let anyone cut you off of "Imp Films" in order to wreak his own petty spite on the Imp company. Do as I suggest: Cut out the non-buying exchange and come to the Laemmle Film Service for the best films on the market.

JUST WATCH THE EXHIBITORS SIT UP AND TAKE NOURISHMENT NOW, WHEN THEY HEAR THAT THE OLD "CENTAUR" IS BACK IN THE MARKET.

For the benefit of new members, it might be well for the chair to explain that the CENTAUR is the oldest independent producer, and dates back to the time when it was the only INDEPENDENT producer. It can recall the time when there were only FIVE EXCHANGES, that were INDEPENDENT, Greene of Boston, Moses of St. Louis, Ullman of New York, Graff of Philadelphia, and McMillan of Chicago.

Just keep your eye on the Old Guard, some of them have scars and other souvenirs of the battle that was waged to keep the market open. The old CENTAUR was FREEMANIZED along with MOSES and ULLMAN, but has weathered the storm and will release some pictures that will keep the new manufacturers and the near-manufacturers awake nights trying to hold the pace that the CENTAUR will set.

Heart-to-Heart Talk About The Film Fight

I am now going to tell you all the "Imp" company during the Sales co[mpany]

In the first place, before the Sales company was even thought of, the "Imp" company was doing an enormous business far greater than I had thought was possible.

All the stockholders in the "Imp" company were delighted and eager to keep piling the money back into the business in order to keep "Imp" films improving all the time.

Therefore, it was with no idea of making MORE money that the "Imp" company joined the Sales company movement.

We had been receiving hundreds of letters from exhibitors, who said:—"We will turn independent the minute the independent manufacturers are producing a strong enough program every week."

That was the vital point in the whole affair.

The Sales company came in the nick of time to bring about the very condition that the exhibitors and exchanges were waiting for.

By getting the manufacturers to work in harmony we saw how it would be possible to make our usual SPECIAL REELS, a greater drawing [illegible] a branching out of [illegible] the full maximum of comedy, drama, trick and scenic, educational and other class features of film to make up a most splendidly good program, both for exhibitors and for ourselves.

It is an actual fact that the "Imp" had nothing to gain by entering the Sales company, except that it met a general opportunity to wage the independent situation, so good and so strong that exhibitors everywhere would flock to the independent side.

The "Imp" company has never failed to boost the independent game, even when suffering a dead loss of money by doing so.

Witness the unexpected way in which we scooped the other side on the "In Africa" picture, on which we lost a small fortune and which we knew we would lose, even before marketing the picture. All we got out of it was advertising and the good will of scores of independent exchanges and exhibitors.

Our next great scoop was the "Funeral of King Edward"—another dead loss of cash, but a great gain in popularity for the "Imp."

I have probably been involved in [illegible] I HAVE WON LITTLE BUT LOSSES OUT OF THEM. I am doing it now the biggest [illegible] against the entire [illegible] of you!

If you Mr. Exhibitor, believe in [illegible] of progress. If you believe I am telling you the truth about the "Imp" [illegible] and the Sales company—it is up to you to boost [illegible] by getting HOME. Help [illegible] by getting [illegible] every time that sending the [illegible], but by [illegible] it your exchange and demanding "Imp" films. Don't neglect to do this, because you know it won't help it [illegible] "Imp" films are the biggest money makers you handle.

I publish all this against the advice of conservative friends. I have always believed that the man who EARNED the support of the mass of EXHIBITORS could win any fight he engaged in. I believe it now. I have nothing to conceal, nothing to gloss over. I am going to keep right on giving you results first and the rest will [illegible] to the fact that you ought to USE the combined POWER that lies in your hands.

Sincerely yours,

The Picture and the Eye.

Like the flowers that bloom in the Spring, we once more encounter in the lay press that hardy perennial of the sensation monger—picturitis. Picturitis, we may inform the reader, is a coined word of our own, signifying some real or imaginary injury to the eye caused by looking at moving pictures. We have called picturitis a hardy perennial. But it is something more. It is sporadic. It breaks out irrationally and has broken out irrationally for the last fourteen years; that is, ever since moving pictures were brought prominently to public notice. Under the caption, "The Menace of the Picture Show," such a widely circulated publication as Leslie's Weekly recently quoted a Dr. Southard as tracing eye troubles to the moving picture. Dr. Southard may or may not be right in certain specific instances, but even so, it is not advisable that any general conclusion should be drawn from the doctor's evidence. Conclusions, we mean, that, generally speaking, the picture is injurious to the sight. The evidence that this is so is so slight that it is not worth taking notice of seriously.

Nevertheless as the scare is recurrent, we deem it our duty to impress upon our exhibiting readers the urgent necessity of indoctrinating their patrons with a conviction that looking at the pictures from a proper position in the theater has absolutely no injurious effect on the eyes. We would like them specially to read an article we wrote in THE WORLD of March the 26th, headed "The Eye and the Picture: Where to Sit in the Theater." An intelligent exhibitor could find matter in this article which he might profitably distribute amongst his patrons. Then, again, in THE WORLD of April 2, we had a further article on the subject of "The Physiological Effect of the Moving Picture," which also contains much valuable information. If both these articles are carefully read and well digested the moving picture theater exhibitor will be armed with a number of arguments, data and practical facts with which he can refute any contention that the moving picture is essentially injurious in its effect to the normal eye. By the normal eye, we mean the eye of an individual having fairly good sight, while the individual himself or herself is otherwise in good bodily health. Of course in all this we assume that the picture is being properly shown, that it is steady and free from intrinsic or extrinsic defects. The former defects are, of course, of a chemical nature—spots, streaks, splashes and the like. The extrinsic defects, of course, are raininess, flickering, etc. Even Cyclops himself would find his solitary eye fatigued if he looked long at pictures of this kind.

We specially exhort exhibitors then to, whenever they have the opportunity, nail down these recurrent statements that the eyes are injured by moving pictures. Ever so many years ago a scare was created that the red light of a photographic dark room was injurious to the eyes. That scare has been repeated to-day. Here, again, the evidence that a few hours in rays of red of the spectrum was injurious to health has never been substantiated. So it is with the moving picture.

Wise Versus Unwise Criticism of Moving Pictures.

In our advocacy of just criticism of moving picture work it was with pleasure that we last week gave to our readers what we trust was a profitable interpretation of certain criticisms made in the Supreme Court of this State, showing the wisdom of the same and pointing the benefits to be derived therefrom.

This week it becomes our duty to defend the moving picture from unwise criticism. Under the caption, "Picture Shows Denounced," in the daily papers we read that the "German Staats Verband," in an annual gathering in Kingston, N. Y., made "a strong declaration against moving pictures, secret societies and socialistic propaganda." No details are given, otherwise we should feel enlightened and could form some opinion or judgment. We can understand the societies' religious antagonism to secret societies, or its political feelings against socialism; but as the moving pictures are neither religious nor political, to include them in a general condemnation is unjust; to criticise without giving cause is unwise. We shall gladly welcome as wise and timely any true and specific censure of the cheap, the low or the vulgar, and warmly support proper authorities who feel it right to make such censure, but we cannot aid in the good work of securing the best moral results in moving picture exhibitions when censure lacks detail or specific charges. To resort to a general sweeping denunciation serves no purpose, does no good and must be classified at least as unwise. It is interesting to be able to note in this connection that an organization connected with the above society recently made upwards of ten thousand dollars by a proper use and application of a well chosen series of moving pictures; showing at once how beneficial they have become. There is no doubt that religious, fraternal and political societies can do much good by using the moving pictures for the education and edification of their members, securing also very often financial benefit and a bonus of pleasure besides. In this way there can be no doubt as to the outcome and the verdict will be a wise one.

The Verdict of a Jury of Children.

In the issue of June 4 of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD there appeared twelve or more well-written letters from as many children averaging twelve and a half years of age, each one expressing the writer's opinion of the exhibitions they had visited. These letters have been carefully analyzed and classified for the purpose of proving the collective value of the youthful ideas. Before doing so, however, let us remember that the value of the child opinion lies in its perfect naturalness, its simple judgment, free from any taint, opinionism or bias; absolutely without prejudice and totally unconscious of serving any side, party or purpose.

The leading subjects pleasing to the young minds were history, travel and geography; three writers expressed similar views upon the helpfulness of these subjects; two desired pictures of foreign customs and countries; again, two others sought to know more of the cities and beauty spots of this their own country; one especially mentioning the value of such pictures as those depicting Southern life and the cotton fields with its attendant lessons. Two writers especially longed for views of the past, i.e., the times of Washington and of the Civil War, showing the trend of the young mind in patriotic subjects and those which, as they themselves expressed it, as being "helpful to their school work" because these pictures made learning easy, and, we venture to add, more attractive.

Comedy and funny pictures were appreciated by two writers, but in these, as in other subjects, the opinion of two or three seems to indicate the tendency of all.

The negative side is shown by the expressed dislike for murders, suicides, robberies, detective stories and "certain love stories." One young writer says, "I cover my eyes at "shooting and killing"; another with a rare maturity of judgment declared that pictures with brutality in them "were injurious to the weak-minded." Only one writer—a girl—actually named objectionable subjects, saying that "Love's Revenge" and "Dead Men Tell No Tales" created an impression "like a bad taste in the mouth."

All expressed a desire for the educational and amusing. The wise exhibitor looking for the best returns will see that to gain profit he must needs give profit, for the profitable pays both ways. With singular clearness of insight one bright girl suggests that "if good pictures are beneficial, bad ones must be harmful to the same extent." If in so young a mind these truths find root, we have no fear about what kind of subjects will soon form the standard of our exhibitions. The study of these letters and their classification should prove exceedingly helpful to moving picture people. Pictures of heroes and ideals always appeal to the young, the Roosevelt African series being especially appreciated by young people at this time. It should not be forgotten that in securing the right class of young people the interest of the parents is also secured, and with an established confidence in the value of that which the children receive a cordial encouragement will be extended to good exhibitions.

The Fool!!!?

It is an old saying that "There is a black sheep in every flock;" also that "There is a fool in every crowd." These sayings have become traditional and as traditions are born in truth, so there must be some truth in these sayings. Experience is, however, the best teacher, and in her school we have learned that there is a fool at large everywhere, and, like a weed in a garden, he will grow and push his way to the front, occupying ground that might be used for a better purpose, until it is uprooted and thrown out. A fool is always impudent, and, like the devil making his appearance in church, he does not hesitate to enter the best company; he should be driven out as soon as he is discovered, or he will bring discredit and disgrace upon those who allow him to stay.

If he finds himself in a large crowd in an open space, and a little puppy yelps, Mr. Fool cries "mad dog,' causing a stampede with danger and disaster to everyone around him.

If in a large crowded building, some thoughtless person strikes a match (even without danger) our omnipresent fool yells "fire;" a panic results, often with great loss of life. Unfortunately Mr. Fool is very deceitful, taking care to hide himself because, knowing his own contemptible nature, he knows but too well that a righteously indignant public might lynch him if caught.

A company of young people going out for a pleasant ride in a boat on the lake, innocently anticipating a happy time and bent upon thoroughly enjoying themselves, feels satisfied that every member of the party is a sane and safe individual, until "our friend the enemy" appears; when he, in the "boat rocker," Mr. Fool announces himself, "A Tragic Disaster" is the headline in the morning paper as the result of his presence.

Automobile riding is very exhilarating, the "auto" is a wonderful friend to man in business and in pleasure, he uses it for both purposes profitably; surely here there is no room for the fool. The chauffeur must needs be a careful, scientific man, with a level head and cool good judgment. But, alas! the "joy rider" and the "speed maniac" soon proved we had been premature in our expectations; the former becomes a murderer, the latter a suicide, both emphasizing the saying that "There's a fool born every day." We could wish that two might die every day and so the world would be the sooner rid of them.

These reflections upon this strange adjunct to the human family have led the writer to ask two questions: First, what is a fool, and how can he be defined? Second, has he invaded the ranks of the moving picture fraternity?

In answering the first question we find the fool is either one of two kinds; he is either the worst of his kind, naturally and unfortunately born so, and is to be pitied, or, he makes himself the worst of his kind, wilfully and deliberately, and as such is to be condemned. For the good of the community and of their fellowmen these two classes of people are put under restraint. The asylums hold the one, the jails the other.

In answering the second question, we regret to have to say the moving picture family is not free from his appearance; as has already been shown he is known by being "the worst of his kind," not by nature, but by choice; he deals only in the worst of his possibilities, and, like a "sow wallowing in the mire," he revels in his filth. Publicly he draws around him his kith and kin; there are some people closely related to him who would go to a circus of all clowns, they would also go to a church all devils; these are the ones who get up and go to a picture show all questionable, making both the show and the place all bad; bringing down the condemnation and righteous indignation of right-thinking people upon their foolish heads. Under those circumstances what shall we do who have at heart and at stake the best interests of the moving picture world? A little reasoning shows the answer is not far away; the "joy rider" does not hurt the reputation of the automobile or the "boat rocker" that of the boat; neither can the moving picture business be hurt by the presence of the "undesirable citizen" in the ranks of the profession; it becomes us however to give him short shrift wherever we find him, to treat him as he is treated anywhere and everywhere else whenever he makes his appearance, and if we cannot drive or crowd him out, we can help the authorities to put him out. It is the object of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD to show that the moving picture business is for the scientific and artistic; for the educated and the educator; for the true pleasure giving and pleasure seeking people, and there is no room in our ranks for "the fool."

The Bianchi Camera.

When the writer first met Joseph Bianchi at the historic gathering at the Imperial Hotel, New York City, in January, 1909, when the F. S. A. realized that the formation of the Patents Company rendered it nugatory, if not a superflous institution, he (this writer), slapped Bianchi on the back and said "So you are the inventor of this mysterious camera." We did not say mysterious, we said something else more pointed and emphatic in one syllable. Anyhow it served to introduce us, and since that time Mr. Bianchi and ourselves have been strong friends, because we have in common many scientific and technical ideas in regard to the picture. The Bianchi camera, then, historically regarded, made what we will venture to call a furtive and mysterious appearance. It was talked about a great deal, it was rarely seen, it was regarded by many as offering the Independent manufacturer the opportunity of using an instrument which did not conflict with instruments upon which there were validifled and validated patents. We mean those patents controlled by the Motion Picture Patents Company. In fact the Bianchi camera was thought by many to save a situation; which, to say the least of it, was rather acute from the Independent manufacturing point of view.

It was only, as the reader knows, within the last few months that at the Thanhouser works and the Powers works, we had an opportunity, first of all, of thoroughly examining the novel optical construction of the Bianchi camera, of submitting ourselves to being photographed by it and of examining on the screen and in the hands, both raloy and enalloy, pictures taken with the instrument. In other words we went as far as we could reasonably be expected to go, in examining into the practicability of this instrument, and we are bound to say that on the evidence given to us, we lend to regard the Bianchi camera as quite fulfilling the claims which its inventor, Mr. Bianchi, has made for it.

To recapitulate the novel features of this instrument: It consists of the synchronization of an optical system, both parts of which work independently, and yet combine at the instant of exposure to transmit an image on the focal plane which is in continuous motion. We do not expect that the ordinary reader of these pages will grasp this description, but anybody having a scientific optical knowledge, will readily understand what we mean. Those who prefer a simpler definition, had better turn to the MOVING PICTURE WORLD of April 2, where a full description of the camera is given.

On broad grounds of theory we cannot see why the Bianchi camera should not be a success all round. Photographers of all kinds are, as we perhaps know better than anybody else in the world, exceedingly conservative people. These men take strange fancies in their heads about the tools with which they have to work. They conceive an affection for, let us say, a particular lens, and find it impossible, or say it is impossible to produce results just as good with another lens of identical construction. So with celluloid film, used either in the camera or in the printer. So with printing papers and chemicals. Photographers seem to be creatures of irrationality, plus impulse, plus invincible ignorance.

The Bianchi camera has had to combat in a more than ordinary degree this prejudice, getting the knocks of those interested in the Patents Company on the one side and Independent manufacturers, who imagine they could infringe the Edison patents with impunity, on the other. Now, that it is to have a fair chance in the hands of men who have every reason to handle and use the camera in the way that will ensure best results, the Bianchi camera may be expected to come into its own and demonstrate the correctness of the claims made for it.

Confusion Worse Confounded.

Many of our readers will remember a little refrain occasionally sung at stag parties both in this country and in other parts of the Anglo-Saxon world. It runs something like this:

The grand old Duke of York,
He had 10,000 men.
He marched them up to the top of a hill
And he marched them down again.
When they were up, they were up, up, up.
And when they were down, they were down.
And when they were only half way up.
They were neither up nor down.
Singing: Halleluiah, etc., ad lib.

This, we think, describes the result of a recent meeting of the Independent manufacturers and renters at Detroit. They are neither up nor down. They do not from what we can gather, appear to have either advanced or retrograded. They are just where they were. The status quo ante has been preserved. It is as you were before you were.

One fact, however, stands out with sufficient clearness and it is this: that the renter is more than ever determined to be a ponderable factor in the situation, as we have pointed out over and over again he necessarily must be. The renters' are in a position to pick and chose.

They do not appear to be in the mood to submit to dictation from either section of the Independent manufacturing and importing elements, unless there are equitable and reciprocal terms involved. In other words, the Independent renter is disposed to conserve his independence and not to barter it away blindfolded. He is discriminating between the claims of rival sections. It is no more possible, it seems, for Twenty-fifth street to corral him than it is for Fourteenth street. So far, so good. The Detroit meeting, then, stands adjourned so far as the renter is concerned, until next week, when it is probable that further steps will be taken towards the consolidation of the Independent exchange end of matters. For the good of the business we hope that something definite will be achieved before long, in the form of a representative Independent Renters' Association.

Now, with regard to the Sales Company versus Associated Independent manufacturers aspect of the matter; as far as we can learn, and our views are expressed in the little bit of poem printed in the former part of this article, matters remain where they are. There seems to be, from what we can gather, a desire on both sides to come to an understanding. That desire is symtomatic of good. It is felt that the present position of affairs is impossible to maintain. That in short if a genuinely co-operative scheme were put forth the breach would be healed and the lion of Fourteenth street would lie down with the lamb of Twenty-fifth street. But whether this will be brought about remains to be seen. The conflicting differences are surely not irreconcilable. In other words a working agreement or understanding seems, to us, a common sense way out of the difficulty. Mutual concession and a policy of give nd ake would probably bring this about. Meanwhile, however, the situation had hardly improved since last week. We were hoping that these futile meetings had ended and that the Independent side of the business had settled down to a proper routine of trade; that is, the making and selling of good moving pictures. This is the end that we are striving for, which we have in view, and which animates us in whatever we write in this paper, no matter what ignorant, irresponsible or prejudiced persons outside may say to the contrary.

The Sales Company Once Again.

Last week we felt it our duty to put the quietus on some absurd rumors in regard to a reported attempt to control raw stock for Independent moving picture making. We pointed out that this was a practical impossibility, and we expressed the hope that any such attempt would fail in the interests of that open market on the Independent side of things which the MOVING PICTURE WORLD consistently stands for.

The individual who starts out with a desire to please everybody is foredoomed to certain failure. The path of duty is not always a smooth one. We saw our duty in this respect and what has happened since last week had not imbued us with the smallest regret that we took the course we did. What has happened? We have received many personal congratulations from renters, Independent manufacturers, importers and others in the business upon having pricked a little bubble which was thrown in the air for the purpose of affrighting people, and we are satisfied with the effect we have created in the minds of fair dealing men in the business for the good of the industry who desire freedom of contract. On the other hand our article has evoked the displeasure of certain persons who seem to think we should address our readers just in accordance with their ideas on the subject, rather than in accordance with our own, which are conceived not in any partisan spirit, but for the benefit of the business as an entity.

To begin with some of our excellent friends at 111 East Fourteenth street have got, we learn, absurdly angry because they attribute to us premeditated antagonism to them in our article on raw stock. As a matter of fact we never had the Sales Company in mind when we wrote this article. We had the subject of the raw stock for Independent moving picture making slated for treatment in these pages weeks and weeks ago. At this moment we have other subjects slated for further treatment and we shall treat those subjects quite irrespectively of personalities, whoever or whatever they may be. Let us assure the Sales Company and other factions in the business that we will not submit to any menace whatsoever in our conduct of this paper. The threat of the withdrawal of advertising patronage will not weigh with us, so long as we are conscious of doing our duty fairly, impartially, disinterestedly, towards the great public, to which the MOVING PICTURE WORLD appeals.

In the affairs of life, the worst drawback to success is a thin skin. Thin skins seem to be somewhat numerous just now. Not a single line has been printed in this paper with regard to the Sales Company, that is not fair comment; that is not based upon fact; that has not been inspired by a desire to see the moving picture business prosper. We have said over and over again that just in so far as the Sales Company exists for the good of the business it shall have the support of this paper. If we think that it is not for the good of the business we shall say so. The Sales Company has a very fine opportunity, but, apparently it is not using that opportunity to the best advantage, otherwise there would not be all this confusion on the Independent side of things. There would not be an association of Independent maufacturers, discontented renters, discontented importers. Dissatisfaction, it is said, is the root of progress, and the fact that the Independent Manufacturers' Association crystalizes dissatisfaction and discontent plus very considerable business determination in our opinion, points to the failure of the opposing elements rather than the reverse.

We are in the mood to concede that all possible opportunity should be given the Sales Company to have every chance of making good. Weeks ago, over and over again, our excellent friend Cochrane aassured us in this office that the company was on the level; that it was formed for the betterment of the business; that it was equitable, all fair and square, and above board. We should like to ask him and others whether they can conscientiously lay their hands over their hearts and say that events from the Chicago meeting downwards, have substantiated their pious claims. "Do we sleep; do we dream or is visions about." Why has there been such a wholesale repudiation of the Sales Company by important elements in the business? Let Mr. Herbert Miles, Mr. Baumann, Mr. Powers, or Mr. Cochrane employ the literary talent at their disposal, sit down and write us a letter for publication, laying their views before our readers and we shall be pleased to publish it.

MOTION PICTURES IN SCHOOL.

The Pittsburg "Leader" of May 31 had the following editorial:

In the Morse School last week Professor C. E. Connolley, dean of the School of Apprentices and Journeymen at the Carnegie Technical Schools, delivered a lecture on motion pictures in the public schools to illustrate geography, history and other subjects. Moving pictures were used in presenting the subject to an audience of more than 400.

An Open Market and An Open Door.

We had written the articles under the captions of "Confusion Worse Confounded" and "The Sales Company Once More," when opportunity was given us of taking a less pessimistic view of the Independent situation than we felt obliged by circumstances and evidence to favor until the latter part of this present week. The dove of peace was circling between the camps of Fourteenth street and Twenty-fifth street for a time, but to no effective purpose. The poor bird was driven away, frankly, we believe, because the differences between the Sales Company and the Associated Manufacturers were found to be irreconcilable. Still, we are in hope that, in due time, the best elements of both parties will get together and heal the breach. That, however, is not likely to happen yet. Meanwhile we take sincere pleasure in recording the fact that under the presidency of A. D. Cromelin, of the Columbia Phonograph Company, the Associated Independent Manufacturers seem determined to vindicate their right to individual freedom in a very thorough and a very business-like manner. Indeed, in all our recent experiences of these film palavers, we have never been so much impressed as we were on Thursday last by the unanimity and business determination to effect a manufacturers' organization which, all working in harmony, shall stand for the freedom of better government of the film business. More of this spirit in other quarters would, we think, result in closing up the divided ranks. We have received a large volume of evidence that the programme and policy of the Associated Manufacturers is well favored by numerous exchanges. If sentiment counts for anything, then we cannot see how this body can favor its object, which is to keep an open market and to give the individual manufacturer liberty of action, subject, of course, to some common agreement with regard to terms and methods of doing business.

In all this there is an important principle at stake which we fear our friends on Fourteenth street do not sufficiently realize. It is the principle of liberty of action, the principle of a manufacturer selling his good himself for himself and by himself to whom he pleases without being bound down to sell those goods to the agency of a competitor or a group of competitors who charge him so much a week for the privilege. We have no reason to doubt the bona fides of the Sales Company, but we certainly incline to the opinion that the suspicions and objections of the Associated Manufacturers are reasonable and rational, whether they be ill or well founded. There are other elements of a personal nature which need not be discussed.

There is one thing we like about the Association of Independent Manufacturers: they deliberately have opened their doors, they give us all the information in their power; they court publicity, they give us, of this journal, every opportunity of judging of the justice and business desirability of their cause, and we are bound to say without assuming a judicial position that we think everything justifies the steps they are taking. They are a representative body, they are not autocrats and domineering or secretive. If we may coin a motto for the Association of Independent Manufacturers, we should say it is this: "An open market and an open door."

The Association has certainly opened the Independent market to all. It is keeping the door open for the admission of those who are outside and who might be willing to co-operate with them in their policy. In this respect, then, the Association deserves the support of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD and shall receive it. Progress, therefore, must be conceded to have been made on the Independent side of things when we find such a spirit [illegible] actuating an association which is conceived on broad and equitable lines. Any business to be successful must be conducted on the principles of other business—that is, of freedom of trade and freedom of individual action, with quality the determining factory of success.

The General Film Company.

The demon of unrest seems to pervade the moving picture industry more than any other. But there is one cloud that we want to dispel and that is the feeling that the General Film Company will interfere with the business of the licensed exchanges or the exhibitors. We have dug down to the root of this matter and can positively assure our readers that any action on the part of the General Film Company will be palliative and not aggressive. They will recognize the territorial rights of licensed exchanges. Their own business will be conducted as an individual exchange with branch offices. These offices will be added to as they may see fit, but no compulsory methods will be adopted to acquire the business of other exchanges. Whenever this is done it will be on terms equitable to all concerned. Under general manager Percy L. Waters the General Film Company branches are already working in complete harmony and the resident managers and their customers are well pleased with the system. The exhibitor will be the gainer and the public, as they will profit, by the better regulation of programs and the elimination of repeaters and duplication of films in theaters close to each other.

So the General Film Company is but a step toward the better regulation of a gigantic business. It offers an assurance to the exhibitors who have invested large sums of money and encourages the entrance of other capitalists into that field.

Vaudeville Vitiates the Pictures.

In reference to the article under this caption which appeared in last week's MOVING PICTURE WORLD, we were interested to perceive in the "New York Herald" of last Sunday the following letter, which we reproduce exactly as it was printed in the pages of our contemporary:

WOMAN COMPLAINS OF MODERN VAUDEVILLE.

[illegible] New York, June 3, 1910.

To the Editor of the Herald:

Some weeks ago the worst show seen on Broadway in many days was closed by order of the Mayor. It is a wonder that some of the acts at different vaudeville houses are not taken off. We have to endure half clad women, whose acts savor greatly of indecency; but last night at a well known vaudeville house an audience, composed mostly of women, was compelled to listen to a negro monologist, whose "stuff," in vaudeville parlance, was positively intolerable.

Vaudeville in this country has become execrable. Nude women and comedians black and white—who tell "off" stories. Decent acts get by without a ripple of applause, but jokes of a low order bring forth loud and boisterous guffaws.

People like to be amused at a vaudeville show, and they don't want to pay their money to see and hear things that are indecent. A WOMAN.

The complaint of this lady is probably well founded. If the quality of vaudeville at the ordinary vaudeville house is such as she describes, it can easily be imagined that quality hardly undergoes any considerable improvement by the time the acts reach the humble moving picture theater. Vaudeville all around is in a deplorable condition in New York City. And not alone in New York. Last week in Chicago a vaudeville act was condemned by the police because the performer appeared almost in a state of nudity. It is from association with such forms of "entertainment" that we want to separate the moving picture.

An Australian Lady on the American Moving Picture.

The American public is always eager to learn the views of visitors to this country upon its institutions and the impressions which they have either upon the traveler, or those who intend to make the United States their home. In the last number of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, we devoted a brief article to the personality of Mrs. Armand Kellerman, who has arrived in New York for the purpose of taking an active part in the film business. And now we have the pleasure of giving our readers the substance of an interview we had with her recently for the purpose of ascertaining her ideas with reference to the moving picture outlook in the United States as compared with that of Australia. Perhaps we vast continent. Its population is roughly about 4,000,000, may be permitted to say that Mrs. Kellerman is a lady of very great culture and information; therefore, her views on the subject will no doubt carry great weight with our readers.

MRS. ARMAND KELLERMAN.

As to Australia: Americans are singularly deficient in knowledge of the possibilities and potentialities of that but it is an enormously rich country, and we are assured that head for head the inhabitants of Australia are wealthier than the inhabitants of any other country on the face of the globe. The natural resources of the country are practically inexhaustible, and are as yet almost untouched.

Mrs. Kellerman told us that the Australian public is a very sporting public. It likes sporting themes in its pictures. It will not tolerate vaudeville in moving picture houses. The prices of admission range from ten cents to seventy-five cents. Everybody goes to the picture house in Australia: rich, poor, aristocrat and plebeian. Moreover, the picture is enormously popular with the children, who, as in the United States, spend their last penny in order to get into the moving picture house. Pathe pictures enjoy great esteem there; but, in Mrs. Kellerman's opinion, there are not enough scenic subjects shown. Such a subject as that depicting the American Rockies pleases everybody. Educational pictures would be popular with the Australian public if they were shown, because, according to our informant, the average Australian has a great thirst for information and knowledge.

It will interest the American reader to know that moving picture theaters are not open on Sundays in Australia. Moreover, the clergy, unlike their American confreres, do not say unkind things about the pictures. They encourage rather than depreciate them. This, perhaps, is chiefly due to the fact that objectionable pictures are never shown in Australia, where every attempt is made to prevent the minds of children being misdirected by unsuitable subjects. Generally speaking, according to Mrs. Kellerman, the moving picture is increasing in favor with the Australian public. The houses are always full, there is aways good music, and the public seems to like a six-day program. People go again and again to see their favorite pictures.

Questioned as to her impressions of American moving picture business men, she said that they struck her as hardworking, alert, smart and shrewd. Generally speaking, she likes the American pictures and thinks they would be popular in Australia. She, however, was very emphatic in her condemnation of American vaudeville, which she said would not be tolerated in Australia for an instant. She is of the opinion that American film manufacturers do not realize the enormous opening in Australia for moving pictures.

English pictures are popular in Australia, where such subjects as those just being released by the American Kinograph Company would most certainly be appreciated. Mrs. Kellerman was anxious to impress upon us the fact that sporting subjects such as racing, Western and cowboy scenes, anything of a dramatic, competitive or exciting nature, assuredly would be liked by the Australian public. Sound effects are made a feature in the Australian moving picture theater, where the Cinephone is also prominent.

Business in Australia is exceedingly good and improving all the time. The authorities leave the picture alone and do not seek to harass the business. Again, there is no antagonism between the moving picture theater and the regular theater. And according to our informant no actors or actresses have been put out of business in Australia by the moving picture theater.

We are pleased to learn that Mrs. Kellerman is highly appreciative of the best aspects of the moving picture in the United States. Like a true Australian woman she is full of enthusiasm and confidence for the future of the business in Australia. We commend this interesting information to the careful attention of our readers.

A new Mirror Screen was recently placed in the Star Theater of Elgin, Ill. Mr. James Sullivan, manager of the Star, appears well satisfied and has nothing but good to say about his new curtain.

The many different ways in which animated pictures may be used is ever evincing itself in all manner of means. The latest use that has come to our notice is that employed by a North Dakota mine expert, who wishing to interest European capitalists with sufficient proof that would remove any doubt from the skeptical minds of the foreigners, had numerous pictures taken of his mine in operation, showing the workings and machinery. To further prove his claim he carried on the film affidavits from the manufacturer of his reels that the views were absolutely genuine and that they were taken on the particular property of the owner.

Pictures of the Jeffries-Johnson Fight.

July the 4th this year is to have double significance of more than ordinary interest to the world. It is, as everybody knows, Independence Day. It may be, as the saner section of the community, also hopes, shorn of some of the pyrotechnical absurdities that have hitherto distinguished it or shall we say disgraced it. But above all things this next 4th of July is to be made memorable in the annals of pugilism by the long discussed meeting between the old time champion of the ring, James J. Jeffries, and his successor, the present holder of the title, a person of color, known as Jack Johnson.

An astonishing amount of interest throughout the world is felt with regard to this approaching fight, for several reasons. Jeffries was always a good man at the game, was, we believe, undefeated, retired amidst a blaze of glory and has only emerged from that retirement in order to appease popular sentiment, which is against a "gentlemen of color" being permitted, in the United States, where the color question is somewhat acute, to wear without dispute the proud title of the fistic championship.

According to the newspapers the men have been in hard training for several weeks. Both are confident and in good condition. It is certain that on July the 4th, a huge crowd will witness the contest. Not the least important part of the fight is its moving picture side. It is no exaggeration to say that the entire world will await a pictorial representation of the fight. We read that hundreds of thousands of dollars are being offered for the rights of taking moving pictures of the contest. With a good light and a battle of, say, thirty well-fought rounds, and the unmistakable victory of Jeffries, these pictures should prove in the current locution, a "gold mine." This is the wish that is father to the thoughts of hundreds of millions of white people throughout the world.

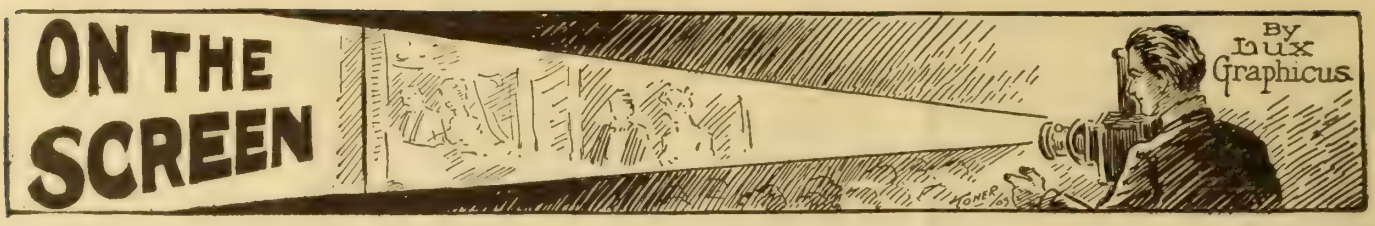
There is the other possibility that Mr. Johnson may prove the better man of the two. Many good judges think that he will, in virtue of the fact that although Jeffries has strength, ability, courage and all the rest of it, he has not fought for several years, whereas Johnson is constantly fighting and has vanquished all the opponents that have stood up to him with ridiculous ease. In the language of the racing track, he is in a winning vein. As our sporting readers know—and we have many sporting readers—it is good policy in these matters to back winners. What will happen, then, if Johnson wins? It is commonly believed that the pictures would then be of comparatively little value, especially amongst the white section of the community. Amongst the colored section, however, their value would be greater. Racial pride would come in to exalt Johnson, in the eyes of his brethren, to the position of a demigod. There are political, social, and other possibilities arising out of Johnson's conceivable victory, which is not our province to discuss, and which it would not be prudent so to do.

After the fight, then, interest in this affair will swing to moving picture theaters throughout the world. If the pictures are good and interesting scores of millions of people will be looking at the photographic representation of the battle. We say scores of millions of people, advisedly, and we do not think we exaggerate. They will no doubt be shown in every important part of the civilized world. Shown not once but many times while they may also become of historic value.

You can see, therefore, that the business side of this fight centers chiefly in the picture. The purse or purses, the ring side fees, the bets, all this money will be trifling compared with the amount of money that will be made out of the pictures by the principals in the contest, the exhibitors and those who actually take the pictures. Who will take the pictures?

For weeks past the newspapers have told us that there have been competitive bids by various manufacturers for the picture rights. None of these bids so far as we can learn, have yet been closed. The probabilities point to the rights being secured by the associated manufacturers working under the License of the Patents Company. So, that, whatever risks are incurred, the business way of things may be distributed over a number of heads instead of concentrated in one, thus dividing possible losses and of course probable profits.

Mr. W. T. Rock, the president of the Vitagraph Company of America has gone West for the purpose of securing the picture fight rights on behalf of the associated manufacturers. This is an enterprise entirely after Mr. Rock's heart. As everybody knows he is one of the shrewdest men of business in the game, and no doubt he will be successful in his request. Even a president of such a great and progressive concern as the Vitagraph Company, may feel some little legitimate pride in handling a gigantic proposition of this nature. For it is gigantic. It transcends in importance financially and popularity we are bound to admit, although we do it with some reluctance, the Roosevelt pictures and even the King Edward pictures. All of us, every mother's son of us, no matter who we are or what we are, love a fight. All of us at some time or another have fought fights fistically and otherwise and, when, as in the present case, the eyes of the world are really turned towards this white man and this colored man fighting one of the fights of all time, don't you, reader, as well as ourselves, envy Mr. Rock and his mission? Frankly, we do. And that is why in this number of the Moving Picture World we are giving the portrait of the man who is after the fight pictures.



"The Child."—Thomas Carlyle in one of his books uses a phrase applicable to all of us who are suffering more or less from Anno Domini; that is to say, getting on in life, when he calls us "children of a larger growth. Far be it from me to enter into competition with this eminent philosopher in his keen, merciless, and always just analysis of our common humanity; but, at a respectable distance I may allow myself to say ditto to his sentiments. We are all just children, old children, young children, big children, little children; in fact, the babe and the child never dies in us. That is what I think Carlyle meant in his "heart of hearts." Of course, it is in respect of his intense humanism, that his delightful old house on Cheyne Walk with all the relics of his beautiful Gothic career are still preserved as a public museum, and are visited by hundreds of thousands of the most human people on the face of the globe—Americans.

The boy is father to the man and the girl is the mother of both the man and the women, which is perhaps a round about but possibly an intelligible way of saying that the little people to-day are the mothers and fathers of the future race. Therefore any influence exerted on their minds whilst in childhood or adolescence, clearly is bound to have a vast effect for good or evil on further human progress. You will perceive, brethern, that at this moment I am in a reflectively, speculatively philosophical frame of mind. In other words, I am looking to the future of the moving picture, a subject which all of us associated with The Moving Picture World have at heart.

* * *

It has happened since I last figured in this page that I have been brought into contact with many children and have heard from them what they and their children think about the picture. They think such a lot. With them it is the picture at all costs. One can overlook the alleged juvenile peccadillo of appropriating an occasional domestic nickel for the purpose of gratifying a desire to see the picture. Because, as I have said above, it is so intensely human. The child when it reaches the age of reason is possibly not animated by the stringency of moral laws or ethical considerations in its desires to gratify a love for one of the most extraordinary phenomena in natural science—I mean the moving picture. Deep in its small heart it is a desire to see it because it touches the chords of curiosity, wonderment, delight and that soupcon of the mysterious, that is inbred, inborn and innate in human nature. This is the effect which close observation shows that the moving picture has upon juvenile human nature.

* * *

I have often wondered in these last few months whether there was any flagging in public appreciation of the moving picture as means of entertainment, instruction and the like. Assuredly not, as far as I can see, hear and believe amongst the oldsters. I satisfy myself about this over and over again. We all like the picture, dont we? We are liking it more and more and we want to see it presented in even better shape than it is being presented.

* * *

But what of the children? A recent number of The Moving Picture World contains evidence of what children think about the picture and also this week there are articles pointing out the scientific and other values of the moving picture in regard to the entertainment and education of the little people. These reflections of mine were arrived at quite independently of what appear here. They are the outcome of ersonal experiences.

* * *

All these last few days I happened fortuitously to be brought into the society of many young people and those who are responsible for their charge; those who sympathize with them; those who desire that their lives here should be happy. They infallibly turn to the picture as giving something which no other human agency that I am aware of affords.

* * *

It is the children of the present time who are making or marring the future of the picture. I prefer to think that they are making rather than marring it. In other words, that what goes on in the moving picture to-day is parallel to what goes on in the school.

* * *

Is it not then vitally incumbent upon those responsible for the preparation and production of the picture to be certain, sure and positive that no pictures are released which do harm to the childish outlook; that nothing is shown on the screen which is likely to produce an effect of a repellant nature on the juvenile mind. I am of course aware that there is nothing new or novel in these sentiments, but I have thought that they would bear repetition, simply by reason of the fact that the attention of those who are sincerely interested in the progress of the picture seems recently to have been directed towards the urgent necessity of considering the best interests of the children in this matter. This sort of thing comes and goes, ebbs and flows. It is coming and going, ebbing and flowing just now. In other words it is in people's minds.

* * *

This week I read in a newspaper that the suicide of a small child was attributed to the influence of the moving picture. Nonsense! I have heard, too, that small children occasionally stay away from school to go and see the picture. I do not and cannot blame them if the pictures are good. School is usually a very dull place, as we all know, whereas the good picture, the instructive picture, is never dull and teaches more easiy and readily than maps and blackboards or books. Better, in my mind, that children should go to see pictures, in their spare hours, or even in their truant hours, rather than they should roam the streets, thereby contracting bad manners and risking the corruption of their morals.

A properly administered moving picture theater, that is a theater in the hands of responsible, conscientious men and women, is on the whole a better agency for good than the irresponsible streets of New York City, where the young mind is allowed to do just as it "darn well pleases," and runs the risk of permanent deflection from the right. Which, then, brethren, do you think is the more dangerous menace to the minds and morals of children,—a properly conducted moving picture theater or the lawless libertinisism and license of the streets of a great metropolis? In the interests of the child, therefore, let us hear no more, if you please, about the alleged degrading tendencies, influences, and opportunities for evil, of the moving picture theater. Take it from me, children come to more harm in the streets of a city than in its theaters.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE PICTURE SHOW.

The transformation of an old theatrical landmark like the Academy of Music in New York into a hall for moving picture shows is a significant sign of the times. To many people the change marks the degeneracy of a building on the stage of which so many famous actors and prima donnas appeared, and which was for years the great social center of the metropolis. But that is a superficial view to take. Opera and drama are enshrined in other temples more accessible to the well-to-do, while the moving picture, which began in small structures on a limited plan, has progressed in its development to now occupy a great auditorium and be presented on a lavish scale. The moving picture show appeals to the multitude as no other form of entertainment ever did. Evils have attended it and the usual outcry has been raised against it by moralists unable to see that it had come to stay and be developed, and that there were in it, with proper regulation, vast potentialities for good. A greater educational force for the masses could not be devised. In combination with music and literature the moving picture is destined in the near future to be a supreme attraction for all classes of people and to wield an immense influence on the thought of mankind.—Newark Star.

I picked up a copy of the Moving Picture World the other day and I saw the headline "The General Film Company." At first I thought it was one of those ordinary repetitions of rumors of rumors. Instead of that it was an official announcement that the Chicago, Denver, Boston and New York offices operated by the Kleine Optical Company, the Lubin Film Service of Philadelphia, and the Howard Film Exchange of Boston, had passed over into the control of some other person. I really expected that within a week or two Messrs. Kleine, Lubin and Howard would be acting the parts of retired millionaires and that the subservient forces would be back at their old business. But, strange as it may seem, there is no apparent change. It is rumored that Mr. Kleine received a stupendous amount of money to give his agencies. So far as his department goes he is still serving Mr. Kleine; so far as his spirits go he is satisfied, and so far as his labors go we see no change. The same with Mr. Howard, of Boston, and Mr. Lubin, of Philadelphia. They have admittedly made a deal with the General Film Company, and all agree that it is best for all concerned. I can vouch for this because I got it from a little cosy corner, but if any doubt it they can get it from the men themselves.

"The handwriting upon the wall," says somebody. P. L. Waters, always identified with the Edison interests, becomes the general manager of the General Film Company. Many people are sceptical regarding Mr. Waters for the reason that he has been in more ways than one closely allied with the Edison interests; but no man who knows the man, knows his independence, his freedom of thought, his indifference to gain, can say that it was a "frame-up." Indirectly I happen to know something of Mr. Waters' business methods. He never requires a written contract. His word is given and your word is taken. If you break he holds you. I don't know of an instance where anybody has had occasion to hold him. He is one of those peculiar men who tell you off the reel what is going to happen, and if it happens he tells you in such a genial way that you pay up and shut up. In the Winter time you find him seated at his desk wearing a straw hat. In the Summer time you find him at the same place wearing a felt hat, and yet donned in the latest cut of Summer wear. He is actually peculiar in his way. He is always free of debt, yet he pays you when he feels like it. He never worries about his bank balance because he always feels that he has enough to carry him through. He is a most peculiar fellow. And yet his peculiarities have elevated to the standard of confidence placed in him. Honest, unassuming, and fully appreciative to all the subordinate assistance rendered him, he enjoys the confidence and well wishes of all above and below him. I understand that his idea was that when the General Film Company purchased his exchange he intended to lay back on his oars and drift with the tide for the balance of his days. Well, there is no disputing the fact that he sold his exchange, but he is not drifting. He is a most busy man. Some people seem to think that, so far as he is concerned personally, it was a cut and dried proposition. I happen to have undisputed evidence that Mr. Waters was repeatedly spoken of as general manager of the General Film Company, and he repeatedly not only discountenanced the reports, but in most positive terms stated he would not accept the position, but wished to leave the moving picture field altogether and take a well-deserved rest. This he could do, for he has made money in the business. He was eventually persuaded to change his mind and accept the position. I want to say right here, that knowing Mr. Waters as I do, I believe he has undertaken the office in the utmost good faith, and he will make good.

But enough of Mr. Waters. If there is any man on the face of the globe who hates "taffy" it is he. If you wish to get him angry just tell him how fair and square he is. He is not profane by any means, but don't get him worked up. And non-committal! Well, I asked him the other day where I would be able to find him, and what do you think he said? This: "If the elevator is not working and you have good wind walk right up."

* * *

I was very much interested in a recent letter in the Moving Picture World in which a subscriber asked why it was that on the one pictures produced the [illegible] always made the [illegible] victory for the Southern forces. I was not quite prepared with any explanation, so I consulted some people to learn why the misstatement. I think their explanations are quite satisfactory. The results of my investigations [illegible] that south of Pennsylvania and east of the Mississippi moving picture films would be capitalization outside of the Picture issue. Out on California and Washington and Oregon and there is really nothing between the coast and Nebraska. There may be plenty of moving picture houses, but they are what is known as "[illegible] territorials." In this sweep I have covered considerable territory, but I will draw the line to the Mississippi on the west and the southern line of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois and Indiana. Taking all the territory south and east of the lines I have drawn, I will quote a gentleman prominently identified with one of the leading manufacturers. Everybody concedes that there is no more North and South except the moving picture man. The South can be made a wonderfully productive country, and it is in some lines, but it takes capital. I speak now of only licensed exchanges. Alabama is on record for but two in the entire State, and they are located in the heart of the mining regions—Birmingham. North and South Carolina have none. Florida has some. Mississippi has none. Tennessee has one. Virginia and West Virginia, none; and Georgia none. Louisiana has some outside of New Orleans; Texas has none outside of Dallas. There may be many picture theaters in many towns and cities of all these States, but they cannot secure first-class service with the supply stations so remotely located. Now, a picture play showing as a climax a glorious victory by the good old fighting Confederates would no doubt receive a great hand throughout the territory I have mentioned, but the applause and huzzas do not pay either the renter nor the manufacturer. Let it also be understood that all pictures thus far issued bearing upon the Civil War have been story pictures. If they were historical the point taken by the correspondent might be sustained. I can recall but one historical American war picture, and that was based upon the Revolution, in which the life of Washington was brought in consp[illegible]ously, not too much so, but very agreeably. There have been some pictures bearing upon the civil war in which President Lincoln, General Grant, General Lee and others have been drawn in incidentally, but only so because the desire has been to avoid bringing up unpleasant memories. The trend of thought in most instances has been to sustain the ever growing feeling that the result has been for the best of all. Personally, I care nothing for that sensation which is produced by the reflection of explosions, the charges of infantry and cavalry, the writhing of the wounded, and like scenes. Many like the exhilaration, and many exhibitors seek such pictures as features."

* * *

I can see that the manufacturer of moving pictures is like the hat and clothing manufacturer. He caters to the market that provides the greatest outlet. A picture based upon the life of Napoleon creates interest throughout the world. This has been proved. This same is true with regard to Washington. But would it pay any manufacturer to launch the life of General Grant or General Lee? That is the question. Neither of these great men have sufficiently passed into history to warrant the idealization attached to the others. True, their accomplishments and records are rich in the memory of those of the present day, but it is long after one is dead that his true merits are appreciated. I notice that the English and American, Irish and other flags receive the glad hand when they victoriously appear in a picture, but not one in the applauding audience notices, or gives attention, to the bearers. I have seen a soldier struggle laboriously up a rampart to replace a flag, but it was not until the flag was floating to the breeze that the audience applauded. The flag was the incentive, not the deed.

It may be surmised from what I have written that because the Southern States have such a poor representation in the picture field their supremacy in battle scenes should be suppressed. I hope this idea will not be entertained. I do not wish to make that impression and I know the manufacturing representatives with whom I have consulted are not inclined that way. The point is simply this: Satisfy the balance of trade, and that takes in a territory that is practically limited, although there may be 10,000 to 12,000 exhibitors in the United States. It is not so long ago that a gentleman whom I know to be well acquainted with the moving picture business walked up to a map hanging upon a wall and drew a circle around the area of what he called "the picture business." What do you suppose it took in? I'll tell you. On the north, Buffalo; south and east, Greater New York. Now this may seem ridiculous, but the guess was not a bad one. It is a safe bet that, so far as the exchanges are concerned, Greater New York exchanges are doing better than any others in the country. They are getting better prices. The second best appear to be the exchange men in the far West and Southwest. On the surface it appears that most people seem to either wait for business to come to them, or sacrifice everything to get it, but in the successful centers it appears that those who go on the live-and-let-live policy are making good.

THE BUFFALO BILL AND PAWNEE BILL FILM COMPANY.

Probably one of the most startling announcements that have been made in the moving picture industry is the sudden entry into this industry of two pioneer Wild West men known to mostly every inhabitant of the globe. We allude to W. F. Cody (Buffalo Bill) and Major Gordon W. Lillie

(Pawnee Bill). They are going to produce Western subjects in addition to the ordinary dramatic pictures. Special attention will be given to spectacular productions. Historical incidents depicting various Indian battles and frontier exploitations, and particularly those in which Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill participated. The worldwide fame of Buffalo Bill, commonly known as the old scout, and his proclamation of his farewell tour in America, lend additional interest to the announcement that he has at last consented to pose before the moving picture camera. As neither one of the "Bills" had ever before been cinematographed it should prove a revelation in the production of Western pictures, as the entire roster of their Wild West and Far East company will participate. In addition to several tribes of Indians, including famous chiefs with their squaws and papooses dressed in their native costumes, cowboys, cowgirls and Mexicans and their speedy mustangs, the entire Far East portion of the show will be at the command of the producers in use for their various pictures. Mostly every nationality will be included in the entertainment provided by the noted Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill shows. Amongst the subjects to be released will be a two-reel subject showing the life of Buffalo Bill from his boyhood to his present age, and reproducing the various incidents of his strenuous career. Johnnie Baker, the famous sharp shooter and foster son of Buffalo Bill will stage the historical and spectacular productions which are to be made. Pictures will be made en route with the show until the close of the season in November, after which the productions will be staged at Col. Cody's ranch, Cody, Wyo., and at Major Lillie's ranch, Pawnee, Okla. Further information in regard to this important entrant into the moving picture field will be given in an early number. All correspondence should be addressed to P. B. Craft, general manager, Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Film Company, in care of The Moving Picture World.

SELIG VERSATILITY.

Considerable interest was shown in the wrestling match for the world's championship between Frank Gotch and Stanislaus Zbyszko which took place at the Coliseum, Chicago, on the first day of June, 1910, in which Gotch proved successful and threw the Polish giant twice in succession. Pictures, vividly portraying every minute detail, were taken by the Selig Polyscope Company, giving the preliminary training of the men before entering the ring. The pictures are a true sample of perfect photography and are intensely interesting throughout. The fact that Gotch won from Europe the championship and placed the laurel upon the American eagle will more than likely cause these pictures to be of international interest. State rights are now selling and the managers of Gotch and Zbyszko, namely, Messrs. Klark and Herman, are of the opinion that the picture will prove a great success.

The dazzling variety of subjects which continue to emanate from the Selig Polyscope Company, the great spectacular films, have ceased to be wondered at because they come with such regularity, but the recent issues, "After Many Years" and "The Bargeman of Old Holland" are equally noteworthy because of their success long descent list. Then we have Selig educational subjects, such as "Opening an Oyster" and the special feature film now ready of the "Gotch-Zbyszko World's Championship Wrestling Match." The arrangements for the procuring of this special film of worldwide interest shows to what extent the Selig Company go to secure subjects that make headliners—money-makers for the exhibitor. We learn that the Gotch-Zbyszko film is perfect in photography and clearly shows every move of the contest between these muscular giants.

Perhaps the ablest leading man in certain characters in the theater of America was brought to the Polyscope office not long ago for the purpose of inducing him to appear in an important moving picture story. This young leading man, an amateur photographer himself, was not enthusiastic over the prospect. Like many of his fellow craftsmen of good repute, he looked upon the bulk of moving picture productions as ridiculously crude efforts of bungling ignoramuses. "Is there no one," he asked, "prominent in moving photography who understands what acting is? Mr. Frohman, the greatest theatrical man in the United States, not only superintends the rehearsals of his plays, but actually rehearses more of them in different degrees; the same may be said of George Tyler—Leather—Klaw and Erlanger and the great fame of Belasco is builded upon stage directors. These theatrical men pass considerable time on the stage of their theater and give civilized productions, but your picture makers," he added, "are simple business men without dramatic knowledge and are rarely in their studios and would not know what to do if they went there."

After twenty minutes conversation with Mr. Selig he changed his mind at least about one picture maker, because he found in Mr. Selig a man abreast of the best dramatic thought of the time. The interview lasted two hours. They talked and talked well of the latest European theatrical productions of the past year, both men having visited Europe the same time in that year. From things dramatic they drifted to photography. He, Selig, was the master. The delighted and astonished young leading man found that the Polyscope maker was not only a student but an inventor as well. At the finish of the interview the leading man said, "Mr. Selig, you are a theatrical man in the moving picture business; you can get me for any picture any time you want and the price will not be heroic, for you know your book. I am more than pleased to have met you."

PATHES' AMERICAN PRODUCTIONS.

Pathe Freres announced their intention of releasing from now on one reel of American-made film each week. This week's release, "When Luck Deserts," came on the 7th. This is a story of a Dakota relative to a gentleman who left a fortune in the East. The wife rather than have native plains, stabs herself and the cowpuncher is pursued, captured and sentenced to death by her assassin, who took to be killed. In the nick of time the rescuers from what was only a ruse to explain that he is innocent and the result is that he decides to continue his happy life with his wife in preference to going East and taking possession of his inheritance. The following week, on June 14, Pathe Freres release "The Great Train Holdup," a sensational film of Western life. This is a picture that should be a great success. The way the robbers are located and ultimately captured gives a fine opportunity for good acting by the little boy and girl who take the parts of the sheriff's children.

LICENSED MANUFACTURERS AFTER THE FIGHT PICTURES.

Last Saturday Mr. W. T. Rock, president of the Vitagraph Company of America, left New York for San Francisco to meet the principals in the Johnson-Jeffries fight. It is reported that the Motion Picture Patents Company will secure the moving picture rights for the great championship contest. Mr. Rock has gone fully prepared to meet the stipulated conditions of the managers and close the deal and by the time it is on the scene of action. No more fitting occasion could have been chosen for this important mission. We wish him success. If we must have the fight pictures it is important that they be in the hands of a company that will handle them with dignity as well as for profit.

A complete series of slides depicting the most interesting periods of the training of Johnson and Jeffries for the coming conflict to take place in California, on July 4, is the latest offering of the Cosmopolitan Slide Makers. These slides show all of the interesting points in the preparation of these two champions from the signing of the articles to a glimpse of the artist's conception of how these men will appear in the ring on Independence Day, made up as a composite picture.

"A VICTIM OF HATE" ESSANAY'S NEXT BIG DRAMATIC RELEASE.

Miss Spier Featured in this Exceptional Film.

The dramatic productions of the Essanay's Chicago producers have lately attracted the attention of the film world in the extraordinary fine qualities of the films and their whole-souled endeavor to strike the higher mark. Other recent dramatic releases such as "The Danger Line," obtained much praise and were highly appreciated by the exhibitors all over the country, if the letters of congratulation received from many of them are to be taken as just criticism. "A Victim of Hate," it is claimed by the Essanay Company, is even superior to "The Danger Line" as a classic modern drama. In all respects it is of Broadway quality, beautifully staged and costumed, intelligently acted and photographically flawless. The picture will be released Wednesday, June 22.

The plot of the story concerns chiefly a young girl, loved by two men, who falls a victim of an ignominious conspiracy obtained by the degenerate and debauched lover, whom she refuses. Harry McAllison, a wealthy degenerate clubman, loves Dorothy Van Hagen, who is also loved by Algernon Trevost. McAllison seeks revenge and in a clever conspiracy lures Dorothy and Trevost to a wicked gambling place, which results in a separation of the two lovers, each believing the other to be habitues of the place. Dorothy is made seriously ill from the shock, and Trevost refuses to see her, but young McAllison, smarting under a guilty conscience, at last confesses that he led them into the trap. The story ends in the reconciliation of the lovers, who mercifully forgive McAllison for his ignominious conduct.

The dramatic incidents of the picture are thrilling but consistent. The story is interpreted by talented people, while the photography is up to the usual standard of the Essanay product.

Whatever the effect of the moving picture craze may have been in New York, it has played a small role in amusements compared to what has happened in that vast region patronizingly referred to as "the road." There it is a lucky manager who is able to get his public to pay the usual price of theater admission. Under the most favorable circumstances he can only hope to fill his orchestra seats and his balcony. The wise provincial theatergoer cannot be lured nowadays into paying 25 or 50 cents for a gallery seat when the moving pictures invite him in at 10.

Daniel Frohman is one of the managers who do not believe that the spoken drama will ever be permanently affected by the vogue of this new entertainment though he admits its great effect on theaters.

"Of course the drama acted by living persons will always possess an eloquence and power for its audiences that no mechanical device can ever acquire," he said. "The moving pictures are now in a state of transition and are destined to be better even than they are to-day. The next move will undoubtedly serve to combine the vision and the voice so that it will be possible to represent plays on these stages. While the films exhibit the action of the play to the spectator some talking machine arrangement of a kind that is still to be perfected will recite the dialogue, and thus the spectator will have as complete an illusion of acted drama as any mechanical means can produce. You can prophesy very readily where this will strike. I can foresee the time in the very near future when plays that have exhausted their popularity in the high priced theaters will be rented out to the electric film men just as they are now to stock companies. That probably will be very rough on the stock companies, but the price will be cheap, and the public will have the opportunity to see a play about which much has been written and there will remain the small price of admission, which is the real secret of the whole success of these

FUTURE OF MOVING PICTURES.

By Daniel Frohman, in the New York "Sun."

Last Monday night another playhouse deserted the spoken drama and took to moving pictures, thus increasing the number of theaters that are already dedicated to that purpose. Apart from the numerous stores, hallways and other crevasses occupied as moving picture theaters there are now ten well known theaters in use for that same purpose. Out of the ninety in New York this is probably not such an overwhelming proportion, but it illustrates the extent to which the public is willing to take its entertainment in this form. Next Fall the vast Academy of Music goes over to the flickering reflections, and it has been repeatedly rumored in the last month that a historic Broadway house will be dedicated to the same use after the present Summer.

entertainments. This phase of the play question came up in Washington the other day in the effort to protect managers and authors from the manufacturers of the films who tried to take their property without compensation.

"The moving pictures have already progressed into the second stage of their existence, and the vaudeville of the kind that is supplied with them now proves that the pictures in themselves were not sufficient. If persons of moderate means were not at such a loss to make both ends meet there never would have been the demand for the moving pictures that there is at present.

"Men and women of small means no longer go to the play for entertainment. They can find enough of that in the picture show at a price which demands less self-sacrifice. Evidence of this is found in the empty galleries of all but a few of the theaters. To attract the poor man now a play must be sensational to its extreme or it must have some theme of vital importance. To be merely entertaining means, however, in these days that it is likely to make no money for its managers. In this respect the picture shows have made impossible the success of a play that would have taxed very well ten years ago or more. Now it takes an 'Easiest Way' or something equally sensational to make the poor man spend his money on the theater. Just think of the change in public taste, and only a few years ago at the old Lyceum Theater I had to make the heroine of 'Sweet Lavender' legitimate in order to suit the public taste and was never able to give 'The Second Mrs. Tanqueray' at all, although I tried to get permission to give it at a matinee. In those days married women sneaked off surreptitiously to see 'The Second Mrs. Tanqueray' at a matinee and were shocked when they accidentally were seen by their friends. To-day young girls sit in a box at such a piece as 'The Easiest Way.'"

The educational value of the moving pictures will in Mr. Frohman's opinion prevent them from having any permanent effect on the active drama. Cheap melodrama has almost gone out of existence because the audiences that used to get delight out of it have been educated to a point that makes them demand something else. The education of moving picture gazers will eventually dissatisfy them with the replica of an active drama and will make them long to see the persons of the actors and hear the sound of their voices to dance for the delectation of a half-drunken crew of cowboys who show their good nature and generosity when it is discovered that the artist is trying to reach the bedside of his sick child.

The Ruling Passion" is a great comedy drama of Mexican life by the author of "The Song of the Church" and "The Palatine Princess." This will be the release of June 30 and will be followed by another cowboy comedy, entitled "The Little Deputy."

Melies has justly won the reputation in the last few months of turning out the most consistent Western pictures now being made, and his working staff near San Antonio includes Mrs. Melies, madame, who furnish their own horses and equipment. Watch for the great rolling picture soon to be released, "The Postal Substitute."

"THELMA" FILMED BY THANHOUSER.

The Thanhouser Company have pulled off another "classic" and dramatized at Mystic Corners "Thelma." This great work has been treated for the picture patron in the best style of the picture producer, and in the "cutting down" process attendant on the transfer of a 300-page novel into a limited length of film, it is pleasant to note that only the superfluous and tedious has been "cut" and that the thread of the story, in all its original strength is preserved to the full.

"Thelma" practically established Marie Corelli's American reputation and the mere billboard announcement of the delivering speeches that the talking machine has intoned. After a while they will thus be brought around to the drama again.

"Only to the drama with a theme, however," Mr. Frohman said; "never again shall plays merely provide agreeable entertainment. I am convinced that some social or economic thesis has become almost indispensable to the success of a play in this country."

MELIES NOTES.

The percentage of comedy releases is about one in five, and these pictures are always eagerly snapped up by the exhibitors, especially when the release happen to be a Melies cowboy comedy.

This week that firm is turning out "A Texas Joke," which is a screaming story of a joke played by some cowboys on their foreman, and the way in which he turned the laugh upon them.

Melies has a great double feature for the release of Thursday, June 23. It is a drama of the love of a cowboy and an Indian for the daughter of an Indian chief, with a fight for the possession of the maid in which the right man wins. This picture is called "White Doe's Lovers," and the opening scene, where the Indian maiden is shown sailing a birch-bark canoe down a stream, is alone worth the price of admission.

On the same reel is 280 feet of a screaming comedy, "The Stranded Actor," wherein this dilapidated Thespian is made novel as a film will have no small advertising value. The film is released on Tuesday, June 21. The title role is played by Miss Rosemont with Frank Crane as Sir Philip Errington, Yvonne Marvin as Lady Clara Insley and Alphonse Ethier as Viking Olaf.

THE KING EDWARD FILM.

Never before in the history of local motion pictures has a film created such general interest as that at the theaters this week showing the funeral cortege and other incidents attending the burial of the late King Edward of England. The film is an excellent one as to detail and photography and many of the crowned heads of Europe, the army representatives and many other notables of England are seen paying their last respects to England's greatest ruler of the century.—Springfield, Ohio, "Sun."

PROCTOR'S PUTS IN HALLBERG MACHINES.

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, 28 Greenwich avenue, New York, has equipped F. F. Proctor's new Bijou Dream, at Newark, N. J., with a Motiongraph machine and two "Hallberg" Economizers. This is one of the most modern and up-to-date combinations, and the flickerless and brilliant pictures obtained are attracting widespread attention. Mr. Proctor is now using several Motiongraphs and has been using the "Hallberg" Economizer for the past two years in his other theaters.

OPERATOR'S COLUMN.

Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Setting Shutters.—New York City, N. Y., writes asking that I give illustrated instructions for setting the shutter of Power's No. 5, Power's No. 6, Edison one and Edison two-pin machines and the Motiograph.

I hardly think this is feasible or even desirable. There are so many different models of the various machines, mostly with a somewhat different shutter for each model, that that one thing would render such instructions of slight value. I would much rather try to get the operators to understand the underlying principle of the shutter and they would then be able to set any shutter with very little trouble. It must be understood that the office of the shutter is to cut off the light while the intermittent sprocket is in motion. That is what the shutter is for and it is for nothing else under the sun. The wide blade is always the one that does the business, the narrow blade (or blades, where shutter is in two pieces, as in the Motiograph) being merely to help to eliminate the flicker. The narrow blade is disregarded utterly in setting any shutter. Now, in order that the shutter cut as small a percentage of the light as is practical without developing a "travel ghost" (white streaks shooting up or down from white objects in the picture or from letters in a title), the shutter is made narrow enough so that it does not quite cover the aperture during all the time the film is in motion. It has been found that although the film may start to move while the aperture is still open about one-fourth (I speak of all shutters except the double wing variety like the Motiograph now) there is no evil effect. This is called making the shutter "late." But, on the other hand, however, it is usually necessary that the shutter cover the entire aperture until the film has stopped moving. In other words, while it is possible to allow some leeway at the beginning of the movement, none is permissible at the last end. One thing I must mention, viz.: where the shutter does not travel with the frameup carriage the frameup should always be set midway of its travel before setting the shutter. With the Motiograph, if you have the two wings just barely come together in exactly the center of the aperture just as the intermittent sprocket starts to move you will be all right. As to the outside shutters (shutters in front of the lens, such as the Power's No. 6), they are easier than easy. Just loosen the screws which hold it until it will slip under slight pressure. Now put in a film and run a couple of feet, stop and slip the shutter a trifle, run some more, slip the shutter a little more and so on until you get it exactly right. You can tell when it is just right by framing up a little past the lower dividing line and a little down past the upper dividing line. If the dark dividing lines between the pictures look all right and not streaked and your picture looks O. K., too, you have it just right. You can, of course, do the same thing with an inside shutter but it is a lot of work. In the first models of the Power's No. 6 there was no provision for setting the shutter. The company will, however, supply shutter hubs which can be set, on application. Study the action of the shutter and learn its real operating principle and you will, I think, have no trouble.

Machines.—Greenville, Miss., writes asking advice as to what make of machine to purchase. Naturally I cannot answer such questions in the column. Greenville also wishes to know if one 6½ and one 7½ condensing lens is right for a 5½-inch projection lens. I think two 7½ lenses would be better, but as he says he is getting good results I would advise him to stick to his present combination. It is "results" that is desired and no matter how they are arrived at provided you get them.

Lining Up the Machine.—Some weeks since we published a letter from Mr. A. W. Crowe, Watertown, S. D., on the importance of having aperture, projection and condensing lens all in exact line with each other. Mr. Crowe now writes that he has had several requests for further information as to his method of lining the machine. He sends sketch showing how he does it and asks that we explain the matter in the column, which we, of course, gladly do.

Neighbor Crowe's method is to lay a straightedge along the top of the machine and lamphouse, presumably lining the lenses and aperture sidewise and dropping a plum-bob from one edge thereof. He then lays the straightedge alongside the machine and lines the openings up and down by it. Now while this is perfectly natural I think a line would serve a little better. Fasten your machine and lamphouse to the baseboard or whatever they are to rest on. Now remove the lenses from each end of the projector, also both the condensing lenses. Next fix a wooden brace across the lamphouse, inside, near its back end, cut so that while it fits tight still you can slip it up and down. Just in front of the projection lens set up a standard. Now stretch a thread, or fine string, between the standard in front of the projector and the stick in the lamphouse. Next keep moving the string at both ends until measuring shows it to be exactly in the center of the outer end of the projection lens jacket and exactly in the center of the condenser opening. Now move your machine so that the string is exactly in the center of the aperture and you are done. Have the standard in front of the lens quite close to it (not more than an inch away) or when you move the machine to center the aperture you will have the line out of center again with the front end of the lens. All this sounds quite complicated but it really isn't. Of course I assume that you have set the lamphouse square with the board in the first place, otherwise you would have to center the string at its back end and move the front end of lamphouse to center string in condenser hole. If, however, the lamphouse has been set square with the board it will be all right for all practical purposes to proceed as above set forth. By the straightedge method you may set up the edge perfectly square with the curtain and, say, 10 inches from the machine, exactly as high as the center of the aperture. Now set all openings (condenser, aperture and projection lens) just so that their centers are exactly 10 inches from the straightedge. Next set the edge on standards so that it will be exactly over the center of the machine and lamphouse. Let it be, say, 1 foot above the center of the aperture. Now set all openings so that they will be just 12 inches from the straightedge and—there you are. On second thought, I guess that is the way friend Crowe used the straightedge. Understand the edge is not fastened to the machine but to temporary standards fastened to the machine baseboard.

Elizabethtown, Pa.'s, Green Ghost.—Mr. A. W. Crowe, Watertown, S. D., writes: "Allow me to suggest a possible solution to the green ghost that is troubling Elizabethtown, Pa. I think he will find somewhere inside the lamphouse a bright piece of metal which is reflecting a ray of light against the condenser lens. If he will take a bright, long bladed screwdriver, or anything else having a bright end and hold it at different places inside the lamphouse, reflecting a ray of light against the condenser lens, carefully noting the position of the ghost caused, I think he will soon locate his trouble. The ghost on a very short throw, like on the wall of the operating room, will have a wide, green center with very narrow, red edge on one side and a blue edge on the other."

Many thanks, neighbor Crowe. Suggestions of this kind are always gladly received. The editor of this column don't know everything and is always glad to receive such letters. Operators and managers are cordially invited to write, asking any question they wish, making any suggestion or setting forth any interesting experience they may have had.

Poor Transformer.—Clarksville, Tenn., writes: "Would like to know the cause of my trouble, as follows: Am throwing a 12 x 10-foot picture at 40 feet. Used a rheostat in the first place, but could not get a good light. I then purchased a (he names a certain make of low voltage transformer). It gives a better light but the light is always red. All connections are tight. I use Electra carbons, also Arco. Also there is a great amount of heat comes from the lamphouse and almost every day the wires inside the lamphouse burn off. When I change from the 30-55 to the 30-35 contact the current was too weak. Have tried everything I know but get no relief. Always an abnormal heat in the lamphouse and red light. Will you not kindly advise me what to do?"

The answer is easy, Clarksville, and the trouble self-evident. On the lower contact you don't get enough current and on the other you get too much. Your transformer is not right. There is something wrong with it somewhere. I have used the same transformer (the Inductors, Compensarcs, Economizers, etc., etc., are merely low voltage transformers) myself and have found it to be highly unsatisfactory. But plainly you have gotten an extra bad one. Your real remedy is to throw it out and get another from some firm whose goods are known and recognized as standard and first class. If you have paid for it, however, you might try to make the manufacturers make good, though I can tell you frankly I very much doubt their ability to do so. Like many another they mean well, but they don't know how. That is my judgment, anyhow.

Transformer. Rosedale, Miss., writes: "What is proper size transformer to carry moving picture machine using H. & H. current reducer, A. C., 110 volts, 60 cycle, 45 feet throw, 9x12 picture, twenty 16 c. p. lights and five wall fans. Also what is proper size wire to carry current from transformer?"

Now see here, Rosedale, in some ways your information is very complete, but in others it is so incomplete that I cannot answer you at all. I suppose from what you say it is the main line transformer you are talking about, not a low voltage transformer (current saver) for the operating room. You have an H. & H. for that already. Assuming you are using say 40 amperes of current at the arc you would be using a total of about 50 amperes exclusive of the five fans. I would have to know their size to know what amount of current they consumed. Each 110 volt, 16 c. p. lamp requires .58 of an ampere of current. It is quite safe to say that if you are not using more than 40 amperes at the arc, your total current consumption is below 55 amperes. You must therefore have a transformer capable of supplying that number of amperes on its secondary, but as you have not stated the line voltage that is as far as I can go. If you mean your present transformers will only supply 30 amperes on the secondary it most certainly is too small. You should use No. 6 wires for your projection circuit, always.

Machine Trouble.—Tulsa, Okla., writes as follows: "I am running an Edison machine and when the film goes through it sometimes gets caught on the plate below the intermittent sprocket, tears in two or doubles up. This happens on first run films at that. The door has a guard on its bottom and between the door and guard is a rod that presses the tension roller against the plate below the door. The way the machine is made the roller does not run on the sprocket but on the plate below it. Can this be fixed or can it not?"

Tulsa is plainly running a two-pin movement with a one-pin gate or vice versa. The roller is too low down and presses the film up under the sprocket so that it catches on the edge of the apron, naturally tearing in two or doubling up, just as he says. The obvious remedy is to send the machine in and have it made right. I think if you write the Edison Manufacturing Company, Orange, N. J., giving serial number of the machine and describing the trouble accurately they will fix you up all right. You see you havn't even told me what model machine it is. To help you out I will forward your letter to the Edison people myself, which may save some time.

Letter from an Iowa Operator.—Editor Operators' Column: I noticed in a recent issue that one of the boys was having trouble losing his upper loop. Have had calls to fix up machines, in nearby towns, having this trouble and have founds spurs on sprocket badly worn. On the machine I am now running have same trouble caused by spurs being so badly worn that when tension roller goes up if I don't watch when it comes down the grooves in roller won't center over spurs. Also I have noticed different ones asking the reason for losing lower loop on the Edison machine. I have found a great many cases where the takeup tension was set too tight that when a thick patch or anything else starts the film to climbing the takeup will pull it right through, thus losing the lower loop. I run my takeup just tight enough so that it will take up all of an ordinary reel, and then if I have an extra large reel I help it out with my hand at the last end. By doing thus I scarcely ever have any trouble losing the lower loop, even with the sprocket spurs worn quite short. While I note that you advise the Edison people to change their machine so that the lower loop can be made longer, I must say that I have noticed that, with an Edison, if the sprocket spurs be not worn, the shorter the lower loop the steadier the picture. I run the loop so that it will not pull tight by about two sprocket holes in the film. Trusting that this will help some one as I have been aided through the column, I remain with best wishes, one who is working for the betterment of the business. H. A. MOYER.

Glad to hear from you, neighbor Moyer. The matter of too tight a tension bar has been dealt with in these columns before, but naming it again won't hurt. I cannot agree with you as regards the short lower loop. If you have to run a short lower loop to bolster up the tension springs and help them do their work there is something radically wrong. The excessively short loop is prolific of trouble in that it is a bad patch causes the sprocket to climb just two holes and are "in bad." But, while I don't agree, that is no sign that I'm not pleased to have your views for the benefit of our readers. It is with letters as this I want. Come again, neighbor Moyer.

Condenser Breakage—Machine Trouble. [illegible], Vt., writes: "Will you kindly help us out of our difficulty. We have a new [illegible] machine and have a great deal of difficulty with the picture jumping up and down on the screen. This is something new with us. Also we are having trouble breaking condenser lenses. They usually break while we are setting the carbons.

The fault is in the machine itself. Will refer your letter to the manufacturers, who will, I am very sure, make it right. As to the condenser breakage it would indicate that you either have excessive heat, due to lack of adequate ventilation in the lamphouse, or you have an operating room fan set so that it blows into the lamphouse when you open the door to set the carbons. If the former, try running with back slide of lamphouse removed—unless there is a local law against it. If the latter, move the fan. If there are no vent holes in the condenser casing proceed to punch two about a quarter of an inch in diameter, or a little larger, near the bottom of the casing and two more near to its the top.

Unique Resistance Scheme.—Wisconsin (name of town suppressed) sends in what is the most unique resistance scheme the editor has run foul of to date. At first glance I said, 'that won't work,' but closer examination showed me that it would, though how well I cannot say.

Wisconsin was running his machine in an amusement park, hooked up to 600 volt trolley current. He ran his wire direct from the trolley wire to the top carbon of his lamp. He then suspended an electrode made of six sheets of galvanized iron, separated by slats of wood to allow the water to circulate between, to each of which was soldered a copper wire. These wires he joined and soldered to a No. 6 wire attached at its other end to the lower lamp binding post. The electrode was suspended by a rope, running through a pulley attached to the limb of a tree, in a lagoon of water. This rope extended into the operating room and was attached to a lever. By manipulating the lever the electrode was raised or lowered in the water, thus increasing or decreasing the current flow. I guess there isn't any doubt but that it would work, particularly if another electrode is thrown into the water, attached by a wire to the track rail. It amounts to a water rheostat with natural ground connection of the finest sort, with a whole lagoon for the "barrel." Comments on this scheme are invited. The device, of course, must be fenced in to keep bathers, boating parties, etc., from contact with it.

"Clear, clean cut and brilliant in light, shading and coloring, the figures seem ready to step out of the frame," is the way a Muncie, Ind, paper describes a new Mirror Screen, which was recently placed in the Royal Theater there. The manager of this house is well pleased with the results of his new curtain and states that his increase in patronage has almost paid for the curtain, which has been installed but a short time.

Panora Travelettes is the latest invention of the aggressive picture men to-day. This unique invention will have a tendency to revolutionize picture shows and bring them before the public as a place of educational value as well as amusement. Mr. Louis Francis Brown, of the Burton Holmes Travelogues, and his associate, Mr. Fred H. White, who is one of the photographic and lantern experts of the Travelogues, possess the elements with which they hope to show the world a new wrinkle in moving picture projection. It is their intention to furnish parks, fairs, theaters, audiences with highly colored and photographically accurate panoramas of foreign travel which will be known as Panora Travelettes, which when projected on the screen accompanied by a snappy talk and the proper effects, will give the public all but the cooling breezes of the sea voyage. These Panora Travelettes consist of a continuous panorama, projected from non-inflammable film, highly colored and giving a clear and flickerless projection. The film is moved evenly and steadily across the field of the curved screen, giving an illusion of the passing of numerous scenes from the deck of a steamer. Each Travelette occupies about one-quarter of an hour's time projecting in this period a panorama on the screen equal to 6,000 feet in length.

"Away Out West" (Essanay).—A Western picture which will hold the interest from beginning to end. It has all the spirit and go which is so characteristic of the Essanay work, and at the same time it depicts life in the West so graphically and with so much appreciation of its essentials that one cannot fail to acquire a more accurate impression than ever before of the characteristics of that life. The Essanay players undertook their work sympathetically and they brought to its consummation a thorough knowledge of the requirements. The result is a notable picture, and one which will unquestionably be popular everywhere. It is a thousand pities that a picture of this character, suitable for continuous exhibition for several days, or possibly a week, should be subjected to the action of the daily change rule. It deserves more consideration than that. Managers should not hesitate to allow their patrons to see more of such films. It would add to the coin in their coffers.

"The Office Seeker" (Gaumont).—A story of the methods of an office seeker which has some interest as an exhibition of what may be termed pure gall, but otherwise is of no special importance. The methods adopted by these people are the same in all countries, and what this one does in his attempt to secure an office has been duplicated many times over in every country under the sun. It is a human document which will arouse a feeling of disgust in the minds of a good many who see it.

"Beneath the Walls of Notre Dame" (Gaumont).—A record picture giving close views of the huge arches, the clock tower, the chimeras or ornamental figures, the streets below, looking down from the highest parts of the building and the towers, a panoramic view of all the high parts of the great structure. Whoever is interested in buildings will find much of interest in this picture. The views have been made from the most advantageous points, giving not only a record, but a pictorial interest as well. The operator must have studied the cathedral a long time before making his negatives. In no other way could he have produced such excellent pictures.

"The Majesty of the Law" (Vitagraph).—A graphic illustration of what responsibility will do for a man. Here is a drunkard, a tough, for a joke elected to the office of sheriff. Instead of doing as everyone supposed he would do, he turns squarely around and enforces the law, reforming his own evil ways to do so. He is shot and badly wounded in performing his duty. A pretty love story develops and a wedding follows, while the sheriff restores order and suppresses all the elements which had previously made life unbearable in his community. The film suggests many things, not the least of which is the fact that even supposed bad men may assert their manhood under proper conditions. Yes, "The Majesty of the Law" is a sermon; nay, more, it is a practical illustration of the reclaiming power of the good that is in all men. Like the parable of the "Great Teacher," its subtle power is impressive and no exhibitor should fail to add it to his program.

"A Child of the Ghetto" (Biograph).—Does fortune favor the innocent, as graphically pointed out in this instance? This film will set one thinking, considering the question on its merits. Perhaps the most one can reasonably say is that it sometimes favors, as is graphically shown here. It would not be wise to say anything further. Interest in the surroundings represented in this picture will be quite as strong, perhaps, as in the story. That Ruth finally escapes from unjust accusation and the law is pleasing to practically all who see the picture, but that the scapegrace who so nearly entrapped her likewise escaped punishment for his misdeeds seems like a miscarriage of justice. But Ruth finds a good home and triumphs over the most adverse conditions, and whether one is ready to say that the story is true to life or not it is a pleasant ending, and in that, at least, is a happy change from some others. The Ghetto pictures are as good as any ever put on the screen and will afford those who never saw the Ghetto a good idea of what it is really like.

"The Flag of Company 'H'" (Pathe).—In some respects one of the most marvelous films the Pathes ever produced. Here is a dog, who, when all but one of a company of soldiers is killed by Indians, digs up the flag and carries it a long distance through wild country to the main command, even though pursued by some of the Indians on horseback. Then he leads the colonel and his command back to the scene of the battle where summary justice is meted out to the Indians. Then when his master, the sergeant, falls dead from his wound, the dog lies down beside the body and refuses to be parted from his former master. Where a dog could be found to perform throughout a film with so much intelligence is a problem not easily solved. The success in finding one makes this picture notable and overbalances any shortcomings in the equipment and customs of the "Indians."

"The Bargeman of Old Holland" (Selig).—An interesting story of a baby boy set adrift in a barge in old Holland, and who grows up to be a fine man. Later the father and boy are reunited and fortune and happiness smile on both. The love story is a tender bit direct from the heart, while the setting among the picturesque scenes of Holland are sufficiently well pictured to add interest to the film. This picture is another excellent example of the versatility of the Selig Company in that it is on lines different to their usual routine, but carried out with all the care and skill to make it convincing. Some of the scenes are truly beautiful as pictorial photographs and the film deserves the widest circulation.

"Grandfather's Gift" (Lubin).—A novel situation developed around a child's birthday. Grandfather's unique gift, a bank note in each toe of a pair of new boots, goes, through a series of mischances, to the wrong grandchild; but inasmuch as it brings about reconciliation it also brings about an interesting conclusion to a film which might be objectionable to some otherwise. It is a touching scene when the two children go hand in hand to grandpa and he gathers them both in his arms, and the separated family is once more united.

"Officer Muldoon's Double" (Lubin).—A comedy in which a sleeping policeman figures more prominently than he cares to do and an unfortunate tragedian is the gainer by what eatables several corner stands carried. The play is humorous and when the offenders are finally rounded up a whole lot of interesting things happen.

"The Shyness of Shorty" (Edison).—A stirring character study, developed among the bold, free element which made the early West a gathering place for their forage and depredations. Shorty is a little fellow, but he makes it plainly evident at the outset that he is amply able to care for himself under ordinary conditions. The proximity of a woman, however, upsets him temporarily, though he eventually regains his poise. The introduction of the outlaws, their connection with the hotel man and the exciting episode of capturing the sheriff are admirably managed. Then enters Shorty, drunk, it is true, but dangerous, as the outlaws soon discover. Ultimately, with the help of the sheriff's wife, the outlaws are backed up against the wall, and law and order triumph. Like all Western stories, and melodramatic tales of contests with outlaws, this story possesses a peculiar fascination, and one follows every movement of the characters with increasing interest. It is, perhaps, quite within the limit of facts to say that the picture is one of the best depicting the West which has come out in a long time. It is a character study rather than a swashbuckling representation of mere bravado. As such it deserves commendation.

"Mr. Bumptious on Birds" (Edison).—A humorous story of Mr. Bumptious, who, after reading innumerable books on taxidermy, acquires an impression that he is an authority on birds. True, his attempt at stuffing a pet canary is not entirely satisfactory to his wife, and because of that he visits a neighboring barroom to drown his injured pride in something stronger than tea. Then begins an able criticism of an owl. But after all the bad points of the stuffing are pointed out, the bird tires of the disturbance and flaps his wings in protest. Mr. Bumptious displays his only indication of good sense by ordering drinks for the crowd.

"A Night on the Coast" (Gaumont).—An adequate, though somewhat melodramatic, representation of the daily routine of the coast guards. Of course it is not intended to convey the impression that smuggers regularly hurl the guards into the ocean, but such things have happened, and are not impossible at any time. The picture is very graphic, giving a clear view of some of the wild places along the coast frequented by smugglers and affording them reasonably safe retreats. The wave-beaten cliffs are pictorially the most attractive feature of the picture, and unquestionably will help in making it popular.

"The Monastery in the Forest" (Gaumont).—Perhaps no picture of recent release has so forcibly reminded one of the difference existing betwen the ancient world and the world to-day. The architecture of the monastery is the first feature noticed, that of the reproduction of the Lourdes grotto, the cloister and the cemetery, the convent of the Grand Chartreuse and the place where a liqueur considered by some the most famous of all is made among the Grenoble hills by the Carthusian monks. The play carries with it something stronger than the mere pictorial representation of history. It is a graphic view of the great changes which have occurred in the world since the monastery was a prominent feature of the life of many countries. The campaign of his monk with more than ordinary interest, and the picture will cause expressions which will not be easily effaced.

"A Modern Cinderella" (Vitagraph).—The old story brought down to date, but slipper and all, with a grandmother as the good fairy and her grandson as the prince who seeks out the girl that lost the slipper and ran away as the clock struck twelve. It is clever of the old story somehow to fail with modern surroundings as prominent features.

"Burly Bill" (Essanay).—A curious combination of pathos and humor. The picture will make you laugh in some scenes and then, too, a lump will come in your throat while you see Burly Bill, tramp and burglar, taking care of a baby deserted by its mother while she goes to meet its father. The mixing up of the little ones is a touch of grim humor not to be appreciated by the audience than by the parents of the children. But however mixed up the picture seems it all ends nicely and the parents are made happy by the return of their tantrums to normal size. Of course it is impossible to tell what may happen when children are left alone, as Burly Bill suggests in his graphic note but it is a safe proposition that such a mixup is sufficiently rare to make it a great novelty.

"The Price of Jealousy" (Kalem).—Jealousy, like other unreasonable passions, brings its own reward. And what may come of unrestrained indulgence is so graphically depicted in this picture that one is disposed to vow never to become jealous. True, the girl was foolish, yet no more so than most jealous persons. It is well, perhaps, to consider this in the nature of a warning. It is so strong dramatically that its influence must be more far reaching than the mere amusement of the audience.

"The Empty Cradle" (Pathe).—A simple story, yet the pathos reaches so deep down into the human heart that it brings moisture to the eyes. An empty cradle. Ah, many a household has felt its silent, poignant desoltion. But to few comes a waif to fill the cradle. Perhaps on the other hand few waifs are so fortunate as to fall into the hands and hearts of such people as the warm-hearted police sergeant and his wife. The picture is not great dramatically, but because of its suggestions and the memories it awakens it is one of the best pictures of the week.

"Lucy Consults the Oracle."—It is impossible to determine whether this picture is intended as a travesty upon the disposition of some to believe in signs, or whether it is to be accepted seriously. At any rate Lucy consults the book with regard to her future in love affairs and makes her decision accordingly.

"The Nightmare" (Urban).—A dramatic dream, caused by the struggle of a poor man to overcome the temptation to seize a large sum of money, murder the owner and dispose of the body. The horrors of the dream undoubtedly represent, in some degree, the sensations of a man who has committed such a deed. Not all are warned by such a nightmare, however, and saved from the consequences of their own cupidity. Some compensation comes to this unfortunate when the traveler pays the rent and saves his home.

"The Mountain Lake" (Urban).—Always excelling in the production of outdoor pictures this house has in no wise tarnished its reputation in producing these scenes of Lake Brienz in Switzerland. The picture illustrates the whole eleven miles of the lake from Brienz to Interlaken, and one enjoys an exceptionally attractive panorama in the journey.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Jump to Death" (Great Northern).—A strongly dramatic subject, which has more than one thrill in its length. It is acted with all the spirit which usually characterizes the work of the Great Northern players and cannot fail to be interesting. The Great Northern people have put out some excellent feature films in the past and this one is another of the same general quality.

"Foolshead as a Porter" (Itala).—Foolshead appears in a new role in this picture and shows how expert he is in performing the duties which belong to such a position. Foolshead is one of the greatest tumblers in the business and whatever he does the audience can rest assured of a long list of comical situations.

"A Pennyworth of Potatoes" (Itala).—A comedy representing the sale of potatoes but possessing no particular merit beyond amusing the audience briefly.

"Girls" (Bison).—A bit of comedy based upon the donning of male attire by a lively girl and the complications, including "The Bucking Broncho" (Victory).—A lively Western story, full of the vigor of the plains, and developing into a genuine comedy. The young cowboy Davy rides the bucking pony in one of the best Western scenes put on the screen in many a long day. Perhaps Davy was fortunate that nature had subdued the beast's ferocity. Anyhow it saved a whole lot of trouble, and when Davy's wife let him away by the use of a series of subscribers was happily averted. This picture is notable chiefly for the characteristic Western spirit which pervades its scenes and should be popular because it tells a clean story and causes one to want more of the same kind. It has all the life which marks all the Western pictures put out by the Nestor people and deserves to be popular.

"A Martyr of Love" (Eclair).—Perhaps it is necessary to make a story like this to rouse interest, but very many who will see it will be of the opinion that it would have been quite as interesting and vastly more pleasant if the girl had been permitted to live after her lover returned. It is recommended that the ending of this film be changed, and that the girl be allowed to live and presumably be happy with her lover afterward. Trials and tribulations are popularly supposed to be the portion of unfortunate lovers, but the difficulty should stop there. Let them live together happily after the storm and stress of disappointment and suspense are over.

"A Sculptor Who Has Easy Work" (Eclair).—A trick picture, representing the gods, or some equally propitious powers, transforming clay and marble into statues while the easy-going sculptor sleeps. Whom the gods love has easy work might well be recited in this instance.

"A Shipwrecked Man" (Ambrosio).—A well told story, clearly photographed and otherwise technically satisfactory.

"The Outlaw's Redemption" (Atlas).—The first release of a new company and in conception and acting it deserves commendation. Some slight crudities appear in the mechanical department which future polishing will eliminate. There is a thrill indeed when the lady one falls from the cliff. Then the rush of the other for help the meeting with the outlaw, his assistance and the sacrifice it entailed are all graphically represented. The representation of the humane jury is a touch which goes straight to the heart, and the final reformation of the outlaw is a strong ending to an interesting film. The acting of the children is the feature of the picture and would be difficult to surpass. If the new producer sends out such pictures as this he is about to the motion picture field will be welcomed. A simple story like this, told with the human touch which goes to the heart, will be popular when more elaborate productions would only be admired.

"The Vivandiera" (Eclair).—A war story, not without its emotional and dramatic features, all marred by the fact that both the brave young man and his equally brave sweetheart are killed. The picture would be much better to change it, allowing them to recover from their wounds and receive the honors in life accorded them in death. If one must die it seems better that both should. Let them go together, yet it would be far more satisfactory to let them live, happy in the knowledge that they had performed a service for their country and had been appropriately honored for it.

"The Nichols on a Vacation" (Imp).—Here is a comical mixup that is an excellent antidote for a fit of the blues. Nichols has an affinity, but when he made a date with her at a restaurant he did not anticipate the arrival of his wife and daughter at the same restaurant. It is probably quite needless to remark that Nichols left little more than a suggestion of corporeal existence so extremely rapid were his movements. Of course the affinity did her share of waiting, without knowing the two ladies regaling themselves beyond. Now enter the young man engaged to Miss Nichols, without knowing of her presence, and proceeds to flirt desperately with the affinity. The picture doesn't show just what happened to him, but one may be permitted to infer that he received some extremely vigorous lessons. One must be indeed fastidious to want anything worse mixed than that. It is hard to say who deserves the most sympathy, Nichols or the affinity.

AMONG THE SHOWS.

Another visit to the Senate Theater has served to increase our admiration for that quiet, resourceful young man who has charge of the operating room there, Mr. Louis Riner. The film on the screen when we entered was the Selig "After Many Years." The projection was excellent and steady, but what attracted our attention was the appearance in some scenes of a small hand colored picture in the corner of the moving picture, giving a dissolving view effect similar to the visions that have appeared in some films, which much increased the beauty of the picture and brought applause many times. After the show we sought the operating booth to inquire the source of these little auxiliary pictures and found that it was the idea of Mr. Riner, who had slides made for the purpose, which were projected in the stereopticon so as to fit in the corner of the picture, where it did not affect the picture itself. Small pictures of Grant, Lincoln, "Old Glory," etc., were thrown on the screen and received a hand every time. In the last scene, after the sub-title, "United We Stand," just after the effect in the picture of the flag waving, Mr. Riner used a tiny portrait slide of Lincoln with the motto under it, "United We Stand, Divided We Fall" with telling effect. Mr. Riner says that the Edison picture "'Mid the Cannon's Roar" made a great hit here with the aid of these little pictures. It his his intention to put these slides on the market, together with his other specialties, One Drop Oil, Bull Dog Film Cement, and the rubber tension rollers mentioned in The World some time ago. The Bull Dog Cement is remarkable for one thing at least—it is not even necessary in making a patch to scrape the emulsion from the film. To be sure, though a scraped patch is stronger, we tried to pull apart a patch made with the cement and found that the film tore apart before the joining gave way. We were much pleased with the projection of the old Pathe picture, "Marriage in India;" it was not only rock steady, it was absolutely steady on the screen, though we were seated within 15 feet of the screen; it could have hardly been told from a lantern slide except for the motion of the people in it The other pictures presented were a first run Biograph and Selig and an older Gaumont. We believe that the Senate is the only house in Chicago, other than the Orpheum, showing two first run pictures. The pictures here are even steadier than at the Orpheum, though to be sure, they are on a much smaller screen. Even at this, Mr. Riner assured us, the machine used was their second best one, reserved for the days of the heavy grinds, Saturday, Sunday and holidays. Yet despite this, the old Pathe and Gaumont were very steady. Take note of this, O ye operators, who run a film which may be more than a couple of weeks old through the machine as if it were old junk. Mr. Riner projects his third reel as well as he does his two first runs, which goes to show that the fault of poor projection with old film is not always the fault of the film itself by reason of old age.

On East Thirty-fifth street we found two moving picture theaters, in both of which the projection is excellent The Forest Theater, at Thirty-fifth street and Forest avenue, is an attractive house of medium size. One thing that drew our attention was the inscription over its portals, "The Silent Drama." Within we found a well projected, steady picture of average size, but of great brilliancy. A feature to be commended in this theater is, that the side lights near the screen are reduced in candle power, which much increases the brilliancy of the picture. The Edison film, "Fortune's Fool," was shown here and made a hit.

A short distance away, near Grand boulevard, we found a very fine picture in the National Theater. Mr. Straus, the manager, formerly had his screen coated with aluminum paint, but did not get the picture he desired with that, so coated it over with a brilliant pure white hygienic kalsomine with excellent results. The projection was so steady and brilliant and free from flicker that we inquired the name of the machine used, to find it a new Motiograph. Even at the first row of seats, within 10 feet of the screen, the picture was so steady and had so little flicker that it did not hurt the eyes to look at it, which is not usually the case, as the nearer one gets to the screen the more the illusion is destroyed. C. Y.

Mr. J. W. Tschudi is busily engaged in redecorating the stage of Jim Gabriel's unique Circle Theater, at St. Louis, Mo.

Another section of the story of Esther and Mordecai which is part two of this beautiful biblical drama will be released on June 10 by the George Kleine people of this city. These pictures are an example of beautifully colored photography and deserve special mention in that line, with other subjects of this class, are looking to put the motion picture on the highest pinnacle of standard amusement.

Mr. Max Lewis, of the Chicago Film Exchange, was laid up in a hospital for some days last week, owing to a fall which caused him considerable injury. Mr. Lewis has, however, returned to his offices and seems to be in good health.

Mr. S. J. Levin, manager of the Orpheum Theater, Chicago, has been appointed general manager of the Jones, Linick & Schaefer circuit of theaters, which appointment will take effect July 1. George H. Moore, who has been Mr. Levin's assistant, will be promoted to the office of manager of the Orpheum Theater and will no doubt carry out the successful policy heretofore conducted by Mr. Levin. Merit always brings reward and we congratulate friend Levin on his promotion.

Carl Laemmle recently purchased the rights for the States of Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas and Nebraska of the Welch-Daniels light pictures from the Clemens Hester Company. This ring contest took place in London, England, on April 28, 1910, and gave Welch the lightweight championship of England in a nine-round bout, which is full of excitement from start to finish. The film is approximately 1,000 feet in length and is excellently produced.

Promoters are now busy in the task of a grand aviation meet, which is to be held in Chicago sometime in August. The following well known men in gasoline circles are now under consideration and overtures are being made to have them participate: Barney Oldfield (automobile races), Stroebel (airship), Sloane (automobile), and the world famous Curtiss and his aeroplane and Donaldson. Motion pictures will be taken of this great meet and considerable interest is being aroused as to who will produce them.

Mr. Bell, of the Bell & Howell Company, made a short business trip to Cincinnati, Ohio, last Monday, returning Tuesday morning to Chicago.

Tom Quill, who represents the Goes Lithographing Company, of Chicago, is still in the running and is putting out some excellent poster work for the Essanay Manufacturing Company in the way of one sheets.

Mr. B. E. Clements, who has been showing the lovers of motion pictures a few good ones in the sporting line, left Chicago last Thursday. The point of his destination is not known, but we rest assured of the fact that he is on another mission for new pictures and something great is to be expected.

Geo. W. Bond & Co. have recently launched a novel scheme of placing slide sets, both song and travel pictures, at the disposal of the exhibitor. The plan of the Tabard Inn Library is one that is fully understood by everyone and this is the plan adopted by Mr. Bond. The plan outlined is this, any exhibitor wishing to join this club can become a life member by purchasing one set of slides outright, after which these can be changed as often as is wanted by paying a small revenue as an exchange fee. The rental plan will also hold good with the Bond people, so that either method of obtaining slides may be used at the discretion of the exhibitor. The Bond Company have in their employ the best photographers and color artists that money can obtain, and the excellent quality of their output is sufficient proof of their ability.

CLARENCE J. PERFITT.

Antigo, Wis.—The Crystal Theater is now under new management, Bauter & Klements having sold the business to Latts Bros., who have moving picture theaters at Ashland, Washburn and Odanah. A. Latts will be in charge of the local theater. He has had several years' experience in the moving picture business and will no doubt do a good business. Mr. Latts informs us that he is going to make some changes in the theater as soon as he can. He will have a lecturer so that every picture will be explained. He has also engaged a gentleman singer. He will also have the seats in the rear of the theater raised so as to give those in the back a better view. A mirror will be placed in the rear of the theater especially for the ladies. There will be four changes a week in the program and he expects to run a show on Sunday evening, but states that it will be of a religious nature.

INDEPENDENT DIFFERENCES

Agreement Between the Two Factions Likely to Be Arranged.

Last week another attempt was made to [illegible] prominent manufacturers and exchangers. The meeting held in Detroit, while it did not accomplish much at least served to establish the fact that the great majority of manufacturers and exchangers were firmly determined to do business between themselves even if at a loss, rather than submit to the dictates of the Sales Company.

Those manufacturers who prefer to do business legally and openly have taken refuge under the Columbia-Biograph patents, and the Allianz exchanges have also recognized the protection they offer.

Harmony prevailing between the associated manufacturers and the exchanges after the final Thanhouser flop, a telegram was despatched to the Sales Company to join them. A form of agreement was drawn up under which both factions could operate and allow the exchanges freedom to purchase from both sides.

This form of agreement was curtly rejected by the spokesman for the Sales Company, who arrogantly insisted upon full compliance with their own terms. Wiser heads on both sides are still endeavoring to effect a compromise, without which it is evident that the independents are losing ground.

A joint meeting in the offices of the Sales Company only resulted in further bickerings. It seems impossible to get certain people to see the necessity of unanimity or to pin them down to a discussion of the facts of the case. The only hope is that those manufacturers who have large interests at stake will assert themselves and compel their associates to act with reason.

We stand between the manufacturer and the public. We want to see the former in a position to sell his product in open market and on merit. We want to see the exchanges free to purchase from any manufacturer, and we want to see that the public are getting the kind and quality of the pictures that they are willing to pay for.

NOTES OF THE TRADE

EDISON NOTES—COMING RELEASES.

The daily routine of duty of Uncle Sam's coast guardians—the life savers—is shown in a short film on the reel of the 14th. Drilling with the breeches buoy, life-boats and resuscitation practice, and the other details of their daily life are shown in a series of scenes excellently photographed. For a short subject this film cannot be surpassed.

The exciting adventures of a young novelist in search of a change of air and thought are the dramatic story embodied in the film which completes the reel of the 14th—"The House on the Hill." The young hero clears the air of mystery which surrounds a supposedly haunted house by running down and capturing the gang of counterfeiters who occupy it, and shares the government reward for the deed with the plucky farmer's daughter who helped him turn the tables on the gang at a critical moment. Plenty of action, mystery and good light and scenic effects in this film.

The "Cigarette Girl of Seville" continues to be the subject of complimentary letters received at the Edison Studio from moving picture lovers in all parts of the country. Pilar-Morin's work in this film has proven to be the best of her characterizations thus far shown. The Edison people are to be congratulated on the acquisition of the exclusive services of this wonderful French woman, whose work stands out so distinct from other pantomimic artists.

Bootles' Baby," "The Judgment of the Mighty Deep" and "The Little Fiddler" are dramatic releases of the 21st, 24th and 28th, respectively. Each is a full reel and notable story of its kind. "The Judgment of the Mighty Deep" is perhaps one of the most powerful sea pictures ever produced. The Edison Company is certain that it surpasses in every particular their "Keeper of the Light," which will be remembered as a splendid work from the standpoint of dramatic detail and beautiful photography.

The following Edison films were exhibited at the National Convention of Charities and Correction, held at St. Louis, May 23 to 28, inclusive, which was attended by representatives of every State in the Union: "The Prince and the Pauper," "Annual Celebration of Children at Newark, N. J.," "King Cotton," "It Pays to Advertise," "Fishing Industry at Gloucester, Mass.," "Cocoa Industry," "Suffer Little Children to Come Unto Me, for Theirs Is the Kingdom of Labor," and "St. George and the Dragon."

ESSANAY NOTES.

The Essanay Guide for the last two weeks of June, describes three Western feature pictures from the Essanay Company's Western picture makers in Colorado. These pictures will prove notable, particularly in the strength of the stories, the beautiful scenic surroundings, and the superb photography. "The Bandit's Wife," to be released June 18, is a feature picture almost as strong as "Away Out West." The story concerns two Western highwaymen and a woman they both love. This latter is the wife of one, who is secretly loved by the other. The false pal, knowing that his partner, upon whose head the sheriff of the county has placed a price, is about to leave the country, plans to turn him over to the sheriff and claim the reward. The unfaithful wife and her lover conspire together to effect the capture of the highwayman, thus making it possible for them to marry. The husband finding a note from his wife to his partner, explaining that he will cross the boundary line at 8, plans a mode of revenge in adding a postscript to the note, stating, "He will be dressed in my clothes." When the fatal shot is fired the treacherous partner runs forward to find that he has killed his sweetheart. The story is thrilling and alive with interest from the first foot to the last.

The Essanay release of June 25 is another Western picture of exceptional interest, and a novelty in that the plot and theme is something out of the ordinary, dealing with the subject, which in the West is not unimportant, the ways and wiles of the timber thieves and the dramatic episodes of the forest rangers. Uncle Sam's forest saviors. Charles Wentworth, a forest ranger, is detailed by the United States District Marshal to arrest certain timber thieves at work in the Government timber reserves. After numerous adventures he locates the thieves, but is overpowered by them and sentenced to be shot. His life is saved, however, by the daughter of the ringleader of the gang, who brings help at the critical moment and saves young Wentworth's life. The thieves are captured and dragged away, and Wentworth, deeply grateful to his girl savior, proposes to her and is accepted.

The Guide also describes a dramatic film and two comedies from the Essanay's Chicago studios. "A Victim of Hate," release of Wednesday, June 23, is a picture the quality of which cannot be too highly recommended. The two comedies, "Pat and the 400," and "C-h-i-c-k-e-n Spells Chicken," are fully up to the high quality standard of the famous Essanay comedies. "Pat and the 400" is an exceptionally funny farce, with a tang of satire. Some fashionable folk pay a slumming visit to the shanty of one Patrick Murphy. The next day Pat and other residents of Carnegie Alley, reciprocate in going slumming to the home of the society leader, who had called on him the previous day, on a little slumming expedition of their own. The picture is good for a laugh in every foot.

"The Bad Man's Last Deed," the Essanay Western release of July 2, is another admirable film. Arizona Pete, a typical Western bad man, who has about gone the limit of devilty, is requested in a petition from the citizens of the county to remove himself to other pastures. This request follows a shooting-up affair at the village dance hall, when Pete, inspired by a liberal quantity of "Old Henry" makes a tenderfoot dance a jig to the rattle and pop of his .44 Colts. Pete, seeing that public sentiment is running too swift for him, complies with the sheriff's request and removes himself to a neighboring city. The young tenderfoot, nephew of a ranchman, is requested by his uncle to take a bunch of cattle to market. Disposing of the herd, the young fellow is tempted into a gambling dive where he is fleeced out of the roll and is about to leave in despair when Arizona Pete enters, secures the money from the confidence men and volunteers to take the young fellow back to the ranch. Pete realizes his danger, as he has been threatened with instant death if seen by any citizen of Mariposa County. The journey is made in safety, until he is about to leave the ranch house, when the sheriff rides by wippes out his gun and a second later Arizona Pete falls in the dust. The photography and scenic settings in this picture will be found the finest of any of the Essanay Company's late Western productions.

in order and a new fifty-foot pilot frame will be in place by the middle of June. A few scenes were made in the new house as early as the middle of May, but complete occupancy will not take place before the 20th. The plant is on the Norristown line of the Reading and about a quarter of a mile from the main line. It lies to the west of the tracks and in afternoon and evening when the crystal walls and roofs reflect the sunshine it gleams like some huge jewel. It attracts no little attention.

A real camera oddity is to be the Lubin release for June 25. The motion picture man shows some of the troubles of the picture operator in an amusing fashion and then, to the surprise of the spectator, the picture which has been made but which has appeared to be a disconnected series of expositions is run off the screen filled together, making a unified interesting subject.

Already the Lubin Company is in receipt of appreciative endorsements of the Decoration Day release. "A Veteran of the G. A. R." which appears to have scored a hit wherever it was shown. Every holiday in 1910 gives them a Lubin release day and these timely occasions have proven most valuable paybooks as the pictures are planned to be needed apart from their timeliness. "A Veteran of the G. A. R." would have made an acceptable release any month in the year.

The latest Lubin Bulletin shows an unusually generous skein of comedy subjects and lastly many little comedies they are. "The Wild Man of Borneo," released June 14; "Practical Jane," issued on the 20th, and "The Modern Picture Man," due the 24th, are flying comedies with real interest for their happening. That is one of the charms of the Lubin comedy issues. Little by scene as well as nonsense.

In the making of "The Motion Picture Man" which is to be released June 24, the scientific were permitted to crowd into the picture instead of being held back by the police. Since its making more than 100 letters have been received by the Lubin Manufacturing Company asking where the picture may be seen.

The scenario department of the Lubin Manufacturing Company is enjoying a lookout over a number pompous pates recently removed which time to pate. "The writer is not a person to whom this work is more ever-else or excitement, not except the fame of having written a moving picture play badly considered him, for having been engaged in an occupation requiring mental work, this matter is produced at a cost." "A Thankful Cat" was the title of one of the stories and yet the writer took himself seriously.

Publicities have been a little skittish since the car strike and the other day when a heavy auto headed down with police flashed up the street the crowd raced after to see what happened at the end. Those whose gates a scene enabled them to be in at the finish were disappointed but when it was found that the police were actors employed in one of the Lubin stories soon to be released.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

A Civil tale, if worth telling at all, is not told too oft. Once more we call attention to the special extra release on Tuesday, June 8, of "How Champions are Won and Lost" by James J. Corbett, the most skilled boxer and fighter known to the world of sports. An exhibition of Jeffries and Johnson styles of defense and attack and all the blows and points ever used in the squared circle of pugilism, and which "Jim" Corbett will explain at the training of Jim Jeffries during the last month of preparation for the Jeffries-Johnson fight.

In the cold foggy early grayness of the winter works the camp was pitched by the Vitagraph actors for the taking of the scene of camping out in "The Man Haters' Club." Night crept on gruesomely and the scene had to be postponed until the following day. Two of the "boys" were left in charge standing guard on the tents. During the wee small hours of the next morning they were startled by sounds of approaching footsteps. Of course they were sleeping soundly and fearlessly wrapped sword or weapon. "Say, who do you think that is prowling around camp?" "I don't know," said Sam in concealing fear. "I'll just take a shot at 'em and let 'em know we're sentinel duty." "Then in a sole whisper, "I guess that'll scare 'em." Then Ed and Sam got under the blankets and when they got up the next morning the whole camp outfit had been carried off and they were the only things left.

On July 12 "Nellie's Lamb," the most perfect "life portrayal" of love and sentiment by the shadows of a great city. The wells of poverty and adversity, pleading and impressive in the extreme. A master stroke of dramatic fire the scenes that will show the world how to live half lives. A scene from the waste of the wilderness owing to loose in the green pastures and beside the still waters.

Preceding the great and glorious release of "Old Glory" on the day we celebrate, "Saved by the Flag" will be published on Friday, July 1. A drama of the power of the Stars and Stripes in commanding the respect of other nations. There is no stronger appeal to the people than the flag of our birth and its presence in airdome or theater will get the crowd and put snap and enthusiasm into them at the same time. It beats the band what the flag will do.

You don't need fireworks for a send-off or display on the Fourth of July. "Old Glory," the patriotic release announced for July 2, will keep your houses packed and the audience keyed up to the "spirit of '76," the valor of 1812, the cry of the Alamo, the Union forever and "Remember the Maine." When "Old Glory" bursts upon the screen there will be a burst of applause, the men will take off their hats and the ladies will, too. They will want to wave them anyway and everybody will cheer from the Declaration of Independence to the closing wave of the flag as it floats majestically in the breeze. The whole blessed family of Uncle Sam and his adopted children will want to see this picture and rally round the emblem of freedom, as it is displayed from its birth to the present time.

"Becket," an historical dramatic picture of the eleventh century during the reign of King Henry II of England. "Saint Thomas," as Thomas a' Becket, Bishop of Canterbury was called, is one of the most wonderful characters in history and its dramatization will be heralded as a classic novelty and specialty well worth securing by the placing of an order in advance.

In labeling a film of "Old Glory" one of the joiners labeled it "Old Gory." The head of the negative department called her attention to the mistake and she said: "Oh! Excuse me, Mr. Mac. I forgot to put in the 'o'." Then he shook his gory locks and said, "Oh! Glory!"

The more immediate Vitagraph issues are: "The Altar of Love," on June 11; "The Russian Lion," on the 14th, and "Davy Jones' Landladies," on the 17th. You have been told about these and they are all and more, too. Everyone of them will serve you right. "Ito, the Beggar Boy" is one of the beautiful Japanese series with a story that enraptures and enthralls. This is announced for June 18.

Just before the battle of the great giants, Jeffries and Johnson, the special extra release by James J. Corbett, "How Championships are Won and Lost," will be given to the public on June 15, next Wednesday. No better idea could possibly be gained of what champions do and how they do it. In the sparring exhibitions between the "Vitagraph Girl" and Mr. Corbett we have some lively tilts of comedy and produce relaxations of pleasantry. This is the film that takes us into the secret chamber of the training camp, where Corbett is giving Jeffries the advantage of his science and skill.

Or a Little Heroine of the Civil War

No period of the United States history is more fascinating than that of the Civil War, and a story of that time is always sure to excite interest. This Biograph subject is one of special value on account of its dramatic strength and scenic beauty. It tells a story of heroism on the part of a little child, who first saves the life of a Confederate soldier despite her inborn sectional sympathies, and afterwards saves her own father, a Union Soldier, from the hands of the same Confederate. The scenes are laid at Delaware Water Gap.

Later, a victim of drink, he deserts his wife and child and goes the usual road. The wife, at the point of death, begs her husband's father to care for her child, which the old man does. The child grows into manhood, and on the day of his graduation, while celebrating the occasion, the face of a tramp appears at the window. leave a note under a certain flat stone in the grove.

That evening Jim rides up, dismounts and enters the house. He tells Martha that a band is out and that we will have the battle at Sycamore Flat tonight. Martha hears no more, for the note of warning steals out of the house unseen and Jim, who has been successful in his duties is following steadily behind her.

She secretes the note and carries back to the slave with him watching his opportunity, takes the note from under the stump and reads it. Then in understands. It reads: "Jim will meet the boundary line at eight. Martha."

The bandit looks up with a blackened face and menacing mien. Suddenly a mode of revenge presents itself to him and taking a pencil from his pocket he hastily scribbles a postscript: "He will be dressed in my clothes."

At five minutes to eight Jim who has prepared to leave, takes his wife in his arms, then hesitates, asking her gravely, if she will go out and make sure the coast is clear. She, unsuspecting the impending tragedy, agrees, throws a shawl over her head and slips out.

A moment later Jim who is waiting expectantly, hears a shot fired, a scream, and with a smile of triumph turns and walks slowly out of the house.

Martha is stretched out on the ground, dead, while Harding with still smoking gun, is bending over his victim stricken.

Sweeney touches him on the shoulder and pulls him to his feet, tears the gun from his hands and with a smile of evil triumph turns and stalks away.

Harding falls over the body of Martha, cursing madly his fate as the picture flushes.

A VICTIM OF HATE. Harry McAllison a degenerate young man, is in love with Dorothy Van Hagen, a very close friend of his sister, Gladys. As yet he has never made a proposal but has worshipped her secretly from afar. The day our story opens, however when he finds Dorothy and he alone in the latter's library, he weakly confesses his love and endeavors to take her in his arms. She reproaches him and tells him she does not love him. Then Gladys enters, she bows her adieu and goes out.

The following evening Harry and his sister attend a party at the Van Hagen's. During the evening Harry haunts the presence of Dorothy, much to her dislike and nettles him in refusing to give him a dance and then straightway offering her arm to Algernon Trevost her sweetheart. McAllison watches them with envious eyes, an intense feeling of hatred burning in his heart. A moment later Trevost and Dorothy enter seek a secluded spot in the conservatory but within view of McAllison and exchange kisses and caresses. A scene follows in which Dorothy orders young McAllison from the house.

The next day McAllison still smarting under Dorothy's reproach racks his brain for some method of revenge. Suddenly a plan frames itself in his thought. He knows of a certain gambling resort, notorious for its wickedness and vice to which he plans, by a clever ruse, to lure Dorothy, at the same time despatching an anonymous note to Trevost, explaining that if this latter desires to know the real character of the woman he loves to visit No. 996 Rennert street at nine o'clock that evening. The other note to Dorothy dispatched shortly before the appointed time asks that she call at "the Room" street, where Gladys McAllison is suddenly taken ill. The note is signed Harry McAllison.

This plan carefully prearranged and timed to the minute works out smoothly. Dorothy unsuspectingly enters the trap and is denounced by Trevost who believes her to be an habitue of the place. In her innocence and misunderstanding she stumbles bewilderingly about the room and is soon surrounded by a crowd of flashy women. Trevost, unable to stand it longer, runs from the place, and McAllison, who from a quiet corner has watched it all runs forward and catches Dorothy in his arms. She has fainted. He carries her out and places her tenderly in a cab, giving the driver the address.

The next day a note from Mrs. Van Hagen, urging Gladys to call on Dorothy immediately, is received by the latter. At the Van Hagen's Gladys sees Dorothy, who has suffered a severe nervous shock from the ordeal and who is confined to her bed. Dorothy is too ill to explain and Gladys in departing has received no hint that her brother was implicated in the hateful conspiracy.

A few days later, Harry, who has suffered an excruciating remorse, makes a confession to his sister, explaining that it was he who caused the separation of Dorothy and her lover. He wants her to intercede for him with Dorothy and to win her forgiveness.

Gladys is horrorstricken and finds explanation for the note received by her early in the day from Mrs. Van Hagen. It reads:

"My dearest Gladys:—

Dorothy is still too weak to talk of the sad events of a week ago, but Mr. Trevost is now convinced Dorothy was the victim of some horrible plot. He will call upon you in hopes you can help solve the mystery.

Mrs. Anna Van Hagen."

A moment later Trevost is ushered in. After a few words Harry comes on and confesses to Trevost that it was he who invented the scheme of Dorothy's downfall. The outraged lover is, finally able to hold the confession to make the despicable perpetrator of its contents unhappy. Gladys pleads with Harry and he leaves to see and make out.

A few minutes later Harry and Gladys drive to the Van Hagen mansion where they are greeted by Dorothy. Dorothy forgives him and he and Gladys depart.

Young Trevost then enters and taking the sweet secret to his arms, tenderly presses a kiss to her lips. The reconciliation has been consummated.

AT THE DAWNING; or, The Fear of the Comet.—It was popularly believed that the end of the world would take place at the dawn of Good Friday in the year one thousand. At that time a comet appeared in the sky much to the consternation of the people who prepared for the destruction of the earth.

Many plans of violence were forsaken and many wrongs righted because of this fear.

Our story has to deal with one of these episodes. The staging and costuming are the result of careful study of the times in which the plot is laid.

A rich baron falls in love with a nobleman's daughter, but is unsuccessful in obtaining the father's consent to his marriage. By the aid of an accomplice he succeeds in carrying the maiden away to his fortified castle. He then sends an insulting letter to the nobleman. The nobleman is beside himself with anger and is preparing to move in battle against the dissolute baron, when a monk arrives at the nobleman's mansion and hearing the news tells him not to lose heart. We then see the monk set off to the baron's. Arriving there he tells the baron that the end of the world is coming at dawn. He points out to them the comet hanging in the heavens as proof of his assertions. In terror, the baron promises to restore the daughter to her father, and we see the monk return with the daughter. In the meanwhile, the end of the world does not come, the sun rises as usual. The baron appears at the nobleman's castle and begs the father's forgiveness, at the same time asking for his daughter's hand. He is accepted. The monk intercedes for the baron and we see them all enter the church quite happy.

"ESTHER AND MORDECAI."—Mordecai is appointed to sit at the King's gateway.

While on duty he discovers a plot to assassinate the King and discloses the facts, whereupon the King orders that this brave deed be recorded in the Annals of the Kingdom.

Among the King's favorites, Haman is supreme. He soon becomes violently jealous of Mordecai and plans his destruction. As Mordecai is a Jew, Haman makes preparations to massacre the entire race and thereby complete his revenge on Mordecai.

About this time the King decides to make a review of his Annals and to his amazement finds no record there of the good deed of Mordecai, whereupon Haman is ordered to give honors to Mordecai. This only serves to increase the jealousy of Haman.

Through the gracious Intercession of Esther, Mordecai soon has another and greater victory over Haman. As the time for the massacre of the Israelites approaches, Esther, who has been told all by her uncle, Mordecai, invites Haman to dine with her and the King at the palace. During the feast she discloses the fact that she is a Jewess and declares that all those who are enemies of the Jews are her enemies and, therefore, enemies of the King and are not worthy of his favor—whereupon, the King, who has been informed of the full facts, orders Haman delivered up to the guards and has him hanged on the very gallows Haman had designed for Mordecai.

The victory of the Israelites is now the cause of great rejoicing.

"THE SPANISH FRONTIER."—A brief excursion to the Basque country which comprises the three Spanish Provinces of Biscay, Guipuzcoa and Alava. The territory bordered on the north by France and the Bay of Biscay.

This section of Spain is distinguished from all other divisions of the country by the character language and manner of the inhabitants, as well as by its peculiar contrasts of ocean and mountain scenery.

Our panorama gives both the wild, out-of-the-way scenery and the finest examples of human endeavor, as exemplified in the towns.

TRANSFORMER

For Moving Picture Machines
(Alternating Current)

SIMPLE COMPACT EFFICIENT

Price, $65.00

This transformer, known as "The G. E. Economy-Arc," is an invaluable adjunct to any alternating current moving picture installation. The advantages of a transformer for this work will be appreciated by both the theater management and operator; by the management in the reduction of light bills and in the better production of the pictures due to the steady light obtained, and by the operator in the simplicity of the device, the absence of danger from shocks, and the added comfort in the lamp house due to the low heating.

The saving in power insured by the use of a transformer instead of a rheostat varies from 65 to 90 per cent., depending upon the voltage from the supply mains. Many lighting companies require the use of 220 volts for moving picture work in order to avoid heavily loading one side of a three-wire system. This increases the loss considerably in circuits using a resistance or reactive device for reducing the voltage.

THE ROAD TO HAPPINESS. Rhoda is a saleslgirl one of the victims on the altar of trade. The heat of the long summer days, the incessant lifting and measuring and the aggravation of unreasoning customers all help to bring about the break down that attracts the attention of the welfare secretary of the store. Rhoda has her vacation time advanced and with the prospect of a glorious two weeks at the store's vacation home in the country she leaves the oven-like boarding house for the station. Arrived in Clermont she asks to be directed to the Home. The carriage is waiting for her and she makes a happy start but there is a runaway and only the quick action of Dick Phelps, a young farmer, saves her from injury. The friendship thus formed grows rapidly to the delight of the other girls. Maggie, one of the impish little parcel wrappers, takes a special delight in rallending the rural lover and as a joke manages that a supposed love letter shall fall from his pocket to be discovered by Rhoda. It looks for a while as though Rhoda had turned to retrace her steps along the road to happiness, but Dick courageously saves Maggie from drowning and in gratitude the girl explains the plot and Dick goes in search of Rhoda to make it up.

OUR NEW MINISTER. We are shown a scene in the country postoffice, where the news that the new minister will arrive with the next train causes great commotion and all prepare to meet him. At the same time Marguerite, a city girl, also arrives, to open a millinery shop in the little village and with her cunning ways, causes a stir in the hearts of the country youths. Cynthia, a sweet country girl, was the sweetheart of Reuben Lealand and when he also became a victim of Marguerite, it would seem her heart would break. However, Cynthia found a friend in the new minister who was a witness of the indifferent treatment poor Cynthia received and Reuben decided that the simplest way to get out of reach would be an elopement with Marguerite.

This he almost accomplished but for the minister who not only checked the elopement, but married Reuben and Cynthia and pointed out the road for Marguerite to follow. This accomplished, he did more, he re-united the hearts of Reuben and Cynthia and we see a happy ending.

THE FIRE CHIEF'S DAUGHTER.—The chief of the fire department has a beautiful daughter for whom he has hopes of a wealthy and advantageous marriage, but contrary to prearranged plans of this kind, Ellen has given her heart to a young fire ladder, and much against her father's will, marries Jack Lowney. This so enrages the old fire fighter that he turns his back on his daughter and son-in-law and will not be reconciled. Now the unexpected happens. Jack is put to a test and proves his worth. The Chief's residence burns and he and his wife are saved from a fearful death by the heroism and self sacrifice of the boy whom they have despised. Reconciliation follows. HOW CHAMPIONSHIPS ARE WON AND LOST. By Mr. James J. Corbett. In the first scene of this picture we have a chance to see Mr James J Corbett as an actor in his 'glad rags' and society where Mr Corbett meets Miss Florence E Turner. The Vitagraph Girl leads us into the fancy waltz and words they are dancing the frills floating into his arms He leads her to a sofa, and with the assistance of her chaperone, revives her tells her she should take more exercise and invites her to his physical culture studio She accepts his invitation.

The next evening with her chaperone she calls to see him and arranges to take some lessons under his instruction In the gymnasium he explains to her the uses of the one hundred pound punching bag Professor Cooper now takes her in hand for a few exercises showing how to reduce the waist and hips the method of removing flesh on the upper part of the body strengthening the back, hips and thighs and abdominal muscles.

At home Miss Turner practices the methods taught her by Mr Corbett and the Professor. This scene gives a fine idea of the advantages of physical training at home as an aid to health, strength, grace and beauty

One month later, the fair pupil is seen at the studio taking a lesson in boxing from Mr Corbett, the great exponent of the art of self-defense. This is where the result of Mr. Corbett's lessons to his pupil shows itself in the skill displayed by Miss Turner in their friendly little bout, in which she proves herself to be his master

In the following scenes Mr Corbett and his sparring partner, Tom Kennedy, in ring costume, give illustrations showing the famous "Knockout" blows The Sullivan and Corbett battle and the last rally and knockdown. A CHILD OF THE REGIMENT. Picture a fond mother with babe in arms, thrown upon the world by a grasping landlord whose demands for the rent of her number home cannot be met, and you have the pathetic introduction to a story which runs the entire gamut of human emotion in its telling.

Follow this mother through her cold search for food and employment until every vestige of hope is gone and she turns to the sea for a haven of rest and peace, then witness the timely dropping of a telegram by a messenger who passes on horseback, and you see not glad smile as she reads its contents. A determination to live on takes the place of despair, and she struggles on, impelled by the telegram until she reaches Fort McHenry. There, leaving her baby on the doorstep of Major Vane's quarters with the missive pinned to its shawl, she bravely takes up her cross alone, with ultimate success.

After two and a half years, the baby is now the pride of the Fort and the mother a successful novelist. The latter, spurred on by months of yearning for her loved one, induces her employer to journey with her to the Fort and assist in reclaiming her child.

Military maneuvers are in progress as they arrive, and a hurried search is made for the little one, only to find her in the keeping of a nurse, laughing with glee as the gallant soldiers march by and salute. The mother, mad with joy, cannot understand why they hurry the child away and refuse to allow her a mother's kiss and embrace. The Fort is thrown into confusion on hearing her story, and both officers and men refuse to give up their pride and joy, until the Major and his wife sadly consent to a separation for the sake of a mother's longing for her own, and the final farewell is spoken with a hearty "God bless and keep you."

TAMING A WOMAN HATER. Tom Taylor, the owner of a pretty rustic cottage, where he lives all alone believes himself to be a woman hater, and incidentally his friend John Sparks, when the latter loses to ornament the cottage with posters of Tom Taylor's property is valuable, and at the opening of the play a financier purchases it at a satisfactory figure.

To close the deal, Taylor is obliged to go to the financier's hotel, and there he attracts the attention of four pretty young girl guests. One of them, Lou Bennett, asks John to introduce Tom. This Jean declines to do on the ground that Tom is a woman hater. Lou bets the other girls that she can make Tom fall in love with her, and promise to her within a week. They take the bet, and not knowing Tom's name or where he lives, they follow his horse, borrowing a buggy built for two that is waiting outside the hotel.

Lou meets Tom, and wins her bet—she falls in love with her. But in identally the girl loses her own heart. Tom finds he has been tricked, and is preparing to go away forever when Lou arrives speaks with him, and all ends nicely.

THE LITTLE HERO OF HOLLAND.—Hans is a little Dutch boy, the son of a poor fisherman. He, like all children of Holland, is early impressed with the fact that the safety of the whole community depends upon the strength of the dyke. He is sent upon an errand to his aunt late one evening. Walking along at the foot of the dyke, he discovers a tiny hole, through which the water is pouring.

Realizing that if left to flow through even this small aperture, the water would soon break down the dyke and flood the village, he sticks his finger into the hole, and waits for someone to come to his assistance. Night comes on. His fingers ache, but he has stayed with his aunt, and so do not worry about him.

In the morning he is found almost unconscious from fatigue and exposure by his little sister who has been searching for him. She runs back and notifies the villagers, who come to his assistance, secure the dyke, and carry the boy back to the village in triumph. Hans is received by the Burgomaster and praised by the Mynheer. By his nobly action he has made himself a name to be loved and will always be known as "The Little Hero of Holland."

CENTAUR

HER LESSON. Miss Jessie Mary was up in the clouds to ask Miss Montrose to go swimming. Mary eagerly accepted. Before they got to the pool Mary's brother Will showed them a letter from a boy friend and proceeded to read it aloud, stating that his boss, an ordinary cop at the corner, was ready to become a regular with the charming sister of whom he had heard so much but never met.

Will exacted a promise of Mary not to make any appointments for that evening, as he expected his friend Jack. The girls then left gayly talking over the expected visit. In the course of their swimming Jessie met Willard Newell and at once exhibited herself to Mary and went to a pavilion with Willard. Mary at first angered, smiled and turned away, deciding to continue her swimming alone, and found herself looking into the eyes of a young man who had been staring at her for some time. She blushed becomingly under his ardent gaze and bowed to him.

After some hesitation and inward argument to followed, and when he got to the dock dropped a package in so that he could pick it up and return it, thereby opening up a conversation. She noticed unwillingly enough that he was handsome. Her interest was aroused. Will's letter before leaving for pool had a deep interest in each other, and though she would not have liked him she did promise to meet him on the same place on the following day.

Her lesson for that day had been learned, and came to the town that evening, proved to be the man she had flirted with that afternoon.

He quickly guessed by her that she played him to meet her without the proper introduction. He could not associate the spirit of his friend with the girl he had flirted with in the streets and treated her so coolly as to cause consternation in the home he had entered for the first time.

He left the house perturbed, for he feared chagrined and the girl well she formed a grim resolution to never flirt again as long as she lived.

THE OLD MAID'S PICNIC. Of course, everybody in the village turned out to see the old maids meet in front of Zeke Sparks' general store. There were maidens tall and maidens short, maidens fat and also lean, all spick and span bent on their annual picnic. An occasion that none of them had missed for the past forty years and that each and every one looked forward to participating in for the next forty years to come. However, they met with experiences in this picnic that they hope never to battle with again. The village bad boy followed them and after stealing a bottle of whiskey from a tramp he emptied it into the teapot and so tickled the palates of the old maids that they actually fought with each other in their eagerness to refill their cups. With the working of the tea they began their childhood pranks and when the excitement was thickest the prankish lad dropped upon them a bunch of live snakes that he had saved for the occasion. The "maidens" in a wild rush down the road never stopped running until they dropped of exhaustion upon the steps of Zeke Sparks' store again, as sick a bunch of old maids as ever gathered in one spot.

SHERIFF'S DAUGHTER. Sol Dalton had returned just in time to protect his angry little wife, Billie, from the embraces of Pete, the cowardly and drunken half blood.

The husband lambed her his quirt, and Pete could hardly beat she knew full well how to wield it.

This, however, was not the reason he gave the chief and his tribe for wishing to assassinate her. Pete, her because he had overcome Billie's father, Sheriff Colby, telling his wife and daughter that he and Sol would be away for a few days. Therefore, Pete declared, last could select an hour when the women were out and carry off everything in sight.

The Indians had put their plunder in a blanket when Mrs. Colby returned. Quick as a flash she ran to a chest and would have escaped had not Billie ridden up and, hearing a noise inside, armed herself with a rifle.

Although for the moment she succeeded in stunning both Pete and another, it only served to anger the half-breed the more so instead of flying on beside her mother, to help her off to the camp.

As the half dragged half carried Billie past the kennel Sport tugged madly at his chains, but it was not until two Indians and trembling, ran that he finally broke loose and came bounding like the lupus wolf he was and threw his fangs.

Billie crawled out cautiously to the door of the tepee. The redskins were all busily engaged with the whiskey they had stolen, and would be in no condition with one foot so severely bound would be willing to ride. She paused to see Sport dispose of Sol. Tearing off a piece of her dress, she managed to bind the wound and prevent the dying savage's life blood from flowing away. Billie hastily scrawled a few words on a piece of paper, telling her father where to find them, so the rescue. Here arriving the two had crawled to the door to see that all was well, passed to set off for the rescue women to mount and the captives speeding to a safe place.

At least Sol paid no attention to Sport's frantic leaping and whining, and, turning back to put the horses around the wounded Billie's passage.

Instantly Sport was upon the unsuspecting redskin, pulling him down and tearing his throat.

As the startling news spread like wildfire among the Indians, several got their guns and started in the direction of the fleeing pair.

Putting her injured leg over the horse and mounting behind Sol said to Sport, "Go get 'em," and the noble animal turned and sprang to the assistance of his master. The Colonel was so thankful to Sport that he gave him a home after and will ever be remembered for what he did for his master and especially for the noble way in which he saved Billie's life.

W. E. Greene Film Exchange

OPPOSITE MAJESTIC THEATRE - 228 TREMONT ST., BOSTON, MASS.

Mr. Exhibitor, Protect Your Investment!

I want to ask every moving picture exhibitor to give this some serious thought:—Your theatre represents an investment of several hundreds or several thousands of dollars. It is not a plaything. If you cannot afford to use it as a plaything, most assuredly you cannot afford to let any film exchange use it as such. To protect your investment, you've got to get the best pictures you can rent. Many of you think that "Imp Films" are the best. Well and good. Now then, several exchanges have quit buying Imp films for the purpose of injuring the Imp Company. Therefore they cannot supply you with the latest films of that brand. The question for you to decide is this:—Can you afford to get mixed up in the personal squabbles of your exchange? Can you afford to rent from any exchange which will not supply you with Imp films, simply because it wants to take a crack at the Imp Company? Can you afford to let your exchange use you as a stuffed club to whack the Imp Company? When you have answered that question, make a note of the fact that the Laemmle Film Service will be tickled to land you as a regular customer and give you WHAT YOU WANT! If you give a rap for MY advice, do as I suggest. Either make your exchange quit playing petty politics or else—come to me for your films.

This is the excellent program we have arranged after listening to the suggestions of exchanges and exhibitors. It can be added to the instant exchanges, exhibitors and manufacturers deem it advisable.

Last Saturday night we had the most satisfactory meeting since the inception of the Sales Company. An unexpected visitor was the editor of one of the leading trade papers who, at our urgent request, asked us every question and named every objection which been used as an argument against the Sales Company.

It was a conversation in which everybody called a spade a spade and it resulted in clearing the atmosphere of all the vague doubts, fears and misunderstandings which have been hanging over the Independent cause like a fog for the past few weeks. Every possible and imaginable objection to the Sales Co., from the standpoint of exhibitors, exchanges or Independent manufacturers, was wiped away by oral and documentary proof. And we conclusively established the FACT that the temporary split in the Independent Party was caused en toto by a complete outsider with a selfish motive and not by any REAL flaw in the Sales Co. idea. Our only regret is that every moving picture editor, exhibitor, exchange man and manufacturer could not have attended that Saturday night meeting to knit the whole Independent proposition into as solid a unit as the Sales company is and will continue to be.

In conclusion we again urge exhibitors to give their active support to the loyal exchanges, a list of whom we will cheerfully furnish upon request This is the quickest way to reach the end we are all seeking to attain—a unity of action and an undivided party.

GROWING!
GROWING!
GROWING!

Enormous Factory

For the "IMP"

Negotiations Closed and Work of Equipping New Place Now in Progress.—A Sensational Business Success

—Monday of this week negotiations were completed whereby the "Imp" company secures a factory with ten times the capacity of our present plant!

—Eight months ago there was no such thing as an "Imp" Film. In that time it has grown so tremendously popular through sheer force of quality and merit, that our present factory which we thought large enough for at least five years is already insufficient and cramped!

—In eight months we have accomplished the very thing which required as many as eight YEARS for other brands of moving pictures!

—Our new factory is at 101st street and Columbus avenue, New York City. It gives us a floor space of over ten thousand square feet for developing, printing and drying alone! And this, bear in mind, has nothing to do with our mammoth studio which is in another building in another part of the city.

—Hereafter when we find it advisable to produce special rush pictures such as "In Africa" and "The Funeral of King Edward" we can do so without the terrific strain of night work which has been necessary in our present quarters.

—We owe this astounding growth to loyal exhibitors and loyal exchanges as much as to our own efforts. We have spent money like water to better our product, but it would be barren of results without your loyal backing. Never imagine we don't appreciate what we owe to you. And never imagine we are going to let up one single instant in our herculean endeavor to maintain the leadership we now enjoy!

—Here's a million thanks to the whole bunch of you!

—Now that the Sales company has relieved us of the frightful job of making shipments and collections, etc., we can pay more attention than ever to "Imp" pictures—and that's what we're going to do!

COMING—Drama and Comedy!

THE DRAMA:—"The Brothers' Feud." Released Monday, June 27th. Length, 960 feet. A Civil War story of the Mrs. Leslie Carter sort. The kind that exhibitors will demand again and again for "return dates." They don't call 'em "repeaters" when you send Imp Films back again. Isn't that bully!

THE COMEDY:—"A Game for Two." Released Thursday, June 30th. Length, 970 feet. In which wifie tries to play the part of the village skeezix and gets more than she bargained for. This picture ought to make as big a hit as our famous "Fruit and Flowers" picture. Fight and beg for it!

Send for list of exchanges who are loyal to You!

The Laemmle Film Service Alliance, Portland, Oregon is a regular purchaser of IMP films. Their name was omitted from our list last week through an error.

The Qualitative Picture.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE FRENCH SCHOOL OF PICTURE MAKING.

As the public taste in matters of art advances, so does that public become more discriminating, more critical of the work that is produced for its aesthetic satisfaction. This is true of all arts. Take painting for example: Connoisseurs in this country must regret that the chief productions of James A. MacNeil Whistler and John Sargent do not find places in New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art. Nevertheless the American collector is atoning for his remissness in the past by ransacking the old world for the best works of art.

It is commonly said that America to-day is in too much of a hurry to make money, to pay closer attention to artistic progress. This is probably true in great measure. It applies also to the little field of the moving picture. We see over and over again a feverish haste to get a release, irrespective of those finer qualities of the picture, which are slowly earning the appreciation of the moving picture public. Let us take one or two concrete examples. The Biograph releases are distinguished by a certain pictorial quality which is the outcome of patient systematized work in the photographic department. Perhaps the hypercritical might say that they subordinate the theater has absolutely no injurious effect on the eyes correctness of tone values, clearness and uniformity of picture. Nevertheless they have a standard of quality all their own which is recognized throughout the world as Biograph quality—a quality which other makers are laudably endeavoring to emulate.

There is, in fact, room in the moving picture field for several schools of picture making, each having its own distinctive qualities of pictoriality. Another instance occurs to us which we desire specially to commend to the consideration of the earnest maker of moving pictures and the earnest student of them. We mean the Gaumont pictures, which are highly respected by good judges of pictorial quality in moving pictures. We have become so familiar with the various styles and schools of picture making that we think we could pick out a Gaumont from a crowd of others, even though it were not identified and titled by the makers themselves. The Gaumont picture typifies the work of the French school. Be sure that whenever you see—or as a rule, when you see—a Gaumont picture, it has certain distinctive qualities which impress themselves upon the mind of the careful observer. To begin with: the lights and shades, which are called in artistic parlance, the chiaroscuro, are always true to nature and well balanced. The picture is always illuminated from the proper point, that is, in most cases, from the side or the back of the camera, and the result is naturalness of effect. Then, again, as to the tone values, the sky is never as dark as the foreground. This is the true condition of affairs. The various tones are differentiated throughout the scale. Say, one of the characters wears a dress in which there are several kinds of light fabrics; the relative difference is shown. We should conjecture that Gaumont uses orthochromatic films and a light filter on the camera, for it is by this means that correct tone values are obtained. Then, again, the composition of these pictures conforms to the requirements of pictorialism; they do not seem to be chosen haphazardly. The settings, the groupings are all arranged in conformity with the known laws and rules of composition. We are leaving out of consideration here the acting and story telling sides of these films and are simply judging them as artistic productions.

The Gaumont picture gives you a distinct color deposit inclining towards warmth or sepia, so that the total effect of these pictures is, as a rule, that of delicate drawings or paintings in monochrome. There is nothing crude about them; everything is well balanced, modelled and harmonized. So that, unconsciously, the spectator of these moving pictures has some such æsthetic satisfaction as one does when looking at a picture by Chase, Alexander, Whistler, Sargent, or other American painters; they are, in fact, not merely photographic, they are pictorial. We have drawn this distinction between the pictorial and the photographic quality in these pages before. Let us illustrate our meaning: The purchaser of a kodak camera starts out making exposures, gets his or her prints developed and something of a result; in most cases these are merely indifferent black and white snap shot photographs: mere snaps secured without reference to artistic composition, tone values or any other pictorial consideration. But after a time in many cases your kodaker realizes that the mere photograph as such does not satisfy his craving for something pictorial, and then, as the current literature of the subject amply proves, he begins to study the artistic possibilities of photography. And by and by, after much tribulation, he begins to make pictures, that is to say, he pays attention to composition and tone values; he modifies his printing methods; he accentuates here, and suppresses there, and the end of it all is that, if he be a serious student of his work, he is no longer content with the haphazard snapshots. He works for something pictorial. All this, of course, is accomplished as the result of careful study and attention to technical details, plus the application of pictorial knowledge. Without exaggeration we have witnessed the evolution of scores, we might say hundreds, even thousands of photographers, from the snapshot stage into picture makers. So soon as their eyes are open to the crudities of their first efforts they become dissatisfied, and do not, or will not rest until their work is invested with some pictorial quality.

Much the same sort of thing is going on in the moving picture film to-day, especially amongst those manufacturers who have taken up the work during the last two or three years. They are no longer content with the poor photograph, because the public is no longer content with it. The public is demanding pictures and it is up to the makers, therefore, to give the public what it wants. We thought, therefore, that we might take the Gaumont pictures as the text for this article in order that we could more clearly illustrate, for the information of our readers, what we mean by pictorialism in moving picture making. It is easy, of course, to condemn or criticise; it is not so easy to construct, build up, or teach; —unless we have at hand illustrative examples, which these Gaumont pictures certainly are. Of course we do not say that these or any other class of moving picture should have universal imitation,—that would lead to monotony,—but they certainly contain qualities of a suggestive nature for the earnest worker. There is no effect without a cause, and the causes and the excellencies of the Gaumont picture are simple: high grade artistic and technical knowledge applied to the work. This also holds good in reference to the other school, if we may so term it, the fine, vigorous black and white work of the Biograph Company. Here you have two distinct kinds of picture, each with its own excellencies, each appealing to its large public.

There are other possibilities in this direction. It is open to any manufacturer to-day to devote such attention to the work that he could give his pictures their own pictorial individuality. One maker might go for delicate grays; one might go for razor-edge definition; that is, fine focusing and a well stopped down lens; others again might diffuse the focus slightly; others again might select their own individuality of color deposit by modifying the exposure and the developer. There is, in fact, a wide field open for individuality of expression in the photographic end of moving picture making. Again we say we are leaving out of consideration the acting and scenario ends. We are dealing with the moving picture as a picture, a point not sufficiently emphasized by those who write about the subject, or otherwise give it attention.

In respect of this important matter we in the United States are probably only on the threshold of great advances. We hear much said and we see much written about the moving picture being in its infancy, but very few people who use this phrase quite know what they have in mind. They talk about the future of the picture in a vague, conjectural fashion. Do they pause to think that the future of the picture rests with its technical and artistic improvement and advance? Moving picture making, just as other forms of illustration in books and periodicals, as a glance at these productions as compared with the pictures of a decade or twenty years since will show, has made enormous strides in style and technical expression. To-day our magazines and books are illustrated by skilful artists. We have reproductions in color and the like. Generally the standard has been lifted, in virtue of the fact that progress in artistic appreciation has been very marked with the people at large—a fact which applies to all the liberal arts, as we have recently pointed out.

This is the sort of modification going on in the moving picture field. The time is rapidly going when the slap-dash photographer who produces a crude black and white subject, ill-composed, falsely lighted and inaccurate in its translation of tone, light and shade, will any longer be tolerated in the moving picture field. The ignorant and the stupid have jeered at us for uttering these sentiments before, but the ignorant and the stupid are refuted by events. For it pleases us to hear that moving picture makers are beginning to talk MOVING PICTURE making, not MOVING PHOTOGRAPH making—a totally different thing, as was pointed out in these pages some weeks ago.

A careful study of such pictures as those produced by Gaumont will well repay the labor on the part of those young manufacturers who have recently taken the work. It is common to read in the advertisements and elsewhere the claim for "good photography." Not in so many cases as we could wish is this claim well founded. There is, as we have pointed out before, the merely mechanical photograph; there is also the pictorial photograph. It is the pictorial photograph that we want to see dominant in the moving picture field. And that is why we draw attention to the matter in this article, taking the Gaumont pictures as subjects and inspirations.

The Fourth of July in the Picture House.

In last week's Moving Picture World, we referred to an incident that is to specially characterize the Fourth of July this year. We mean the taking of the Jeffries-Johnson pictures. This, of course, is of particular interest alone. It is an incident that is not likely to recur. The Fourth of July will, of course, remain with all its significance, when Mr. Jeffries and Mr. Johnson have retired into that obscurity which many people think they should not have emerged from. This is a point, however, that we do not desire to debate, inasmuch as we have already said it lies outside our province. The Fourth of July, however, remains with all its popular historical and national significance, and we desire to refer to it specially this week in relation to the interest which it has, or should have, with the moving picture exhibitor and the public for whom he caters.

We were very much interested on Memorial Day last to see how advantage was adroitly taken by some exhibitors of the sentiment which that day crystallizes in the hearts of the people. The popular house we visited put on a film which is not a new one, but is always attractive to those who are patriotic Americans. This picture was called "Stirring Days in Old Virginia," which is thoroughly well known to our readers as one of the Vitagraph Company's most successful productions. It graphically illustrates some of the concluding incidents of the Civil War, and ends as, of course, everybody knows, with the apparition of President Lincoln pleading for peace.

The reception of this film by a holiday audience convinced us that the great American public is always willing to welcome moving pictures of historical incidents connected with the foundation, growth and progress of their country. We are glad to see that some of the makers are making special releases for this coming Fourth of July and desire to impress upon the exhibitor the value of the opportunity that lies before him in thoughtfully catering for his patrons on the Fourth. Besides these forthcoming releases, there is much other material to draw upon, because for several years past the American film makers have specially directed their attention towards patriotic subjects, and we have no doubt there are, as in the case of the film which we make reference to above, other pictures available which will be to the taste of the audiences.

It is a trite observation that the moving picture is a real means of teaching history, and certainly American people are keen to familiarize themselves with the leading incidents in the history of their country. This cannot be more effectively done than by the production of carefully made moving pictures. Washington and his times are bound to figure on the forthcoming Fourth. Not alone will Washington figure on the screen; we conceive there are incidents in the lives of the other great men of the country which may be fittingly illustrated. The life of Lincoln supplies an illimitable wealth for film treatment. There is, of course, the quadrennial inauguration of a president which will interest people. There are such things as the recent Hudson-Fulton Celebration, indicative of the progress of the country. There are the incidents of 1812. There are the Mexican and other wars. There is, of course, the Civil War; there is the recent voyage of the United States fleet around the world—in fact, when we commence enumerating the leading incidents of the country which can be treated on the moving picture screen, we are surprised at the scope which the film maker has for teaching the lessons of history and patriotism to moving picture audiences on July the 4th.

Let the exhibitor, then, in the time remaining for him use his best efforts to arrange a programme which will appeal to the patriotic sentiments of his patrons, old and young. The young are athirst for information about the history of their country, the old never tire of re-reading it. More than that, of course, these pictures besides being of an instructive nature may also be intrinsically dramatic and entertaining, so that while ministering to the patriotic sentiments of those who witness them, they may also divert and please the mind. If advantage be widely taken of the imminence of the Fourth of July on the part of the exhibitor to furnish suitable patriotic pabulum for his patrons, then another important step will have been taken to enshrine the moving picture theater in the hearts of the public. We specially direct attention to this matter for general as well as particular reasons. We want to see the Fourth of July taken advantage of in the manner suggested, and we also want to feel that our advice will be of general interest, that is to say, it will be looked upon as an effort on the part of the exhibitor to show the public at large that there is a serious social side to the moving picture theater as a teacher of history, patriotism and pride in citizenship of the United States.

Two communications reached us this week and are elsewhere reproduced which cause us a certain amount of surprise and pain. One of these communications is from an exhibitor dealing with the capture of an alleged "colour"; the other is a Pennsylvanian document. In both of these reference is made to the immoral character of many films and by implication censorship is regarded as essential to the future good conduct of the business.

Are we specially privileged, we wonder, to escape seeing the undesirable film about which so much clamor is made in these last two years? We have never seen a really objectionable picture. We have seen some tragic ones; others, again, in which crime and brutality have been shown; nothing out of the way. This may be good fortune on our part, or it may be an accident. There the fact remains; but we who see as much of the picture as anybody have found no reason to be shocked like our Harrisburg and Albion friends.

That unsuitable pictures are produced goes without saying. But why condemn the picture generally? Unsuitable books are printed this very moment in this very city. Why condemn literature? Mr. Comstock objects to certain paintings, bits of sculpture and other efforts of art. Why condemn the liberal arts on this account?

Morality, after all, is purely a matter of geography. In Paris the menage a trois excites no surprise; in London or New York, we elevate our eyebrows. In some parts of the Orient the recognized marriage customs could not possibly be illustrated on the moving picture screen. Yet, Oriental people are very moral. If it is wrong to show a murder on the moving picture stage in the interest of the morals of young children, is it right to place an unexpurgated Bible in the child's hands? Let our Harrisburg and Albion friends answer this question.

We want to see the picture as clean, as harmless and as innocuous as it is possible to make it. But where is the line to be drawn? Here in New York there is a body of censors working under the patronage of the People's Institute. So far these good people seem to have given satisfaction. Personally, however, we should be disinclined to regard Mr. John Collier and his friends as infallible authorities on morals. You cannot possibly lay down a universal standard which will govern a man in Paris, another in New York, another in Pekin, another in Timbuctoo.

There may be, and probably are, imported pictures which are not to the taste of the people in this country. We do not see them. Those we do see are not violently aggressive against the commandments. We refer, of course, to the French and Italian subjects. To our taste they are rather dull.

We should like to see a little more consistency shown by these critics of the morals of the picture. The evil, we are persuaded in our own mind, is very much exaggerated. Speaking generally, both licensed and Independent manufacturers to-day are producing good, clean pictures. Now and again violence may appear which is not true to life. How can you possibly illustrate life if you omit some of its salient phases? Can you teach a child religion without dealing with the consequences of wrongdoing? Can you teach morality without dealing with the unpleasant results of immorality? Can you keep in a state of good health and be indifferent to the deleterious influences that surround you? Of course not.

This is no apology for unsuitable pictures. It is rather a plea for less exaggeration when dealing with the subject—a plea for moderation of thought and action. It is a plea to the better instinct of the exhibitor, the renter, the importer, only to handle such films as are not likely to raise doubts as to their suitability. The good old-fashioned newspaper rule applies: "When in doubt, leave out." There was a time the picture could be very properly assailed on general grounds, as, generally speaking, it was bad—bad in theme, bad in photography, bad in effect. But that time has gone, we must insist. All the same, as our pages show week by week, whenever we come, or if we come, across a picture which in our judgment is not suitable for public exhibition before women and children, we shall denounce it and we shall denounce its makers with all the emphasis and intensity at our command. As we have said before, this journal stands for the good, clean, elevating, entertaining, instructive picture. No other reasons influence us. No other must be permitted to injure an entertainment and a business of such importance to us all.

Moving Pictures Cure Mental Diseases.

The unlimited beneficial uses of the moving pictures have always been contended for in these columns; it is, of course, absolutely impossible to enumerate every possible advantageous use to which they may be applied, but believing in their universal adaptiveness we are never surprised at any new discovery or experience in which they have become profitable.

The latest use to which living pictures have profitably been applied is in dealing with the insane. The idea occurred to Dr. Henry S. Atkins, of the Missouri State Hospital for the Insane at St. Louis. Dr. Atkins says: "Knowing that an insane person has in many ways the inclinations of a child, and reasoning collaterally, I put this question to myself, 'Would my patients be interested in motion pictures?' A trial was enough to convince the most skeptical doubter, for at the first entertainment half the entire number of inmates sat fascinated through the hour's performance. Following this a modern apparatus was installed in the asylum, and given a full test for one year. The improvement has been remarkable even in cases which had been declared hopeless." Dr. Atkins further relates in the history of his new treatment of the results in certain special cases where insanity has been cured or greatly improved. This testimony is without doubt of great value and we believe there are others besides Dr. Atkins who can prove the same benefits elsewhere. There can be no doubt that dormant faculties in asylums or in schools can be brought to healthy activity by a judicious use of the moving pictures, and we are sure that this is one of those divisions of the sphere of usefulness at once health-producing and mind-quickening from which we anticipate large results in the near future. We shall continue in our watchfulness and expectancy, knowing that from time to time we shall realize our varied anticipations and gladly record every development, knowing that every such advance, in whatever sphere it may be, is not only helpful to those in the moving picture world but for humanity at large. We would remark in this connection that we notice from time to time various institutions are installing moving picture machines. A Board of Education recently considered the question of introducing a plant in the large public school under their control; this is, we believe, but the beginning.

We have often urged the moving picture exhibitor to supplement, or complement, his display of moving pictures by good music, both vocal and instrumental. It is to the credit of a progressive business that our advice is often well heeded. There was the conspicuous instance the other day when our Mr. Bradlet at Chicago was instrumental in having a fine Gaumont picture treated with suitable music. This created both a record and a local sensation. Now, this very week we have received a bill from the St. Nicholas Theatre, 1,409 St. Nicholas avenue, in this city which shows that the proprietor of this house is alive to the value of good vocal and instrumental music. We think that his is such a good example, that we reproduce the bill in its entirety as it was distributed, so that other exhibitors may profit by the hints given therein:

A new departure in the Motion Picture Business. The grandest Entertainment ever offered for the price. A clean, cool, airy, home-like Auditorium.

Your patronage respectfully solicited.

It will be noted that our friends of the St. Nicholas Theater get out a special programme for Sunday. There is something peculiarly fitting in the provision of good music of any kind in a house of entertainment on Sunday. Music is one of those aids to that rest which all of us are supposed to take on the seventh day of the week—or is it the first? So that we hope the example of the St. Nicholas Theater will be generally followed elsewhere.

Of course this idea is not necessarily restrictable to Sunday. It is capable of being carried out every day of the week. We hope to live to see it. We hope to live to see the Australian idea made general in the United States; that is, the provision of the highest class music as a supplement to the moving picture.

A Comparison.

Visiting a theater on Twenty-third street for the purpose of studying the value of the moving pictures, I was led into a strange and unexpected comparison or comparisons, the recital of which may perhaps be of interest to readers of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

The films shown were chiefly new, including "The Marriage of Esther," "An Unexpected Friend," "The Altar of Love," "Lebius Abbey—St. Honorat's Island" and some views.

"The Altar of Love" and "An Unexpected Friend" are similar in pathos and are serious views of life under adverse circumstances, with attendant sorrows; both, however, end happily, the suspense caused by "life's tragedies" visiting both families is turned to joy; these are two wholesome scenes with the additional strong point in their favor that they are sufficiently and safely self-explanatory without need of verbal details. An old-fashioned set of slides were next shown by the old-fashioned stereopticon, depicting early scenes in the life of Napoleon Bonaparte, accompanied by "descriptive readings," which latter were well entitled to the same "eulogy" which an old Scotchman pronounced upon the dominie's sermon in that "he read it, then that he read it badly, and finally it was not worth reading." If this set of pictures were shown to fill time they served their purpose, for indeed they were of no other value; the "readings" were useless because it was impossible to hear them.

In striking contrast to this, "The Marriage of Esther" lost half its value for lack of good "descriptive readings" or a good-voiced person well acquainted with the story who might with great profit have carried the audience to an intelligent appreciation of a worthy subject. To a lay mind in these matters it does seem strange that a useless old magic lantern series should receive the attention of the descriptive voice while the advanced living picture portrayal of a great and important event should be treated with a silence that not only robbed it of its best parts but by comparison—or rather by contrast—beggared its value. Should it fall to my lot to again see "The Marriage of Esther" when the whole series is completed I hope it will be accompanied by a helpful verbal interpretation; if, however, this should prove impossible, let not this "poverty of language" be made more conspicuous by its absence in the undue attention paid to a less worthy and old-fashioned stereopticon subject.

The theatrical manager is in an apologetic mood. He is telling the public why he is more or less of a failure in the business—mostly more than less. He is apologizing for such plays as "The Easiest Way," which is the story of a woman's degradation in the market place. The theatrical manager is saying that this is the only kind of stuff that pays in the theater to-day—this half-concealed salacity. "The Easiest Way" is making money; so is "Zaza," another unpleasant revelation of the life it is possible for an actress to lead. The theatrical manager frequently says that the playgoing public is a low-minded, prurient-minded public; that it wants only the unclean side of life shown on the stage; that it likes to look upon Salome unveiled, and young women in a state of partial undress inviting the audience to come and loosen their garters! Mr. Theatrical Manager, if you believe all this you are either a criminal, a lunatic, or both, and you have no right in the business.

I wonder if it has ever occurred to men in the theatrical business why most of their houses go dark suddenly, or without warning. Is it because of the lack of acting ability shown by their highly paid performers? Of the thirty thousand actors and actresses in the United States, how many does the reader think are fairly entitled to be called actors and actresses? Very few. In every walk of life, ability and excellence count. The real reason, as any intelligent man knows, why the New York stage, the American stage, the English stage, if you like—the real reason why these things are so, is because of a lack of ability in the construction of plays and a lack of ability in the acting of them. Not that the ability does not exist. Oh, dear, no! There are good playwrights and, contradictory though it may read, there are good actors and actresses. The flaw in the position lies with the theatrical manager, who is usually a speculative ignoramus. He does not know a good play when he sees it; does not know anybody who knows a good play; is no judge of acting ability, and is incapable of getting anybody else to judge for him.

The fault is not with the public. The public is as keen as ever to support good plays well acted. Mr. Theatrical Manager is incapable of supplying the demand, so the public stays away and, thank heaven, goes to the moving picture theater. What do I mean, then, by my caption, "Reflective Influences of the picture"? I will answer my own question in a concrete manner. In England the popularity of the moving picture killed the lantern slide, and killed the business until it was regarded as dead as a coffin nail, which is about the deadest piece of ironmongery I can think of, although a door nail is usually regarded as rather dead. However, what has happened? The public taste in England is being directed to excellence of photographic quality by the moving picture, and the result is there is quite a strong revival of interest in the lantern slide. It is a case of reflected influence. The influence created by the moving picture has exerted itself, as it were, automatically on the lantern slide, which has been resuscitated in public esteem, because it has been resuscitated in quality.

I think something in the nature of a parallel is likely to work itself out here. The moving picture is giving the public what the ordinary theater seldom does, or does not do in the majority of cases—that is, fine acting. It is very rare indeed, when you study a high-class moving picture, that you see "sticks" and "supers" in the picture. They are acting all the time. Everybody is doing something. They are obliged to act; they must act; they must let themselves go; it is not a case of reserved force, personality, voice, reputation, public curiosity or notoriety: all factors of success on the talking stage; it is a case of acting, acting, acting all the time.

Consider, now, the enormous audiences that these actors appeal to every day. Millions of people. Do you not think that these people are directly influenced by the ability shown on the moving picture screen? Unquestionably they are. But even so, supposing that the same level of acting ability as is shown in the moving picture were transplanted to the talking stage; do you not think that there would be fewer failures, fewer dark houses, fewer managerial fiascos? I, for one, certainly think so.

It seems to me that the pendulum may take a big swing to the other side. That a demand from the ordinary theater may spring up for the services of those actors and actresses who are making such successes in these moving pictures. Fancy, now, such a consummate actress as Pilar-Morin being stolen from the Edison Company by Mr. Frohman or Mr. Erlanger. Why not? Why not a raid of theatrical managers on the Biograph Company, the Imp Company, the Essanay Company, the Vitagraph Company, the Selig Company, etc., where all this splendid talent is working before the camera? Do you mean to tell me that if this talent had an equal chance of distinguishing itself on the ordinary stage, the public would stay away? The devil a bit of it.

I look with confidence to the early date when the casts of the Broadway theaters will be recruited from moving picture actors and actresses; when the young lady beloved of the "Angel" will no longer be a power in the theatrical world; when talent, real talent, will have the chance that it has not had of late. It looks a bit whimsical, no doubt, for me to suggest that the moving picture will be the salvation of the art of American acting, but that is quite as likely to happen as Mr. W. J. Bryan's possession of the next Democratic nomination to the Presidency. Just as likely as that and likelier!

A Review and a Preview Especially Interesting to the Young.

By Rev. W. H. Jackson.

The gift of the past ages to the twentieth century is the living picture, the reproduction of life. In animated reproduction and illustration in picture form before the human eye of everything living in any part of the earth is a wonder our forefathers would have declared impossible. The only parallel to this marvelous development of the kinematograph is to be found in the aeroplane, which is to the balloon what the moving picture machine is to the stereopticon.

Since the days when Pliny first analyzed color and the spectrum analyzed light; or since Watt discovered the hidden power of steam, and Franklin the subtle forces of electricity, the world has enjoyed no greater blessings than the recent fruits of these early beginnings. It seems to have remained for the twentieth century like a mighty trust to gather up the fruits of the labors of these early discoveries and bring them together in one concrete whole pregnant with the life infused by the combination of so many vital sources.

The common use of anything often robs us of the advantage gained from a knowledge of its origin and purpose; a comparison of the times when its uses were unknown is helpful.

The child of to-day riding in an automobile, besides being unfamiliar with its origin and development, is likewise ignorant of the stage coach, and to appreciate the change must become acquainted with the growth from one to the other. The telephone causes us to forget the courier who ran afoot for our forefathers, and the growth of the mail coach, mail train and telegraph.

How helpful it is, therefore, to awaken people to a sense of what is, as compared with what was; thereby quickening them into a higher outlook as to what shall be, for—write it as a law—it is only those who knowing and comparing the past with the present, who can most safely and wisely be the progenitors or prognosticators of the future. A helpful story written to illustrate the value of this knowledge is given as follows:

A wise parent wishing to teach his children a lesson and arouse them to a comprehension of the advantages of the time in which they lived and the blessings that surrounded them, promised at a certain birthday party to have provided "a cake that took a thousand men to make."

How great was the young people's joy and how much greater and intenser their expectation. Surely something was coming the like of which had never been seen before; to them it was a marvel yet unknown that was to be revealed. The surprise of the juvenile party can be better imagined than described when, as the long expected moment arrived, the cake appeared—not a monster pudding carried by a host of men, the creation of their expectation, but a simple plum pudding carried by a maid.

Chagrin and disappointment was apparent on every face; but now began the lesson. Taking pencil and paper, under the parent's guidance a tabulation of those men whose work was necessary to produce the pudding was commenced.

Beginning with the mining of the iron, the manufacture of the plow, followed by the making of all the tools, machines and instruments in the process of successive manufactures.

The plowing of the land, sowing and harvesting the grain, the preparation of the necessary machinery for making the flour, with the costly mills. The procuring of coal, the process of obtaining all the many and varied ingredients of the pudding soon taught its own lesson to the wondering children. The result being that the pudding was eaten with a relish and a vim more satisfying than if one thousand men had actually carried a gigantic cake upon the table. The great value of such a lesson can never be lost; this review then will be of great help to young readers in helping them to understand and appreciate the value of the great things they at present enjoy.

A wide vision of the past always suggests a wider vision of the future; the past, in coming up to the present, has proved how unlimited things may prove; and the future presents joyful anticipation of greater possibilities and facilities, all for the service of an appreciating mankind.

The living picture has taken ten centuries of time and millions of men to produce, ranking with other beneficial development for the good of those of us living in the beginning of this wonderful twentieth century. What a grand prospect is in view for those taking a proper advantage of this product of the ages, this mighty servant of the future.

It is going at once to be our recorder and our messenger, our historian and our prophet, our teacher and our scholar, a great educational and commercial power and one of our most sensible pleasure givers. Because its varied sources were found in the free elements of the universe it will be the boon of the poor; because its equipment is capable of the costliest setting and service it shall be the rewarder of the rich; speaking through the age it shall teach the lowly and uncultured as well as the savant and the professional. Open the widest door of the imagination and take a view even in the next decade and you shall see the moving picture richly rewarding by the grandeur of its service all those who in these days have recognized its value and given its growth the impetus it so richly deserves.

THE TRUTH OF THE GAUMONT RUMORS.

For some time there have been repeated and conflicting rumors circulated as to which of the three opposing camps would market the Gaumont product. Both the Independent factions claimed it openly, but George Kleine, who has held the contract for years, preserved his usual Sphinx-like silence. We are assured that he will continue to market the films of the Gaumont Company, of Paris, as usual, which should set at rest the minds of the licensed exchanges and exhibitors. But the business of the Gaumont Company, of New York (located at Flushing, N. Y.), which has been managed from its inception by Mr. Herbert Blache, has now been purchased outright by him and will have no connection whatever with the Gaumont Company, of Paris. The purchase includes, of course, all the American and Canadian rights of the Gaumont Chronophone, which department of the business will now be fostered. It having been reported that Gaumont-American film would be produced in the Flushing plant, we put the question direct to the proprietor. His reply was that they had no immediate intention of doing so but that one never could tell what the future would bring forth. When the plant was installed it was amplified far beyond the necessities for the Chronophone and they have now a perfect mechanical equipment with a capacity of 50,000 feet of positive film a day. This printing plant is at the service of any American manufacturer whose own plant is not equal to the demands or those who want to improve their product by getting the popular Gaumont quality in their positives. We are inclined to the belief that if Mr. Blache can keep his Flushing plant running on developing and printing for the trade that he will leave the producing end of matters severely alone.

Lubin essayed a new line of work in "An Indian's Love Affair," shown this week. The story is particularly good and it was presented in a manner that makes us wish for more work from the Lubin studio along the same lines.

Selig's latest scoop, "Ranch Life in the Great Southwest," promises to be the pinnacle of wild Western productions. From an educational and historical standpoint this film deserves the widest exhibition and the names of the ranchmen that have taken part in the scenes assures the exhibitor that there will be enough thrills.

THE LIVING VOICE WITH THE LIVING PICTURE.

By Rev. W. H. Jackson.

Everyone is familiar with the "sight seeing cars" of the large cities. In New York especially they are one of the features of the city. Suppose, however, that they were simply "seeing cars" taking visitors aimlessly from one end of the city to another without the guide with his story of knowledge, his descriptive powers and his megaphone, how long would the sightseeing car business last? To ask the question is to answer it, for without doubt the absence of the "descriptive voice" would very soon mean the absence of the sightseeing car itself. The moving picture is much in the same condition with but simply a change of position. In the sightseeing car the people go to the picture, in the exhibition the picture is brought to the people, and there is equal need for the descriptive voice under each circumstance. The old stereopticon never appeared without the lecturer on pulpit or platform, the combination being the cause of a great deal of good. The most conspicuous instance of the value of the combined picture and voice is that of the famous John L. Stoddard lectures which were given to intelligent audiences over this entire country, and while tens of thousands of people increased their store of interesting knowledge and saw the whole world at only second hand, the financial returns exceeded the vast sum of a million and a half dollars. Further to this may be added the fact that the publication of those lectures has exceeded 700,000 sets of 16 volumes each, or a total of 11,200,00 books, bringing the author one of the most magnificent of fortunes, not only as a reward for his conspicuous ability, but as a testimony to the value of the living voice with the inanimate picture. What Stoddard might have accomplished with animated pictures staggers the imagination.

When we plead for the "living voice" we do not mean the mechanical voice as recorded upon and reproduced by the phonograph. There is need and room for both the personal and the mechanically reproduced voice, as also there is a place for each, but each must be kept in its place.

The cinephone or any similar invention which synchronizes the voice with the picture is a valuable addition to the moving picture art; we look for its usefulness in filling a very evident void at this time. It can be most profitably used in giving the full title, or the timely necessary explanation to a picture, with which, as we have shown in another place, the picture may be misunderstood or a wrong and injurious interpretation be given in a critical moral situation.

Nevertheless, while the value of such an arrangement as that given by the cinephone is great, and its field of usefulness is large and growing, we do, however, feel it incumbent upon us to speak a word at this early stage of its use, in asking that it be used and not abused.

The first important lesson we would seek to impress upon our people in the use of the cinephone is that while explaining and emphasizing any picture subject, it makes good BETTER, it also makes bad WORSE. A conspicuous example and proof of this fell to the lot of the writer upon his first experience in the use of the cinephone. It made good BETTER.

The subject happened by mere chance to be the always acceptable "Excelsior"; the pictures, in true Alpine setting, were good in themselves, but without the "living voice" were more sentimental than inspirational. When, however, the photograph synchronizing with the picture gave forth in song the words so well known and admired, the effect was so inspiring that applause was actually drawn from those assembled to judge the effect, proving the great advantage of the combined voice and picture and a new sense of appreciation of this distinct advance in exhibition work.

It made bad WORSE. By singular contrast the next series shown happened to prove most thoroughly how carefully this new combination must be handled. The subject, "Won't You Come and Flirt with We?" in itself not good, and with words absolutely without interest, became, when in unison with the phonograph, not only bad, but absolutely vile to a degree of beastliness, producing a feeling of disgust with both picture and song; indeed, the words made the picture loathsome.

Personally we are glad that the use of this combination thus brings out the distinctive characteristics of the pictures and subjects, because we believe it will have an entirely uplifting tendency by driving out that class of subject which cannot bear the increased emphasis on their moral lacking parts.

The full object and purpose with the many attendant advantages is, however, not attained by the use of even the most perfect invention or arrangement and classification of several inventions. The natural living voice with the personality of the speaker is that alone which can give perfection to living picture work. When we have progressed to this stage we predict a great advance all along the line and in every detail of moving picture work, more interest will be raised and interest imparted to otherwise uninteresting subjects, and those subjects which deeply possess an educative interest will become sensational as a result of the life-giving power of the living voice.

THE NEW YORK EXAMINATIONS.

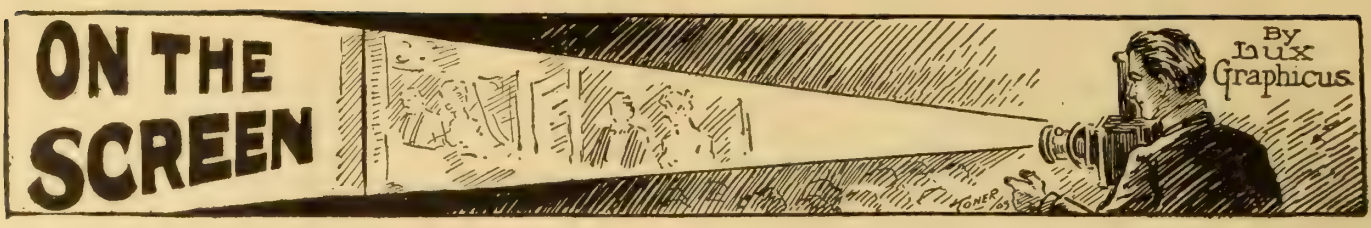
By F. H. Richardson.

During the past few months the writer has been the recipient of many complaints from operators concerning the examination given by the New York City Board of Examiners. I believe the Board has been accused of about everything from plain arson to robbing a henroost. Usually one man made such a circumstantial howl after being turned down, accusing the Board of robbing him, that I concluded to investigate for myself. I accordingly called at the office of Mr. Wynkoop, of the Bureau of Electrical Inspection, under whose direct supervision the Board works, intent on ascertaining whether or no the examiners were really working in good faith, performing their duties with the sole purpose of determining the applicant's ability, or lack of it, as the case might be. I was made welcome by Mr. Wynkoop and met Mr. George F. Sichert, consulting engineer of the department. After a long and pleasant chat with these gentlemen at their office at Park Row, I was cordially invited to visit the examination room next day and see for myself just exactly what the examination consisted of, as well as what the Board had to contend with, also to offer such criticisms as seemed to be warranted by my observation.

Next morning in company with Mr. Wynkoop I found at Borough Hall, Brooklyn, where I met and had a chat with Mr. Charles F. LaCombe, chief engineer of light and power, after which we descended to the basement where is located the examining room. I was surprised, after all I had heard. There most certainly was nothing at all tending to confuse the applicant. The whole outfit consisted of one Wagner No. 5 machine, one 25 ampere, non-adjustable rheostat, one large and one small knife switch on the wall, one set of plug and one set of cartridge fuses, with receptacles attached to the wall. Nothing could be simpler and it would be hard to imagine an outfit less confusing. In fact it strikes the writer that there might well be other operating room equipment added. The examiners impressed me as capable, honest men who aimed to do the right thing by the men they were examining. In fact they rather seemed to feel sorry for the applicants who made such a monumental display of their ignorance while I was there.

And now let me tell you what happened! I remained during the examination of three men, each of whom had had from three to five years' experience in operating and all of whom were, as I understand it, now employed, working on an old card. Each and every one of these three operators said, in response to questions, that he would not hitch up to a number eight or ten wire but would require a number six. Each and every one of them said, also, that they would not hitch up to a No. 1 or No. 0 wire, giving as their reason that "it was too strong," meaning that they would get too much current. I never was more astounded in my life! One man, in response to the question "what is the rheostat for?" replied: "it is to regulate the heat!" I didn't know whether to laugh or risk arrest by chucking the fellow through a window. The monumental gall of a man pretending to be an operator and knowing no more than that! Can you beat it? Is it any wonder I have looked in vain for a first class picture in New York City, if those three men were fair samples of New York City operators? Would you expect an examiner to pass a man after his refusal to hitch up to a No. 1 wire? Great God can it be possible that such dense ignorance is tolerated in the operating rooms of this city? Can it be that former boards have passed men who knew no more than that? Yet these same men scoff at the operators' school and deride it. They might better be taking a course themselves I should say. Bear in mind the fact that these three men are operating right now, though they probably won't be much longer. In conclusion let me say that from what I heard and saw, I am pretty well convinced that the Board is trying to do its duty and ought to have the cordial support of every real operator in the city. I am inclined to think that the examination is too easy, rather than too hard.

The Lyric Theater, of Spartanburg, N. C., has changed hands and in the future will be known as The Majestic, under the direction and ownership of J. W. Lynch.



Is the moving picture permanent? I do not mean will it last in popular esteem as an entertainment factor, as an agency for recording life of all kinds in motion, as the scientific application of the principles of persistence of vision —I do not mean in these respects. This question in those applications has been asked before, and is always answered in the affirmative by those who are competent to answer it. The picture will last, of course. There is no doubt about that. And when I ask is it permanent, I mean are the negative and positive prints that are made to-day immune against chemically intrinsic fugacity?

Chemically intrinsic fugacity! I will explain. In stationary photography for many years, the most popular printing process was known as the albumen silver method. The image of the photograph consisted of a deposit of gold toned silver in albumen. This was the glossy print that was in vogue from the sixties down to the nineties, and still is occasionally made. These pictures were not permanent, mainly owing to careless manipulation in toning, fixing, washing; silver prints were notoriously liable to fade; that is, the image would become a pale, sickly yellow and almost disappear. Probably every family in the country to-day has some of these pictures more or less near the vanishing point.

* * *

But there are other printing processes which yield greater permanence. That is to say, the image does not fade. They are carbon prints, bromide prints, platinum prints. Photographs made by these methods can be regarded, if reasonable care be taken in the manipulations, to all intents and purposes, as permanent. That is to say, they do not contain in their constitution any sulphurizing compound which destroys the image.

* * *

Is the image of the moving picture negative or positive, then, liable to fade? I think it is, unless it is very carefully developed, washed and fixed. Some years ago, Sir William Crookes, pointed out that the images of stars on gelatine glass negatives were liable to disappear. This is a very curious phenomenon. Those faint spots of stars at remote distances quite disappeared in the gelatine vehicle, that is, the developed silver, became, as it were, dissolved in the gelatine and so the picture disappeared. Very many of the star photographs taken to-day, then, will have probably faded away in a few years' time.

* * *

Now, with regard to the moving picture, that is, the silver image in gelatine on celluloid. Sir John Benjamin Stone, an English member of parliament, has made a large collection of moving pictures of English life and customs, and he has presented these pictures to the British Museum, in order that they may be preserved for consultation by future historians. Yet, Sir Benamin is in a reasonable state of doubt, I see, as to whether his much prized pictures will last. In other words he is apprehensive lest the image in the gelatine will fade and therefore partly disappear. He raises a doubt as to the comparative permanence of the pictures. This doubt is justified, if care be not taken in the making of the negatives and positives of the thousands of subjects of ephemeral interest which are made all over the world, released, exhibited and forgotten within a very few weeks. There are other subjects which it is desirable in the interests of history, science and social progress to preserve. Amongst the fixed released there are, no doubt, many negatives which it is desirable should be preserved.

What then, are the probabilities that these pictures will not fade in a comparatively short time—say a few years? Those probabilities are all in favor of the image deteriorating, unless as I have already said, the greatest care is taken in the making of them and let it be said their storage. They should, of course, be stored in a cool, dry chamber away from deleterious atmospheric and other influences. Everybody knows this.

The essentials to the comparative permanence of a moving picture are few and simple. In the first place it must be assumed that the celluloid base is innocuous in its effect on the gelatine and the silver image. Then the gelatine itself must be perfectly clean and also chemically inert. It must have no inter-relation either with the celluloid or with the silver. Chemists will tell you that absolute inertness is hardly to be thought of. Both the celluloid and the gelatine, no doubt, undergo gradual decomposition, and therefore, some kind of reaction, however, slight, must be set up. In practice, however, if both the celluloid and the gelatine have been properly manufactured and manipulated this danger may be thus avoided. I have celluloid negatives taken by myself nearly twenty years ago and they look to me to-day to be as good and as fresh as ever they were. But then, you know, I am a careful man.

The greatest danger to the permanence of a moving picture, or rather the greatest friend to its impermanence, is imperfect fixation and washing. When the negative or the positive has been developed, the washing cannot be too thorough. The film must be deprived of all superflous chemicals. This can only be done by a very thorough washing. Then comes fixation in the hypo bath.

* * *

Probably no photographic operation is more perfunctorily carried out than this. It is too frequently the case that the darkroom man trusts entirely to the eye in this matter. But anybody with the smallest chemical knowledge of the subject will tell you that though a film may to the eye be apparently fixed, yet nevertheless it may not be actually so. In other words that the hypo bath may not be quite strong enough, that it may not be used long enough and that, when the film is taken out of that bath, though it is apparently clear of all hypo and silver salts, yet there is a great deal of both left on. If this be the case, then the seeds of impermanence are implanted in the film.

Of course the best thing to do is to make the fixation as thorough and as prolonged as possible within proper limits; with a bath of full strength keep the film immersed in it long after it is apparently fixed. If this be done, one danger is removed. Photographic experimentalists well know that one of the greatest incentives to impermanence is incomplete fixation. Yet even though your film be fixed properly you are not altogether removed from the risk of danger of impermanence. A final washing must be as thorough as it is possible to make it. The object of this washing is to get rid of all superfluous hypo salts and silver salts which may be left in the film.

If that washing is incomplete, if the water of solution does not penetrate perfectly thoroughly, it is obvious that deleterious compounds are left in the gelatine, and these are those which make for fugacity or impermanence, in virtue of the fact that, chemically speaking, they have no place there, but having a place there pro tem they react upon the molecules of silver present with the final destruction of the image. I ought to apologize to my readers of this page for handing out this week a subect of apparent obtuseness, but I felt that I had a little duty to discharge in drawing the attention of the serious maker of moving pictures to the possible dangers of the fugacity of the picture.

You all remember the old sentence with regard to the man who was adjured to do something better for the good of posterity. His reply was this: "What has posterity done for me?" A humble but a rational argument. Very few of us care what happens to-morrow, yet some of us, the majority of us, like to feel that what we are doing to-day in the world will be regarded in future times as good work and therefore, you know why I have written these paragraphs.

"Has anyone here seen 'Rocky Kelly'?" If you have not seen him, you surely have heard of him. At present he is in California in a burg called "Frisco"—a great moving picture town, but too sanctimonious to harbor so-called prize fights. Since reading the newspapers of the past week I have come to the conclusion that Rock resembles the rock of Gibraltar. When he goes after anything he usually gets it and if he fails it is not because he did not stick to the job. It may seem like a reckless assertion, but it is none the less devoid of justification, Rock is to-day a greater man than the Governor of California. To many people the latter appears to be the fundamental stone of salvation. He, a few days ago, played what he thought was a winning card to the clergy. The card he really played was a joker. What he played was a piece of tissue paper—so thin that you could almost see through it. The next thing will be a big convention of gospel groupers, with the Governor in the seat of honor, and advance copies of resolutions of confidence in the hands of all the newspapers. It will not be a special subject, so film renters need not feel any apprehension of extra expense. It will be one of the ordinary, or rather regular releases, as the trade terms it, and the wind up of the picture will be very scant of interest. It will picture an "angel" passing into oblivion. It is not difficult after these few remarks, to discern why Mr. William T. Rock, of the Vitagraph Company, should be in the limelight at the present time, and far more popular than the Governor of California. I forget the name of the head of the so-called native State, and perhaps it is better I do. Perhaps upon mature reflection he will agree it is better that the people (of whom I beg the privilege to be one), forget him.

Some people may think my zeal in behalf of the motion pictures makes me unreasonable. I will endeavor to convince such to the contrary. The Moses of Morality, of California, failed to burn the bridges as he passed over them. When he paid a recent visit to New York city he was interviewed by newspaper reporters and declared "There is nothing up to me in that direction. There is a law in California which prohibits prize-fights, but it contains a clause permitting athletic clubs to hold boxing matches with the consent of the proper county authorities. It provides that the rounds be limited, and that the candidates shall be examined by a physician before they enter the ring. I have no knowledge that there is anything other than a boxing exhibition to be held."

* * *

It is as clear as daylight that the Governor of California had a passive mind when in New York. But what does he say when he reaches Chicago? The press throughout the country quoted an interview to the effect that the Jeffries-Johnson fight was a frame up, and even if Jeffries could not win on his merits, Johnson would be forced to lose. To this day the Governor of California has not given a positive refusal of that interview. The best in his favor has been a refusal to be interviewed, or a statement to the effect that he was incorrectly reported.

* * *

This is not a letter on sporting topics, nor is it designed as a part of a sporting column, so we will jump to California and read that the Governor of that State has declared "They can't fight here." He instructs his Attorney General to stop the fight. When interviewed in New York and Chicago, the Governor was not so emphatic. At that time, the fight was fixed for Emeryville, California. Since that time the scene of the contest has been changed to San Francisco, California. Are the laws regarding boxing matches more stringent in the latter city than the first named? Have the articles of agreement between Jeffries and Johnson been changed since the visit of the Governor to New York and Chicago? But let us go a step farther in the search of good faith. The Governor of California evidently knew the conditions of the contract between Jeffries and Johnson. If he did not how could he declare "There is nothing up to me in that direction," and practically quote the contract terms? And let us take another step in advance and ask if the Governor and his Attorney General and all the attorneys, detectives, etc., and other have not been [illegible] duties. If the coming contest between Jeffries and Johnson is a declared and intended infringement of the laws of California [illegible] that the training and other preliminaries are also infringements? And if it is a fact, does not the Governor of California ordered the arrest of all the infringing parties and put them under bail to keep the peace? Thousands upon thousands of people are in California to-day watching the preliminaries paying tribute to the ambitious hotelkeepers and the [illegible] active in all quarters. The press of the country has [illegible] the situation most clearly and it is only less than three weeks before the fight that the moral aspect dawns upon the mind of the Governor.

* * *

To quote a well-known earnest and humorist, "not only that," immediately following the announcement that a contract has been closed whereby the fighters and the backers of the fight are to get $150,000 as their share of the moving picture profits, the Governor of California awakens to a realization that the contest is to be a prize fight and an infringement of the law. Of course the Governor may be too busy when at his official desk in California to think of either Jeffries or Johnson, but he cannot get away from the clearly defined fact that his unrefuted interviews in New York and Chicago do not dovetail with the declaration he has made to his Attorney General.

* * *

The Evening Journal (New York) gave editorial space during the past week to moving pictures and paid many compliments to them, the most striking of which was this: "When the mind travels the body need not travel." This followed the statement that "the photograph brings everything that is worth while in the world before the eyes of the stay-at-home." The writer says "Have you thought how much the photograph has taught you? You know the leaning tower of Pisa, or the great Pyramids of Egypt, or the Palace of St. Marks in Venice or the Falls of Niagara—hundreds of the world's wonders. They are clear in your mind, although you may never have actually seen any one of those things." All hats off to that editorial man. The poor, despised moving pictures have at last received recognition. Every picture house man who is enterprising will send to the newspaper for a reprint of the page bearing the editorial, I refer to and prominently display it at the box-office. It is the culmination of a long fought battle for the recognition of motion pictures as a legitimate offering.

In spite of the gratitude that springs from my long suffering heart however, we must take issue with the editorialist on one point—but perhaps it is not an issue, rather a correction. He says "All moving picture exhibitions should be rigidly scrutinized, every picture put in motion before the eyes of children should pass a severe censorship and be officially licensed before its presentation." If the editorialist I have quoted is not a backwoods man he has certainly kept a stay-at-home. All the travel scenes subjects he refers to are as old as the history of the moving pictures. If I am not mistaken I saw the Pisa tower and the Pyramids of Egypt reflected upon the moving picture screen eight or ten years ago. The Venice pictures came out about the same time. All the subjects were exhibited the farthest West, the northest North and the southest South at least six years ago by traveling companies. At that time they were of foreign manufacture and were featured. Some of them have since been reproduced, but the features are identical. If a jest is permissible, may I ask why the editorial omitted from its citations "Roosevelt in Africa"? Oh, well! never mind. Everybody is not receptive to one idea. But, to relax into seriousness I most emphatically protest against the rigid scrutinizing of moving picture exhibitions. It would be the opening of another door to graft. If there is to be a censure let it be on the pictures before they reach the hands of the exhibitor. The censorship of exhibition places should be restricted to the place itself, and entirely independent of the pictures. In the case of counterfeit money it is absolutely necessary at times to arrest the people who circulate it in order to trace the source of production. In the case of moving pictures no telescope is required to locate their source, consequently the censor's position is at the exit.

I notice the writer very shrewdly says: "Every picture put in motion before the eyes of children should pass a severe censorship and be officially licensed before its presentation." No exception is taken to this. There is a National Board of Censorship with headquarters in New York City, and if the editor will look up the telephone number of the People's Institute he will be able to secure a very agreeable interview with Mr. Collier, the secretary of the Board. Mr. Collier is a man of wide and most favorable reputation and I am sure he will be only too pleased to give information concerning the work he has been engaged in for months to purify, if the term is correct, moving picture productions. And when Mr. Collier supplies a list of names of the people who are back of and interested in the work of the Censorship Board our editorial friend will be convinced that the keynote of purity was sounded before he dipped his pen in the ink. Mr. Collier may very properly also suggest that the latitude of his organization be extended to the scrutiny of more than "every picture put in motion." There are many newspaper illustrations that could hardly bear the test. Pictures of young girls being led to ruin, depiction of their murder, graphic views of the apartments, the fireplace where the body was concealed, how the body looked when discovered by the police, and all such things could very readily be at least tamed down without danger of infringing upon the freedom of the press.

MOVING PICTURES.

(From the Report of the Department of Factory Inspection, Harrisburg, Pa.)

Within the past few years, particularly during the last two years, Pennsylvania has been invaded by a horde of enterprising but reckless amusement promoters. The art of making life-moving pictures and projecting the same upon canvas had been perfected to a degree which insured cheapness of production and a new and pleasing source of entertainment. There was money in it, too; easy money for all who could secure a room, be it large or small, in which to exhibit this new art. Accordingly all sorts of rooms were rented or purchased outright, and in them were installed the various machines and appliances necessary—that is all appliances except such as would safe-guard the patrons from panic caused by fire or other accident. The projecting machines had none or worthless enclosures, the electric wires or other lighting devices were improperly installed, the aisles were too few or too narrow, the means of exit insufficient and in short, the whole structure presenting no evidence whatever of any care for or interest in the gathered throng of patrons save what was centered upon their purses.

To remedy these evils as well as to guard against a repetition of them in future, the legislature in the session of 1909 made wise provisions. By an act approved the first day of May, 1909, pamphlet laws, pages 346-353, it was enacted, in brief, that permanent and portable booths for moving picture shows shoud be constructed of a certain size and material, and that all appurtenances and appliances used in connection with moving picture machines should be safeguarded.

By another act approved the third day of May, 1909, pamphlet laws, pages 417-420, provisions are made for the erection of fire escapes, the installation of fire extinguishers, and fire proof curtains, the construction of aisles and exits and some other provisions all tending to safe-guard lives.

The enforcement of these two laws are intrusted to this department, which at once adopted measures intended to carry out this trust. Opposition immediately arose in the shape of many protests against what was termed confiscatory and unconstitutional legislation. Undeterred by these protests the department sought to enforce the laws and did enforce them in many places of amusement. Seeing that their protests were unavailing, a combination of picture show speculators was formed, attorneys were engaged, and injunctions restraining this Department from enforcing the laws in question were sought and obtained. The first of these injunctions, and the one of most importance owing to the number of petitioners and the standing of counsel was granted by the Dauphin county court. In defense of the laws the Attorney General acting for this Department, appeared in court as early as last October and made reply. Up to the time of preparing this report no opinion from the court has been delivered.* What the nature of the opinion will be is, of course, unknown. The nature and character of those who would seek, even by a legal technicality which the courts might sustain, to set aside laws enacted for no other purpose than to compel such men to have regard for the lives of men, women and children—the nature and character of such men are shown in their actions.

But despite injunctions and other forms of hindrances, this Department has had four hundred and sixty-six moving picture shows inspected. It has compelled the erection of suitable booths in two hundred and fifty-nine, more and better exits in one hundred and seventy-three, fire extinguishers in seventy-three, fireproof curtains in eighteen, water pipes and hose in ten, outward swinging doors in sixty, exit lights in fifteen, and has insured the necessary aisle spaces in two hundred and nineteen.

The Department has, also, in theaters proper, to the number of one hundred and thirty-five, enforced the law in many instances and along the same general lines as above noted in reference to moving picture shows. Fire escapes on theaters to the number of six were erected, thirty-two had aisles widened, thirty-five installed booths, fifty-five installed extinguishers, forty-two were provided with fire proof curtains, forty-eight with fire hose and water appliances, forty-one had exit lights installed and twenty-two were provided with more and better means of egress.

By reason of the enforcement of the laws a number of moving picture shows were closed for all time, the smallness of the show rooms making it impossible to erect booths, widen aisles or obtain proper exits. During the past year a fatal accident occurred in a film storage room caused by the explosion of films. Such an accident affords sufficient evidence of the explosive and inflammable nature of moving picture films. Another accident in which a machine operator lost his life in a badly constructed booth was the result of a neglect to observe the law. Regrettable as those accidents were they impressed some and should impress every one with the belief that a Commonwealth can make no better use of its police powers than to protect lives. And it should protect faith and morals, too, by making provision for the appointment of censors of these moving pictures.

New York State has its board of censors, through whose efforts pictures intended to show how robberies and even worse crimes are easily committed have been eliminated. The present laws would be improved were they amended so as to make it a punishable offense for any person to operate a moving picture show until a license so to do had first been obtained from this Department.

*The Court sustained the constitutionality of the Act. An appeal is now pending.

THE MARRIAGE OF ESTHER.

A Critical Review by Rev. W. H. Jackson.

I think it was Rudyard Kipling who gave his opinion of America, as being like a man in a railroad station; i. e., "in a restless condition—part way between where he came from and where he was going to." This was the impression made upon me by the presentation of the first portion of this new series "The Marriage of Esther."

Just what motives the compilers of this series may have in mind cannot, of course, be known at this time; it will be manifestly unfair to form any judgment until the whole work has been seen in one presentation. The first portion, however, does not create any profound impression, perhaps because the most important part has yet to come. In this preliminary stage we are only favored with an introduction to the important characters, the coming of the maidens; their presentation to King Ahasuerus, who selects Esther, making her his Queen, and presenting her as such to his courtiers as they gather at the marriage feast. When we remember that this is a very important incident in Jewish history, dear to every Hebrew to this day; also that as the revelation of an overruling Providence to all people Jew and Gentile alike; it would seem that the object in view in presenting such a beautiful work can be but two fold. First, to center the mind upon Esther's divine mission and destiny, and its beneficent effects upon her nation. In the second place to reproduce as near as possible the surroundings of the times in which she lived; the former of these constituting the morale and the latter the artistic of the subject. Together these should be expected to create an inspiration and admiration in the minds of the beholders; let us therefore endeavor to trace to what xtent this has been accomplished thus far.

The characters in the representation are our first study; Of the personality of King Ahasuerus there is little to note at this time, his general appearance is very fair; Esther is very good, although a little too mature in appearance, not forming a sufficient contrast with Mordecai, who is a decade too young, as a result not sufficiently fatherly or Patriarchal in his appearance beside his adopted daughter. In their endeavor to faithfully portray those whom they represent Esther is very good, prudently modesty is apparent the natural shyness and timid carefulness shown as she steps upon the throne, also upon receiving the crown, are commendable.

The King is much strained, his action in ordering every one from his royal presence when about to place the crown upon Esther's head is decidedly and extremely peculiar, most unwarranted, and without doubt not faithful to the times and custom.

Mordecai is fairly represented. His committal of Esther to divine protection requires less acting and more fervency. This fault, however, may be excused from the fact that actions must necessarily supplant words.

The setting of the whole scene is a very fair attempt to reproduce styles and customs of the times, showing great care and preparation which may be commended; yet there is room for improvement in many ways. The arrival of the maidens by camel, donkey and ox team gives a strange Oriental tinge; their reception by the King's chamberlain is crude; his actions are more like those of an Arab buying slaves than of a courtier selecting beauty.

The preparations of the maidens for their presentation to the King are very modern, especially so in the case of Esther, where a splendid opportunity presents itself to depict her as being arrayed in robes of splendor and rich adornments suitable to the historic account; instead of the monotonous—painfully monotonous—commonplace, continued hair combing; this was exceedingly weak and showed Esther to pitiful disadvantage.

The royal procession at the banquet was the best scene here again the deportment of Esther was commendable. At the close of this, the first series, we could not help wishing that the whole conception might be lifted to a somewhat higher plane; this could in a great measure be accomplished if a descriptive voice were brought into requisition. This strong subject loses half its value through lack of description and explanation; it is possible that to the majority of Hebrews the whole scene may be more familiar, but to many others there is need of the real helpfulness and vitality otherwise lost to the detriment of the better presentation of the subject.

Those having charge of this production should carefully hold in mind the threefold setting of the subject, i. e., Oriental, Historical and Sacred, and as such should be handled with extreme delicacy and care; as the slightest modernizing or profaming of such a noble theme would be detrimental to this class of work.

We look forward with anxiety to the next series, when, as we stated at the beginning of this article we shall be better able to judge the motive of the producers of this film. At this point we stop and wait, without praise, without criticism, until the end. At this time, also, it is not possible to form a right estimate of the public reception of the "Marriage of Esther." We heard no comments, nor came in contact with, nor experienced any "impressions."

The one test of this work when completed as measured by the importance of the subject, and the great troube required in its preparation will only be found by proving that it creates a profound impression.

AN APPRECIATION.

Sitting beside a very well known actor, who made a reputation for himself on the living stage, we enjoyed the Biograph drama, "The Face at the Window," at Keith's, the other evening. Our friend remarked: "This is grand! How well the actors are selected and how well they carry the part. I come here regularly to see the work of this company, but I regret the time wasted on songs and vaudeville acts." The speaker, whose name is known to every follower of theatricals, joined heartily in the applause which was the most sincere accorded to any number on the program.

BULL DOG CEMENT

Is what Mr. Louis Riner calls his film cement for inflammable and non-inflammable films. And like a bull dog it holds—we find that a piece of fim joined with it will part anywhere but at the joint. Riner is a practical man and has other things that will help the operator. His One-Drop Oil should be in every operating booth. For particulars address The One-Drop Oil Company, 4059 North Seventh avenue, Chicago, Ill.

GOTCH—ZBYSZKO.

[illegible] Gotch-Zbyszko World's Championship Wrestling Match at the Coliseum, Chicago, Wednesday night, June 1st, was pictured by the Selig Polyscope Co., and the result is one of the cleanest and best pictures of a sporting event ever made. The States and European rights are now being sold and the popularity of the picture guarantees great things for its producers. The length of the bout enabled the film makers to get the match complete in one excellent reel, as the first fall was 37 minutes and second a little over 20 minutes. Already there have been numerous cable inquiries regarding foreign rights, from all over the world.

The World's Championship Wrestling match pictures made by the Selig Polyscope Co. are now ready for distribution showing both Gotch and Zbyszko in training and every detail of the match from the time they step into the ring until the last fall—about eleven hundred feet. Price 15 cents per foot. State rights now selling and believe us they are going like chaff before the wind. Wire your proposition quick. Klank and Herman, care Selig Polyscope Co., Chicago.

KALEM INDIAN STORIES POPULAR.

Just what was the special attraction in the Kalem Indian stories puzzled us for some time. Now the secret is out. They are as historically correct as they can possibly make them and the scenes are carefully selected with a view to realism. Before a Kalem director puts on a play he is provided with a correct description of the costumes and an understanding of the customs of the particular tribe of Indians gathered from the most authoritative sources. What matters it if the actors disport themselves in the mountains of New Jersey instead of the wilds of Arizona or New Mexico. Rocks and trees are rocks and trees anywhere and our impression of a Kalem picture was convincing—at least as to the details of setting. And it ended with a weird scene of a band of Indian marauders committing themselves to the Great Spirit and leaping to death over a great precipice rather than fall into the hands of the enemy. Yes, the precipice was real, and the leap was real, and because the life net far below is out of range of the camera the thrills that are dear to the heart of the exhibitor will make "The Cheyenne Raiders" as popular as other Kalem stories.

ELECTROGRAFF QUALITY

Is destined to be the standard when the Independent manufacturers discuss the photographic end of matters. We prophesied this in a recent number after an interview with Mr. Geo. Graff and he has fulfilled our expectations, judging from his release of this week—"An Interrupted Courtship." Better photography than appeared in some of the scenes could not be wished for. Come, George, raise the standard of the plot and the acting to the same level and you need not take off your hat to any of your competitors.

CANARDS RUN TO EARTH.

The Associated Independent Film Manufacturers circulated a letter to the effect that their opponents were making overtures for a compromise. So far from this being the case the latter finally rejected the good offices of an arbiter of their own choice when the arbitration suggested by outside parties came to a hearing.

The Bianchi camera has been unjustly blamed for the poor photography in some past releases of the Powers Company. A new camera man has been engaged and the pictures are sharp and clear. "The man behind" is as important in camera work as in gunnery.

Since writing the article on "The Fourth of July in the Moving Picture" several films of a patriotic nature have been announced to which we direct attention. "Old Glory," the Vitagraph number for July 2, is one that will make the walls of your theater tremble with the bursts of applause. "Stars and Stripes," by the Edison Company on July 1, is another patriotic stimulant. It is said that the elaborate staging and number of people employed in the presentation of this film sets the pace for expense and realism in moving picture production. So the exhibitor is well provided with a suitable program for Independence Day.

"A Victim of Jealousy" (Biograph).—Producers do well to represent jealousy in the films in its true light, otherwise it might create a tendency to such obsession in the minds of those who are easily influenced. In this Biograph picture the unreasonable and wholly unwarranted jealousy of a young husband almost wrecks a home. His unjust suspicions of his young wife become unbearable, but after a number of bitter experiences she resolves to leave him, and is only restrained by his abect promises to do better in the future. One cannot commend this picture because of its amusing, or even entertaining features. Yet whether the producers intended it or not it seems destined to perform a beneficial service in graphically exhibiting the disagreeable effects of jealousy.

"The New Boss of Bar X Ranch" (Lubin).—A surprise for the rough fellows about the ranch. The new owner is a woman; but that doesn't matter particularly since she fits into the new life, investing it with a charm that makes them all worship her. In an evil moment she is seized and carried away. But before any harm resulted, her absence was discovered and she was vigorously rescued. Then develops a pretty love scene between big Dick Shirley, the foreman, and the little woman. One of the men sees them and playfully ropes them with his lariat. Perhaps the principal change to be noted in the film is the fact that when the kidnappers are captured instead of stringing them up as is the case in most pictures of cowboy life, they are led away to the officers to let the law take its course. The influence of such a picture is less likely to be injurious than those where lynch law, picturesque and effective, perhaps, is represented as controlling the execution of all sorts of criminals.

"Love's C. Q. D." (Melies)—An interesting love story woven around a wireless telegraph station at a frontier army post. Jealousy develops in a rival, but notwithstanding this the story ends well. The favored lover is captured, condemned to death and imprisoned until sunrise. But with a pocket sender, a novelty now, but perhaps in the near future a reality, he communicates with the post, is rescued by the soldiers and arrives just in time to see his enemy force his attentions upon the girl. The rest may be left to the imagination. One can but commend the adroit use of the wireless, with its mystery, in developing an interesting tale. It would be hard to imagine anything better in this particular line.

"The Range Riders" (Selig).—The motion picture film is performing one important artistic public service. It is putting in imperishable form reproductions of the wild riders of the plains, the picturesque cowboy and the treacherous Indian. In a few years all these will have disappeared forever. But reproduced by the camera their reproductions can be called into being upon the screen centuries in the future. Selig has been more than ordinarily successful in his representation of these scenes. This picture contains all the elements which go to make up a thrilling film. The cowboy, the cattle rustler, the cattle themselves—yes, there they are, quite as they looked to the writer the last time he came up over the old Sante Fe trail, and the great herd stampeded in a thunder storm which was awful in its manifestations, and for three days they were scattered over the prairies. Shortly afterward the trail was abandoned for the more rapidly moving train. This picture brought it all back, and aroused a flood of memories which obscured the years and carried one back among the clashing horns and the thundering herds of the broad prairies. The writer wishes personally to compliment Selig upon the excellence and value of these reproductions. It is the most graphic and beneficial of all ways to write history.

"Dimitri Douskoj" (Pathe).—A picture representing the rough Tartar soldiers of Russia in some of their oppressive reprisals. The picture is true to life, too true for one's peace of mind. It will be of service in supplying graphic information of what it means to live under such a tyrant as Khan is represented to be, and there are plenty like him in the world. The gallant Dimitri is a type which is fast becoming prominent in those countries, and through whom relief will come, as is shown here. The picture was warmly applauded, both for its theme and its manner of execution.

"The Exiled Chief" (Kalem)).—A pathetic picture representing peaceful Seminole Indians driven from their ancestral home in the Florida Everglades and forced to live in the barren wastes of Arkansas. The chief determines to return to the Everglades to die. Some excellent pictorial work is done as the chief is shown on his weary tramp through trackless forests back to his beloved Everglades. The scenes in the Everglades are well worth seeing. Indeed, the pictorial features apart from the pathetic story warrant the production of the film. The story itself is another chapter in the white man's oppression of the unfortunate Indian and deserves careful consideration.

"Twenty-four Hour Automobile Race" (Pathe).—A picture which will appeal to very many because of its character. Clearly photographed, it develops excellence from the pictorial end.

"Over the Garden Wall" (Vitagraph).—A pretty love story which is perhaps best described by saying that quite in a natural way a widow and widower meet and marry, through their children becoming acquainted over the garden wall. The story is not great, perhaps, but it is pleasant and the ending is as sweet as the most ardent admirer of love stories could desire.

"The Ranchman's Feud" (Essanay).—A story of a feud that has one merit well worth commendation. It is a feud with all the existing elements which make feuds thrilling, but without any killing. One man is shot, but he recovers and he and his sweetheart patch up the differences between the two older men so that the feud disappears and a wedding looms large on the horizon to take its place. There is plenty of life and animation, with the spirit of hatred which often controls the action of stubborn men faithfully depicted. The producer is to be congratulated upon establishing a precedent in pictures of this type well worth following.

"The Marriage of Esther" (Gaumont).—A sumptuous and historically accurate reproduction of the story of Esther as it is told in the Bible. While the story itself is wonderfully graphic in its description, this reproduction of it in a motion picture adds so much to the original narratve. No effort or expense was spared in making the picture. Mlle. Gravier, of the Theater de la Renaissance, was selected for Esther; M. Leonce Perret, of the Odeon Theater, was Ahasuerus and M. Legrand, of the Odeon Theater, was Mordecai. The story, as everyone knows, is one of the most romantic in history, and this feature was kept fully in mind throughout the production. The film consists of fourteen magnificently staged and exquisitely colored scenes, and one feature of the coloring deserves mention in passing. There is an almost total absence of the gaudy tints which sometimes mar a colored film. On the contrary the colors and tints are softened and blended with an artistic appreciation and a sympathetic understanding of the requirements. All through the picture the thoughtful arrangement of the characters can be distinguished. Life is emphasized. Not a dead scene is offered, and the grouping of the characters is always for the emphasis of the idea together with pictorial effect. It is a model in this respect. A picture like this has no scene, perhaps, which stands out with more emphasis than the others. The choosing of the new queen is, perhaps, the most notable scene and conveys an accurate idea of manners and social customs prevailing in King Xerxes' time, 521 B. C. There is more than entertainment in the picture. There is instruction, and that, too, of a very valuable sort. The ancient world, or a portion of it, is brought to our doors. An important occurrence is reproduced as accurately as though the original characters posed before the camera themselves. Thus history, which is only another name for the life of the people, passes before one in a series of attractive scenes and the process of education becomes almost a matter of actual sight. The work in this instance is so excellently done that only praise is justified. Improvement would be a difficult matter.

Lerin's Abbey on St. Honorat's Island" (Gaumont).—Students of religious history should be interested in this since it illustrated the place where St. Honoratus built his monastic home in 410 A. D., and went forth to labor in Western and Southern Gaul. He and his followers were the leading missioneries of their time. The interest in the film centers principally in its pictorial qualities, which are of a high order. One always feels satisfied when seeing a film of this character that the operator was an artist and selected his view points after careful consideration of the artistic requirements of the scenes. Gaumont's outdoor pictures, particularly the reproduction of scenic splendors of this type, have an artistic quality not surpassed. One views them with pleasure and profit.

"An Unexpected Friend" (Pathe).—A tender bit from life, emphasizing the misfortunes which sometimes seem to pursue the poor. If one sympathizes when the poor man, worried over his sick child, is arrested for passing a counterfeit coin, which he didn't know was bad, then one may be pardoned for feeling a sort of exultation when a friendly policeman substitutes a good coin and the charge fails. The return of prosperity enables the workman to give concrete evidence of his appreciation of the service rendered.

"Floating to Wealth" (Pathe).—A novelty picture representing how Mr. Moneyless floats out of his home on the waves of the Paris flood into the home of a wealthy woman, whom he saves, and she, in gratitude, marries him, placing him forever above want.

"The Altar of Love" (Vitagraph).—A pathetic domestic picture, representing the sacrifice of a poor immigrant, who is obliged to give his daughter away because of ill health. Years afterward he has become a successful man, and his daughter's benefactor is in financial straits. He is able to assist him and once more father and daughter are united. It is a simple story, but it stirs the emotions, since it appeals directly to the affections, and one alternately grieves and rejoices with the characters as they work out their parts on the screen.

"In the Border States" (Biograph).—A dramatic subject based upon the influence a child may unconsciously exert. It is a war story and when the child of a Union soldier hides a Confederate in the well she is saving her father's life, though of course, no one knows it at the time. In a few days it develops, and the Confederate, true to his manhood, refuses to strike when opportunity offers because of the child. While the story, apart from the child's part in it, possesses merit, the chief interest will center around the little one whose presence saved two lives, and possibly accomplished good which cannot be measured. "And a little child shall lead them."

"The Wild Man of Borneo" (Lubin).—An extremely laughable picture. The race between the young collegian, impersonating a wild man and a supposed gorilla, is about the liveliest thing put on the screen lately. And the things that happen during that race are too lively and too numerous to mention. Lubin has been responsible for a good many laughs in the past, and in producing this picture has added another to the long list.

"On Panther Creek" (Lubin).—A love story woven around a prospector's difficulty with a desparado. Through the intervention of his daughter's lover the stolen gold is recovered and the desperado brought to justice. Then the frosty father perceptibly warms up and Bud, quick to see his opportunity, makes the most of it and does business immediately. The sagacity of the horse is a feature and the setting is quite satisfactory.

"Micro-Cinematograph — Sleeping Sickness" (Pathe).—Bringing to its aid micro-photography the motion picture operator presents the spread of the disease germ which causes the sleeping sickness of Africa in the blood of an inoculated rat. The rapid multiplication of the trypansomes and the progress of the disease are made plainer than an entire treatise on the subject could make possible. This film suggests a whole range of valuable educational subjects clearly worth while, and which would form a series of great usefulness in the dissemination of information upon the action and spread of common diseases.

"Romeo and Juliet" (Selig).—A travesty upon the oft repeated syllogism that true love must necessarily proceed over a bumpy road. The warring factions of Brown and Smith interfere, and a lambasting over the parental knees is temporarily a deterrent. Yet, even as love has been known to utter loud guffaws at locksmiths, even so it overcomes stern parental objection by precipitately beating it to the justice where the twain are made one, and the discordant Brown-Smith elements are indissolubly united.

"United States Life Saving Drills" (Edison).—Few outside of the immediate vicinity covered by them realize what the United States life savers actually do. A daring rescue brings them flaming headlines in the newspapers, but in a day or two it is forgotten, and if they are ever thought of again, it is in a desultory way and probably with the erroneous impression that all they ever do is that. The Edison company in presenting this picture of the routine of their daily lives has performed a distinct public service, not only for the life savers themselves, but for the people of the country, who will acquire in this way accurate information of what they do, and how incessant are the toil and drills which inure them to hardships and develop those qualities which make the spectacular rescues possible.

"The House on the Hill" (Edison).—A dramatic film, with a strong heart interest developing that ultimately leads to the goal yclept matrimony. While this is working out, however, a gang of counterfeiters, headed by a supposed ghost, is run to earth and captured in extremely dramatic fashion. Because the young man and woman could not agree who should receive the reward they decide to marry or, at least, that is the inference, and both are have its benefits. It is a good story, well told, and has many attractive qualities.

"The Russian Lion" (Vitagraph).—A pathetic story woven about a famous wrestler. Its principal interest will undoubtedly be in the excellent exhibition of different types of wrestling. Moreover, the pathetic story works out to a pleasant ending, removing whatever of sorrow appeared at first.

"At the Dawning" (Gaumont).—A story containing some measure of timely interest since it is woven around the appearance of a comet in the year 1000. There is a kidnapped maiden, restored to her father, who afterward accepts the lawless baron as a son-in-law. And it all ends happily. The reproduction of the appearance of the comet is a novelty. There is some picturesque scenery, too, well worth the seeing. Gaumont's films never tire in this department.

"A Bitter Enemy" (Lux).—The story of a man who antagonizes himself some one else and runs amuck, belaboring with a gusto worthy some other cause a tailor's dummy, a pig's head, and similar objects which chance to come in his way.

"A Honeymoon for Three" (Essanay).—A humorous picture, albeit the humor is a trifle broad and perhaps, one might say suggestive; yet nothing is said in the subtitles or shown on the screen to which any one could take exceptions, and the producers of the film can scarcely be censured for the thoughts that rise in the minds of those who see the picture and appreciate the wedding couple's situation when the baby is discovered in their automobile. The heart interest which centers around the widow and her baby is pathetic enough. But she and the little one are cared for and when later twins come to the young couple there is rejoicing indeed. It is a picture that will make people laugh, but the people better remove themselves hence while it is running.

"Mistaken Identity" (Kalem).—A puzzle picture containing much interest and a good many thrills. In effect it shows how a crook took the place of a reputable man and nearly wrecked his life in doing it. Mystery is a prominent feature, and the one who follows it through to the end will be disposed to agree that it is a satisfactory production in its line.

"The Bonesetter's Daughter" (Pathe).—A love story centering around a physician and a patient with a broken leg. There is a young couple who want to marry, but are refused permission, and the broken leg works out the salvation of the lovelorn youth and maid. Much interest will be aroused by the natural setting and the photography of this picture, both of which are above the average, even of a Pathe film.

"The Barry Sisters" (Pathe).—An acrobatic picture of more than usual merit. Not only are the acts performed extraordinarily clever, but the photography is sharp and clear, even though the subject is difficult. It is, perhaps, one of the best of this type of film that the Pathes have ever produced.

"The Gum Shoe Kid" (Urban).—A detective story, representing a boy sleuth as performing remarkable stunts in the way of tracking criminals. Here is a conspiracy among servants which he clears away almost at once. Like all stories of this type its interest cannot be denied and one looks forward to the end with much pleasurable anticipation, nor is expectation disappointed. The guilty ones are dramatically brought to justice.

"A Trip Through Brazil" (Urban).—A scenic production of merit, presenting numerous pictorial features of Brazil, well worth seeing. It brings some of the most entertaining and instructive features of Brazil life to the doors of those who can never go there; and thus performs an educational service of merit. The photography is admirably done, with practically the scenes clear; and presented from what would seem to be the most graphic view point.

INDEPENDENT.

"A Determined Woman" (Imp).—Whether or not all disturbances incident to club life, or the cultivation of some particularly engaging ism could be quelled as easily and as quicky as this one is a question which it might be unwise to attempt to solve in the same way. But unquestionably the way to a woman's heart is through her affections, and in this instance when she sees another installed in her place she realizes that after all her home is the important thing, and tells her husband so. It is needless to point out how ready he is to restore her to her rightful place in the home. Intended for a comedy this film is really a subtle study of life and the influences which may be invoked to change the apparently uncontrollable currents.

"The Children of Edward IV" (Sales Company).—A picture dealing with an important episode in English history. It is perhaps needless to describe it. Everyone who has read English history at all knows the story, and as one watches the picture one becomes impressed with the idea that the history of kings, queens and their unfortunate children, is only a story of the infliction of needless pain, or of putting to death innocent persons merely so some one else might gratify an overweaning ambition. These pictures will serve to emphasize the difference between the present and the times depicted so graphically.

"Mr. Swell in the Country" (Centaur).—A comedy which might be true, yet the producer was undoubtedly moved to emphasize his fun by exaggerating the scenes. Mr. Swell makes a good appearance before he decides to take a bath in the stream. But his trousers are appropriated for scare crow purposes, and he perambulates first in a barrel and next in a skirt.

"Saved from the Red Men" (Bison).—A wild western picture with redskins pursuing a girl on horseback at a furious pace, one of them taking her from her horse at full gallop. Then the cowboys come, the girl's lover shoots the Indian, and the ending is happy, quite like similar stories everywhere. The furious riding is the principal feature, and one must admit that it is a stunt well worth seeing.

"Russia, the Land of Oppression" (Defender).—A very graphic reproduction of the terrible scenes of persecution which have been enacted among the Hebrew race in Kief and Kishineff. It is scarcely necessary to describe it. The newspapers and magazines have done this many times over. Happily the heroine of this picture has the general's son for lover, and she is saved from the unmitigated tortures and dishonors of Siberia by his intervention. There is a feeling of exultation when they are shown landing at Ellis Island, the gateway to the land where cruel persecutions of that character do not exist. One acquires a clearer comprehension of what the oppression of Russia means to the unfortunates who suffer under it when it is illustrated like this; and it is safe to say that after this picture the newspaper accounts of such persecutions will be more realistic than they have been heretofore. One may not commend the subject selected, but the manner in which it is worked out and its palpable effect upon the audience may be commended, and those interested in its production congratulated upon their excellent work.

"Her Romance" (Powers).—A love story with its accompaniments of death, widowhood and poverty, following disinheritance by an angry mother. Later the grandmother's automobile strikes the child while he is selling papers and reconciliation follows. Such stories are popular, and even though they are plentiful seem never to pall upon the taste of an audience.

"Limburger and Love" (Powers).—A marital mix-up due to the arrangement of an alliance through a matrimonial agency. One man is mistaken for another, arrested and put in prison, but afterwards released, and is married to the old maid by a justice. One does not deny the humorous features, but the question sometimes arises when looking at these pictures that make light of marriage whether or not the subtle influence is not injurious? Marriage should not be a subject for humorous exploitation. It is too sacred and too important for that.

"In Love with the Charcoal Woman" (Eclair).—A jumping charcoal sack would naturally cause a good deal of commotion and this instance clearly proves the contention. John's love for his charcoal woman got a serious set-back when he found he could not escape from the sack into which she thrust him when her sweetheart appeared. And when finally he did escape he comes to the conclusion that loving a charcoal woman is fraught with too many dangers to be further pursued.

"The Biter Bit" (Eclair).—A love story with some novel situations, introducing an old clothes man, with some of his tricks and discovering a pile of bank notes in an old cushion, and yet, Margaret doesn't care for the fortunate man. She prefers the one without money, and Ralph joins their hands and bids them proceed and be happy. The title refers to the machinations of the old clothes man, not to the love affair.

"The Way to Win" (Imp).—A lively picture in which a French count is made a monkey of while the girl he wants and her lover steal a march upon him and her father and are married before the unfortunate Frenchman escapes from the constables who hold him for speeding. Not an important, nor even an ultra-amusing picture, but serves to while away a few minutes without disagreeable accompaniments.

"The Sheriff's Daughter" (Nestor).—A wild western tale of Indians, kidnapped women, a dog that carries a message written on a bit of white skirt, careering cowboys and fleeing Indians. Aside from the intelligent work of the dog it possesses little or no novelty.

"The Emperor's Message" (Ambrosio).—A dramatic film, with well sustained interest and admirably photographed. The subject offers a number of opportunities for strong pictorial treatment, and each one of these subjects is developed to the utmost.

"Settling a Boundary Dispute" (Atlas).—A melodramatic method of securing the consent to a wedding of unwilling and quarreling fathers. Such outlawry is not recommended to the attention of lovers since it might not work as well again; but in this instance it was an admirable scheme. Further, they succeeded in settling the boundary dispute which had disrupted the two families to the entire satisfaction of every one; and a wedding followed in the natural course of events.

"Jeffries on His Ranch" (Yankee Film Co.).—A series of views of Jeffries on his ranch, presenting the big fellow in a way that will delight those who never look beyond the sporting page of the newspapers and a good many others beside. It is a strictly record picture, yet technically it is admirably done and deserves commendation on that score. This is the first release of the company, and it is an excellent introduction to the picture loving public, although it was made and issued some two or three years ago.

"Wenonah" (Powers)).—The story of the daughter of an Indian chief allied with the British in their war with the Americans. Numerous dramatic situations are included. Perhaps the strongest is where Wenonah has her hands tied and is sent into the woods to starve. The final scene, where she gives her life for the papers taken from the British courier, ends the picture with a touch of tragedy which adds to the picture. One must be ready to admit that it seems better for her to die thus than it would be for her to live. An impression of sadness runs through the picture, but it does not seem oppressive, or useless. Altogether, it is an excellently worked out and highly dramatic film.

"A Jealous Wife." (Ambrosio).—Perhaps after seeing the film almost any audience will agree that the wife had cause to be jealous. Some complicated occurrences assist in developing goods scenes. There is a snap to the acting which helps the picture immensely.

PARAMOUNT FILM CO. A LIVE WIRE.

A malicious rumor has been circulated that the Paramount Film Exchange is not buying new film. As this company has been advertising an exclusive service and making a bold bid for trade we made it our business to investigate their methods of doing business. Suffice it to say that they are buying at this date every available release on the independent side and holding a large group of satisfied customers by clean business methods. If the same could be said of every independent exchange the manufacturers on that side would have a more rosy outlook. We have no sympathy with these malicious unfounded rumors and will nail them down every time.

THE "OPEN DOOR" IN MOVING PICTURE WORK.

Years ago, in stationary photography, quite a vogue arose amongst clever European and American amateurs for what is known as the "open door" subject; that is to say, the picture would be photographed from inside a house or room, through a door, the landscape and the figures being shown beyond, thus creating a very marked effect of looking out of doors on a picture. We are reminded of this by a little reproduction of the Essanay release for June 18—"A Bandit's Wife." Here the woman is shown out of doors under the trees, whilst a man stands inside a building looking out upon the sunlit scene. This feature has always made a very striking effect in stationary photography. It is even more striking when shown on the moving picture screen. We have seen it on the screen in a few instances, but not so often as we would like. This little feature alone makes "The Bandit's Wife" in our eyes a notable bit of pictorial moving picture work.

Flint, Mass.—The Star Theater of this city, a beautifully appointed house, with a seating capacity of 750, devoted to moving pictures and vaudeville and formerly owned by Mr. M. Felder, has changed hands and is now under the management of Mr. T. Speigelthal, of New York city. Mr. Speigelthal is well known in the film business and expects to make his new purchase a paying investment.

OPERATOR'S COLUMN.

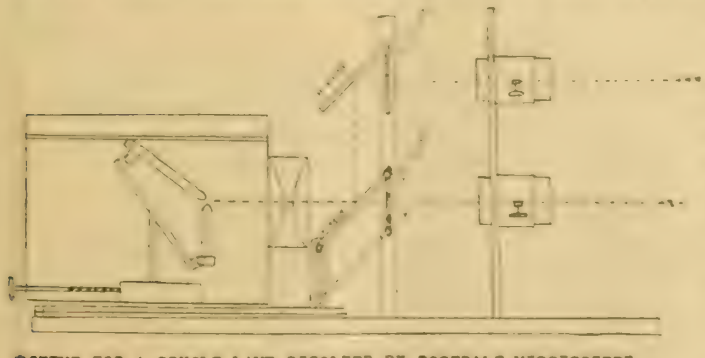
Questions and Answers.—Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Tension Springs, and Other Things. Washington, D. C., writes: "Kindly tell me if the tension springs in ——— machine should be bowed outward on their seating one before being put on the gate. I put a pair just as they came from the factory, but as they are perfectly flat they do not exert sufficient pressure to eliminate vibration. Also I would like to know why it is that the various film manufacturers don't print their film so that each one will frame the same—that is to say, why do they not print so that the perforations will be in the same position relative to the dividing line between the pictures on every film. The variation causes much annoyance to the operator who likes to start with his picture exactly in frame. Can you tell me at what degree of heat a film ignites? What screws do you manipulate in order that the framing carriage of the ——— machine, model ———, work easily or hard?"

The tension springs of the machine you name, also those of any other mechanism using the same style spring, should be put on just as they come from the factory. Put them on and try them out. If you think more tension is needed take your screwdriver and insert it under the springs, one at a time, and with a pull outward sufficient to bow the spring when you let loose, run it up and down under the spring two or three times. The result will be the same as your sketch. Let me caution you, however, Washington, that you must be careful not to get any more tension than is necessary, else you will wear the springs, aperture plate and film unduly, as well as the intermittent, and, for that matter, the whole mechanism. You must have sufficient tension, true. It is very easy to have too much, however. As to the matter of the perforations, I think I shall have to pass that up. The manufacturers have a very decided habit of doing things about as they please without much consideration to your or my convenience, so long as sales are not decreased. If uniform placing of sprocket holes in relation to the dividing line of the pictures helped sales you would see them get busy in about two-fifths of a minute. But such is not the case, and in this world, where nothing counts for much but the item of profit, it would be a mere waste of ink and energy to take up anything like that. I'm not sure what the exact degree necessary to ignite film is, but have heard it stated as being about 250, though whether F. or C. I do not know. Here is a chance for someone like Neighbor Crowe, of Watertown, S. D., who likes to experiment, to get busy. The experiment would be interesting, I am sure. I would be at it with my hair in a braid, were I fixed so I could. As to the frameup carriage: in the front of the two boxings which hold the rod to which is attached the frameup lever and the gear which meshes into the cog track you will see a set-screw—one in each boxing. Tightening or loosening these screws has the effect of making the frameup carriage work easy or tight.

Dissolver?—Rosedale, Miss., writes as follows: "Would you tell me through your helpful column what you think of the enclosed sketch? Would it produce a dissolving effect? Your column has been a great help to me, and the Moving Picture World is a jewel."

Many thanks, Neighbor Rosedale, for your kind words.



SCHEME FOR A SINGLE LAMP DISOLVER, BY ROSEDALE, MISSISSIPPI.

May we continue to merit your good opinion. Oh, well, I dunno about that dissolver. At first glance I said it would not work, but a closer inspection of the arrangement sketched (reproduced herewith) caused me to hesitate. I'm not sure just what the effect would be, but this I do know: mirror schemes and about everything else imaginable have already been tried in the effort to get the dissolving effect with one lamp. You might continue your experiment and report progress from time to time. It will be interesting at the least.

Some Information for Ft. Worth.—Los Angeles, Cal., writes: "Operating Fort Wayne with lower loop, and see that I have remedied the same difficulty by moving rod that holds roller bracket and spring forward (away the steel gate) just a little, giving more tension on the roller. Also loosening take-up which spring as there would be too much on the take-up. As regards Model setting (I use Model B, Edison), I loosen screw holding shutter to its spindle until I can slip it readily on its shaft when I bend the tripping stationary. I set framing lever in middle of its travel and frame the film when threading by looking through lens and pressing film as frame. Also, I stamp the machine and watch for Mr. Ghost on a title. If the strokes are upward I advance shutter a trifle; if down, I back it up until I am always get it exactly right so to very short while. This is, I think, even better than Washington. Hope I may say. Thanking you for help in the past, I trust these suggestions will be of assistance to some brother operator."

I think, Los Angeles, these matters have been set forth in The Column before, but nevertheless that explanation in somewhat different form does not come at all amiss. Many thanks. Come again.

Daylight Screen.—Baltimore, Md., writes: "Am in moving picture business. Own an open air[illegible]. Is there any successful method of projecting moving pictures in daylight? Was told to seek information from you. August Pahl, 917 Duncan place, Baltimore, Md."

I have taken the liberty of giving the full address this time to the end that any one who is posted in the matter of daylight projection, or who knows where the new patent daylight screens may be had will be able to supply the desired information direct. Personally the writer knows that pictures are being projected, with at least some degree of success, in broad daylight, but where the screens are made or who makes them he does not know. One scheme is to divide the screen up into a lot of little squares, just like a great checker board, each square having raised sides. These sides are painted dead black with their bottom white. That such a screen would be successful goes without saying in so far as the mere ability to see the picture in daylight is concerned. But it also follows that the audience would have to be seated pretty nearly squarely in front of such a screen. Any one having information concerning this matter is invited to send it in to The Column, also to send it direct to Mr. Pahl.

A Suggestion.—Appleton, Wis., sends in suggestion for an improvement to the Powers lamp. It looks very good and I have referred it to the Powers Company. For the benefit of any operators who wish to do as Appleton has done, however, I will set the matter forth. He has a late model Powers lamp on which is an arrangement for swinging the top carbon arm sidewise to line the top and bottom carbons with each other. He has attached to the end of the rod another rod with a universal joint, extending this extension rod outside the lamphouse through a slot cut beside the door. On the end he has placed a wooden knob and he can now turn the rod and swing his center to one side or the other at will without opening the lamphouse door.

From Far Off Salt Lake City.—Mr. Edward F. Hartford, a Salt Lake City operator writes as follows: "Have been a reader of The Column for quite a while and have found it a big help in righting some of my troubles. * * * I note several queries concerning the Powers No. 5, particularly regarding the setting of its shutter so as to eliminate the travel ghost. Here is my method: raise the framing lever as high as it will go, thus lowering framing carriage to the lowest point. Turn flywheel in the direction it runs until pin of camwheel is directly over the shaft—that is to say, it is at its highest point in its revolution. Now (having first loosened the screw holding it to its shaft, of course), slip the shutter around in direction it runs until the Flicker Blade covers the aperture. Tighten the shutter on its shaft again and the job is done. This method I have found to be eminently satisfactory and it has never failed me. I trust this will prove of use to some brother operator. If so, I shall feel amply repaid."

Salt Lake City also remarks on the losing of the lower loop on the ——— machine. Says he has had the same experience but has found it to be the fault of too tight a takeup tension. As regards the method of setting the No. 5 shutter, it merely illustrates the fact that none of us ever get too far along to learn. I have tested out Salt Lake City's method and it is absolutely correct. Also it is perfectly simple. I have learned something. Many thanks, Salt Lake City, both on behalf of the Editor and our readers.

Dirty Sprockets.—St. Louis, Mo., writes: "Does or does not the dirt which gradually collects on the face or rim of the sprockets do any harm? Can you tell me some quick easy method of removing same. I clean off the face of all my sprockets every day before the first show. The operator of a nearby house ridicules me for it and calls me a grandmother.' What do you think about it?"

I think the operator of the nearby house simply makes a display of his ignorance. Certainly the dirt does harm. It most decidedly makes the film jump if it is on the intermittent sprocket and helps along any inclination the film may have to climb the teeth of the other sprockets if it is on them. The best, easiest and quickest method of cleaning the sprockets is by brushing them with a stiff bristled toothbrush. Every operating room should have a toothbrush for this purpose. In this connection let me again say that the whole machine should be kept scrupulously clean. A dirty, oil-covered machine infers a sloppy workman. A sloppy workman in turn infers almost anything else than a first class show.

Rheostat Coils.—Topeka, Kas., asks if there is such a thing as a resistance coil that can be used singly on 110 volts? Presumably Topeka means is there a coil of approximately the size and length of an ordinary rheostat coil which may be used on 110 volts pressure. Yes. One company makes a coil of this sort which delivers three amperes on 110 volts when working alone. Any number of them may be hitched in multiple, each added coil increasing the amperage by three. A rheostat is now being put out which is made up of these coils, or it is about ready to be put on the market at least. I'm not sure that it is actually out yet.

Ghost Trouble.—Portland, Ore., writes: "The Operator's Column is what I look for first when I get the World. It certainly is a big help to us out here in the woolly west where we don't claim to know all there is to the game. Now friend Richardson, I am up a tree and want help. A friend in a neighboring city has installed a ———— machine and is having a lot of trouble. He throws 70 feet, uses an Allen adjustable lens and a current saver called a "Formostat." The picture cuts sharp enough so far as focus goes but he can't get enough light on the screen. Have used 6½ and 7½ condenser, two 7½s and a 6½ and 9, but the result is the same. Have moved lamphouse close to the machine and pulled it back until ghost is eliminated but the latter movement results in showing two distinct circles of light on the curtain; also the picture was very dim. I adjusted the carbons as you have directed, placing the lower a trifle in advance of the upper and the light was perfect at the arc, but a true spot we were unable to get. Another thing I noticed: whenever film is in the machine the lens is in perfect focus, but as soon as the machine is run the field shows slightly out of focus. I use an Edison projector in my theater and have never had this happen. Do you suppose the above trouble may be due to condenser casing being out of line with the aperture, causing the true focal point to be above or below the aperture? I trust you will be able to help us in this matter as my friend is losing a lot of business and worrying himself silk through inability to project a good picture."

Well, friend Portland, you have sprung a pretty stiff one. I am inclined to believe the main trouble lies in that "Formostat" (what in thunder ever that may be). Two seven and a half condensers should be all right so far as the condenser lenses be concerned. Possibly your condenser is too high or too low and also that it does not set square with the aperture and that the lenses are not square with each other. Look well to all these points, though none of them should or could hardly be charged with so serious a state of affairs as you describe. The ghost may possibly be caused by having your lower carbon too far advanced, thus causing the lower carbon tip to interfere in the light. As to the film showing out of focus: are you sure your machine is not vibrating badly or that the projection lens is not vibrating or that the lenses of the projection lens are not loose in their holders and vibrating? Also that there is no dirt or oil on the lens anywhere. Any one of these things might possibly produce the effect you describe I believe. As to the two rings of light when you pull the lamphouse back, you've got me, Portland. Never saw that particular effect caused in that particular way. The two rings I have often seen present but they were multicolored and due to carbon set. They were present at any position of the lamphouse. And now I think I shall pass this matter along to our readers, reminding them to set forth their views of Portland's trouble. I have also referred your letter to the manufacturers of your machine who will write you personally. The fault is not in the machine, I think.

Ghost Trouble.—Kansas (name suppressed by request), asks the cause of the dark spot in the center of his curtain. Says he has tried moving lamp backward and forward as well as the whole lamphouse. Has carbons set as per my directions. Uses A C and an economizer. Asks what focal length condensing lenses he should have. Says test picture at 40 feet.

I think, neighbor, you probably have your lower carbon just a little too far in advance of the upper one. This causes the lower tip to burn so that it interferes with the light, causing a shadow on the curtain. It is also quite possible that your condensing lenses are of wrong focal length. Measure them as directed in a recent edition of the Columns. Get two 7" lenses. On page 187, August 7, 1909, issue of The World I set forth fully the matter of setting the carbons and gave nine illustrations of right and wrong ways to set them. I would recommend that Kansas procure that copy of the World and study it carefully. It must be understood thoroughly that setting carbons for alternating current is, if best results are to be had, very close work. The difference of less than an eighth of an inch in advancement of the lower carbon will totally alter the position of the crater as well as change other conditions. They must be set exactly right and be kept that way.

THE INTERCHANGEABLE SPROCKET.

"What great events from little causes spring!" The little teeth on the sprocket wheel of the moving picture projector may be said to control the entire industry. As the reader knows they form part of a valuable patent. They are vital in their mission to the complete carrying out of the fundamental principles of both taking cameras and projectors. In other words the intermittency of film movement. They are given to wearing out on one side, and, then, in their contact with the film they abrade or disturb the perforations. The result is tribulations. The interchangeable sprocket is designed to avert this. When the teeth are worn out you can unscrew the washer at each end of the spool and you will find the sprocket disk with the little points on it, which you can turn around and thus get the effect of an entirely new sprocket, or you can keep a supply of sprockets for the purpose of renewing the efficacy of this most vital part of the machine. This is one of those excellent ideas which make one say: "Why was not this thought of before?" Anyhow, here it is, and we recommend exhibitors, exchanges and others to get in touch with the Motion Picture Machine Repair Works, at 131 West 24th street, New York city, so as to learn all about the practical advantages of this ingenious little device.

NEULIGAN & BOGGS OPEN AIRDOME—PUT IN HALLBERG ECONOMIZERS AND SEARCHLIGHT.

Mr. George Nelligan, manager of the above theater at Third avenue and German place, New York city, has worked out a novel advertising scheme. It consists in mounting a searchlight on top of the operating booth of his open Airdome and playing the powerful stream of light on the public and on the buildings in the neighborhood, thus attracting attention to his show. The outfit consists of a "Hallberg" Economizer, upon which is mounted a specially constructed searchlight, which is adjustable for any position. Mr. Nelligan has also installed a complete "Hallberg" machine and Economizer equipment and on pleasant evenings is playing full house to a seating capacity of 1,800. Mr. Nelligan has expressed himself as much pleased with this scheme of advertising, which has so far proved very attractive and profitable. Mr. J. H. Hallberg, of No. 30 Greenwich avenue, New York city, furnished the entire equipment.

"AN OPEN MARKET AND AN OPEN DOOR"

We want to thank those Exchanges and Exhibitors that stood by us so nobly last week in our fight for the open market built on quality. There is only one great principle involved in this fight and that is—AN OPEN MARKET, and you and we are going to win.

From Our Standpoint. The right to sell our product direct to you. We refuse to hand our business over to competitors and to entrust our goods to men who selfishly conspire to effect our and your gradual elimination and eventual Commercial Destruction.

From Your Standpoint. You demand the right to buy from such manufacturers who have what you want without being compelled to take a complete program and be used as a dumping ground for a program stuffed and padded with a product made by unknown manufacturers and sold under fictitious names.

We are not afraid to sell our goods in competition. Not so our competitors. Because they have carefully planned to Monopolize the Independent Market, Factories, Exchanges and Exhibitors and in this they are doomed to certain failure. Remember we are not organized for profit. Each concern will sell you direct. We are banded for your and our mutual protection and United We Will Win.

AMONG THE EXHIBITORS.

In Canada the pictures seem to be doing well, for news from this corner reports that the Elite, the Colonial, Dreamland, Starland, Unique, Pastime, Princess and Lyric are all playing to increased business and look forward to a bright future, in Winnipeg.

The Elite Theater, of Nashville, is also doing good business, as is the Dixie.

Capt. W. D. Ament, who is well known in show circles and along the Pay Streak, recently sub-leased the Marlowe Theater from Frank L. Long. The Marlowe is located in Jackson, Tenn., and will be run as a popular priced vaudeville and picture house.

The California Theater, located on Broadway, San Francisco, has changed its policy somewhat, running pictures through the week and vaudeville on Sundays only. Mr. Ben Michaels is in charge of this theater and under his skillful direction the success of the house is assured.

The new Grand Theater, which recently closed its doors in Winnipeg, Canada, is said to be the largest motion picture theater in the Dominion, having a seating capacity of some 1,200. Mr. Klein, who runs the Elite Theater, is now manager for the Grand and, from his past reputation, success seems assured.

Mr. Riffe H. Smith, of Oskaloosa, Kan., recently opened a new motion picture theater in that city.

A. M. Henry recently opened a motion picture house in Cole Camp, Mo. Mr. Henry was formerly a band leader.

Reports from Iowa City, Ia., proclaim another victoy of the film over vaudeville, for the Bijou theater there has closed the vaudeville to devote its entertainment entirely to pictures.

The Imp Films seem to be making a decided hit in Nashville, Tenn. Mr. William Wassman, manager of the Crystal Theater there, says that where there's an Imp there's a crowd.

The Latts Brothers, present owners of the Bijou Theater, at Ashland, Wis., have purchased the Crystal Theater, located in Antigo, Wis., from Bouter and Kelmon. The Latts Brothers took charge of their new house on June 1, 1910.

The Unique Film Exchange opened a branch office in the same building with the Happy Hour Theater, in El Paso, Tex., and will supply, through this branch, Mexico, New Mexico and Arizona. Mr. E. H. Duffy is the local manager.

From Louisville, Ky., comes a report that the moving picture theaters are very prosperous. The Hopkins, Orpheum, Princess, Columbia and Crystal Theaters are in the lead there.

AN EXPLANATION AND A PROTEST.

Albion, N. Y., June 13, 1910.

To the Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—As you probably noticed, the Official Organ of the Independent branch, the Moving Picture News, in the issue of June 4th, reprinted a letter on "The Morals of Moving Pictures," which I wrote to the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle. Because the text of the letter was more favorable necessarily to the M. P. P. Co. than to his side, the editor jumped to the conclusion that it was written by some one connected with the "Trust," to injure the competing side. I enclose a letter which I have sent to the News, with a copy of the attack which called forth my letter, both of which are self-explanatory.

Yours truly,

B. G. DRUMMOND,
321 University avenue, Rochester, N. Y.

Albion, N. Y., June 13th, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture News,
New York City:

Dear Sir—It has been called to my attention that in your issue of the 5th inst. you reprinted my recent letter to the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, implying that it was written and the publication secured by the "Trust," with the purpose of damaging Independent films in the eyes of the public. Such was not the case. I, an exhibitor of motion pictures in Albion, N. Y., as I signed myself in that letter, wrote the article in reply to a criticism of moving pictures as a whole, which appeared a short time before in the same columns, a copy of which is enclosed. It was solely because I did not relish seeing the whole motion picture industry condemned for the fault of a very small minority, that I wrote the letter. I sent it by mail to the editor of the paper, without comment, and he published it without remuneration.

As an exhibitor, I do not experience any more pleasure in parting with my two dollars each week than do any of the thousands of others who have become addicted to the habit. I am predisposed to patronize the free and unshackled distributors of films, but I must have quality! There are makers of pictures in the Independent ranks who are decidedly a credit to the trade; one in particular, a recent addition to the producers, all of whose subjects I should be glad to show; but they are so much in the minority to the other kind—the kind who were responsible for the attack which I answered—that like many others, I shall continue to contribute my two per, figuring it out as a dime for protection, a quarter for royalty, and $1.65 for the assurance of the best quality the market affords—until I find I can get as good programs from the other side of the business. Then I'll flop.

My assumption that the pictures which were referred to as especially bad, were imported independent subjects, was correct, as I learned in an interview with the critic after the publication of the letter which you reprinted and criticized. I am not in any way interested in the M. P. P. Co., except as it is a force working for the betterment of the business; I am intensely interested in seeing the motion picture come into its own, and that alone was my reason for stating in the press facts which aroused your resentment. I hope and believe that they will cease to be facts after the passage of time has shown all the manufacturers you represent that quality spells success.

B. G. DRUMMOND,
Proprietor Bijou Theater, Albion, N. Y.

(From the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, May 12, 1910.)

Thinks Picture Shows Objectionable.

To Editor of the Democrat and Chronicle:

Sir—Moving pictures have come to be the most popular form of entertainment offered to the people. Wherever you go, in city or town, you will find the moving picture theater doing business. In the larger cities the patronage accorded them is so large that the receipts of the more pretentious theaters have been seriously affected, and in New York City, half a dozen of the older vaudeville and melodrama houses now echo with the click of the reels. The nickelodeon has certainly caught the popular fancy; to-day more than 12,000 moving picture shows are operating daily in this country. To provide pictures for these places, about thirty theatrical companies are continually employed in acting scenes before the camera and a million and a half feet of new films are put out each week. On these films Mr. Edison, who holds the patents on the moving picture processes, draws royalties of half a cent a foot, or more than $7,000 a week.

Inasmuch as these moving picture theaters have an estimated daily attendance of 5,000,000 people it becomes a matter of public concern what sort of pictures are displayed. A state law forbids the presence of children at these places unless attended by parents or guardians, but the law is a dead letter in many places; children of all ages are freely admitted if they have the price. The manager of such a place cannot make his selection of films, but must take what comes to him on his standing order, unless it be for special occasions, and so it often happens, no doubt, that pictures are shown that do not represent the taste of the manager.

A record faithfully kept of pictures thrown upon the screen in one town during a period of three months showed that 60 per cent were not of a character to be seen by a mixed audience. Some were positively bad and degrading and corrupting, others portrayed scenes of murder, burglary, robbing, assault, divorce, etc. A child should grow up to loathe impurity and young women should abhor marital infidelity, and yet, if they are constant attendants at the average moving picture show, they will have put before their eyes, scenes of married life which will make them familiar with a kind of life which goes beyond the limits of respectability and decency.

Many of the subjects presented are of a kind which makes for good entertainment and instruction, but if any one who is a habitual patron of these places will take pains to check all the pictures he sees he will find that more than half the reels contain films which portray suggestive and melodramatic subjects which are no better fitted for the eyes of a boy or girl than are the wicked words for their minds. Children should not be permitted to go to these places without adult escort, for more reasons than one, and some pretense at least should be made of enforcing the law.

The moving picture shows in Rochester are, so far as my knowledge goes, models of their kind, and yet at one of these I once saw a series of pictures which would have justified the mayor in closing the place had he been present to look upon them. I. H. B.

THE EXHIBITOR'S GOLDEN TIME.

Dothan, Ala., June 8, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—Under the above caption, which I have noticed in your valuable paper, I would like to have a few words. First, I would like to say that my brother in the Northwest is in too small a town to make any money. I am in a town that claims 10,000. Of this number there are about 4,000 blacks. I have had the fight of my life to make a success of the motion picture here. The trouble that I have gone up against is the fact that those who should be the real promoters of moving pictures, viz., the manufacturers and the renters, have not catered to the trade of the small towns. The exhibitor in the small town is the fellow who needs help and needs it bad. When a special release is made, the price is so high that it is out of the question for me to get it, and when the price declines low enough it has been forgotten by the public. I do not wish to cast any reflection on the exchange that I am now getting service from. They have treated me better than I have ever been treated by an exchange before, and I have taken to going to church on Sundays since doing business with them. I think the Patents Company (who are the licensed manufacturers, I think) should equalize the exhibitors' royalty as they promised to do. They get $104 a year out of my theater. This amount would keep a high grade moving picture machine in my theater. The exhibitor in the large city needs no help. He can look out for himself. He has thousands of people out every night looking for amusement, and if he has the goods they will patronize him. Not so in the small towns. I have to offer all inducements available to get two hundred out. There are various causes for the exhibitor's failure, the principle one being his lack of knowledge of how to please the public. Hoping you will find space in your columns for this article, I am, Very respectfully,

SOUTHERN EHXIBITOR.

WHAT THE MANUFACTURERS ARE DOING.

MELIES NOTES.

"White Doe's Lovers" is the interesting release of the Melies Star Films this week; and without fear of contradiction, this may be called an Indian picture par excellence. The producer has staged a stirring drama of the love of a white cowboy and an Indian warrior for a red-skinned maiden, who is something of a coquette. She finds it hard to choose between them, and leaves it to their valor in personal combat.

This duel is a terrrific affair in which the best man wins, carrying away the willing captive, while the horse of the defeated champion sniffs in surprise at the dead body of his master.

On the same reel is a pretty comedy entitled "The Stranded Actor." These two make a great double-header, which are sure to boost the stock of Melies away above par.

The release of June 30th is another great Mexican picture. It is a comedy drama of love and horse-racing, which bears the title of "The Ruling Passion," the reference being to the Mexican's love of chance.

EDISON SHORT COMEDIES GROWING IN FAVOR.

"There's Jones again!" a "fan" was heard to say in one of the local theaters on a recent evening while one of the Edison picture comedies was being run, and judging from the audible hum that swept over the audience at the same moment, he was not the only one who had made the same discovery.

It was "Jones" all right. There was no mistaking that rotund figure and that good-natured, mobile face so easily wreathed in smiles or in the most convulsing of grimaces. "Jones" (stage name, of course) is in a class all by himself when it comes to the interpretation of comedy roles before the camera. He was the most popular actor in that field of the motion picture a year or two ago, and the Edison Company made a "ten-strike" when they brought him out of retirement to act for their films. So far he has appeared in two productions, "Fortune's Fool," released May 24, and "Mr. Bumptious on Birds," released June 7.

This "Mr. Bumptious on Birds," suggested possibilities to the Edison producers, and as a result they are preparing to produce a series of short comedies with "Bumptious," a fat little man who is "all swelled up" by his own importance, as the principal figure. This part has been entrusted to "Jones," and a rattling good choice was made in giving it to him. If the producers overlook any opportunity for comedy in the scenario "Jones" may be expected to develop something in the rehearsals. Other characters which appeared in the first production will be preserved throughout the series—"Bumptious'" wife, his cook, his two angular friends and his hoodoo, the girl who chews gum. The latter character, by the way, is a bit of original work that deserves recognition.

The next of the series, "How Bumptious Papered the Parlor," will be released on July 15, after which comes "Bumptious as an Aviator," to be released July 29.

The Edison Company is receiving many compliments on the splendid work done by the portion of their Stock Company and photographic staff engaged in the pictures recently produced in Cuba. The first of these, "The Princess and the Peasant," released May 17, is generally conceded to be an extraordinary film in both dramatic and photographic excellence, while "Sisters," released three days later, although less sensational, is equally as good from a photographic standpoint. Another of these, "A Central American Romance," was released on the 17th inst., and several more are promised for the near future. An occasional change of locale always lends to the success of pictures, and the Edison Company certainly chose wisely when they selected the wonderful scenery of the West Indies as the natural setting for some of their dramas.

The child actress whose work attracted such favorable attention in Richard Harding Davis' "Her First Appearance," will again be seen in "Bootles' Baby," the dramatic subject to be released on June 21. This film, which has a strong military flavor, is interpreted by a special cast headed by Robert Conness, in the title role of "Bootles," the good-natured officer of the "Scarlet Lancers," an English regiment. The title of the picture suggests but little of the dramatic strength of the story it tells.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Lo! the Conquering Hero comes! As usual the Vitagraph Company is "Johnny on the spot," and will be right in line at the head of it with pictures of the reception to Theodore Roosevelt on his return to his native heath on June 18th. The recent grand coup d'etat of the Vitagraph in securing pictures of the King's funeral is fresh in our minds. This and their general activity in the doing of things has made them known throughout the world as real live, go-ahead and get there people. The great aquatic and land reception and processions in honor of "Our Teddy" will be presented to the public and world at large in a most comprehensive and thorough Vitagraph fashion.

And still they come! This is direct evidence of what the Vitagraph pictures are doing every day—not only amusing and entertaining the public but getting right into the hearts of people by bringing before them real life portrayals that win them and set them to thinking in the right direction. To get at the story from the Freeport, Ill., Press of May 26th:

"A touching episode occurred yesterday morning at the Majestic Theater where Manager Guiteau was showing a Vitagraph picture entitled "Convict No. 796." Just before the show opened Mr. Guiteau noticed two poorly dressed men enter the playhouse and as they acted as if they did not want to be noticed, he kept his weather eye open. Just before they entered he had seen them looking at the posters which advertised the picture. When inside they stood well in the rear of the house and after the picture was finished, Manager Guiteau asked one of them, whom he saw holding a handkerchief to his eyes, what he thought of the film. While the tears streamed down his face the fellow replied sobbingly: "Too near home, pard."

The Japanese are a wonderful people, extremely poetic in their natures. Sir Edwin Arnold, the great English author and poet found in Japan his ideal of femininity and wrote many a sonnet in commemoration thereof. "Ito, the Beggar Boy," is a dramatic creation of the love and devotion of a little Japanese boy to the baby daughter of his benefactor and nothing can approach in fiction or fact anything more penetratingly pathetic and idealistic than the noble spirit of little Ito.

The scenic splendor of this picture is an artistic companion piece to "The Love of Chrysanthemum," which has already been issued and endorsed a marvel of beauty. "Ito, the Beggar boy" is announced for June 18th, the same day as Col. Theodore Roosevelt reappears in our midst—and like him, the observed of all observers.

This is the month of daisies. Here are two: "The Little Mother," on June 21st, and "By Faith of a Child," on June 25th; the former emotionally dramatic and the latter dramatically emotional with one of the most exciting episodes of rescues from pending death through the intercession of a child and her wild ride to deliver her father's pardon just as his execution is about to take place.

"Old Glory," the Vitagraph feature film which everybody is waiting for, will unfurl its graceful folds upon the breeze of popular approval on Saturday, July 2d, and majestically wave from the pinnacle of Vitagraph standard and motion picture supremacy, a thing of beauty and a joy forever. Patriotism will give vent to pent up enthusiasm as the people behold this magnificent tribute to the flag of our nation. The mighty banner of freedom and amnesty to all. No cannon's roar or musket's boom are necessary to fill your theaters and airdomes with the enthusiasm and spirit of the Fourth of July. "Old Glory" will suffice. Secure it now and a rousing big audience with full lobbies and still a coming will be yours. The Vitagraph Special "Old Glory" poster will help some.

LUBIN NOTES.

The Lubin Company announces Apache Gold for its release of June 27th, the story having been written by a contributor to many of the best known magazines. The story possesses that twist of originality that is a hall mark of the Lubin western releases, and the concluding scenes are a genuine novelty. The release for the last day of June, Faith Lost and Won is another interesting contribution to the western stories, telling of a woman hater who goes to a ranch to escape women and winds up by marrying the girl owner of the adjoining ranch.

One of the stories recently accepted by the Lubin Company for early production is the product of a former English prize fighter now an exponent of physical culture in a western city. He is the author of a couple of books on culture topics and is now working on a novel of ring life. He is a find of the Lubin Scenario Department and has been developed into a writer within the last three months. The accepted story does not deal with the ring.

Percy, the Cowboy, has scored an unanticipated success. It was regarded as a clever idea when it was published, a sound comedy picture, but scores of managers have taken the trouble to write of their appreciation of the subject. The story is unique in that it was written, staged, photographed and edited by the same man, one of the Lubin directors.

SELIG NOTES.

Fred Walton falls before the moving picture camera and becomes a Selig feature in the master comedy production "The Hall Room Boys." Mr. Walton is known throughout America and Europe as the monarch of silent comedy and the recruiting of such a well known actor to picturedom can but reflect with credit upon the aggressiveness of Selig, whose motto is and always has been to obtain the best irrespective of cost.

An early release by the Polyscope will be a big dramatic picture revival of "The Phoenix," with Milton and Dolly Nobles in their original parts. We have noted the great interest exhibitors in general manifest in seeing their old time dramatic favorites in the plays in which they were so familiarly known and in presenting Milton and Dolly Nobles in "The Phoenix," one of the greatest of the well-known plays will be given to picturedom. It is sure to create a demand for this class of subjects.

"The Red Man's Way," is a new one on the way and the story runs as follows: An Indian farmer and his wife protect and secrete a gambler who has injured a cowboy in a fight over a game of cards. The gambler repays the Indian by stealing the affections of his wife, a beautiful Indian woman of eighteen. Great is the dismay of the Indian on finding his wife in the arms of the white man whom he has befriended. His first thought is to kill the destroyer of his home, but he decides to give the squaw to the gambler and when she attempts to take her infant, the Indian interposes. "You take the squaw, the child stays with me." Five years later, we see the effects of the union between the gambler and the squaw. He has become a confirmed drunkard and the squaw through abuse, neglect and hardship, is dying. The Indian learns of this and his manner of vengeance is unique, and gives this picture story its name.

Hal Reid has been specially retained by the Selig Polyscope Co., and will appear as Tom Logan in "Human Hearts," the part created and made famous by him. Every effect is being made to make the master drama of far reaching merit and should prove a glorious success as Mr. Reid is one of the best known actors of America.

TWO REMARKABLE FILMS.

Pathe Freres will release "Caesar in Egypt" on June 27, the second of their colored Egyptian series. The first of this series was "Cleopatra," which met with such excessive approval that in presenting "Caesar in Egypt" Pathe Freres feel diffident when they state that if anything the interior settings of this film may be said to be even better than those in "Cleopatra." The actors are leading French artists, M. C. Moreau as Caesar, Mme. Delphine Renot as Tagra, and Mlle. Rianz as Tsit. The mise-en-scene bears the hall-mark of a consummate knowledge of the art and science of staging and it is certain that its indisputable merits will assure for this film warm praise.

On July 6 Pathe Freres release their next colored art film, "Love Ye One Another," which tells the story of a poor outcast who, although willing, is unable to obtain food or work. The picture concludes with his death after rescuing from a fire a boy who had only a few minutes previous refused him a bite of bread. This fire scene is the most realistic thing of its kind ever staged, and it is marvellous to see the burning rafters falling all around him in the blazing house as he carries out the lad, half-suffocated with the blinding smoke.

GREAT NORTHERN FILM COMPANY.

Great activity prevails at the headquarters of this company, who have enlarged their producing capacity with great care and cost. Vast expenditures are being made in elaborate productions that will startle and surprise the moving picture industry. Contracts have been entered into with the principal actors of the Royal Theater at Copenhagen, insuring perfect and artistic interpretation of specially selected features, full of life and animation, and will afford splendid scope for the fine photographic quality for which the Great Northern people have distinguished themselves. Exhibitors catering to appreciative and good-class audiences should not fail to make it a point to include this company's product on their programs.

CAPITOL FILM COMPANY.

"Cash on Delivery."

No expense in securing the services of the best actors and actresses to produce this picture has been spared. A contract for one year has been signed with the smallest and most talented child actress in America, whose name will be withheld until the picture has been released. The above named scenario has been written around her, giving her excellent opportunity to display her ability. The stage settings are superb, showing a noticeable lack of scene paint, as for the most part the scenes are laid among rugged and picturesque natural settings. These facts, coupled with the splendid work of Mr. James and little Audrey, are sure to make "Cash on Delivery" a much-talked-of reel, and one that is sure to please even the most critical of motion picture lovers.

THE MARKED TIME-TABLE

How Criminals are Made by Blind Maternal Love

This Biograph production shows a powerful lesson to over-indulgent mothers, whose maternal love works a most disastrous effect on their children. The young man in our story has fallen into evil company and his scrapes are always covered by his mother, making him bold enough to go to greater lengths, until finally he commits a deed that serves him as a bitter lesson, and realizing his own worthlessness he firmly resolves to amend. The mother also appreciates how ill-advised her kindness in condoning the boy's faults was.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

NEVER AGAIN.—Dear friends, avoid two things in life—first being a peacemaker, despite the praise showered upon such an act, for you will always get the worst of it, second, helping a friend to wreak revenge, for though you may have favor it is bound to result calamitously for you, in other words, "Don't butt in." Clarence McKnight and Felix De Gross are rivals for the heart of pretty little Letitia Mooney, but it is evident that Clarence is the favored one. However, Letty becomes jealous of her cousin, who seems to have a leaning down in her heart for Clarence, and engages his attention whenever she gets the chance. Letty determines to pay him for this fancied wrong to bring beating with Felix. As an outcome Felix is a bit weak and colliding with another boat, tumbles over, carrying the oars with him. This leaves Letty in the careless boat at the mercy of the tide. Clarence, who has followed, appears in another boat and rescues the fair one from her perilous position by taking her aboard his own boat, towing her down the stream, while they settle their little misunderstanding. This effected, they come back to find Felix still diving after the lost Letty, who, we imagines, is at the bottom of the lake, feeling sure she went overboard when he did. So you see the reward received by Felix for being an accomplice in Letty's pique was a serious ducking and almost a dragging, for his terror has caused others to jump overboard to the rescue of the missing girl.

MAY AND DECEMBER.—As water seeks its level, so affinities will find their own, no matter what the conditions. The quartette comprising this story are of ages as the months are to each other. June, a young college boy, finds his resources in depletion, and to improve his financial condition, proposes to October, a wealthy spinster of the "where is he" stage, and is accepted with avidity, and so those two soul 'mis' mates start their engagement running. Later, December, a wealthy old bachelor, proposes to May, a pretty miss of eighteen, and the promise of fine gowns, jewels and automobiles so dear to the heart of the fair sex, induces her to accept with half hearted tolerance, hence they also start the engaged period. Everything goes finely until the quartette meet. Well, May, under a subterfuge gets December to go an errand for her, as does June with October, so when the Autumn months return they find the Spring months in their proper order of sequence, side by side, so there is nothing left for December and October but to make the best of it, and folded in each other's arms they set the fatal—that is the festal—day for some time in November.

THE MARKED TIME TABLE.—There's nothing so holy as a mother's love, and yet it may breed disaster. How often do we see a young man vicious and reckless, all because of the advantage he has taken of the kindly indulgence indured by his mother's affection for him. One would suppose that such love would prove talismanic and lead its object to thinks worthy of it, but alas, not always. Mr. John Powers, a broker and his wife are at breakfast, awaiting the appearance of their only child, Tom, a young man of twenty two. Glancing over the morning paper, Mr. Powers is astounded to read the heading "Wild Prank of Spendthrift Youths. They wreck a tenderloin bar and then settle with proprietor Tom Powers the leader." At this moment Tom appears for breakfast and receives a severe reprimand, for this is not the first unsavory incident that has been brought to the father's notice, his mother always having been the intercessor in the quarrels between father and son, her love for the boy being the power. Despite the scolding he has received, he brazenly asks his father for money. This the father sternly refuses, and the boy goes to his mother who gives it to him, begging him to mend his ways which, of course, he promises to do. However it is the same thing over again. He goes straight to the gambling parlor, where he loses it all. To make matters worse, he receives a letter from a companion stating that if he doesn't pay him what he owes he will make trouble. Here he faces more disgrace, so he appeals to his mother, who in turn appeals to the father, but in vain. Tom is now beside himself with terror, and learning that the father is to leave on a midnight train for another city to transact a business deal, having the large amount of cash with him, the boy forms a desperate plan. Knowing his father will have several hours to wait before train time, he disguises himself to burglarize. The mother, seeing the burglar at the window, and not knowing his identity, secures the money from the wallet while the father dozes, relying upon the chance of the burglar being blamed for it. To deceive the burglar as to the contents of the wallet, she places in it in lieu of the money the marked time table they have been consulting. The boy now enters and in extracting the wallet arouses the father. An alarm is given and word received that a suspect has been caught. You can readily imagine the amazement of the father when he is called to identify the suspect, his own son. The wallet is shown and one glance at its contents—the marked time table—reveals to falls fainting at his feet. The old man revives him and with the whole part of the scene intact as a fitting accompaniment of the awful narrative the lassie had told of his village, his toys and of the daughter's pitiful fate falls unconscious to the floor. A long silence and the vocal falsetto calls for an answer to his pain. In an eager and breathless he tears at the man's heart for a word of comfort. "Where is my daughter? Speak!" Silence and darkness are his answer. The lass that breached the cruel message to the aged man's ears is dead forever to death. He is alone, alone with the dead and the sea and wind howl forth their mad dirge of death and suffering.

The old blind sailor staggers forth into the night. His cries are heard along the foreshore where the waves break around him. At last as his feet strike something soft and warm. He has found his daughter. Slowly he drags her home to his lonely cabin and by it is to the old man's heart which her lover comes and with care and tenderness she is brought back to life. But there lies the other one cold in death. The two young lovers reverently cross his hands and kneel in prayer. The old blind fisherman holds his peace and they never know but that the sailor lad had given his life for the girl he loved. Only the selectman and the blind man know, and they keep their secret well.

ESSANAY FILM MFG. CO.

THE FOREST RANGER. The scene opens in a backwoods hut, the home of Dave Barlow and his stepdaughter Anna. Barlow is one of a party of timber thieves who have been working stealthily and to good profit in the government forest reserves on which property they live. Barlow and his crowd have assembled and are preparing to make another cutting. Anna tries to persuade her father not to commit the crime, describing the penalty, which means imprisonment if he is caught. He is abusive and the crowd goes out.

The next scene shows them marking certain trees which are to be cut.

We leave them here and show the office of the United States Marshal of the district. A letter has just been received, stating that timber thieves are busy on the government land. After reading the letter the Marshal calls one of his deputies, gives him the assignment to run down the men, and the latter leaves.

We next find Charles Wentworth, the deputy, reconnoitering about Barlow's place. Satisfied that this latter is one of the miscreants, he goes to the door and knocks. The door is opened by Anna, who, being questioned if her father is in, opens the door to the stranger and invites him in. Barlow, who is half drunk, greets him with a nod and Wentworth asks for a night's lodging. Barlow is suspicious but gives an affirmative answer and some time later ushers the guest into a spare bedroom.

During the night Barlow, convinced that Wentworth is a spy, resolving that "dead men tell no tales" and that a dead forest ranger is much preferable to a living one, steals quietly to Wentworth's door, tries several keys and forces an entrance. But Wentworth, who has heard the rattling of the key, is prepared for him and when the latter opens the door he finds Wentworth's gun covering him threateningly. Barlow makes the excuse that he had left a hat in the room and wanted to get it without awakening the guest. Wentworth sees the scheme, tells him to take the hat and get out, emphasizing his desire for solitude by again pointing the pistol at his head.

An hour later Barlow returns with the rest of the crowd of timber thieves, explaining to them that he has the spy at bay.

Anna now awakens, hears the men crunching about below and slips quietly downstairs. She suspects the plot and resolves to save Wentworth, who had shown his kindness to her during the evening.

Stealing out of another door, she mounts her father's horse and rides like mad for the office of the United States Marshal. There she communicates the news and her fears for Wentworth's life and begs them to come with her immediately and with all haste to save the man's life.

Returning to Barlow's place, the men have quietly entered then with a rush they attack Wentworth's door and before he can lay hands on his revolver, seize him, bind his hands and drag him out of the room.

Drunk and unsuspecting that Wentworth's rescuers are now close upon them, Barlow and his crowd torment the captive and finally draw straws to see who will have to do the job. Barlow gets the fatal straw, and, ordering Wentworth to strike a position on the opposite side of the room, raises the pistol and is about to fire when the outer door bursts open and the Marshal and his assistants, followed by Anna, enter the room. The entrance is timely and effective. Wentworth is saved and the timber thieves, securely handcuffed, are dragged from the room.

Wentworth's heart stirs with love for the girl who has saved his life and there and then he proposes and is accepted.

At last Hercules finds a way of recapturing Queen Hippolyte, by bribing with sausages Cerberus, the dog on guard at her cave, and makes her his wife.

DOES NEPHEW GET THE CASH? An old miller bonanza is entertaining some very tagged guests on the occasion of his birthday, when his nephew, dressed up in immaculate style, arrives to wish his uncle "many happy returns," etc., and perceives the crowd of beggars. The uncle tells him that if he wishes to remain his heir, he must treat the poor with kindness. The nephew has his obedience put to the test shortly, for uncle assumes various disguises to see for himself how his nephew is behaving. Everything is going swimmingly for the latter, until one day an old beggar-woman pleads for alms. Thinking she may be the uncle in disguise, he takes her home, and gives her something to eat. While she is thus engaged the uncle arrives for a short call. He is delighted to find the nephew at so charitable an occupation, but is still suspicious. He bids farewell, but while the nephew is absent for a moment he returns and quickly changes places with the woman, disguising himself in her shawl and bonnet. Meanwhile the nephew and his valet return, and feeling certain that this cannot be the uncle, the two commence a furious onslaught on the supposed woman. The nephew's horror and dismay can be better imagined than described when removing the shawl, his uncle's well-known features were disclosed, and he promptly informs the youth that he is disinherited.

LAKES AT EVENTIDE.—Along the shores of the lake in a rowboat. Unfolding to our vision a magnificent panorama of flower-covered banks backed in order by forests, table lands and snow-capped mountains.

The monks on the open road. Putting before us a beautifully toned pastoral scene such as Breton and Millet delighted to put upon canvas, our study is, however, in motion.

The Abbey of Huntingombe. Moss-covered ruins surrounded with high wall festooned by vines and crowded by mammoth old trees.

The tomb of the Dukes of Savoy. Only a little way along in the panorama we see the ivy-clad towers of these historic buildings, then soundingly glide out onto the surface of the lake where we observe the eventide. A final glorious poem of nature.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23rd

One of the Novelties of the Season

Very few persons ever get a chance to see a motion picture camera in action, but here is a chance for everyone to get into the big Lubin car with the stock company and experience some of the delights of picture making. It at first appears that the picture being made is merely to give some excuse for action, but the apparently disjointed scenes resolve themselves into a capital comedy offering. A three times winner in any house in the country.

tentions upon Clarita. He bitterly resents her preference for Tony and does all in his power to belittle his rival.

Tony is the proud possessor of a pedigreed horse whose fame is known throughout the province, so that none will face against him as no one has been tested on several occasions, only to be deprived of the stakes of victory. Many a night scheme from bets made against this animal.

One day Tony and Jose have an encounter at the cactus bend where the former is engaged in purchasing this product for the use of cattle. Manuel, the father, separates them and orders Tony away, with no credence with Jose upon his dismissal. That evening when the day's work is over Tony reveals most plans in front of Clarita's home. Tony demands to know why Manuel prefers the pedestal Jose to himself, and is told that it is on account of the former's money. Tony gains permission to call upon Clarita if he succeeds in making enough money to outshine his rival, whereupon he challenges Jose to a race.

Jose is well aware of the success of Tony's horse and is afraid to bet, whereupon the latter is in despair.

One day when he is nearing his home he is accosted by Clarita, who has been planning their mutual happiness. She tells Tony that if his horse was disguised that he could easily get a race and suggests that they paint it black. Tony agrees to try the plan and secures a can of paint with which they mark out the white spots upon the animal, after which he is entirely changed, so that none knows him.

Jose seeing the strange horse, taunts Tony with his appearance and offers to bet his money in a race against the animal. Tony appears to be reluctant, but finally agrees and rushes off to pawn his silver-mounted saddle a Mexican's dearest possession so that he may obtain money with which to bet. He also sells his sombrero, and is surprised and pleased when Clarita gives him money which she has raised on her jewels, in a like manner.

The race is run and Tony's horse wins. Jose is disgraced and disgusted, particularly as he has bet all he had upon the result. He tries to injure Tony, but is ordered off the track.

Tony is not certain of his reception at Manuel's house, and so he plans an elopement with Clarita. This is consummated, but Jose happens along and sees the ladder at Clarita's window. He arouses Manuel and they set off in pursuit of the lovers. They arrive too late, however, as a friendly priest has just united them, and, after some arguing and a display of Tony's recently acquired wealth he is forgiven and the father gives them his blessing.

She poisons the sentries and leads the Sabines into the city, where they attack the Romans. The Sabine maidens, however, seeing their fathers and brothers fighting with their husbands interfere and stop the battle and join the bands of the two bands of enemies in friendship.

The real scenes where the events actually took place are given, for the film was made in Rome amidst the most beautiful natural scenery.

PERSEVERANCE REWARDED. For weeks Max has been vainly endeavoring to make the acquaintance of a young lady living in the opposite house; her charms have captured his fancy, but his love-lorn looks and the persistency with which he lovers in the vicinity when she takes walks abroad, have not the slightest effect upon her.

He is therefore obliged to resort to stratagem. He bribes a tramp to make an assumed assault upon the damsel, courageously rescues her at the proper moment, and is rewarded for his gallantry by permission to see her safely to her door. From that day forth Max makes rapid progress in his lovemaking, and kisses are often blown across the street from one window to the other. It happens however that the two [illegible]

[illegible] scenes of Melanesia life showing the preparations for a fishing expedition, the landing of [illegible] on Tahiti as the water where they explode, [illegible] stunning the fish and allowing them to be easily caught. Also the return of the natives to the village, carrying their catches along on long strings with the brilliant pearly scales glimmering in the last light.

A CURIOUS INVENTION.—A clever scientist discovers the secret of setting back the hands of time, and invents a powder which, when placed upon persons and things causes them to go back to an earlier state. He first experiments with a hen which is successively changed to a little chicken and then to an egg. Next his wife from a middle-aged woman is transposed back to when she was eighteen, an electric chandelier to an old fashioned oil lamp, a handsome automobile to a donkey cart, and a bullock to a calf. On arriving home he finds his wife with an admirer, and forgetting that his gun is loaded with these peculiar bullets, he fires at them both, changing them back to children. At a loss what to do, he lies on himself so that he also may be of an equal age.

THE LITTLE MOTHER AT THE BABY SHOW. Calling her little girl to her, the dying mother gives her a small bank, in which has been placed the poor woman's scant savings, telling the child it is all she has to leave her, and she hopes her darling will not use them except in case of extreme need. The mother having died, it is six months later when the father brings a stepmother to his little ones. She, the little girl, does not take kindly to this invasion of the home, and clasps her baby brother to her breast as though to protect him from a foe.

The new wife makes herself at home in her new residence, and gradually begins to show her true nature and real character. She abuses the children and gives them little or no attention. She becomes familiar with the tradesmen and neglects the home. The husband suspects these things and feels disturbed at the condition of affairs. Poor little Sue is anxiously and bravely striving to care for the baby, whom she dearly loves.

While tending her charge she sees a sign announcing a baby show, and decides to enter her baby brother as a contestant for the prize. She goes home and takes the little bank containing the savings her mother left her, breaks it open, removes the money and goes with the baby to purchase a suitable outfit for him in further hope that he will win the prize. A new trouble now presents itself, her own clothes are so shabby. An idea comes to her, and she dresses in some of her stepmother's gaudy finery and goes to the baby show, proudly carrying the infant and holding her parasol pompously over their heads. She takes her place with the mothers, holding her brother in her lap. The crowds in attendance and the judges pass Sue and the baby without paying any special attention.

Back home, broken-hearted, she toddles in with her precious burden to be met by the stepmother, who is furiously angry when she sees Sue togged out in her finery. She is about to strike the child when the father comes in, stops her and after some words he orders her from the house. He asks his child's forgiveness for being so regardless of her and the baby, begs them to his breast and fondly kisses them. Little Sue asks her father to allow her to go and look for her stepmother and intercedes for her return, feeling she may have repented her actions. The father consents and Sue is quickly upon the street with her wee brother.

The stepmother meets them now thoroughly sorry and repentant, takes the baby to her breast and sheds tears of love upon its face, she stoops and kisses Sue in supplication to her to forgive her past offenses and unkindness. In response the child takes her by the hand and leads her back to her father's home, where they are united in newness of life and love.

A FAMILY FEUD.—Jack, with his M.D. diploma, starts for home. Rose graduated from the young ladies' seminary, takes the same train as Jack for home. They meet in the Pullman become acquainted, and he learns that she is going to his home town. He makes himself her logical escort and when they arrive at their destination he sees her to her door which is next to his own home.

Greeted warmly by his father, Jack tells him all [illegible]

[illegible]

BY THE FAITH OF A CHILD. [illegible] back to gentle old Stephen as A [illegible] is anxiously watching by the bedside of his ailing wife. He goes to see [illegible] the office of the settling agent. While he keeps sentinel, his little girl comes to him to tell him that her mother is dying and is calling for him. A man within himself is waged between love and duty. Love wins and weeps. It means martial [illegible] he leaves his post and runs to see his wife [illegible] she dies.

He arrives just in time to bid her a last farewell and while bowed down with sorrow a detachment of soldiers comes to the house and arrests him for breach of military discipline. He is tried by court martial and sentenced to death. His little girl, who is now left in the care of a friend [illegible] her father dearly and constantly prays for his reprieve and is determined to intercede in his behalf. Inspired with childlike faith, that her father will be saved, she goes alone to the Grand Duke Otto and appeals to him for her father's pardon.

The Grand Duke listens to her story about her dying mother calling for her father and how she went for him. The Duke is so touched by her simple and honest plea that he signs a pardon for her father and hands it to an officer to carry in haste to the place of execution, to which the soldiers are now taking the prisoner. Mounting a horse and lifting the little girl into the saddle, they ride at top speed to where the death sentence is about to be carried out, just in time to stop it. The child handing the pardon to the Captain, rushes into her father's arms crying "Papa, you are saved!" while he clasps her in his arms and weeps for joy.

WHEN OLD NEW YORK WAS YOUNG.—Love [illegible] a way years ago in old New York just as it does to-day. Knickerbocker the old Dutch beau [illegible] is wrapt up in Gretchen Medora, and accordingly keeps an eye on his pretty daughter Marie, and her love. Despite [illegible] wise to the "dear" little [illegible] of referring to the "Pharmacopoeia Medica" whenever a patient calls for treatment compounding all his prescriptions from the same box and [illegible] becomes a valuable assistant to his employer, but he considers the young fellow impossible as a son-in-law.

One day a [illegible] "knipper" sends him a letter saying that the nurse he has rented from the [illegible] is harassed and he cannot live in it. The [illegible] immediately posts a notice that he will give ten pounds to anybody who will sleep in the house one night and get rid of the ghost. Everybody is afraid until Dolph comes along and decides to take a chance and win the money. The old doctor and the tenant agree to go to the haunted house with the apparatus, feeling confident that if he can stand it they can. The three watchers crowd into the one bed and wait the coming of the spectre.

At midnight to appears upon the scene, and the ghost from the living and the tenant is enough. Leave hastily and spectacularly like a streak of lightning and Dolph is left in fear and trembling. The spook sits down to count the golden contents of a bag, then beckons Dolph to follow him, sending him to act well versed by gestures to intimate [illegible] has something to do with his interest in the spook world, then to disappears.

Determined to outwit Dolph hastens back to the laboratory and busies himself with his work and thoughts. While looking through an old book he discovers a picture which resembles the ghost and [illegible] with a note pertaining to his device. Dolph tells Marie all about his experiences and together they go to the old well and promptly [illegible] [illegible] which upon opening they discover [illegible] many jewels and great wealth. Carrying their treasure home, Dolph makes bold to ask the [illegible] for his daughter. The father is enraged [illegible] and bundle suggests [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

"$104" "$104" "$104"

I gave you exhibitors warning in my advertisement two or three weeks ago that this newest move of the trust, seeking to compel exhibitors to pay their whole year's "royalty" in advance, would work a hardship on every exhibitor who tackled it. To satisfy myself, I made a test through a friend. He paid the $104 in advance and then almost immediately "turned independent" again and demanded his money back. To date he hasn't got a red cent of it—and he never will. It was my money, but it was worth $104 to me to be able to clinch the rotten fact that exhibitors are in danger of being stung. It was well spent and it ought to teach you $104 worth of wisdom without costing you a penny. The trust is furious because I exposed their plan and published their "$104 Letter," proving still further that they hoped to work this little game on unwary exhibitors before the truth was laid bare. When you are good and ready to cut the dilly-dallying out of the film business, come to me!

THE BOSS OF CIRCLE E RANCH.—As Mary could depend upon expert help at the ranch, she decided to go to the city for a few days' visit. Before leaving she instructed Henry to look after the old man. Mary took the mail and sent it to the Lazy E Ranch, where the cattle are obtaining plenty of feed for their coming round.

Henry Thorpe was only too delighted to be of service to pretty Mary and all other days found him at the ranch. But on this day Mary was away and Henry was left in charge. Henry was very much interested in Mary, the girl with the golden hair, and attempted to kiss the girl with the golden hair, getting the cold shoulder. A violent quarrel followed between the two, which ended in Henry being ordered off the ranch. Henry, who was strongly opposed to the marriage of his son to a wife already contracted, Mary to leave the place.

It was the last straw for Henry. He had been hoping to get his father's consent to their marriage. Now he determined to wait no longer. He found the colonel in the garden and the weeping girl away.

Henry sincerely wished he had taken matters in his own hands long before, when he was half starved, poverty and behold Joe Cattrell's medicine bottles.

Dr. Bradford was quickly called but declared, in the old man's weakened condition, the least excitement would be fatal, the truth of which was soon proven for the entrance of his patient's daughter-in-law to be. Henry to return, and at the earliest again lost his temper, when he let his son passionately declared had caused Joe Cattrell's death.

Two years elapsed. Mr. and Mrs. Henry Thorpe and tiny Henry Thorpe Jr. were a modest, but very happy little family. Each day grandmother Thorpe called to see their wonderful baby, but so far the colonel had remained obdurate and years might have passed in this way had not John accidentally shot his brother while out hunting, and feeling he had been the first cause for Henry's leaving home, hurried to his father, mentioning his brother's wounds as much as possible, and urged the colonel to make what amend he could to give the boy his blessing.

Secretly glad yet desiring to save in the colonel allowed himself to be quite dragged to that modest shack and as they were all looking after the wounded man, Grandmother Thorpe stumbled over little Henry's crib before he had time to realize there was a child in the house always fond of children the little chap and sun to smile and held out his tiny hands to be taken to his grandfather's heart for good and all.

Henry's wounds were soon dressed and the brothers with their mother and Molly were delighted to behold the colonel with the baby and observe the friendship which had sprung up between them.

Heartily the old soldier asked his son's forgiveness and was no less hearty in accepting his happy little daughter-in-law.

ONE GOOD TURN.—The widow Millburn lived with her only child a lad of twelve in her little home down the country lane. The boy was her pride and also only hope of her old age for she looked with great longing to the time when he should have reached the age when he could contribute to her support, and when he fell suddenly ill late one night she was almost distracted and imagined him dying. The only doctor the neighborhood possessed lived fully four miles away. The distraught mother was torn between fear of leaving her boy alone and the horror of his dying and she powerless to help him. She determined to go, and hastily throwing a shawl about her shoulders she ran down the road. When about two miles from home and nearly exhausted the poor woman was held up by a highwayman.

Her pleadings were powerful enough to touch the heart of the bandit and he sent the mother back to her child and ran for the doctor himself.

He refused an invitation of the doctor to ride with him and unknown followed on foot behind the buggy to learn the fate of the boy.

The doctor found the boy's illness only a slight one and after reassuring the mother he started home. As he was about to step into his buggy he was stopped by the bandit who questioned him about the case and after the doctor had driven off he made a solemn resolution to henceforth lead a better life.

GETTING RID OF UNCLE.—This particular Mr. and Mrs. Newlywed were the happiest couple on earth, because they had just bidden good-bye to their guests of the summer. They were now free to enjoy their rest and quiet and also to resume their long interrupted honeymoon. To their great horror and dismay when returning from the depot they received news that an old crabbed uncle of Mr. Newlywed's was on his way to visit them and if when having met his nephew's wife to find her the sweet and amiable creature he has been told she is he will make us some very long permanent.

They are in despair until Suzanne, the maid, passes through the room. Like a flash the idea comes to Mrs. Newlywed to have Suzanne impersonate the wife and meet the uncle in her stead. Mr. Newlywed falls in with his wife's scheme and hurries to the depot to meet the uncle. In the meantime Mrs. Newlywed tells Suzanne what she FORT DU BITCHE. During the Franco-Prussian war there was perhaps more romance and tragedy than at any other time in history. The two countries would not go on to each other but in some localities there was no distinction and known daughters were wed to enemy swains and vice versa. During one great engagement the Prussians attempted to storm the walls of the fortress du Bitche, at which many were killed or left sore. The expression is very plainly shown in this picture. But little did one of the French officers know that later he was to fall in love with the daughter of one of the men he had killed with his own hands.

It happened while the French troops are occupying a small German village and notwithstanding the awful struggle, the young officer finds time to press his suit. He is a fine enough fellow, and is most acceptable to the girl. But just when everything looks bright and rosy, the girl's brother discovers that his sister has married the man who killed their father at the battle of Fort du Bitche. The denouement is unquestionable, aided by some relics of the engagement and the climax is reached when the men face each other. Cooler heads prevail, but the French officer is for the time extreme at the terrible remembrance and feeling that life holds no more charm for him, goes into his next battle with foolhardy recklessness as not when costs him his life.

TOO MANY GIRLS. Nothing so rare as a day in June except a men at the country resort which is the scene of action in our story. We see a bevy of beauteous maidens interrupted in their athletic pursuits by the unexpected arrival of IT in their midst. He is indeed IT and makes the most of the situation on the piazza and off, under the sun or in the calm cold rays of the moon. Our hero is the special object of the attentions of the stately blonde and the somewhat less stately brunette, and is the cause of much dissension between them that on each discovering that he is engaged to the other ushy foxe, a bloody battle is fought under the shade of the sheltering oak with honors even, when enter IT with yet a stately third. The battle is declared off and all make common cause against the perfidious wretch. A wild chase across country ensues. A mad whirl of floating hair, whirling skirts and silken ankles down the lane over the gate, olive barred hedge, across the cow patch and into the lake, where IT is left by the fair deceived ones to repent at leisure.

WE WANT YOUR VOTE. John Jones of Plumpton on Sour, is in the unenviable position of possessor of the vote that will turn the tide. John has a good time in the hands of the wire-pullers who are endeavoring to obtain the coveted vote, being carried about the town by the enthusiasts who wish to see their member triumphant. An amusement which leads them to no little trouble as the film portrays.

THE DEVIL'S WAND.—Tommy had stolen jam and had been spanked by his food jams and left in the dark nursery to atone for his crime. Nature appears to forget the cause of the trouble and soon sends the little one to sleep. Unfortunately straw berry jam is not conducive to sound sleep and Tommy is soon dreaming that he strikes the unconscious of a gentleman in black who gives him a magic wand with which to open his door and escape into the rest of the house where he finds the furniture and numerous customs most interesting and peculiar notes. He awakes at last to receive a fervent excitement from the paternal slipper.

AN EXCITING YARN. [illegible] to tell some stories in the drawing room after dinner and to giving some episodes of his warlike life, he holds his audience in rapt attention. In fact so well does he describe his adventures that they and we see the story told upon the screen. He takes us back to the time of Napoleon and scenes as some of the feats among the many of that period had to experience and incidentally introduces an element of humor which is as welcome as it is unexpected. The story tells of a company of soldiers who had to go on a reconnoitering march. They were not afraid of danger, and were obeyed orders, even when it came to speaking to

NEW TRUST EXPOSED

Once upon a time there were two rival film manufacturing and exchange concerns got together in an attempt to control the earth among the independent film business of the country. This combination was obviously one not to be swallowed by the trade so they gathered to a few other manufacturers and four manufacturers who had been dropped off the map of the Motion Picture Patents Company and "good" business. Old agreements were dug up and the cooperative organization with announcements of new brands of films not been sold. "On the square brother, we cannot sell it for less than ten cents per C. O. D. and if you buy elsewhere we are done off."

What Does This Mean?

It means, Mr. Independent Exchange Proprietor and Mr. Independent Exhibitor, that the combination was formed to compel you by contract to handle only the product of a limited number of manufacturers and kill all others by withdrawing support. It means that these few manufacturers would sell only their own film exchanges with territories divided between their own six directors. It means the control of the exchanges, the limiting of the number of reels available to the exhibitor, the fixing and control of prices to consumers, the raising of prices at any arbitrary proposition that they might see fit. It means the elimination of all competition and stagnation or cessation of the business.

And Why?

Because they could not make money as manufacturers trading their product among themselves and face the fair competition of other manufacturers whose productions were getting to be more in demand. They wanted money and they wanted it quick, so they figured that by binding all the buying exchanges to them by contract that one year's harvest would make each director rich. Nice scheme. But it did not work.

On The Other Side

The Associated Independent Film Manufacturers stand united for real independence, supported by the reorganized National Independent Moving Picture Alliance. Their policy is an open market and competition on quality, without obligations. So, Mr. Independent Exhibitor, help us to break up this budding trust by insisting that your exchanges give you the following makes of films:

THANHOUSER	MOTOGRAPH
NESTOR	CENTAUR
ECLAIR	CINES
ELECTRAGRAFF	CAPITOL
GREAT NORTHERN	LUX
AMERICAN KINOGRAPH	COLUMBIA

and many others, a guaranteed output of at least seven more reels per week than the output of the little trust.

Now, Mr. Exhibitor, if you are not convinced of the necessity of your prompt and decisive action to break up a pretty hold-up game we will furnish you with a copy of an affidavit sworn to in the Supreme Court of New York State that will open your eyes. If you are Independent, be strictly Independent and stand by those who are trying to save you from being cornered by a gang whose only aim is the almighty dollar.

Write the Alliance or any of the above Associated Independent Manufacturers for information where their films can be secured.

By all means be Independent while you are at it
